No excuse can be found for such conduct in the plea that the indulgence in these practices has become more innocent or less injurious to the welfare of the community than formerly. On the contrary, the evidence must be clear to all who will observe it, that the modern race course combines within its precincts a fearful list of the lowest vices that corrupt society. To the betting, always attendant on racing, has been added what is known as pool selling; a device by which men make a business of setting up a sort of lottery adjoining the race course, and enticing others to deposit small sums of money with them, for which the buyer receives a ticket, entitling him to a premium in case the horse which he selects wins the race. As these pool-sellers pay a large rental to the proprietor of the track for the privilege of selling tickets, they manage the business in such a way, that of the receipts from sales only a small amount is paid in prizes to holders of the tickets, leaving a large profit for themselves.

The allotment thus held out to the minds of a large class to grasp money without labor, has often proved a powerful incentive to theft in order to obtain the means of purchasing these pool tickets. It may be further remarked that as this is but a modification of the methods used in the lottery system, it brings with it the evil results inseparably connected therewith, and which have been so justly condemned by the legal enactments of nearly every State in the Union.

Vendors of intoxicating drinks ply their nefarious trade within the purlieus of the racing-ground, inciting the worst passions of the crowd, leading at times to brawls and even murders. Profanity is rife in such an atmosphere, and idleness is fostered in men who should be engaged in honest employment for the support of their families. Thus the existence of the race-ground in any locality becomes not only a great evil to its frequenters, but imposes upon those of the surrounding community who never visit it, the increased burdens involved in arresting and trying the criminals it attracts, and in supporting the families which it impoverishes.

We believe the laxity of public sentiment, now conspicuous respecting this great evil, is increased by the tone of a part of the newspaper press in dealing with it. The sporting columns in these journals, detailing the daily races, and advertising them as if they were a legitimate business enterprise, gives them popularity and throws a veil of respectability over their surroundings which must be misleading to the young and those who are ignorant of the laws against them. One of these laws, as may be noticed, makes the "abettors thereof, and all and every person concerned therein, either directly or indirectly," guilty of a misdeemeanor, and punishable by fine and imprisonment. Further, any person who shall print or set up any advertisement mentioning the time or place of such races, is liable to a fine of Twenty dollars. How then, can the proprietor of a public journal justify such advertisements, or escape the responsibility, both legal and moral, of aiding and abetting in the nefarious practices?

The great pecuniary gains flowing into the coffers of the proprietors and principals in this business have enabled them to silence the objections of others, whom they employ or patronize by the liberal prices they can afford to pay for services or goods. The plausible plea is put forth, that the races make business and stimulate trade, in the face of the fact that such business gives no profitable return for the money it invests from its votaries, or extorts from its victims, and thus impoverishes the many whilst it enriches the few.

It is an evil of vital and far-reaching consequence to encourage a disregard or breach of those statutes, which have been instituted as safeguards to the public virtue by the worthy and God-fearing men who have preceded us; for the reason that these enactments curtail indulgence in popular, but demoralizing diversions or appetites. Submission to law is the indispensable condition upon which we enjoy the multiplied blessings of civil society. Self-restraint in those propensities of the individual, which antagonize the general welfare, lies at the foundation of all good government; while absolute personal liberty is but another name for anarchy.

The growth of a disposition to contemn the laws is therefore to be regarded as a very dangerous symptom in any community; and they who promote such disregard are justly to be censured as among the worst enemies of the State. For if the observance of a wholesome law may be set aside in one case, why may it not with equal right be similarly treated in another?

The responsibility for the enforcement of law must rest primarily upon the police, the constabulary, the justices of the peace, the prosecutors of the pleas, and the grand and petit juries under the supervision of the Judges of the criminal courts. If they or any of them lack vigilance, or sympathize with the criminal, justice is defeated, vice triumphs, and the community suffers. The emphatic language of Judge Garrison, in his late charge to the grand jury of Camden County, New Jersey, on the subject of the races at Gloucester, portrays such responsibility in just terms. He says: "Until you have spoken, the wheels of justice are locked. The responsibility is a great one; in some of its aspects, a fearful one. What man among you would not be bowed by remorse to have laid at his door a tith of the evils that flow from the un molested opportunity for debauchery and crime! And yet at your door they will lie, and justly and doubly so, if instead of ferreting out and presenting the evil-doers for trial, and condign punishment if guilty, you choose rather to stand, not only between the law-breaker and the law, but between iniquity and the possibility of its investigation."

Great efforts are being made by those who are engaged in horse-racing as a business or a sport, to bring about the repeal of the righteous laws on this subject which now stand on the statute books of Pennsylvania and New Jersey. So far, the remonstrances of the sober, law-abiding and Christian citizens of these States have prevailed to prevent such a calamity. We fervently beseech those who are charged with the legislation for these Commonwealths to resist all such attempts, and to rise to the true standard of their responsibilities as guardians of the welfare of their constituents; and that the executive officers of the State may faithfully administer and enforce these wise and wholesome laws as rigidly as they do those against other crimes, ever remembering the Scripture injunction, that "he that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God."

Protest Against Impurity in "Fine Arts."

Our esteemed friend, Josiah W. Leeds, in his public-spirited efforts to promote the moral welfare of the community, made an appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury to prohibit the introduction into this country of a French painting of a sensual character, which it was reported had been purchased with the intention of having it publicly exhibited here. The correspondence respecting it has been published in The Christian Statesman.

While it is hoped this effort to maintain the cause of purity has been, and will be successful, it is a source of regret, that the daily papers which have commented upon it, show little sympathy with the effort, but largely give their influence to the promotion of vice and immorality — not regarding the judgment pronounced by our Saviour on him who puts a stumbling-block in the way of a brother.

The following correspondence refers to this incident:

Phila., 10th mo. 31, 1891, George S. Graham, District Attorney. Esteemed friend: I have a letter from T—— W——, son of the senior member of the extensive manufacturing firm of W——, T—— & Co.; in which the writer, at Chamounix, Switzerland, informs me that "one of the large pictures from this year's Paris Salon has been bought for exhibiting in the United States, and will probably soon be there. We have seen an engraving of the picture, which is called 'The Fall of Babylon,' and, although it is an historical subject, it is treated in a most sensual manner." Two photographs are sent me, one being of the nakedest part of the picture, which amply shows that the subject is treated in a spirit answering to the Apostle's definition of "earthly, sensual, devilish." Intending to communicate with the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to make request that he inhibit the introduction into this country of so pernicious a production, even though a "work of art," it has occurred to me to submit the two pictures to thy inspection, and, if thy estimate of them should coincide with my own, to request thee so to state in writing, that I may forward it, along with my own letter, to the Secretary. Truly thy friend, Josiah W. Leeds.

District Attorney's office, Phila., Nov. 13, 1891. Mr. Josiah W. Leeds, Esteemed friend: I cordially concur in the purpose of your letter of 10, 31, '91. I would ask that you forward it, together with this letter, and such communication as you may desire to add, to the Secretary.

My examination of the photograph copies submitted, leads me without hesitation to pronounce the originals indecent. Wishing you success in your effort, I remain your friend, George S. Graham.

"Rocouency," 11th mo. 13, 1891, Seal P. O. Charles Foster, Secretary of the Treasury, Esteemed friend: I enclose herewith a letter addressed by me to our able District Attorney at Philadelphia, George S. Graham, and his reply thereto, respecting a certain painting of a morally gross sort which has become notorious throughout France, as well as over Europe, and which, it is reliably alleged, has been purchased for exhibition in this country. It will be seen by the District Attorney's letter that he fully coincides with myself as to the indecent character of the production, would deplore its introduction to our people, and hopes that it may be held back at the threshold.

I beg leave to mention the fact that the celebrated French artist, Dore, painted a large picture of the same general sort as the above, for which two Americans negotiated, intending to exhibit it here, but, declining to pay the large sum of 110,000 francs which was asked, the artist (happily for us) destroyed the unworthy production.

At London, some months ago, a collection of five French paintings of the highly sensual sort, were placed on exhibition, but the owners being summoned before a Justice were fined, their exhibit was ordered to be boxed up, and having been placed in the custody of the police, was sent back across the Channel.

Were this pernicious painting of Rochegrosse's, "The Fall of Babylon," permitted entrance, it would be photographically reproduced in immense quantities, as has been done in Europe, and sent everywhere over the land. Incidentally, the prevention of the introduction of the picture would be likely to save us next year from the importation, for the Columbian Exhibition, of many pictures of the nude sort, such as were an offense at the Centennial Exhibition of 1876 in Philadelphia, and the effects of which, in emboldening purveyors of the indecent; were marked.

Desiring that we may be the receivers (and help others to be so) of the promise "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." I remain, very truly, Josiah W. Leeds.

Treasury Department, Office of the Secretary, Washington, D. C., Nov. 17th, 1891. Mr. Josiah W. Leeds, Sir: This Department is in receipt of your communication of 13th inst., enclosing a letter addressed by you to the District Attorney at Philadelphia, in which you call attention to the objectionable character of a painting by the artist Roghegson, called the "Fall of Babylon," and you urge some action by the Department which will prevent the importation of such painting into this country.

The Department fully sympathizes with your desire to protect the community from the baneful effects which would attend the public exhibition of an indecent picture, and has issued instructions to the Collector at New York, at which port the importation will personally be attempted, to thoroughly investigate the facts, and if your description be found accurate, to make prompt seizure of the picture, in accordance with section 11, Act of October 1, 1890.

The question as to the admissibility of any work of art, is, of course, largely a matter of private judgment. Many of the paintings contained in our public galleries are sources of discomfort and protest on the part of classes of spectators, while they are strenuously defended by other commentators as within artistic limitations; the Department has to guard against undue narrowness and severity of judgment, as well as against license and abuse of privilege. But there would seem, in the case under consideration, to be a flagrant defiance of decency and of morality, and if this be found true, no doubt can exist as to the proper course to be pursued. The Department thanks you for your timely warning. Respectfully yours, G. L. Spaulding, Acting Secretary.

Collector Hendricks, of New York, is reported as saying that he would seize the picture, should it appear there. The daily papers which comment upon the incident, are largely in favor of throwing down the barriers, and let pictorial license have free course. Publishing their papers seven days in the week, and frequently treating their readers to illustrations far removed from decency, they would realize that a degree of condemnation was laid upon themselves were this picture refused entrance. The New York World having affirmed that artists and art dealers who have seen the picture see no objection to it, concludes with the comment, of a Broadway importer of foreign works of art, that "people who are afraid of being contaminated need not go to see it." Far more frank is the conclusion of an European correspondent of the Art Amateur, who avers that the painting "will be sure to give offense because of its daring disregard of American ideas of propriety."

I surely believe that the American standard of purity is worth maintaining. We have it from the Winthrops, the Penns, and the Wesleys, and, I trust, are not yet prepared to lower it to that which obtains in Paris or Vienna. It was luxury, effeminacy and licentiousness which invited the fall of Babylon. It would be but a mockery of the "handwriting on the wall" to parade before this people a realistic representation of the lewdness which so signally brought down the judgment of heaven upon the guilty city, which, centuries ago, became "heaps, a dwelling place for dragons, an astonishment and a hissing."
JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

I should have stated above that there is a series of paintings, instead of one.

FLATTERING TITLES.—The annexed cutting from "The West Chester Local," and which seems to have been taken from the Harrisburg Independent, vindicates and commends one of our testimonies relative to giving flattering titles unto men; and which a writer in Holy Scripture testifies, "In so doing, my Maker would soon take me away."

Quaker customs are of a plain, common-sense character, which, when fully considered and properly understood, says the Harrisburg Independent, commend themselves to men of dignity. For instance, what is there in the prefix "Mr.," as applied to a man, or the affix "Esq.," in the same connection? Neither is used by the Quakers, and they are right, for there is no meaning in either. Plain "John Smith," "Jacob Jones," expresses all that is needed in such references, as it tells who the man are, without regard to affix or prefix. All affixes to names in this country are anti-American in practice as well as in spirit. The Quaker idea in this relation is the true democratic practice and ought to be adhered to by all true Americans.

TEMPTED.

BY MARY B. SLEIGHT.

Two rosy eyes, whose wondering eyes
And every day a fresh surprise
Sweet Beth and Ben, with book and slate,
Trip off to school, demure and wise,
Mamma stands watching at the gate,
Where cool the flickering shadows fall,
And soft and clear they hear her call,
"Remember, darlings, don't be late."

But earth is all with life astray:
The brown bees in the clover whir,
And leaf and flower with witching rune
A search for sweeter knowledge spur
Than books can teach in sunny June;
And soon they halt below the hill
To pluck the wild rose by the mill
And hear the great wheel's plashing tune.

Half-blinded with the dazzling light,
They watch the swallows' skyward flight—
How swift and high the glad wings go!
What joy to flit from height to height!
And when at last the birdings show
Each like a far-off circling midge,
They linger, leaning o'er the bridge,
To scan the foaming brook below.

Still yielding to the June-wrong spell,
They loiter in the ferny dell,
Within the lily's painted cup
A humming-bird is hid, and here,
Oh, here is where the fairies sup.
But hark! With brazen tongue the bell
Sends far afield its warning knell:
"Make haste! make haste! the time is nigh."

At that they start, with bated breath,
And yet "Who catbs?" lisps brown-eyed Beth.
"Not I," says honest little Ben.
Between green boughs the sunbeams stray—
The schoolroom walls are bare and gray.
"Stay," softly chirps a friendly wren;
The nodding daisies whisper "Stay,"
It would be, oh, so nice! but then—

Beth shakes her head. "No; let's be hood!"
One swift look at the field beyond,
And, turning swift, they gain the goal,
Each trembling like a culprit fay,
In time to answer to the roll.
Beth smiles to Ben with cheeks aglow,
And only God's glad angels know
The victory won that rare June day.

BE SILENT.

BY E. H. STODDARD.

Let all the good thou doest to man
A gift be, not a debt.
And he will more remember thee
The more thou dost forget.

Do it as one who knows it not,
But rather like a vine,
That year by year brings forth its grapes,
And cares not for the wine.

A horse, when he has run his race;
A dog, when tracked the game;
A bee, when it has honey made—
Do not their deeds proclaim.

Be silent, then, and like the vine
Bring forth what is in thee;
It is thy duty to be good,
And man's to honor thee.

TRUTH.

Great truths are dearly bought. The common truth,
Such as men give and take from day to day,
Comes in the common walk of easy life,
Blown by the careless wind across our way.
Great truths are greatly won; not found by chance,
Nor waited on the breath of summer dream;
But grasped in the great struggle of the soul
Hard buffeted with adverse wind and storm.

Won from the Spirit in hard-working hours
Of weakness, solitude, perchance of pain,
Truth springs like harvest, from the well-plowed field,
And the soul feels it has not wept in vain.

BONAR.
"Buy the truth, and sell it not."
SOLOMON.

The following interesting account is given by the authority of the late John Newton, Rector of (St. Mary's) Woolnoth, and is to be found in his life of William Grimshaw, and appears to have been a remarkable interposition of Providence, in answer to prayer:

"There are at Haworth, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, two feasts annually. It had been customary with the inkeepers, and some other inhabitants, to make a subscription for horse races at the latter feast. These were of the lowest kind, attended by the lowest of the people. They exhibited a scene of the grossest and most vulgar riot, profligacy and confusion. Mr. Grimshaw had frequently attempted, but in vain, to put a stop to this mischievous custom. His remonstrances against it were little regarded; and perhaps any other man would have been ill treated, if he had dared to oppose with earnestness an established practice so agreeable to the depraved taste of the thoughtless multitude. But his character was so revered that they heard his expostulations with some degree of patience, though they were determined to persist in their old course. Unable to prevail with men, he addressed himself to God; and for sometime before the races began, he made it a subject of fervent prayer, that the Lord would be pleased to stop these evil proceedings in his own way.

"When the race time came, the people assembled as usual, but they were soon dispersed. Before the race could begin, dark clouds covered the sky, which poured forth such excessive rains that the people could not remain upon the ground. It continued to rain incessantly during the three days appointed for the races. This event, though it took place nearly forty years ago, is still remembered and spoken of at Haworth, with the same certainty as if it had happened but a few months since. It is a sort of proverbial saying among them, that old Grimshaw put a stop to the races by his prayers; and it proved an effectual stop. There have been no races at Haworth, or in the neighborhood, from that time to the present day."

Do the truth you know, and you shall learn the truth you need to know.

S. Kercheval, in his history of the Valley of Virginia, has the following paragraph:—

"The Indians charge the white people with teaching them the knowledge of theft and several other vices. In the winter of 1815-16, the author spent some weeks in the State of Georgia, where he fell in with Col. Barnett, one of the commissioners for running the boundary line of Indian lands which had shortly before been ceded to the United States. Some conversation took place on the subject of the Indians and Indian character, in which Col. B. remarked, that in one of his excursions through the Indian country, he met with a very aged Cherokee chief, who spoke and understood the English language pretty well. The Colonel had several conversations with this aged man, in one of which he congratulated him upon the prospect of his people having their condition greatly improved, there being every reason to believe that in the course of a few years they would become acquainted with the arts of civil life—would be better clothed, better fed, and erect better and more comfortable habitations—and what was of still greater importance, they would become acquainted with the doctrines and principles of the Christian religion. This venerable old man listened with the most profound and respectful attention, until the Colonel had concluded, and then, with a significant shake of his head, and much emphasis, replied: That he doubted the benefits to the red people pointed out by the Colonel, that before their fathers were acquainted with the whites, the red people received but little, and that little the Great Spirit gave them, the forest supplying them with food and raiment; that before their fathers were acquainted with the white people, the red people never got drunk, and never committed theft, because they had no temptation to do so. It was true that when parties were out hunting, and one party was unsuccessful, and found the game of the more successful party hung up, if they needed provision they took it, and this was not stealing—it was the law and custom of the tribes. If they went to war, they destroyed each others' property, this was done to weaken their enemy. Red people never swore, because they had no words to express an oath. Red people would not cheat, because they had no temptation to commit fraud, they never told falsehoods, because they had no temptation to tell lies. And as to religion, you go to your churches, sing loud, pray loud, and make a great noise. The red people meet once a year, at the feast of new corn, extinguish all their fires, and kindle up a new one, the smoke of which ascends to the Great Spirit as a grateful sacrifice. Now what better is your religion than ours? The white people have taught us to get drunk, to steal, to lie, to cheat, and to swear; and if the knowledge of these vices, as you profess to hold them, and punish by your laws, is beneficial to the red people, we are benefitted by our acquaintance with you, if not, we are greatly injured by that acquaintance."

READING the Bible is an excellent occupation as an incitement and a help to right living and doing. But Bible reading is in itself no substitute for right living or doing. A newspaper notice of a well-known, wealthy, retired farmer, recently deceased in Pennsylvania, says suggestively: "The only remarkable thing about his life was that during the past twenty years he read the Bible from beginning to end over one hundred times." If there be no other evidence of a man's acquaintance with the Bible than the record of the number of times he has read it, we would have to look elsewhere for proof of the worth of the man and of the Book. It were better to read the Bible once and practise its teachings a hundred times, than to read the Bible a hundred times without once practising its teachings.

FOR THE "CHRISTIAN STATESMAN."

Schemes that will make our Schools truly Godless.

In my article upon the "The Beginnings of Gambling" in the Christian Statesman of the 19th ult., reference was made to the reprehensible guessing schemes (for money) practised at a recent Roman Catholic Church fair in the neighboring town of Westchester. The success of this fair was celebrated immediately afterward by a quadrille party given by the priest of the parish to the promoters of, and some of the participants in the money-making enterprise, while, a few days later, the public was informed through a local paper, that a fine site in the town had been purchased upon which to erect a parochial school. It seemed to me that if the moral instruction prospectively to be given at that institution of learning, was to be founded upon the practice of priest and parisoners so lately exhibited, the lessons might prove to be quite as "godless" as any that would be learnt at our public schools.

Desiring to be altogether fair in my criticism, it is under a sense of humiliation that I now allude to the further fact, that, since the above occurrences in Westchester, a grand bazaar has been held in Philadelphia for the sufficiently praiseworthy purpose of raising an annuity fund for the public school teachers, but (as alleged) attended with discreditable lottery devices for raising money. The promoters of the enterprise, elated with their success, now propose to have a dance that shall bring all their teachers, with many of their friends, the alumni and pupils together, and add "a nice sum to the Annuity Fund."

Is it fair and proper that such methods should be pursued even though not officially recognized by the public school authorities? Many tax payers and contributors to the public school funds are conscientiously opposed to dancing, even though the dancing be far charitable or benevolent objects. They believe that the entertainment is of a worldly character, opposed to the Christian requirement to "live soberly, righteously and godly," and hence that their children ought not to be exposed to the pernicious example. The lottery devices, however disguised, are morally indefensible. But, the children naturally look up to the teachers as being both older and wiser than themselves, and they may be readily led to conclude that if their instructors are easy to patronize the dance and take part in schemes of chance, these cannot be very bad practices after all. The few minutes of the morning given to reading the Bible in the collection room would scarcely suffice to prevent our schools from becoming "godless" indeed were the methods above alluded to become general. The true friends of our public school system will not uphold these practices. Further, if the prevailing visitation of the grip, which has prostrated so many of our people and mortally affected not a few, has, in God's providence, any lesson for us, it is sad to consider the little impression made when so many are seen to be eager to participate in all manner of frivolity.

JOSIAH W. LEEDES.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Royal Law.

"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself"—Lev. xix. 18 and Matt. xxii. 39.

When Moses, the servant of the Lord, enunciated this commandment, he affixed the authority of him, who speaks in these words, "I am the Lord." And that same Lord, when he came on earth, as, "the Lord, our lawgiver, the Lord, our King" (Is. xxxiii. 22), "who will save us," spake of this commandment as "the second" great commandment, including our whole duty to man. No better commentary could we have than his own exposition of it, when he said, "Whosoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye also so to them," and as illustrated by the Parable of the Good Samaritan, wherein we are taught to do good to all men, and live at peace with all men as far as in us lieth. Christ our King, loved us when we were enemies, and when on earth loved and prayed for them. The sweet incense of his prayer, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," which ascended on high whilst He was offering the one great sacrifice of atonement, has never ceased its efficacy on our behalf, who through wicked words and acts and thoughts had grieved his Holy Spirit, and so were enemies in mind to Him who is altogether pure. And He commands us, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you, that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven."—Matt. v. 44.

The all creating Word is He, who gave us being, marked our lot in life, giving us all things richly to enjoy. It is through his mercy we have been forgiven, brought into his kingdom, and made fellow heirs with Him, in the promises, and his "law which converteth the soul" is a light in our path and a lamp to our feet. This King Immanuel in his new covenant writes this law on our hearts and puts it in our mind.

Now "they are the sons of God who are led by the Spirit of God." Rom. viii. 14; and "if any man" saith the apostle, "have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his," Rom. viii. 9. Seeing that each one of us must give an account of himself before God, and every man be judged according to his works, how all important is it to us to search our hearts with the Lord's candle, to see that we are indeed in the true faith, bringing forth some of the precious fruits of Christ's Spirit to the glory of God the Father.

God hath simplified his commandments to us as "love to Him supreme" and "love to his creature man," the fulfilling of the latter being the surest test of our keeping the former.

But though it is our duty "to do good unto all men," yet is it our great privilege that we may "especially" do so "to them who are of the household of faith," Gal. vi. 10; as He who is our lawgiver, King and Judge, will to his servants declare in the great day of judgment, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye did it unto me."

Let us then not only diligently hearken to the intimations of Christ's Spirit, but let us meditate on the example he set before us. Though rich, and Lord of all, needing nothing, and the giver of every good and perfect gift, "He for our sakes became poor." The delights of the King of Israel were with the poor of this world, who yet were rich in faith, and were any of us stripped of what Christ himself hath given us, whether riches, power, honor, learning, or any other gift it hath seemed meet to Aim to bestow upon us in our lot, wherein would we differ from the most destitute, weakest, despised and ignorant fellow being? He came to seek and to save the lost. The poor outcast, full of loathsome disease, found pity in his gaze. And can we doubt that since every man is accountable to God for the talent or talents bestowed on him, that we can hide these and use them alone to the benefit of self, in place of following in the Master's, and making others partakers with us, without sin?

As we watch and pray, each one waiting on his gift, we shall be made wise to discern both time and place wherein to exercise the same to the good of the brethren and to the glory of God, thus shall we obey the royal law, and the shout of a King shall be amongst us. Not only so, but in thus acting as faithful stewards of God's bounty, we shall assuredly enjoy the blessed presence of the Lord Jesus Christ himself, for He himself hath promised the servant that faithfully followeth Him, that, "where I am, there also shall my servant be," Jno. xii. 26.

"Oh, how sweet would be the fruit, if each and all of us would walk so humbly before our God, that we might through grace be enabled to so sympathize with our fellow traveller, as to put ourselves just where that tried one may be, and then in the Lord's power exercise the Lord's gift towards each other. What meekness, tenderness, love, charity, gentleness, would be found in our midst. How thoughtful should we be of each other's needs, and how constant in our endeavors to obey our Lord, and keep his commandments, and to such comes the language, "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have a right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." Rev. xxii. 14. W. W. B.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

[The following incident having frequently been related in my hearing by an aged relative, I have thought it desirable to put it in print.—J. H. D.]

A minister in the society of Friends, while endeavoring to sleep, during a dark night, became so impressed with a spiritual call to go to a certain house, and pray there, that he yielded to the requisition, harnessed his horse, and proceeded through very thick darkness to the house. He drove into a shed near by, tied his horse, and spoke to him as he passed out. Then walking round the dwelling, he entered by a door found unlocked, and falling upon his knees within the room, he prayed that no harm might come to the dwellers within the building. And that if any man had raised his hand to slay any therein, it might be palsied. Having performed his apprehended duty, he returned home. A few weeks afterwards, while visiting a prisoner, he was inquired of by one of the convicts whether he remembered going to a certain house on a dark night and praying there for the safety of the prisoner. He said he did, "Well," said the prisoner, "I was in the shed where you were leaving your horse, and had you not spoken to him I should have killed him, for I had heard of a sum of money being paid to him that morning, and my errand was to kill the members of the family, and then secure the money. But I perceived by your voice you were not the man. Then I followed you round into the house, and heard you pray. And when you asked for the murderous arm to be palsied, my arm dropped by my side, and I have not been able to use it since. I left the house, and have since been brought here, not for that crime which I intended to commit, but for one which I had committed before."

Natural History, Science, etc.

The Balance of Nature.—In some parts of England, the small hawks, weasels and owls, have been almost exterminated on account of the mischief they are supposed to do to the game birds—grouse and pheasants. J. C. Atkinson says that in the part of Yorkshire where he resided, one of the consequences of this destruction has been an inordinate increase of field mice. "My gardener killed down the mice in and about this garden last year to such an extent, that he thought there was not another left anywhere near. It is a further fact, that our first snow falling on the 27th November, the official just named saw he must set his traps and other mouse-catching machinery at work, and within the 18 days that have passed since then—he caught 35 mice in the garden."

Birds Shunning.—A water-rail was picked up on a snowy day, by a friend, who assumed that it was dazed with cold. So he brought it home with him, and laid it on a footstool in front of the dining-room fire. Five minutes passed, ten were gone, and still the lifeless bird lay as it was put down—dead to all seeming; only not stiff, as it ought to have been if dead of cold. A few minutes later my friend saw it start off in a moment, with no previous intimation of its purpose, and begin to career about the room with incredible rapidity. It never attempted to fly. Round the room, across the room, under the sofa, under the table, from corner to corner and from side to side; steering itself perfectly, notwithstanding legs of chairs, legs of tables, footstools and what not. On and on it careered; and it was not without many attempts that it was eventually secured. Within an hour or two of its capture it took quite kindly to some raw beef cut in thin long strips, and soon became tame enough to go, and take food out of its master's hand."

Tame Tasmanian Opossums.—"We have only had one of them tame, for, though we were very fond of him, he kept us in such a state of dread and vigilance, whilst he was awake, that it was resolved, nem con., never to try a second experiment of the kind. One of the men-servants brought him to me as a present, after a night's 'pos-suming,' in which the poor mother had been killed. Almost all our native animals are marsupial—that is, the mothers have each a pouch or pocket in front, in which they carry their young until the little ones are strong and active. The opossum Joeys, too, often cling to the mother's back, and make her fur all tumbled and shabby where they sit and hold on. The men who collect skins call such as these 'Joey-riders' and valueless.

"I was delighted to have my Popsy. He was such a soft, sweet-faced, pretty little thing, about half the size of a squirrel; but his delicate pink feet had very sharp claws, as my hands and arms soon bore witness. If the little girl in Punch had cuddled him, she would have said, 'Poppies had 'pins in their toes,' as well as kittens. After I got him safe in his cage, I did not annoy him by much nursing, which he evidently disliked. At first we were obliged to handle him, for he had to be fed with milk; but he soon learned to lap it for himself. He lived in his box-cage all day, curled up fast asleep in a lot of wool; but in the evening we always set him at liberty in the house till morning; and he grew fast, and fat, and handsome, and as large as a cat.

"How would you like to take your meals whilst hung up by your frock, and perhaps one foot, to the side of the room or a beam overhead, and just able to reach your food with your hands, and put it in your mouth whilst in this up-side down position?"

"Because that is the way Popsy best liked to take his supper! Mamma used to think he would choke; but papa said he admired his digestion. He might have sat comfortably beside his saucer of bread and milk, and taken it in commonplace way if he pleased, but he always contrived to hang himself up by the tail like a pendulum, and stretch his hands down for the pieces of bread until they were gone, before coming to lap the milk. Then, when he had eaten enough, his frolics began generally by a run up any coat that hung in the hall and a general clearance of the hat-pegs. Then a sudden 'flip' on the floor, and the next minute, if the parlor-door was open, he would be round the room twice or thrice like a small whirlwind, and up the curtains to the top of the cornice, which was a favorite vantage-ground, and gave him a good view of all going on below, and a capital opportunity to plan mischief. He seemed to know that he had us all at a disadvantage there, for we could not get him down without a risk of hurting him. Some times he sat for a good while so perfectly still that he was forgotten and as when he pleased, he could descend as softly as a spider, perhaps the next thing would be a shriek from some body whose elbow or foot he had gently bitten in play. I am sure he enjoyed the fun of making us start, or he would not have gone so stealthily about his little wickednesses; and he saw he made any amount of racket—leaping, running, and scrambling over, under, and round tables, chairs, sideboard, piano for we had then only one sitting-room doing double duty as dining and drawing-room. He used to make desperate efforts to get upon the chimney-piece, but fortunately it was rather high, and we guarded it with care too, or mamma's precious old china would have come to an end. A general putting away of breakables accompanied the first sounds of Popsy's awakening from his day-long slumber, and if that were inconvenient, the parlor-door was kept shut against his entrance, but in spite of every precaution, glasses, jugs, and decanters were sometimes swept off and smashed in his mad career.

"An open work-box was a great attraction to him. He would come silently and quietly on the table, and peep all round it very gravely, and then, more quickly than you could see, hook the end of his tail to the lid, and jump off. Of course there was a grand upset; reels, balls and tumbles flew in all directions, and in the same instant the rogue vanished, not to be found again until order and quiet were restored, when a pinch of some one's toe, or a tweak of Papa's coat, hair or ear told of Popsy's recovered courage and unequalled impudence.

"His tail was equal in point of use to another pair of hands. Being prehensile, (that is, able to lay fast hold), he could hang by it to anything that would bear his weight, and many were his mishaps and tumbles when mistaking movables on the table for solid parts of it. Although he had never climbed in the forest himself, I suppose his instinct led him to believe that things in a house grew altogether like the branches of a tree; and my work-box tumbling down with him was like a bough suddenly breaking off."

"I am glad to be able to tell you that our entertaining, troublesome Popsy, proved, so far as we know, an exception to the rule that pets come to untimely ends. He was so free, in every way, that we never supposed he cared to go away from us; but probably those of his kind who used to frequent our roof and garden were heard by him, and he may have joined them, for he deserted his cage one night, left his supper unsought, and never returned."—Tasmanian Friends and Foes.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

An interesting circumstance and one suggestive of the words "go thou and do likewise" has recently come to my notice. A Friend owning a large amount of unimproved ground in Camden, N. J., when selling a lot, has inserted in the deed as follows, "Provided, however, and it is hereby specially covenanted and agreed by and between the parties hereto, that the party of the second part (the purchaser), his heirs and assigns shall not at any time use or occupy said premises, nor allow them to be used or occupied, for the manufacture, storage or sale of intoxicating liquors, and this for the mutual benefit of peace and good order to the grantor, be said party of the second part, and other grantees of the said party of the first part."

I am told that this promise is no deterrent to sales of the ground, but quite the reverse—that purchasers, when they know it will apply to all ground in the immediate neighborhood, buy all the more readily. They know that the absence of intoxicants from a locality enhances its value.

Legal Restraint of Vice.—We are sometimes told by those who admit that legal restraint of the vices of society is within the jurisdiction of the State that such legislation is nugatory. "You cannot make men moral by act of Parliament," so runs the bread-bath pathos of this worn-out pastoral. Now if this means that law cannot generate inward righteousness it is true; but those who say the air of moral legislation do not propose to accomplish it by any such result; for statutes of every kind assume to deal only with men's acts, not with intentions or motives. What those who use this saying mean is that law has no efficacy in promoting morality of external conduct; and when uttered with this meaning it is the most preposterous and self-evident falsehood that ever crept into currency by the coinage of an epigram. If it were true it would be an argument against church rules and social regulations as well as against statutes.

The rules of the churches never created inward holiness—that is not their function in church economy; but they serve as an influential and wholesome discipline of conduct, and thus they help to make men moral by law. To suppose that his hoary-headedness is to be held in reverence by the young is an error. Those who quote it so flippantly omit themselves by logical conclusion to the statement that you cannot make men immoral by law. But this is notoriously untrue.

Did not the law that chartered the Louisiana lottery and authorized its roving commission of inquiry through mails and newspapers—did not such legislation, by furnishing the means and inducing the desire of an immoral temptation, make men immoral by law? Can there be a doubt that the acts of Congress which have closed the mails and press on the lottery's nefarious schemes have diminished his immorality, and therefore made moral, with respect to this vice, the conduct of many whose conduct the opposite state of the law made immoral? Do not the laws that set up saloons in Washington "thick as the leaves in Vallambrosa," presenting to the lip of every youth the allurements of a persecuting opportunity; subsidizing by pecuniary profit the greed of every publican in creating a patronage of drunkards; thrusting before the victim of every inherited weakness and depraved appetite an ever-present and multiplied temptation; creating and expanding the social usage of treating as the means of doubling indulgence; bringing into partnership the suggestions and excitement of kindred vices by lewd pictures on the walls, and the gambling-rooms—erected above—do not the laws which license these institutions propagate and foster and multiply and intensify propensities to intemperance, and thus make thousands upon thousands of men immoral by law? As long as they are permitted by law to carry on this deadly work in Christian England, America Anglo-Saxon civilization must be content to rest under the shame of that terrific indictment of that observer who called it a "hideous mixture of beer and Bible." Let him who doubts that men can be made immoral by law imagine the results of applying the license system, with unlimited publicity and freedom of catering for patronage, to the gambling-saloon; or let him imagine the effect upon society of laws permitting in our cities what was permitted in Pompeii. Just so far as present laws save us from such results by their prohibitions and restrictions, they make men moral by law, although it is freely admitted that they fail to suppress entirely the vices at which they are aimed. All statutes against crime, so far as they operate as restraints upon human conduct, make men moral by law; and so all laws against the vices of society, by the condemnation of such vices, by registering the voice of public conscience and public opinion against them, as well as using the machinery of punishment against the violators, become an important factor in promoting morality of conduct.—W. F. Hill in Christian Advocate.

In beholding the Society of Friends as it now exists, peeled and scattered, the thoughtful mind is made painfully sensible of the unstable character of man, and how from generation to generation the renewing power of grace is needed to keep him in the heavenly path and to sound principles. Other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, Christ, the heavenly teacher; and it is only as man is willing to turn from the Lo, here! and the Lo, there! to this unerring Teacher and Guide in himself, and to be obedient to Him, that he can know the truth and the freedom that comes thereby, so as to escape the cunning snares of the enemy.—C. W. Thomson.

APOLOGY OF ARISTIDES.

We have received from HODDER & STOUGHTON, publishers, of London, a small volume, price 2 s. 6 d., entitled Newly recovered Apology of Aristides, by Helen B. Harris.

Many Apologies, so called, were written by the early Christians, and were defences of the Christian religion; pointing out its superiority to the fables of Greek and Roman mythology, and to the gross superstition of the Egyptians. Aristides was an Athenian philosopher, who addressed his treatise to the Emperor Adrian or to his successor, Antonius Pius—so that it must have been written in the early part of the Second Century.

It was discovered in the Convent of St. Catharine, on Mt. Sinai, by her husband, J. Rendel Harris, during a visit paid to that ancient monastery in 1889. The party found the libraries of the convent much better cared for and more valuable than they had expected. They were under the charge of a learned librarian. One room was filled with large chests, in which were stored away the more precious of the ancient Greek manuscripts. Among the precious treasures, Prof. Harris began immediately to transcribe, collate and photograph. Helen says— "After he had spent some days in this work, the librarian, one morning, gave him an invitation to accompany him to another part of the convent, with a significant intimation that there were other things to be seen; so they traversed the narrow passages and stairs of the convent until they reached a door closed by a large padlock—it was rusty, as if no one had recently passed that way; and when it was removed the door opened into a narrow room of some length, the walls of which were lined with Oriental books in the Syriac, Arabic and Iberian languages. Into the examination of these books he immediately plunged, and it was not very long before he had detected in a volume of tracts on ethical subjects, a translation of the long-lost Apology of Aristides. It is needless to say, that a great part of the remaining time of his sojourn in the convent was spent in the transcription, photographing and preliminary study of this precious Second Century record."

This "Apology" is valuable for the evidence it gives of the doctrinal views held by the Christians of that early age; and still more, perhaps, for the light it throws on their manner of life and the purity and fellow-feeling which existed among them. On these points, Helen B. Harris has introduced some collateral testimonies from other ancient sources.

The concluding chapter of the book is a translation from the Syriac of certain portions of the Apology itself. In this, Aristides gives his own view of God as a being, "without beginning and without end, immortal, complete and incomprehensible." He divides all mankind into four classes—Barbarians, Greeks, Jews and Christians; and points out the errors and absurdities in the religious views of the Barbarians and the Greeks. "In showing the superiority of the possessors of the religion of the Christians, he says they keep the Divine commandments," "in the hope and expectation of the world to come; so that on this account they do not commit adultery nor fornication, they do not bear false witness, they do not deny a deposit, nor covet what is not theirs; they honor father and mother; they do good to those who are their neighbors; and when they are judges they judge uprightly; and they do not worship idols in the form of man; and whatever they do do not wish that others should do to them, they do not practice towards any one, &c., &c."—enumerating a long list of virtues, which may well put to shame the imperfect performance of the professing Christians of the present age.

We regard this little book as an interesting and valuable one; which gives to the ordinary reader some insight into the treasures of Classical lore, which are being brought to light by the researches of learned men.

We publish in this number the Address on Horse-Racing recently issued by our Meeting for Sufferings. Many of our readers, who reside in New Jersey and its neighborhood, know of the trouble brought upon its right-minded citizens by the illegal racing of horses, and the betizens and debauchery which seem almost inseparable from this demoralizing sport, which have been persistently practiced at Gloucester in that State.

That Race-course is at present closed, but it is understood that an effort is shortly to be made to obtain from the New Jersey Legislature a repeal of those laws which prohibit this amusement, and that a large sum of money has been raised to facilitate the passage of the proposed bill. The principal hope of defeating this attempt to give the sanction of the law to that which is manifestly evil and corrupting in its tendency, is to awaken such a public sentiment as will overawe those politicians whose unaided virtue is not strong enough to resist the temptations that will be offered them. As one means of awakening the attention of the people to this subject, we think the extensive circulation of this Address among the people of New Jersey is desirable. We hope our readers generally, who reside in New Jersey, will exert themselves in this matter. As many copies as are desired can be obtained, gratuitously, by addressing Jacob Smedley, at our Book Store, No. 304 Arch St., Philadelphia. Any suggestions as to the best means of supplying different neighborhoods, would be gladly received by the committee charged with its distribution, and may be directed to George J. Scattergood, Room 85, No. 119 S. Fourth St., Philadelphia.

We have received a communication from a correspondent in Iowa, who refers to a statement made by a Friend, that in the Western Yearly Meetings under our name, the members were largely adopting instrumental music, and dropping the mid-week meetings. This statement, he says, "may be true to some extent," but he calls attention to the fact, that there are meetings held in the evenings of week-days, which take the place of the morning meetings, usually kept up by our members.

As to the meetings decreasing, he says that the Monthly Meeting to which he belongs has received about 100 new members in the last five years.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Both Houses of Congress reconvened in their respective chambers, after the holidays, on the 5th inst. Owing to the sickness of Speaker Crisp, who is convalescing from an attack of influenza, the House was called to order by Clerk Kerr.

The public debt statement issued on the 21st instant, shows that the interest and non-interest bearing debt decreased $1,758,140 during the month of December. The receipts of internal revenue during the first five months of the present fiscal year were 294,332,420, an increase of $1,430,959 over the receipts during the corresponding period of the previous year. There was a decrease in the receipts on tobacco of $2,492,243.

On the 20th ult. reciprocity arrangements were signed by Secretary Blaine with the Ministers of Guatemala and Salvador for their respective countries. The arrangements with Guatemala require the approval of the Congress of that country, but it is expected that the arrangement with Salvador will go into operation Second Month next.

The value of the farm products of this country in 1891 amounted to $700,000,000 more than what was produced in 1890.

A dispatch from Laredo, Texas, says that "the Mexican revolutionist, Garza, is surrounded in the chaparral in the extreme northwestern corner of Zapata County by United States troops and Rangers, and it is almost impossible for him to escape, either to the northward or in the direction of Mexico."

A dispatch from Fort Reno, Indian Territory, says that the Mesquit craze has broken out afresh among the Cheyennes and Arapahoes. Several days have been going on among the hills for several days, and the craze is apparently spreading. They declare that the Mesquit, who is to expel the whites, bring back the buffalo and restore their hunting grounds to the Indians, is soon to give the great dance will be kept up day and night until the arrival.

Governor Humphreys, of Kansas, has appointed ex-Congressman Perkins to the United States Senate to fill Senator Plumb's unexpired term.

A bill was introduced in the Kentucky Senate on the 4th inst. making it a felony, punishable by a fine of from $1,000 to $5,000 and imprisonment of from two to five years, for any one to promote, carry on or conduct a lottery or to aid in carrying on such lottery, for any one renting, procuring or leasing premises for lottery purposes, or for selling or offering for sale tickets or tickets or drawings; and making it a misdemeanor for any person to buy, procure or purchase for himself a ticket for said lottery or drawings, punishable by a fine.

A company, backed by Eastern capitalists, has been incorporated in Chicago for the manufacture of American-made articles. The value of the stock is $2,000,000. Speaking for the new company, its attorney, G. Cooke, said: "At present nearly all the flux used in this country is imported. This company has experimented to its own satisfaction that it can manufacture the American article much cheaper than it can be imported, and, at the same time, furnish as good an article as that made in foreign countries."

The Salton lake in the Colorado desert, in California, is reported to be now only ten miles long by eight wide, about one-fourth its dimensions in Eighth Month last. It is but thirteen inches deep in its deepest part. A year ago, in this city last week was 71 feet, being 8 less than last week, and 294 more than the corresponding week one year ago. Of the whole number, 315 were males and 403 females; 178 died of pneumonia; 16 of influenza; 50 of diseases of the heart; 49 of consumption; 48 of diphtheria; 34 of convulsions; 23 of old age; 27 of bronchitis; 17 of cough; 13 of Bright's disease; 14 of measles; 14 of congestion of the lungs; 14 of scarlet fever; 11 of cancer; 11 of marasmus; 10 of debility and 10 of inflammation of the brain.

FOREIGN.—The steamer Noordland, from Antwerp, First Month 24, for New York, which was in collision in the North Sea with the British bark Childwall, of Antwerp, the latter vessel going down with fifteen of her crew, is expected to Antwerp. Her bows were stove in in the collision.

A dispatch from Brussels, dated the 4th inst., says: Plenipotentiaries of the Powers have had a meeting here and signed the protocols of the Anti-Slavery act, which goes into operation sixty days hence. The United States plenipotentiary, United States Minister Terrell is still in Washington, waiting for instructions.

A sensation has been caused in Madrid by advices from Manila, the capital of the Philippine Islands, to the effect that Japan has occupied some of the islands north of Luzon. The Government organs in Manila declare that a Spanish squadron will visit the principal ports of Japan, and then, dispersing, proceed to the Mariannas for the purpose of reasserting Spanish supremacy over the islands.

Fifty nihilists, suspected of being connected with a conspiracy to assassinate the Emperor, are on trial in the Warburg prison in Moscow, are the four women saw citadel. Among the prisoners are two Frenchmen. The Russian famine appears to be assuming vast proportions. A trustworthy correspondent declares that in the Province of Samara, where he resides, one-half of the population—no fewer than 1,250,000 persons—are literally dying of starvation, and Levasseur, the eminent French statist, has calculated that to supply the deficiency in thirteen provinces 6,500 ships must be employed, carrying 8,000,000 hectoliters of grain, which would cost $700,000,000. The State has not the money to spend; nor even if it found the money could it provide the means of transport over a surface of 1,000,000 square kilometers to the 5,400,000 houses in want of food.

The American association, at first elaborately denied and anxiously disbelieved, that the official corruption would not be checked, even by the horrors of so dire a calamity, has now been abundantly proved to be true. The entire subscription of St. Petersburg for the benefit of its own poor and of the environs has been stolen. The $300,000 purchase of the land, which has been found to be so infamous, adulterated to be wholly uneatable, and in parts poisonous. The revelations are but now beginning. We shall hear more of them.

Another account says: Government relief is wrongly allocated. It always comes too late. Local officials, striving to hide the true state of affairs, organize banquets and gambling parties for the entertainment of Government Commissioners sent to the district. Any attempt to send appeals directly to the Czar is nipped in the bud by the officials, with threats of expulsion if such an attempt is repeated.

The reports of the missions in the East Indies include an earnest appeal for aid to relieve the distress of the people resulting from a famine in South India. They state that the condition in very wide districts of the country is as bad as is the great famine of 1877. In addition to the utter failure of the crops, a new and terrible pest has been the cause of the death of the people in the failure of the water supply. The tanks and wells are dry, and already hundreds of thousands of human beings are suffering tortures from this terrible deprivation. The Government is doing its best, but is utterly unable to cope with this awful condition of the country.

A dispatch from Bombay, dated Twelfth Month 30 says: The Indian National Congress, which is in session at Nagpur, the capital of the central provinces of India, has adopted a resolution declaring there shall be established a legislature in India to which the Indian people shall elect representatives. The resolution says that since from climate and conditions the starvation among the masses of the inhabitants of India is largely due to the fact that they have no parliamentary representation.

Between 12,000 and 15,000 barrels of herring were taken out in a single night at Sound Island, in the coast of Newfoundland.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

1850.—Tenth Month 17th. "At Springfield Meeting, unexpectedly, the subject of the growth of trees presented to me. Planted, when like small switches, yet if properly cared for, and defended from injury, gradually growing and finally becoming valuable for fruit, or for shade and beauty. So it appeared to me to be with trees of the Lord's planting. As they are cherished and preserved from the enemies they are exposed to, they experience a growth in grace; their root strikes downward in the heavenly oil, and they bring forth fruit to the praise of the Great Husbandman, and finally they are established in the house of the Lord, and flourish in the courts of our God. He beautifies and dignifies him in his church, and enables them to glorify Him in their generation. They become pillars in the house of our God, that shall no more out; and He writes upon them the name of our God, and the name of the city of our God, which is New Jerusalem; and He will write upon them his new Name. It was a day of favor; in which the hearts of some of the journeers were made glad, and the dear young people cheered to hold on their way."

"28th. I have a secret hope that the Lord at work to bring about a more settled state of our religious Society; to bring forth some whom He has been preparing to stand more openly and boldly for His Christian doctrines, testimonies and discipline; and to rebuke the spirit that has been at work, to divide and scatter, by upholding those who have attempted to bring in ungodly opinions, and giving liberty to go into things which the Truth is against."

"Twelfth Month 2d. It will be a great favor if Divine Power rises into dominion among us, as to animate and strengthen right-minded friends, to come out boldly on the Lord's side, and on behalf of our testimonies; that so the denial, the humility, the simplicity, and the inwardness of spirit, which characterized our first Friends, may be revived, and shine forth conspicuously. There is an enmity against the witness, which Christ leads his humble followers into; and a desire, in some, to make a show of the world; that we may be like others, and thereby the reproach of the cross caused to cease.

As that takes place, our locks will be shorn; we shall become weak like other men; spiritual vision will be lost, and worldly professors will vaunt over us. But may the Lord in mercy, kindle up fresh zeal among us; bring us near to one another in the covenant of life, and enable us to put shoulder to shoulder in the support of his cause; and send forth fresh laborers into his harvest field.

"18th. Poverty of spirit, and the reduction of faith have been my portion many days past. If it is of the Lord's dispensing, to lay low the creature, it is enough. He will not cast off those whom He condescends to purge, and prostrate, if they give themselves, and all they have, into his hand. There can be no higher favor, than being objects of his mercy and preserving power; and this is as truly shown to be the case, in his emptying and stripping dispensations, which bring man to feel his own nothingness, as when his candle shines upon his head, and he is filled with a heavenly sense of the Divine fitness."

1851.—First Month 22d. "Having felt my mind turned to the Western Meeting for a few days. I went there and attended the Monthly Meeting. I was brought low, and the matter which opened before me, seemed of such close nature, I felt afraid almost to look at it. After a time it was taken away; when the great importance of watchfulness and daily prayer, that we may be preserved from losing ground and falling short in the end, came livingly over my mind, and had an humbling effect. Under a degree of tenderness, I believed it right to rise with this subject, and to express what might be presented for others, as well as myself, on the unspeakable blessing of Divine preservation in a blessed growth in the Truth, and an establishment in it unto the end. He who loved us before we loved Him, and of his mercy and power brought us out of darkness, sin and corruption, will not forsake us, if we do not turn our back upon Him; but in the same loving kindness and tender mercy, will warn of danger. He will, as we submit and bear his dispensations, strip us from time to time, of all we have known, plunge us into a sense of our nothingness, and in this way keep us lowly and dependent, and enlarge our hearts, and knowledge of Divine things. The language of the beloved and aged apostle, 'Little children, keep yourselves from idols,' revived, with the liability man might be exposed to, if he left a lowly watchful state, to idolize his natural talents, acquirements, spiritual gifts, and religious experience; and getting lost as in a mist, Satan, who can transform himself into the appearance of an angel of light, may set him to work in things which the Lord never called him to do; and finally the wrong spirit get into dominion in him, which had in good measure been cast out. I was opened and led, I believe, by the good hand into these things, for my own benefit, and also as a renewed warning to some, who had quite enough of the creature at work in them, under the garb of religion, and promoting the kingdom of Christ. It was of the Lord's goodness that the clothing of Divine charity was felt; earnestly desiring the present and everlasting welfare of every one in the meeting."

"28th. At times a secret hope revives that the Lord Almighty, who raised us up a people for his honor, will mercifully hear and answer the prayers, which He begets in the hearts, I trust, of many exercised servants; and put a bit in the mouth of the enemy, who would destroy his heritage, and turn him backward. And when He sees our sufferings arc, at this time enough, grant deliverance from the snare, and renew our strength and courage to lift up the voice, for the precious testimonies and doctrines. He raised Friends to support. That so the dear young people may be comforted, and strengthened to give up their names fully to serve the Lord; and 'Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier, shall come up the myrtle tree; and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign, that shall not be cut off."

"Second Month 3d. At Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting for Business, I thought Samuel Bettle, Sr., was strengthened to call Friends back from the violations of our testimonies, which not a few had fallen into, by their conformity to the changeable fashions of the world. They were calling plainness in dress and language, the reading of fictitious books, and others calculated to poison the mind with ungodly principles, and to spoil it through philosophy and vain deceit, little things; he believed the testimonies maintained by Friends respecting them, were the fruits of primitive Christianity. Departures from them created false taste; excited and unsettled the feelings; and these led to the dislike of our silent meetings; and a desire to go where preaching, and vocal or instrumental music, could be heard; which men were induced to think they could use as the worship of Almighty God. But it could have no effect, except on the animal feelings, to arouse and excite them. He opened several of our testimonies, and pleaded with the young people to prize the privileges which they had offered them, in such a Society as ours, that watched over them for good. I thought it my place to say, I hoped we should profit by the exercise spread over the meeting; it was an evidence that He who raised us up had not forsaken us. How fearful were we in the beginning of our heavenly journey, of doing anything against the Truth; and how desirous to know the Divine will, and to receive strength to do it. Was there not now a danger, after experiencing a little prosperity, of putting forth the hand, and appropriating the blessings of a kind Providence, to purposes, of which we should have been afraid in those days; especially in the furniture of our houses, and in our mode of living?"

"12th. Went down to Woodbury, and the 13th, attended their Quarterly Meeting. I was engaged among them, to warn some of the deadening effects of the love of the world; and to invite others to be obedient to the clear discoveries of the Divine will, to some of whom, the language may be applicable, 'Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord has risen upon thee.' Were those who are thus visited by the illuminations of the Spirit of Christ, faithful to its requisitions, there would be raised among us, judges as at the first, and counsellors as at the beginning; and ministers to declare to others of the mercy and power of the Lord extended to them. What less individuals and the church sustain, in consequence of disobedience and neglect of duty!"

"Third Month 2d. First-day morning I was drawn to hold up to view, that we are placed here in a state of probation; to prove the Lord's love and mercy to us, and to be proved whether we will obey his discoveries and requisitions, and thereby glorify Him that created us, so as to be ready, having on the wedding garment, to enter the everlasting abodes of blessedness; in which I was somewhat encouraged."

"Fourth Month 2d. To-day was our Fourth-day Meeting. After a long silence, in which I had many tears of speaking, I felt afraid to depart without reviving the expostulation of the Lord of the vineyard, 'Why stand ye here all the day idle? Go ye also into the vineyard, and whatsoever is right, that shall ye receive.' That there is a work for every one to do in the vineyard of his own heart, which no man or woman can do for us, was held forth. It is they who labor that receive wages, and gather fruit unto life eternal. The weeds in the garden of our own heart are to be first eradicated, that the ground may be prepared for the Seed of the kingdom to grow in it. To be employed in finding fault with others, while our own hearts are unattended to, and the work of sanctification and redemption not going on in us, will be of no benefit to ourselves. But whatever may be our trials and discouragements, if we are faithful to the clear discoveries of the Divine will, we shall lay up treasure in heaven; and keeping our lights burning and loins girded, watching for the coming of the Master, He will in his time appear, spread a table for us, and come forth and serve us."

"Sixth Month 5th. At Arch Street Meeting, I remembered the prophet regarded himself as a man of unclean lips; and that he was commissioned to hand forth the language of encouragement to some among the degenerate children of Israel; and his language, on one occasion, was brought before me, 'Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people, saith your God. Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her that her warfare is accomplished; that her iniquity is pardoned; for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins.' This was applied to those who submit to the Lord's fire in Zion, and his furnace which is in Jerusalem. When they have passed through the administration of his judgments, the baptism of the Holy Ghost and his fire, so as to have the filth purged away, and to be no longer as probate silver; they know all their iniquities pardoned through the blood of the everlasting covenant. They are prepared to partake of the cup of suffering for the body's sake, the church; which at times they seem to drink as to the dregs; so that they may feel as if they received double for all their sins. But it is all for a moment; and when the blessed reward at the end of the race is granted, it is no doubt felt as light affliction, in comparison with the eternal weight of glory which the saints in light partake of. The least and lowest place in his kingdom will be enough for the tribulated spirit."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Reasoning.

"Let us reason together."

It is the manifest duty and privilege of the Christian believer to studiously contemplate the mercy and condescension of the most high God, as they are revealed for the profit of mankind in the coming and work of the Lord Jesus Christ. Indeed, I believe, that just in proportion as we come to the right possession and use of our own senses, we will find it the real business of our lives to contemplate, worship and adore, and to illustrate by word and deed the loving mercy and the gracious condescension, wherein that Divine Being, "through the Eternal Spirit," offered himself as our Sacrifice and Exemplar, as truly in his whole human career as an historical individual, as in his more plainly meritorious death.

In this complete Saviour, however, it is very important to observe, that such mercy and condescension reach beyond the work which was finished in that "prepared" historical body—beyond the mere present immunity and conditional forgiveness which are the basis of our probational life—and that they embrace that serviceable realm of intellect, which, in its needful subordination to the spiritual energy of faith, and to the more unequivocal graces of hope and love, is the largest sphere of social influence, whether as among mere men of the world in their still unregenerate condition and character, or as between the Church and the world. Also important is the observation that this intellectual mercy and condescension are manifested, as they only can be manifested, in an adaptation of the Divine message to our more or less grovelling power of aspiration and apprehension. Immediate advantage and appreciable inducements must at first have precedence of abstract argument and sweeping generalities. "Come now and let us reason together, saith the Lord; though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool," etc. This is the opening message of the gospel, "the kingdom of heaven is at hand," foreshadowed in the first chapter of the evangelical prophet, Isaiah. Surely here also is foreshadowed such a continued "reasoning together" as should result in an opening out of the things of the then approaching kingdom, to an extent "beyond all that we can ask or think," as being from era to era necessary to our free communion with one another, and to our praying and praising not only with the spirit, but "with the understanding also." It was "the man after God's own heart," who exclaimed, "Give me understanding, and I shall live!"

It is the purpose of meditation to remove separation, not to confirm it. Man not only needs, but in every healthy aspiration he impotently craves, to be "made nigh" (Eph. ii. 13.) unto God and his fellow man, "by the blood of Christ," in that full significance of the phrase which involves the life as well as the death of the heaven-sent Saviour. The freedom of Christ consists in a conscious closeness of Divine relationship. "If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." This freedom includes power. It implies a spiritual supremacy over physical surroundings and intellectual equipments. In it we may individually realize, as "heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ," that, as an apostle has written (when but rightly read), "All things pertaining to life and godliness are of his Divine power, which is given to us through the knowledge of Him who hath called us by glory and virtue." It seems marvellous, indeed, that a want of realizing this close and high calling of God in Christ, should so long have availed to prevent Christian scholars from strictly construing the slightly involved phraseology of this sublime and animating teaching, see 2 Pet. i. 3. Both the laws of grammar and style, and the nice use of terms may be pleaded in behalf of the construction here adopted, although the version of our friend Anthony Purver, printed in the last century through the wise liberality of Dr. John Pothergill, is the only published version of the Bible in the English, and perhaps in any language, in which such a rendering is to be found.

Most unreasonable then, and most injurious must be the weak assumption that God thus willing to be truly and practically "made nigh," and to be most intimately "with us," shall not, in a measure limited only by our growing capacity for reception and application, manifest himself to us as the God of Light, as well as the God of Love. The argument of immunity and the blessing of forgiveness, when duly appropriated, must bring the emancipation of faculty for that growing reception and application of the "many things." John xvi. 12 which the more or less infantile soul cannot at once "bear" (Greek, bastazo, "carry," "take it hard," etc.), on its way to the "all truth" of God's declared purpose in Christ. That life of integral progress thus becomes inaugurated, in which the teaching that was once mystical and unpractical, and so seemingly superfluous, is now found to be intelligible and relevant, and so evidently necessary. "Wisdom is justified of all her works," (Matt. xi. 19, R. V.), as well as "of all her children," by that healthy growth of the intelligence which assumes only on its aforesaid subordination to faith, and which, by very virtue of that subordination and dependence, is "hidden with Christ" from the faithless.

Christianity is not the religion of a finished cross. The tendency of our fallen nature is to a faith in our natural intelligence. The essential lesson of the Gospel was anticipated in the of Solomon, "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not to thine own understanding. In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths." The true faith which acknowledges the cross of Christ to be, as Isaac Pennington has termed it, "an inward spiritual thing;" will indeed find that "the way of the cross is the way of light." The cross, as thus known, is the abiding instrument of that Divine mercy and condescension which we have been considering. Only by that submission thereto which is one with a living faith in Christ, can we enter upon that "cast up" way of saving hope and perfected love, wherein "the name of Christ, the knowledge of Christ," "the freedom of Christ," and "the power of Christ, are found to be practically equivalent phrase as alike indicating that living "Word of God, which must still increasingly "have free course (currency) "and be glorified." The farsers it that happy highway, while in no wise despising the ministrations of "milk for babes," or of educational means in general for the stage of spiritual childhood, will still feel bound to exclaim "It is not meet that we should leave the Word of God, and serve tables." For "against such there is no law."

Here is a species of false intellectuality which is known to the educated community under the name of "rationalism," but which, as uttered repudiating the doctrine of a spiritual cross, and stoutly ignoring that best tradition and that deep experience which seem to demand such a doctrine, were perhaps more aptly designated as "naturalism."

There is another species of intellectual error, which, as perverting, or tending to pervert, the true doctrine of the cross to a superficial dependence on effete tradition and "the commandments of men," is largely current under the names of "ritualism" and "ecclesiasticism." May that true devotion be ours, which, being lifted by a true faith above these competing tendencies, and finding a lasting abode in the realm of spiritual experience, can thence descend to the honest aspirations of all the victims of error, in some due appreciation of their several fetters and limitations; and so, in a genuine "apostolical succession," make us in our day "all things to all men," in "giving to every man that asketh, a reason of the hope that is in us, with meekness and fear."

PHILADELPHIA, Twelfth Month 1891.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Baltimore Yearly Meeting.

This is one of the smaller of the American Yearly Meetings of the Society of Friends, but there is much in its past history and in its present position to interest Friends elsewhere.

The articles on "The Eastern Shore of Chesapeake Bay," recently published in THE FRIEND, give some outline of its history down to the year 1790, when the meetings in the peninsula across the bay were transferred to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and Maryland Yearly Meeting was strengthened by the addition of the meetings belonging to Philadelphia, lying west of the river Susquehanna, including Fairfax Quarterly Meeting, which occupied the territory in Virginia bordering on the Potomac River. Among the meetings included in it were Hopewell Monthly Meeting in the valley of the Shenandoah, which was established about the year 1735, and to which belonged the meetings subsequently set up at Red Stone and other places in Pennsylvania, west of the Alleghany Mountains.

The first permanent white settlers in the Shenandoah Valley came from Pennsylvania, and were sixteen families headed by Joist Hite. The majority of the settlers were Pennsylvania Germans. De Haas, in his history of the early settlements in Western Virginia, says: "Tradition informs us that the Indians did not object to the Pennsylvanians settling the country. From the exalted character for benevolence and virtue enjoyed by the first founder of that State (William Penn) the simple-minded children of the woods believed that all those who had lived under the shadow of his name, partook alike of his justice and humanity. But fatal experience soon taught them a very different lesson. Towards Virginians, the Indians had a most implacable hatred. They called them by way of distinction, Long-Knives, and warmly opposed their settling in the valley."

Although the early settlers were kindly received by the Indians, yet as their number rapidly increased by the coming of successive emigrants allured by the richness of the soil, and as the game on which the Indians mainly subsisted became scarce, through the increased number of hunters, the original owners of the country became more and more uneasy, as they found themselves being crowded out of their own homes, and compelled to retire into wilder sections of the country to find the means of subsistence.

They were the more disconcerted, because, so far as we have been able to ascertain, the native tribes had received no compensation for much of the land thus appropriated by the settlers; so that they were in a state of mind which rendered it comparatively easy for the emissaries of the French to induce them to take up the hatchet on their side of the great contest between the French and English for the possession of the country between the Alleghenies and the Mississippi. The uneasiness felt by Friends of Philadelphia, at the situation of things in Shenandoah Valley is well illustrated by a letter addressed to Friends there by Thomas Chalkley in 1738. He was then returning from a visit to the southern provinces—and being much spent with his long journey, expressed his concern for them by a letter, in place of paying a personal visit. From this letter the following paragraphs are taken:

"First; I desire that you be very careful, being far and back inhabitants, to keep a friendly correspondence with the native Indians, giving them no occasion of offence; they being a cruel and merciless enemy, when they think they are wronged or defrauded of their right."

"Second; As Divine Providence hath given them and their forefathers the possession of this continent of America, or this wilderness, they have a natural right thereto, in justice and equity; and no people, according to the law of nature and justice, and our own principle, which is according to the glorious Gospel of our dear and holy Lord Jesus Christ, ought to take away, or settle on other men's lands or rights, without consent or purchasing the same, by agreement of parties concerned; which I suppose in your case is not yet done."

"Third; Therefore our counsel and Christian advice to you is, my dear friends, that the most reputable among you do, with speed, endeavor to agree with and purchase your lands of the native Indians or inhabitants. Take example of our honorable late proprietor, William Penn, who by his wise and religious care in that relation, hath settled a lasting peace and commerce with the natives."

"Fourth; I am concerned to lay these things before you, under an uncommon exercise of mind, that your new and flourishing little settlement may not be laid waste, and if the providence of the Almighty doth not intervene, some of the blood of yourselves, wives or children, be spilled on the ground."

"Fifth; Consider that you are in the Province of Virginia, holding what rights you have under that government; and the Virginians have made an agreement with the natives, to go as far as the mountains, but no further; and you are over and beyond the mountains, therefore out of that agreement; by which you lie open to the insults and incursions of the southern Indians, who have destroyed many of the inhabitants of Carolina and Virginia."

"Please to note that in Pennsylvania no new settlements are made without an agreement with the natives."

The concern which Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting felt that the lands occupied by those of their members residing in the waters of the Shenandoah, should be honestly paid for, continued for many years to claim the attention of our Meeting for Sufferings—for Hopewell Friends did not attend to that part of T. Chalkley's advice, which recommended that steps be taken to satisfy the Indians "with speed." The delay was probably a source of regret to many of them, when the Indian war raged in 1755 and succeeding years. The Minutes of Philadelphia Meeting for Sufferings state, that in the year 1757 the distresses occasioned by the ravages of the Indians on the people residing on the frontiers of Virginia and Pennsylvania became the subject of weighty consideration on account of the exposed situation of Friends there, particularly those residing within the compass of Hopewell Monthly Meeting, divers of whom had deserted their habitations.

A considerable sum of money was appropriated to relieve the present wants of those families of Hopewell Meeting who were reduced to poverty by the Indian incursions.

And as there were many children among these families, the meeting suggested that Friends in Pennsylvania would be willing to take care of and educate these; and it offered its help in procuring suitable places for such.

A painful apprehension was received, that had long subsisted in the minds of many Friends, that true equity and a religious regard to the just right of the native owners of that part of the country had not been duly adhered to by the purchasers of the land on which our Friends were settled. The Meeting for Sufferings earnestly recommended Friends of Hopewell to make a strict inquiry into the foundation of their title, and to remove all just occasion of dissatisfaction and complaint.

The letter to Hopewell also refers to the fact, that their lands were settled on before their purchase from the Indians, and raises the question as to whether there is reason to believe, that any Indians still have claims to those lands?

At a treaty held at Lancaster in 1744, the Iroquois claimed the lands west of the mountains by right of conquest, and sold their claim to Virginia—but this claim being founded on violence and injustice, Friends could not recognize it as valid, but believed they were still bound to compensate the original owners.

A committee of the Meeting for Sufferings visited Hopewell in 1758, at which time that Monthly Meeting adopted a Minute which says that from "the best information they could get it doth not fully appear that the Government hath purchased any other Indian right to these lands, than what was conveyed to them by the Six united nations, which appears to have been acquired by having conquered the former inhabitants in a war; but since that we apprehend they who were so conquered have acquired some strength and vigor to assert their right to the land, and are supposed to be in part the actors of the bloody ravages felt in those countries and in Pennsylvania."

In 1778 a subscription was opened, and £665 10 s., Penn. currency, was subscribed for this purpose.

The money thus subscribed does not appear to have been paid in at the time, and Hopewell Monthly Meeting became dissatisfied with the manner in which their position was represented on the Minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings. The Yearly Meeting itself appointed a committee to examine into the subject, which in 1791 reported:

"We are inclined to believe that Friends in some parts of Virginia are yet under an obligation to endeavor to make restitution to the natives of the country in the best manner they can, for the land which was the original right of the Indians. We are united in believing it necessary tenderly to advise our beloved brethren ren in Virginia, cheerfully to step forward with speedy endeavors to raise and collect a generous sum, according to present ability, and that the money so collected may be placed in the hands of suitable persons to be appointed by Fairfax Quarterly Meeting, ready to be hereafter applied as the wisdom of Truth may point out, in the most proper channel."

This committee made another report the following year, in which they recommended that the whole matter be referred to Fairfax Quarterly Meeting, to take such action thereon as they might deem best. This was agreed to—and a committee appointed to attend that meeting with a copy of last year's report.

Samuel Kercheval, in his history of the settlement of the valley of Virginia, says: "The Shawnee tribe, it is well known, were settled about the neighborhood of Winchester.

"The Tuscarora Indians resided in the neighborhood of Martinsburg, in the County of Berkeley."

The same author, in speaking of the same section of country, says: "Several respectable individuals of the Quaker Society thought it unjust to take possession of this valley without making the Indians some compensation for their right. Measures were adopted to effect this great object. But upon inquiry no particular tribe could be found who pretended to have any prior claim to the soil. It was considered the common hunting-ground of various tribes, and not claimed by any particular nation who had the authority to sell."

"Tradition relates, that several tracts of land were purchased by the Quakers from the Indians on Apple-pie ridge, and that the Indians never were known to disturb the people residing on the land so purchased."

The Meeting for Sufferings to assist Friends of Hopewell in this righteous undertaking appointed a committee to make inquiries and endeavor to ascertain who were the persons to whom such "consideration" ought rightfully to be paid.

The Friends who attended the treaty held by the United States with the Six Nations in 1794, reported to the Meeting for Sufferings, that divers conferences were held with the Indians respecting the ownership of the land about Hopewell, in Virginia, "an issue of which was, that we were all of the opinion the Tuscaroras were the people who formerly owned that country. General Chapin, Superintendent of the Six Nations, upon enquiry being of the same opinion, gave us his judgment in writing."

Jefferson, in his notes on Virginia, says that the Monacans, who inhabited the country about the headwaters of the James River, were afterwards called the Tuscaroras. The principal home of the Tuscaroras was in the upper country of the Neuse and Tar Rivers. They were the most powerful tribe in North Carolina, and about the year 1711 engaged in hostilities with the white settlers, the immediate cause of which appears to have been the intrusion of a surveying party into their lands. Many lives were lost in this war, but by the aid of several hostile tribes of Indians, they were completely defeated in 1712, and many of the survivors went North and joined the Iroquois in New York, forming the sixth nation in that formidable confederacy.

THE SHRINE OF NATURE.

The works of God are fair for naught,
Unless our eyes, in seeing,
See hidden in the thing the thought
That underlies its being.

The outward form is not the whole,
But every part is moulded
To image forth an inward soul,
That dimly is unfolded.

The shadow pictured in the lake
By every tree that trembles,
Is cast for more than just the sake
Of that which it resembles.

The dew falls lightly, not alone
Because the meadows need it,
But hath an errand of its own
To hush souls that heed it.

The stars are lighted in the skies
Not merely for their shining;
But like the light of loving eyes,
Have meanings worth divining.

The waves that moan along the shore,
The winds that sigh in blowing,
Are sent to teach a mystic lore,
Which men are wise in knowing.

The clouds around the mountain-peak,
The rivers in their winding,
Have secrets which, to all who seek,
Are precious in the finding.

Thus nature dwells within our reach;
But though we stand so near her,
We still interpret half her speech
With ears too dull to hear her.

Whoever at the coarsest sound
Still listens for the finest,
Shall hear the noisy world go round
To music the divinest.

Whoever yearns to see aright
Because his heart is tender,
Shall catch a glimpse of heavenly light
In every earthly splendor.

So since the universe began,
And till it shall be ended,
The soul of nature, and of man,
In soul of God are blended.

WATCHING THE TONGUE.

Keep a watch on your words my children,
For words are wonderful things;
They are sweet like the bees' fresh honey—
Like bees, they have terrible stings;
They can bless like the warm, glad sunshine,
And brighten the lonely life;
They can cut in the strife of anger—
Yes, cut like a two-edged knife.

Let them pass through your lips unchallenged,
If their errand be true and kind—
If they come to support the weary,
To comfort and help the blind;
If a bitter, revengeful spirit
Prompt the words, let them be unsaid;
They may flash through the brain like lightning,
Or fall on the heart like lead.

Keep them back, if they're cold and cruel,
Under lar, and lock, and seal;
The words they make, my children,
Are always slow to heal.

May Christ guard your lips, and ever,
From the time of your early youth,
May the words that you do utter
Be the words of the beautiful truth.

It was wont to be said of Archbishop Crammer; if you would be sure to have Crammer to do you a good turn, you must do him some ill one, for, though he loved to do good to all, yet especially he would watch for opportunity to do good to such as had wronged him.—Spencer.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 239.

PRESENCE OF MIND.

We are so accustomed to the regular movements of the passenger trains on our great railways, that we seldom appreciate the amount of thought and preparation which these involve, or the demands made upon the nerve and watchful care of the engineers and conductors; or of the presence of mind sometimes required and displayed by these men.

In Ballantyne's "Life on the Rail," the story is told of a lunatic leaping on a locomotive all fired up and ready to be coupled to the train. He fell on the driver, who was outside the rail oiling some of the machinery, seizing the handle of the regulator, and turned on full steam. The driving-wheels revolved at first with such tremendous rapidity that they failed to "bite," and merely slipped on the rails. The madman was engineer enough to understand why, and at once cut off part of the steam. Next moment he shot out of the station, and again letting on full head of steam rushed along the line like an arrow. It chanced that the passenger superintendent was on the platform at the time. That gentleman had everything connected with the traffic by heart. He saw that the points had been so set as to turn the runaway engine on to the down line, and in his mind's eye saw a monster excursion train, which had started just a few minutes before, laboring slowly forward, which the light engine would soon overtake. A collision in a few minutes would be certain. In peculiar circumstances men are bound to break through all rules of regulations and act in a peculiar way. Without a moment's hesitation he ran to John Marrot and said, in an earnest, hurried voice, "Give chase, John! Cross over to the up line, but don't go too far."

"All right, sir," said John, laying his hand on the regulator.

Even while the superintendent was speaking, Will Garvie's swift mind had appreciated the idea. He had leaped down and uncoupled "The Lightning" from its train. John touched the whistle, let on steam, and off they went, crossed to the up line (which was the wrong line of rails for any engine to run in that direction), and away he went at forty—fifty—seventy miles an hour! John knew well that he was flying toward a passenger train, which was running toward him at probably thirty-five or forty miles an hour. He was aware of its whereabouts at that time, for he consulted his watch and had the time-table by heart. A collision with it would involve the accumulated momentum of more than a hundred miles an hour. The time was short but it was sufficient; he therefore urged Will to coal the furnace until it glowed with fervent heat, and opened the steam-valve to the uttermost. Never since John Marrot had driven it had the Lightning so nearly resembled its namesake. The pace was increased to seventy-five and eighty miles an hour. It was awful. Objects flew past with flashing speed. The clatter of the engine was deafening. A stern chase is proverbially a long one; but in this case, at such a speed, it was short. In less than fifteen minutes John came in view of the fugitive, also going at full speed, but, not being so powerful an engine, and not being properly managed as to the fire, it did not go so fast; its force might have been forty or forty-five miles an hour.

"Will," shouted John, in the ear of his stalwart fireman, "you'll have to be sharp about it,

It won't do, lad, to jump into the arms of a madman with a fire shovel in his hand. When I take a shot at 'im with a lump of coal, then's yer chance—go in 'n' win, lad—and whatever you do, keep cool."

Will did not open his compressed lips, but nodded his head in reply.

"You'll have to do it all alone, Bill; I can't leave the engine," shouted John.

He looked anxiously into his mate's face, and felt relieved to observe a little smile curl slightly the corners of his mouth.

Another moment and the Lightning was up with the tender of the runaway, and John cut off steam to equalize the speed. The madman at that instant observed for the first time that he was pursued. He looked back with a horrible glare, and then, uttering a fierce cheer or yell, tugged at the steam handle to increase the speed, but it was open to the utmost. He attempted to heap coals on the fire, but, being inexpert, failed to increase the heat. Another second and they were abreast. John Marrot opened the whistle and let it blow continuously, for he was by that time drawing fearfully near to the train that he knew was approaching. Seeing that escape was impossible, the madman would have thrown the engine off the rails, if that had been possible; but as it was not, he brandished the fire-shovel and stood at the opening between the engine and the tender with an expression of fiendish rage on his countenance that words cannot describe.

"Now, Bill, look out!" said John.

Will stood like a tiger ready to spring, John beside him with a huge mass of coal in one hand concealed behind his back. There was a space of little more than two feet between the engines. To leap that in the face of a madman seemed impossible.

Suddenly John Marrot hurled the mass of coal with all his might. It struck Thomson low, hitting him on the chest and driving him down on the foot-plate. At the same instant Will Garvie bounded across and shut off the steam in an instant. He turned then to the brake-wheel, but before he could apply it the madman had risen and grappled with him. Still, as the two strong men swayed to and fro in a deadly conflict, Will's hand, that chanced at the moment to be nearest the brake-wheel, was seen ever and anon to give it a slight turn. This much John Marrot observed when he saw a puff of white steam on the horizon far ahead of him. To reverse the engine and turn full steam on was the work of two seconds. Fire flew in showers from the wheels, and the engine trembled with the violent friction. Nevertheless, it still ran on for a considerable way, and the approaching train was within a comparatively short distance of him, before he had got the Lightning to run backward. It was not until he got up speed to eight forty miles an hour that he felt safe, looked back with a grim smile, and breathed freely.

Of course the driver of the passenger train, seeing an engine on the wrong line ahead had also reversed at full speed and thus prevented a collision, which would inevitably have been very disastrous.

John now ran back to the crossing, and getting once more on the down line ran cautiously back in the direction of the runaway locomotive. He soon came in sight of it, and reversed again and went at such a pace as allowed it to overtake him gradually. He saw that the steam was still cut off and that it had advanced that length in consequence of being on an incline, but was somewhat alarmed to receive no signal from his mate. The moment the buffers of the Lightning touched those of the other engine's tender, he applied the brakes and brought both engines to a stand. Then leaping off he ran to see how it had fared with Will Garvie.

The scene that met his eyes was a very ghastly one. On the floor-plate lay the two men, insensible and covered with blood and coal-dust. Each grasped the other by the throat, but Will had gained an advantage from having no neck-cloth on, while his own strong hand was twisted into that of his adversary so firmly that the madman's eyes were almost starting out of their sockets. John Marrot at once cut the kerchief with his clasp-knife; and then feeling that there was urgent need for haste left them lying there, ran back to his own engine, coupled it to the other, turned on full steam, and in a short space of time was back to his station. Here the men were removed to the waiting-room and a doctor called in. It was found that although much bruised and cut, as well as exhausted by their conflict, neither was seriously injured. After a few restoratives had been applied one was conveyed to his home and the other was lodged in an asylum.

The presence of mind of the superintendent, the alertness of John Marrot, the bravery of Will Garvie, bring out into bold relief the qualifications which fit men for the responsibilities of the railway, and bring forcibly before us the perils that sleep and may be wakened any moment on any road.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

How Shall I Know God?

The Apostle Paul answers this question, by saying, "That which may be known of God is manifest in man, for God hath showed it unto them." It is by obedience to God's will as revealed in the heart of man that any true and living knowledge of Him can be obtained. In the fulness of his perfections God is far beyond the limits of the human understanding. No man by searching can find Him out—penetrate into his nature and know his attributes.

There is a yearning in the human heart, there is an aching void that nothing but a true knowledge and acceptance of God in the Lord Jesus Christ can fill. There is this reaching out for better things, a desire for a more than earthly Helper.

Friend, art thou seeking? Art thou longing for this very present help in trouble? Ah! He is nearer than thou may think. Thy very thirst for something better shows the willingness of thy Heavenly Father to bestow upon thee that greatest of all blessings—a changed heart, and himself as an abiding guest. Wilt thou know Him? He stands ready to reveal himself to thee.

God has revealed himself in the veil of humanity's garb that we might be saved through his sufferings and death. "God was manifest in the flesh."

Holy men of old saw and talked with this Divine and loving One. They eat and drank in his presence and heard the gracious words of life which came from those blessed lips. So did many others in that day, who believed not.

He thus became as one of us, sin only excepted, and all the loving tenderness we see in the record of this our Saviour, we may know is the way God feels towards us. Even to the greatest sinner his language is—"How often would I have gathered you, but ye would not."

This same Jesus who suffered in the garden of Gethsemane—"being in an agony"—and who submitted to the death of the cross, bearing thy sins and mine, dear reader. This same Jesus now stands ready to bind up the wounds of thy aching heart, and if thou hast not yet found Him, will lead thee into loving companionship with himself. Thy will, however, must be brought into conformity to his will, and He can be found, He can be known in all his gentleness and in all his Divine reality to the soul.

This same Lord Jesus who died for us, now works in our hearts by the Holy Spirit, and He will come to live there, if we will only let Him. "Behold I stand at the door and knock," is the voice of Jesus. "If any man will open the door I will come in and sup with him and he with me." Know then that this Christ who suffered on the cross and who agonized in the garden of Gethsemane is thy Redeemer, oh anxious soul, and if thou wilt give thy heart into his keeping, He will be thine portion forever. Then open wide the sensibilities of thy heart and mind and let the King of glory come in and set up his kingdom there, whose right it is to reign in the heart for which He died. Let Him rule thy spirit, and guide thy life, and "thy peace shall flow as a river, and thy righteousness shall be as the waves of the sea." God hasten the day when none shall say, "know the Lord," for that all shall know Him from the least to the greatest. In that time nations shall be born in a day and the whole earth shall be filled with joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.

Insects' Eggs.—A discourse before the British Association, held at Leeds, was given by Professor Miall, on "Some Difficulties in the Life of Aquatic Insects." These difficulties begin with the egg stage. Some insect eggs hatch if they are merely scattered like grains of sand over the bottom of a stream; but others must be laid at the surface of the water, where they can gain a sufficient supply of oxygen. Floating eggs are liable to be swept too far down stream or even out to sea, and are besides liable to be devoured by creatures of different kinds, such as fish, birds or predatory insects. Such difficulties have been met in a number of insects by laying the eggs in chains or strings, and mooring them at the surface of the water. The eggs are invested by a gelatinous envelop, which swells at the moment it reaches the water into an abundant transparent mucilage. This mucilage answers more than one purpose. It makes the eggs so slippery that birds and insects cannot grasp them. It also spaces the eggs, and enables each to get its fair share of air and sunlight. Moreover, the gelatinous substance appears to possess some antiseptic property, which prevents water-molds from attacking the eggs. Some insects lay their eggs in the form of an adhesive band. In several cases the egg-chain is moored to the bank by a slender cord. The gnat-like Chironomus lays its eggs in transparent cylindrical ropes, which float on the surface of the water. The eggs of the caddis-fly are laid in large ropes. The egg-raft of the mosquito is well adapted for floating in stagnant water, and is freely exposed to the air—"a point of unusual importance in the case of an insect which, in all stages of youth, seems to need the most efficient means of respiration, and whose eggs are usually laid in water of very doubtful purity."

The Tasmanian Eagle.—Once on the farm of an old friend of papa's, a favorite mare placed alone in a small paddock of good grass, was seen willily galloping round and round for so long a time that her master went to discover the cause, and then first observed two eagles following her, flying low, and almost brushing the terrified animal with their wings, and keeping steadily on their course just beside or over her. The mare covered with foam and sweat, her eyes blood-shot and starting with intense terror, was evidently almost spent, and even after the eagles were scared away, was long in recovering from her terrible fright. At another place, some big yearling cattle were driven and frightened in exactly the same way by a pair of eagles, and papa says that most probably, when the mare or the calves had sunk down exhausted the eagles would have alighted, attacked and killed them; or, what I am sorry to say is even more likely, would have begun their savage feast ere the quivering life was extinct.

A farmer near, whose land lay chiefly on an open plain only divided by fences of posts and rails, had a large number of pigs running out, principally sows with litters, from which the eagles used to take thirty or forty in a season, and might frequently be observed sitting on the fences, seven or eight at a time watching their victims; and from their being able to see any person approaching from a long distance, they kept too keen a look-out to be often shot. They would alight on the ground, and drive the little pigs apart from their mothers, who invariably showed fight; but whilst they were courageously facing two eagles, others pounced upon the poor little pigs, and carried them squeaking away. It was provoking enough for the owner's family at the house to see this tragedy enacted before their eyes, day after day. One evening, as was his custom, the farmer walked down to look after his pigs, carrying his gun, and as he walked eastward, and the sun was very low, his long shadow stretched before him. Suddenly another shadow rapidly passed his feet, and turning sharply to see what was coming, his broad straw hat was knocked off by an eagle swooping over him. Not waiting to raise his gun to his shoulder, he fired and the bird fell only a yard or two off.—Tasmanian Friends and Foes.

A Greenland Tree.—When the late expedition sent out by the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia, had landed in Greenland, the botanist fell upon his knees and began tearing up a little shrub, not over three inches high. The entomologist looked on in curiosity, but opened his eyes wide as the botanist said, "a willow tree." "Tree?" he said; "do you call that a tree?" "Salix arctica, the mighty forest tree of Greenland." It was, indeed, a willow, in full bloom, with catkins an inch or so long and as fully formed as any willow in the world. It is hardly correct to say that it was only a few inches high, for it was what botanists term procumbent—flattened to the ground, and, if stood upright, would stretch to perhaps two feet in height. The trunk was about a half inch in diameter and four or five inches long, and the branches spread about on every side, making a cushion-like mass, from which the little twigs rose a few inches, crowned with the beautiful hairy flower of the willow.

Food of Owls.—It is well known that owls hunt by night, but it may be less a matter of common knowledge that like other birds of prey, they return by the mouth the hard indigestible parts of their food in the form of elongated pellets. These are found in considerable quantities and they reveal in considerable examination of them the fact that owls prey upon a number of predaceous creatures, the destruction of which is directly beneficial to man. Of course, the evidence gained in this way is infallible, and to show to what extent owls assist in preserving the balance of nature, it may be mentioned that seven hundred pellets examined, yielded the remains of sixteen bats, three rats, two hundred and thirty-seven moles, one thousand five hundred and ninety shrews, and twenty-two birds. These truly remarkable results were obtained from the common barn-owl, and the remains of the twenty-two birds consisted of nineteen sparrows, one greenfinch, and two swifts.—Poachers and Poaching.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The following is the Publisher's Report for The Tract Repository for 1891:

I herewith present, as usual, my report to the contributors of The Tract Repository.

The work for the past year has gone on as heretofore, little having occurred that is new or of especial interest, to which to call the attention of the contributors.

As was anticipated at the commencement of the year, a material increase was made in the edition. This was quickly absorbed by eager applicants for the paper from different parts of the South. It has been particularly gratifying to be able to respond to some of these urgent appeals for The Tract Repository which are constantly being made. It has also been pleasing to observe increasing evidences of improvement in the education and intelligence of many of the writers with whom I am necessarily brought into correspondence in conducting the publication of the paper. Yet, perhaps, the most satisfactory of all, is the fact that there is a steady increase, rather than diminution, in the interest manifested in the publication, as evinced by the general tone of nearly all the letters which come to hand from those to whom The Tract Repository is sent.

While, during the early years of the paper's publication, its existence was only expected to be of a temporary character, the continued and growing interest manifested on the part of both contributors and readers is calculated to induce the feeling that the work must still go on. As the enlarged edition of last year has absorbed the balance remaining in the treasury at the close of the preceding one, as well as the contributions that have since come to hand, it will probably be most prudent to somewhat reduce the edition for 1892.

It is, of course, impossible to estimate satisfactorily the amount of good which is being accomplished in circulating in this way, a small monthly sheet chiefly among the colored population of the South; yet, if we may judge from the general tone of the letters received from these people, we are warranted in believing that the regular or continuous perusal of the paper will prove a real blessing to many, especially among the young, whose welfare it seeks to promote.

As the season is now at hand when renewals are required from those who would receive the paper for another year, it may prove interesting to contributors to read a few brief extracts from these communications, as they will serve to show the general tenor and tone of nearly all letters received from the colored people. Many more of a similar character might be added, which have come to hand within a few weeks, but the extracts given on the accompanying sheet are deemed sufficient for the purpose intended.

The average monthly edition of the paper during the past year has been 11,850 copies, an increase of nearly 2,000 over that of 1890. The circulation has been as heretofore largely in the South Atlantic and Gulf States, with a portion in other parts of the South.

The receipts and expenditures for the year ending Twelfth Month 15, 1891, have been as follows:

FRANKFORD, PHILADELPHIA, Twelfth Mo. 15, 1891.

[As the size of the edition sent out depends on the liberality of those who contribute the funds, it is hoped that those into whose hands this report comes, will remember the language of the prophet Isaiah.—"The liberal deviseth liberal things, and by liberal things shall he stand." We know of no way in which seven cents can be placed where it is likely to do as much good, as in sending a copy of The Tract Repository for a year to some of the colored people in the South.—Ed.]

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

"Approved of God."

The Bible informs of a man whose name was Enoch, and when his days on earth were ended, it was said of him, "he walked with God and was not, for God took him." Of whom could more than this be said when writing an obituary notice of the departure of a friend that had enjoyed a well-spent life? A life that in its final conclusion tells the story that "to fear God and keep his commandments is the whole duty of man." It may be said that in those days when Enoch lived, the standard of morality and religion was not as high as since the coming of our blessed Lord, bringing life and immortality to light by the Gospel—that what is looked upon as sinful now was not seen by faint glimmerings of Light to be as bad as now appears. But certain it is, that the requirements of the Gospel are as obligatory upon Christians as were those of the outward law written on tables of stone, to be applied under the ceremonial law, and that it was as hard to human nature to exemplify love Divine under the law as under the Gospel. Be it as it may, Christians are required to make manifest their love by their obedience, and "to show forth out of a good conversation their works with meekness of wisdom;" ministers of good, rightly dividing the word of truth, approved of God as was Enoch. To come short of this, is coming short of that perfection to which we are called, whether Quaker, bond or free as to sectarian obligations. True believers in the Lord Jesus Christ think and perceive of a truth as did Peter, "that God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation he that feareth Him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him." In the midst of great unsettlement of religious views—one saying I am of Paul, another of Apollon, another of Cephas—how desirable, that those who claim to be of Christ, should manifest their loyalty to Him in word and in conversation, showing forth the praises of Him who inhabiteth eternity and whose name is holy.

"Lo this God, is the God we adore,
Our faithful, unchangeable Friend;
His love is as great as his power,
And neither hath measure nor end."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

In the War Cry is an interesting account of the conversion of H—C—, who for 20 years had been a gambler and drunkard, but who was turned into the way of Life through the instrumentality of the Salvation army. At the time of this remarkable change he was in the Kansas City jail awaiting trial upon a charge of felony. Found guilty of the charge, he was sentenced to imprisonment for two years, but had been only about a fourth of that time confined, when he was exonerated from all participation in the crime by the death-bed confession of the real criminal. Taught from infancy that all Protestants were heretics, and that outside the pale of the Roman Catholic church there was no salvation, "it is no wonder," he says, "that after years and years of sinning and confessing to the priest, I looked upon the Salvation army with contempt. But, oh! how I thank God that day He opened both my eyes and my understanding." He continues:

"I wrote to my dear mother in Chicago, sent my photograph, and told her what a change had come over me. Did she shout? No. Did she thank God that her drunken son was saved? No. But my sister returned the photograph and letter, writing these words on the fourth page: 'Mother and I disown you; never want to hear from you nor see you; would rather see you a gambler and a drunkard and a Catholic than to see you as you are—a heretic.' Glory to God for his keeping power! It was a severe blow—a blow struck by her who bore me; but this passage of Scripture came to my mind like a flash, 'When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up.' Bless God! it's true." L.

Chancellor Edward Mayes, of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, publishes in the Christian Advocate, an approximate statement of the Christian resources of America. He refers to the Southern line of the United States as forming a rough boundary line between Protestantism and Catholicism, the former being the prevailing religion to the North of it, and Catholicism to the South, excepting the British, Dutch and Danish possessions.

In the United States and Canada, the whole number of communicants of the different churches is given as 22,662,853. The larger denominations of these are the Methodists, 5,270,612; the Baptists, 4,318,582; Roman Catholics, 2,384,447; Presbyterians, 1,480,665; Lutherans, 1,192,743.

The number of scholars in the First-day schools aggregates more than 10,000,000.

There are in addition numerous societies for benevolent and religious purposes, such as the Temperance, Bible and Tract Societies, whose operations are extensive and important.

Duty of Voting.—Under a system of popular government every citizen's vote or failure to vote, his influence or culture, exercise that influence, affects the community for good or evil. It is, therefore, the duty of all good citizens, at the expense of personal convenience or even of personal business interest, to use both their votes and influence in behalf of public welfare. This is the patriotism of peace. This is public spirit in its most important sphere.—Christian Advocate

Officers of Law who Neglect their Duties are Criminals.—The very existence of a law and order league assumes that the officers of the law are themselves criminals. The assumption is, in many cases, only too well founded. Indifference to official duty, laxity in executing laws which the official has sworn to enforce, and, in still greater degree, sympathy and collusion with offenders, constitute as great a crime against the law and the peace of society as the offenses which are thus neglected or condoned or protected. The whole machinery of the law is in the hands of public officers. The proper use of this machinery is the business and the duty of the officers of the law. They are paid for the business, they are sworn to the duty. It ought never to be necessary for private citizens to employ their time, money and exertions, either individually or in organized societies, to do the work of paid and pledged officials. And they cannot do it with any considerable success. Besides, the machinery of law is complex. There are so many steps from detection to accusation, from accusation to trial to penalty, that if there is a balk at any stage in the progress of justice it is fatal. These considerations suggest that the efforts of Christian citizens in securing the due administration of these laws designed to serve as restraints upon the vices of society, and the enforcement of which is resisted by a criminal class having a strong political "pull," would better be directed toward the election of officials friendly to such a man as would be an honest, industrious, and uncorrupted body of officials to do their duty. These officials are themselves law-breakers, and no pressure of public opinion will long make them even "go through the motions" of a vigorous enforcement of the law. They may occasionally make a demonstrative "raid" or single out some scape-goat, designed to gratify public opinion during some "spasm of moral indignation," but the same legal restraint, except when administered by those who are in sympathy with it.

Cider.—In the current number of the Farm Journal the editor sends out the following timely caution: "Be careful of an abundance of fruit has caused barrels of cider to be stored in the farm cellars for winter drinking it will prove more a curse than a blessing. Empty every barrel of it into the road, that you may not regret the ruin of your sons."

The reading of this counsel brought vividly to mind the recollection of a little conversation that I had with a farmer in the Lower Connecticut valley. He was a New Englander, and an abundant yield was done to the farmers' sons. There are no liquor saloons hereabout for many miles, but when the barrels of cider are stored in the farmers' cellars the boys always have the liquor on tap, and many a one about here it has ruined. Over there, neighbor Blank's son became a common drunkard from drinking hard cider, and over there is a like case, and another over there. The farmer nodded with his head, and rather pointed with his hand to the neighbor referred to. We were in the hills near the base of Panther Mountain and Mt. Tobias. Overlook Mountain rose grandly in the northeast. Beautiful was the scenery, but alas, the curse was there.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The little paragraph on "Simplicity of Dress," on page 178 of "THE FRIEND," has induced one of our readers to send us the following incident. The person to whom it relates is a plain, but neatly dressed Friend.

"She was riding in a very crowded street car, during Centennial summer, when she noticed an elderly and very respectable looking man, watching her a good deal, and she at first thought, Is it anybody I ought to speak to? but concluded she had never seen him before, and so thought no more of it.

"After awhile, he left his seat, came and stood before me, with hands behind his back, and said, 'Madam, it does me good to see a lady dressed as a rational being, and as a Christian.' With this, he bowed himself out of the car. She had no doubt he was a perfect stranger to Friends."

THE UNCONSCIOUS TEACHER OF AN OBSERVANT PREACHER.—He was a young minister of quick mind and warm heart who preached with much earnestness. On the front seat every Sunday sat an honest miller who fixed his eyes upon him, listening with intense interest for twenty minutes to thirty, when he would turn around and sit sideways during the rest of the sermon. The preacher wondered why, and began to notice at what point it occurred. By the observation of a few Sabbaths he found that never did the hearer change his posture till the preacher had fully stated his thought, and was repeating himself or adding "sound and fury signifying nothing" that was always so. From that time the moment the miller changed his position he closed the sermon. During his whole subsequent ministry he has had a reputation for brevity and point, and if perhaps he begins to spin the "spread of his verbosity" beyond the staple of his argument" he thinks he sees the old miller turning sideways and stops the wheel.

How prone we are to feel that the civil law settles all questions of moral right and wrong with reference to property! When the courts decree that there is a flaw in the will by which a man bequeaths his wealth for the support of his "heirs at law" are likely to avail themselves of that decision, and to count as their own the property which they know was designed by the testator for another purpose than their personal profit. And thus they divert from its intended use the money which its owner desired to bestow. In doing this, they show "common honesty," which is a pretty poor standard of virtue. If, indeed, any one here declines to aid in diverting the clearly purposed bequest of a testator, through availing herself of a legal technicality, she is sure to receive, as she deserves, high praise for having exhibited uncommon honesty,—which is the only honesty that is really worth having.

Dr. William Hunt, of Philadelphia, tells an incident which illustrates the kind-heartedness of the late Dr. Joseph Leidy. He was at Swarthmore many years ago making some experiments with frogs, which he caught in a pond there. After using them he put them in a case, intending to again place them in the pond unharmed. However, he forgot, and left for his home without doing it. The next day, First-day, he happened to think of it; and, as railroad communication then was not as easy on the "day of rest" as it is now, and knowing the frogs would die unless they got some water soon, he walked the entire distance to Swarthmore and put the frogs in the pond again.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 16, 1892.

The extensive prevalence in this country of the influenza or La Grippe, and the number of deaths resulting from it, are calculated, one would suppose, to awaken serious thoughtfulness in the minds of the people—agreeably to the prophet Isaiah's declaration—that when the Lord's judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness.

A letter from a valued friend, whose mind is often brought under religious exercise for the welfare of his fellow-beings, speaks of his feeling somewhat depressed, with a sense of the Lord's chastenings in calling many from time to eternity; and at the same time so much foolishness openly manifested in our streets, in the fantastically-arrayed paraders on New Year's Eve, which seemed to show that many were not properly impressed with the seriousness of the situation. If they had been, they would scarcely have been willing to waste time and money in so foolish a manner.

It is a solemn declaration of Scripture—"He that being often reproved, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 11th inst., the United States Senate ratified the general act signed at Brussels, Seventh Month 2, 1890, by seven-tens Powers, including the United States, for the re-pression of the African slave trade, and also a convention of commerce and navigation between the United States and Independent State of Congo, signed at Brussels, Seventh Month 24, 1891. The slave trade treaty was sent to the Senate by the President nearly a year ago, and but a few weeks remained of the time allowed for the exchange of final ratification. Sixteen of the Powers represented at Brussels refused to ratify the convention many months ago, and the failure of the Senate to act upon the convention until this late day was caused by a reluctance on the part of a number of the Senators to recognize the justice of a partition of Africa among the nations of the world.

The provisions of the Convention look to the occupation of the interior of the Congo Basin by the Powers by means of strongly fortified stations in such a way as to make their repressive action effectively felt in the territories devastated by slave hunting; the construction of railways; the establishment of steamboats and telegraph lines; the restriction of the importation of firearms and ammunition of modern pattern; the diminution of trial wars by arbitration; the initiation of natives in agricultural labor and the mitigation of cannibalism. The treaty also contains a prohibition of the importation of spirituous liquors into territory to be hereafter defined.

The United States Supreme Court gave a decision on the 11th inst., in the case of Conselman versus Hitchcock, sustaining the right of a witness in a judicial investigation into certain alleged violations of the Interstate Commerce act to refuse to testify on the ground that his answers might tend to criminate him.

The United States Court of Claims has made a statement of facts in the case of the New York Indians against the United States, to recover the value of certain lands in New York State formerly held by their ancestors. The Court found that the lands were worth $1,900,000, but gave no opinion as to the Government's liability in the matter.

The President is engaged in the preparation of a proclamation of retaliation against those countries which have refused to enter into reciprocity trade relations with this country, and will probably have it ready for issue before the end of the present week.

The Cherokee Council has finally ratified the agreement made by the United States and the Cherokee Nation regarding the Cherokee strip. It now only remains for Congress to ratify the agreement in order to throw over 6,000,000 acres of land to white settlement.

The Chilian Minister in Washington has laid before Secretary Blaine information which he had received from Senor Pereira, the Chilian Minister of Foreign Affairs, regarding the Valparaiso affair. The District Attorney finds that the incident originated in a brawl between intoxicated sailors of both nations; that the police did not take steps to suppress the riot. The District Attorney then indicates three Chilians and Anderson, an American. Their trial will now take place before the Judge of Crimes, who heard the evidence taken originally for the benefit of the District Attorney.

An English syndicate has bought twenty-three, or all but six, of the flour mills in Utah. The transaction involves $1,800,000 for the plants and $350,000 for stock now on hand. The company proposes to erect a number of elevators, and expects to control the entire wheat crop of the Territory.

A Denver dispatch says that the "total output by Colorado for 1891, of silver, gold, lead and copper, amounted in value to $38,548,984; divided into ounces, tons and pounds, it is as follows: Silver, 23,102,355 ounces; gold, 217,652 ounces; lead, 63,123 tons; copper, 5,578,900 pounds. The average price paid for silver was $1.15; for gold, $87.25.

A terrible explosion occurred on the 7th inst. in the Osage mine at Krebs, Indian Territory. Fifty-eight of the miners were killed and seventeen others so badly injured that they were not expected to recover.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 653, which is 65 more than the previous week, and 255 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing, 301 were males and 352 females; 153 died of pneumonia; 76 of consumption; 61 of influenza; 44 of diseases of the heart; 42 of diphtheria; 33 of bronchitis; 26 of old age; 20 of apoplexy; 20 of crop; 15 of scarlet fever; 13 of inflammation of the kidney; 12 of cancer; 12 of convulsions and 10 of Bright's disease.

FOREIGN.—The Duke of Clarence, eldest son of the Prince of Wales, is seriously ill at Sandringham. He is suffering from a severe attack of influenza, complicated with pneumonia. The illness, which began at Sandringham are that the patient has so far maintained his strength well.

A dispatch from London, dated the 7th inst., says: The details received here in regard to the prevalence of influenza throughout Europe show that the ravages of the disease are daily increasing. In Stammersdorf, a suburb of Vienna, fifteen deaths have occurred during the last two days. The disease prevails to such an alarming extent in that vicinity that it has been deemed advisable to close all the schools.

In Dunkirk, a seaport town of France, influenza is also epidemic, and the mortality has been increased 30 per cent. The malady is also raging at Roubaix and Tourcoing, towns of France in the Department of Nord.

During the past week there have been reported in Singapore 1,225 fresh cases of influenza. During the same time there were 110 deaths from the disease. Varley, a Social Purist, who has recently visited Singapore, has written to Lord Salisbury charging the Government with permitting a horrible traffic in Chinese coolies to be carried on in Singapore. He says that 300,000 natives are exported in thousands, almost naked, and thrust into large receiving depots, whence they are shipped by English steamers to Java, Sumatra, Borneo, Jobore and other countries and hired out by agents to a system of enforced labor, where they have no voice concerning their position, work or pay.

Doctor Peifer, son-in-law of the distinguished Professor Koch, discovered the influenza bacillus and has transplanted it in six cases with complete success. He has also discovered the original cause of infection. The bacillus of influenza is the smallest bacillus yet discovered. Another doctor of Berlin, an assistant in the city hospital, discovered the microbe of influenza almost simultaneously with Dr. Peifer. The latter discovered the germ in the sputum, while the former found it in the blood. Both doctors have reared it artificially, and have inoculated animals with the pure cultures. Dr. Canon, of the City Hospital, also made a report. He had examined twenty patients and had discovered the bacilli in the blood of seventeen. Professor Koch examined the specimens and the methods of investigation pursued by the two doctors and established the identity of their results.

A Russian correspondent making a tour of Riazan, writes as follows: "Count Tolstoi has established a number of eating houses where he has fed people at three cents a day, giving them soup, cabbage soup, good bread and occasionally eggs, but never meat. Count Tolstoi has limited himself and his assistants to the same diet. He and his helpers are erecting huts of refuge for peasants, many of whom have burned their own barns and homesteads piece by piece, in order to keep warm before starting to tramp. Count Tolstoi has kept open the village schools and the children look bright and healthy."

A dispatch dated St. Petersburg, First Month 11th, says: "There has just been issued an imperial decree which extends to Finland the prohibition of the exportation of wheat from the Russian empire."

A fresh stream of lava is issuing from the base of the great cone of Vesuvius.

The Khedive of Egypt, Mohammed Tewfik, is dead. He had been suffering from influenza, which developed into congestion of the lungs. This was complicated with a cardiac affection, and on the afternoon of the 7th inst., he succumbed. Mohammed Tewfik will be succeeded by Prince Abbas Pasha, his eldest son, who was born Seventh Month 14, 1874.

"The Sultan's recent recognition of Abbas Pasha as reigning Khedive," says the correspondent of the New York Mail and Express, "has crushed the hopes of Selim Pasha, grand-nephew of Abbas, who would be the successor of his father, according to the old Moslem law, as he is the oldest male member of the family of the present dynasty; but the establishment of the English law of primogeniture is still heartily upheld at the Porte, as concerning Egypt."

The results of the election at Toronto show that for the first time in the history of Canada women have been elected to office. Mary McDonnell, leader of the Canadian Woman Suffrage movement, being elected to the public school board, with two other ladies, Dr. Augusta S. Gillen and a woman named Harrison. Numbers of women taxpayers voted for all the city officers.

For "THE FRIEND,"

Having obtained a Minute for a religious visit to meetings in Iowa, and other meetings within Indiana Yearly Meeting, William Evans writes:

1851.—Sixth Month 10th. "Left home this morning, accompanied by my friend Joseph Elkinton, under feelings of much nearness of affection and solicitude for my dear wife and children, and a deep seriousness at the extent of the prospect before me."

"22d. We attended the First-day Meeting at Stillwater, which was a pretty large company. We seemed to sit in a dry place, for a long time, under the feeling of which, I feared the people were not sufficiently engaged in travail of soul for themselves, but were looking to be led or satisfied through others. Such a state was spoken to, and the indispensable need of his labor for their own salvation, pressed upon them. The honest travellers were encouraged to keep to their Lord, and to be faithful to their gifts, and they would finally receive a crown of life. What avails the mere practice of coming to meeting, and holding the principles of Christianity, if we are swallowed up with worldly thoughts and pursuits, and have forgotten the few of our youth; going after the perishing things of time; which I was afraid was the case with some."

"25th. Attended Alum Creek Preparative Meeting of Ministers and Elders; in which I was led to make some observations on a case before it, touching the care to be observed towards persons appearing as ministers; both as to hastening their reception into these meetings, or in too long delaying it, when Friends are satisfied that a gift in the ministry has been bestowed. The discernment and sense which the Holy Spirit gives to those who humbly wait for its guidance, is the ground of right decision; and that is to be looked for by those, whose duty it is to judge in these cases. It appeared to me, that the desire to fill the ranks of ministers and elders, at this day, arising in part from the idea, that the cause of Christ depends mainly for its support on such activity; and also, it is to be feared, from a change of opinion, in not a few, respecting inward spiritual religion and worship, is involving the Society in great danger.

"26th. After the Scriptures had been read this morning, by one of the parents, I felt drawn to speak on the importance of rightly discharging their duty. The need there is of watchfulness and prayer, that they may be endowed with wisdom to govern the children, and to example them, so as to do nothing we would deem improper in them. Like Abraham, to command our house, and our children after us, to keep the Divine law. The children were reminded of the serious responsibility which attaches to them, for the right occupancy of the measure of grace, purchased for them by the Saviour; and for the advantages of membership in the Society of Friends; and they were affectionately invited to faithfulness to that precious gift, and the improvement of the privileges they had."

"28th. Rode to Gilead; and attended the Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders. I sat among them in enquire; but towards the close, felt engaged to hold up to their view the great importance of the stations which they occupied, both to themselves and to the flock. There are dispensations meted out by the Head of the church, for our renewed humiliation, to strip us of what we have been entrusted with, to let us see and feel our own nothingness, and to prepare for further service when He sees meet. In this condition, we are to abide the Lord's time, not daring to stir up or awake our Beloved until He pleases. When we have waited his time, we come to know Him, by his quickening power, to be unto us the resurrection and the life. It is a great favor to be kept, from the beginning to the end of our heavenly pilgrimage, in this lowly, travelling state, and to see greenness in old age. It was to be feared, that for want of being willing to endure the baptisms of the Holy Spirit, some have trusted in themselves and their early experiences, and have lost ground, and not attained that establishment in the Truth which they would have been favored with, had they continued as when in the child's state. There are right hand as well as left hand errors, and it is needful to guard against the insinuations of Satan, who sometimes seeks to destroy the good work, by persuading that we are unfit for it; even when the pointing of the Divine finger is felt, to engage in it. But we are to lay hold of the degree of faith furnished; and moving at the Lord's bidding, we shall know Him to be mouth and wisdom unto us. I thought the little service made its way into the hearts of some and opened them towards us."

"29th. First-day. At Alum Creek Meeting; in which the doctrine of humility was held up to view, as inculcated by our Saviour, when the disciples had come to Him saying, 'Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven;' and 'He called a little child unto Him, and set him in the midst of them, and said, verily, I say unto you, except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.' And when the mother of Zebedee's children desired that her sons might sit, one on his right hand and the other on his left, in his kingdom; He replied, 'Ye know not what ye ask; and let them know that it was only to be given to them for whom it was prepared of the Father. The desire for eminence and notoriety, either in the world, or in the church, cannot be indulged by the truly devoted follower of Christ. His concern is, to be made and kept what the Lord would have him to be; and if he perseveres steadily, he will be brought to see more and more clearly, that his safety depends upon constant resignation and obedience to the Divine will. I was very unusually and unlooked for, led to treat on this momentous subject; and the meeting closed with prayer for the diffident, honest-hearted ones among them, that they might be strengthened with might in the inner man, to hold on their way faithfully; and for the young people, that they might open their hearts to the King of glory. Dined, and in the afternoon returned to Gilead.

"30th. Was held Alum Creek Quarterly Meeting. In the meeting for business, I felt drawn to revive the prediction, 'In that day the Lord of hosts shall be for a crown of glory, and a diadem of beauty, unto the residue of his people; and for a spirit of judgment to him that sitteth in judgment, and strength to them that turn the battle to the gate.' I observed, that if this prophecy is fulfilled at the present time, it ought to be in our religious Society. Our early Friends were brought off from all human dependence, to wait on the Lord for ability to act in his cause and his church; and they knew Him to preside among them, and allot to his servants their respective portions of the labor. One of them said, 'In Babylon there is the likeness of everything that is in Zion.' They saw the deception, and rejecting the mere image, they sought for the substance. I felt afraid that some, even in the appearance of love and unity, were in danger of mistaking the show of it for the reality, which is only known by the truly baptized members of the church of Christ. The young men, many of whom were possessed of good talents, were invited to wait for Divine direction, to enable them to take their proper place in the church; some to be month, and others as ballast, to keep all steady; every one minding the Pilot, that the bark may be guided, safely.

"Proposing to go into the Women's Meeting, a Friend was named to accompany me, and the Master qualified me to preach the Gospel of salvation by Christ, to the young people; who were pleaded with to yield to the calls of his grace, and come to Him. Faithfulness in the discharge of their duties, was pressed upon the mothers, that as far as in their power, they may prepare the children to receive the Seed of the kingdom; and that when the end came, whether the children regarded the entreaties and exercise of their parents or not, they may be clear; having the testimony of the Lord's spirit, that they had done what they could. It was a tendering time with some."

"Seventh Month 4th. Rode to Carmel. The meeting was small. After waiting some time, the language presented, 'Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled.' I was enabled to speak to such a state, recurring to the poor widow in the time of the famine, who was gathering some sticks to bake for herself and her son, the last pittance of meal, expecting to die after it was partaken of; but obeying the direction of the prophet, to prepare a cake for him first, she experienced the supply to be continued, until the Lord sent rain on the earth; and so it would be in a spiritual sense. The obedient soul would not be suffered to perish; but keeping the faith in those low seasons, renewed supplies of heavenly bread would be furnished, as it is patiently waited and labored for. My mind was then turned to those who were full of business, in providing for the body, neglecting the work of their salvation, living as without God in the world, and striving to collect much about them. But all their earthly possessions could not procure for them one crumb of heavenly bread, or a drop of living water. And what will they do when the pale messenger is sent to their habitation? Prepared or unprepared, they must go to their everlasting reward.

"Although it was distressing to enter into the condition of such worldings, yet it seemed right to warn them of their danger; and such were called upon, if it was even the eleventh hour, to enter into the vineyard of their own hearts, and labor to have everything removed that was choking the good seed, and obstructing its taking root and growing there."

"9th. Attended Union Meeting. The state of some, whose faith was closely proved, was impressed on me; and after waiting for a time, under the fear of over-acting, or suffering the meeting to pass without doing what I ought, I rose with the expressions, 'Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth him out of them all,' and dwell on the benefits derived from our trials. 'Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son that He receiveth.' After entering into the necessity of these dispensations, for man's refinement and preservation, I was led to those who knew nothing of these chastenings; who were without their changes, and were living in ease and indifference; and those who are without chastisement, are not the sons and daughters of the Lord. Many of these go into the earth, and are covered with thick clay; so that they are in danger of entirely losing the tenderness and sensibility which they knew in the days of their youth. It appeared to me, that the inordinate pursuit of the things of the world, had brought a cloud over our religious Society, as well as over other parts of Christendom generally. We were planted a noble vine, wholly a right seed, in the beginning; but were now in danger of becoming the degenerate plant of a strange vine. Some were solemnly warned of the consequences of worshipping Mammon, and reminded of the testimony of Christ, that we cannot serve God and Mammon; and of all that we can collect of this world's goods, we can carry nothing out with us. I was enabled to declare the truth in the authority thereof, expostulating with the worldly professors, and in entreating the young people to serve the Lord."

OUR Lord declares he will come as a thief in the night, in a day and hour when he is not expected. How awful will the summons be to the unprepared, "Steward, give an account of thy stewardship."

FROM "THE INDEPENDENT." How We Treat the Chinese.

The promptness of the Chinese in agreeing to the justness of the claim for damages on account of the Wu-chu riots and the immediate payment of the 110,000 taels demanded, together with the cession to the injured missionaries of several acres of land commanding their establishment, is in strong contrast to the conduct of America in making reparation for outrages committed upon the subjects of China in this country. The fact that the Chinese Government took prompt steps to pay for the damage done at Wu-chu, and that it agreed without a murmur to the amount demanded, together with the occurrence of outbreaks in other localities, which will assuredly be followed by further claims for indemnity, calls to mind the certainty that a counter claim will be set up for outrages on the subjects of that Government in this country which have not as yet been made the subject of negotiation. The present is an opportune occasion for reviewing the principal of these outrages, most if not all of which seem to have almost entirely escaped the attention of the Eastern press, or at best have received only passing notice.

First in date as well as in cold-blooded fiendishness was the atrocious and premeditated slaughter of thirty-four Chinese miners that occurred in 1887 on the Snake River, at the point where that stream forms the boundary line between Oregon and Idaho. The scene of the slaughter was on the Oregon bank of the river, in a wild and almost inaccessible region, sparsely settled, and the resort of gangs of horse thieves and cut-throats. The full particulars of this crime have but recently come to light.

South of the region mentioned the Snake River flows through a farming region, fairly well settled. The people of this locality were horrified in the latter part of April, 1887, at finding, inside of a week, the bodies of a number of Chinese floating in the water of the river. When examined, each body was found to have wounds made by bullets; and the remains also gave evidence of having travelled a considerable distance. All told, twenty bodies were found, each bearing the unmistakable evidence of murder. The remains were all decently interred, and the officials of the Chinese Consulate in this city were informed of the facts.

They communicated at once with the authorities of the locality where the bodies were found, and these men seem to have done all in their power to ferret out the facts in regard to the wholesale murder; but they were unsuccessful, and finally reported that to the best of their belief the bodies had floated down from the vicinity of Wallowa, Ore., but that section was peopled almost entirely by desperadoes, to whom the murder of a white man, let alone a Chinaman, was of no importance, and it was useless to prosecute the inquiry further.

The Chinese Consul General, upon learning these facts, at once engaged an expert detective and authorized him to spare no expense in ascertaining the truth and bringing the guilty parties to justice. It was not believed possible that so wholesale a slaughter could have been committed without a large number being concerned therein, and it was believed that a little good detective work would result in bringing the murderers to justice.

The detective spent several months and several thousand dollars in his search. He did his duty faithfully, but found himself completely balked and was obliged at last to confess that he was defeated; that the report made by the authorities as to the reasons for their non-success was borne out by the facts, and that they had in truth done all they could to unearth the perpetrators of the crime.

So the matter was dropped, and as time went on it seemed as if the blood of the score of Chinamen was destined to call aloud for vengeance in vain. But, as the Chinese Consul remarked to your correspondent, "It did not seem possible that God Almighty could allow the secret to remain hidden," and so it proved. It was necessary first to bring one of those with the guilty knowledge to his deathbed, and then, with eternity staring him in his face, he told the awful story. But until that deathbed confession had been made the full extent of the terrible butchery had not been known. Besides the twenty whose bodies had floated down the river to civilized regions, there were fourteen more killed whose remains were never found, making in all thirty-four Chinamen slaughtered for purposes of robbery.

From the confession referred to it appears that four, or at most five, white men were concerned in the affair. At a bar on Snake River, in the wild region referred to at the outset, there were a number of Chinese engaged in placer mining, and it was reported that they were enjoying good luck. It was proposed to kill and rob them, and plans were laid accordingly. Each white man was well armed with Winchester rifle and revolvers, and they separated into couples. Two went up the river, and the other two took a circuit so as to come down stream and reach the camp on the opposite side. They found twelve Chinese on the bar at work and one in camp, cooking. The two murderers who came down stream reached the camp first, and at once opened fire on their victims, killing several. The Chinese were taken by surprise, and, dropping their tools, fled down the river. They ran right into the arms of the other couple, who also opened fire and completed the work of murder. Twelve Chinese had been instantly killed, and the thirteenth had been wounded and was left lying by a rock, it being supposed he could not escape, and the murderers being anxious to rob the camp. The bodies of the dead were thrown into the swift current of the river, and in the camp the assassins found five sacks of gold dust, containing nearly $6,000.

They remained in the Chinese camp all night, and next morning they remembered the wounded Chinaman, and went to see what had become of him. They found him gone, but quickly espied him in a boat trying to escape. The poor fellow had had his arm broken by a bullet the day before, and was unable to manage his craft, which was quickly driven ashore, whereupon he was seized, his brains beaten out, and his mangled body also given sepulture in the waves.

Shortly after this, the murderers espied a boat containing eight Chinese coming down the river, the occupants evidently intending to stop at the camp of their murdered fellow-countrymen. The assassins kept out of sight, and allowed the Chinese to land. Then, as they were going all unsuspectingly toward the camp, the assassins opened fire, and, being expert marksmen, their victims fell like so many sheep. Eight shots were fired, and the eight Chinese were killed, after which their bodies were likewise cast into the stream.

The appetite of the murderous villains for blood was now whetted, and they determined to make a clean sweep of all the Chinese in the country. They knew there was another camp of pig-tailed miners a few miles up the river, so they embarked in the boat belonging to the men they had just killed and set out on their murderous errand. The Devil must have helped them, for they reached the camp safely, found the unsuspecting Chinese at work on the bar to the number of thirteen (again the unlucky number), opened fire on them and murdered each and every one. Their bodies, too, were thrown into the river, and their cabins were ransacked, resulting in the discovery and theft of some $50,000 worth of gold dust. Thirty-four lives had been sacrificed and a little over $50,000 in dust obtained as a reward for the wholesale slaughter.

Actually, this seems incredible. It certainly does not seem possible that such cold-blooded villains could exist unhung in this country.

Yet on his dying bed Robert McMillan, once of Imnaha, Wallowa County, Ore., solemnly affirmed that this horrible tale was true, and so affirming went before his Creator.

He named Bruce Evans, Frank Vaughn, Max Larue and "Tide" Canfield as the men who committed the crime and stole the gold dust. The bodies of twenty of the thirty-four murdered Chinese are mute evidence of the truth of McMillan's confession, while the other fourteen were easily accounted for as having been lodged among the rocks, driftwood and shifting sands of the stream in the seventy-five or one hundred miles that lay between the scene of the slaughter and the locality where the other bodies were found.

The confession of McMillan has been translated into Chinese, and, with a full account of the whole terrible affair, has been sent to the authorities at Peking, with a request for instructions. In view of recent occurrences in China, who can doubt that those instructions will be?

But there is more to tell.

W. F. GRAY.

LONDON, ENGLAND.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Baltimore Yearly Meeting.

The care exercised by Friends to deal justly and kindly with the Indians bore good fruits—as is shown by a letter written by Israel Penberton, a prominent Friend of Philadelphia, to Samuel Wiley of North Carolina, in the Twelfth Month of 1758. It says:

"The bad conduct of the Virginians to the Cherokees, this summer past, will, I fear, produce bad effects, and I have been much concerned about you and our friends in North Carolina, and I hope you will improve every opportunity of cultivating their friendship and making them know you as a people distinct from others. Is it not a consideration worthy of thankful remembrance, that in all the desolation on our frontiers, not one Friend we have heard of, has been slain nor carried captive and we have reason to think, both from their conduct in places where Friends were as much exposed as others and from their declarations to us, they would never hurt Friends if they knew us to be such, and when we observe how little all their great military preparations have done, and how sensibly the measures taken by the means of Friends, in a way consistent with our principles, have contributed towards regaining peace, it excites reverent thankfulness in many minds and a desire to be enabled to keep steadily to our principles. If General Forbes succeeds, it must be attributed rather to the drawing off the Indians by our pacific negotiations than anything else; for, if we had not relied on the good effect of these measures, I have reason to conclude he would not have ventured this year to Fort Duquesnes. I wish thou wouldst excite the people, both in your country and North Carolina, to apply to Granville to make a fair purchase of his lands of the Catawbas, and to leave them a country sufficient for themselves before it be too late; for fear if some limits are not fairly fixed soon, it will cause disputes with them; and if your governor would authorize some persons here to satisfy the Shawnees, who have repeatedly complained of you, it would be a good work."

In 1763, Western Quarterly Meeting reported that "a scruple and straightness hath arisen in the minds of several Friends, with respect to the recommending by certificates such persons who remove to North Carolina or elsewhere, and settle on lands which have not been purchased from the Indians, and are yet claimed by them," and it asked the judgment of the Yearly Meeting on this point.

This ejected from the Yearly Meeting the following Minute:

"It is the solid sense and judgment of this meeting, that Friends should not purchase nor remove to settle such lands, as have not been fairly and openly first purchased from the Indians by those persons who are or may be fully authorized by the Government to make such purchases; and that Monthly Meetings should be careful to excite their members to the strict observance of this advice; and where any remove so contrary to the advice of their brethren, they should not give certificates to such persons."

As the Friends of both Baltimore and Philadelphia Yearly Meetings were much interested in early times in the movements of the Indians, it may be proper to introduce here a brief outline of the events which so deeply concerned them.

The great Algonquin tribe, at the time of the settlements in America by European nations, occupied the whole Atlantic coast, as far South as the Savannah River. The Iroquois were located on the St. Lawrence and in the central lake region of New York. They were an aggressive people engaged in almost constant wars with other tribes, and extended their conquests westward and southward. At the time of the settlement of Pennsylvania, the whole valley of the Susquehanna was controlled by Iroquois-speaking tribes. The Susquehannaughans, who dwelt along the Susquehanna River, especially in its lower parts, were at deadly feud with the Five Nations, but finally submitted to their authority about 1680. And at the treaty of Lancaster in 1744, the Iroquois nation claimed pay from the Government of Maryland for the lands on the Potomac, by right of conquest.

The Cherokees originally occupied part of Ohio, but were gradually driven southward by the Delawares. When the Lenapes assumed the office of peace-makers, this feud ceased, and was not renewed until the general turmoil of the French and Indian wars, 1750-1768. After this closed the Cherokees sought a renewal of their peaceful relations with the Delawares in 1768.

The Shawnees were of Algonquin stock, and were a very migratory nation. They formerly dwelt in the South and moved northward and joined the Delawares in Pennsylvania. They were at one time located in the forks of the Delaware above Easton, afterwards west of the Alleghany Mountains, and then on the Scioto River in Ohio.

Thomas Chalkley, a minister in the Society of Friends, mentions having a meeting among the Shawnee Indians at Conestoga, near the Susquehanna, in 1706.

The basin of the Cumberland River is marked by the earliest geographers as the locality of the Shawnees. A portion of the tribe afterwards lived near Winchester, Va.

During the French war from 1754 to 1763, the Indians, who were restless and displeased with the manner in which their lands were being taken by the white settlers, were easily induced to take part in the conflict, which true wisdom would have led them to avoid. For, whichever party was successful, they were sure to be the sufferers.

The Indian mode of warfare was to send out small war parties, which surprised the outlying settlements, killed the occupants and destroyed the buildings. This, of course, awakened a fearful spirit of revenge and hatred in those who were exposed to these attacks. Hence the border warfare was marked by scenes of the greatest barbarity on both sides. Some of the pioneer settlers became so embittered, that even in times of professed peace, they were ready to murder a man of a red skin whenever the opportunity presented. And being located beyond the limits of civilized life, the authority of the governments had little influence in controlling their movements. So it happened, that when peace was restored between England and France, and the latter had ceded her claim to the territories in dispute, warlike operations on the frontier did not immediately cease.

Thus arose a renewal of hostilities, known as Cresap's war, which commenced in the spring of 1774.

A party of land-hunters who had chosen Col. Michael Cresap as their captain, treacherously murdered several Indians on the Ohio below Wheeling, in retaliation for the supposed theft of some of their horses. Among the slain were some relatives of Logan, a Cayuga chief, who had authority among the Shawnees, and had ever been friendly to the whites. Other outrages of the same kind followed, which stirred up Logan to seek revenge. The Indians, as is their wont in such cases, sent out many parties to lay waste the settlements in the western part of Virginia and Pennsylvania. Finally a battle was fought at Point Pleasant, where the Great Kanawha empties into the Ohio, between the collected forces of the Indians and a Virginian army, in which the Indians were defeated. Cornstalk, one of the principal Indian warriors, opened negotiations for peace, which Logan did not oppose, although he took no part in them. It was to a messenger sent by the Virginian governor to appease him, that he made the celebrated speech which has so often been quoted:

"I appeal to any white man to say, if ever he entered Logan's cabin hungry, and he gave him not meat; if ever he came cold and naked, and he clothed him not. During the course of the last long and bloody war, Logan remained idle in his camp, an advocate for peace. Such was my love for the whites, that my countrymen pointed as I passed, and said, 'Logan is the friend of the white man!' I had even thought to have lived with you, but for the injuries of one man, Colonel Cresap, who, last spring, in cold blood and unprovoked, murdered all the relations of Logan, not even sparing my women and children. There runs not a drop of my blood in the veins of any living creature. This called on me for revenge. I have sought it. I have killed many. I have fully glutted my vengeance. For my country, I rejoice at the beams of peace; but do not harbor a thought that mine is the joy of fear. Logan never felt fear. He will not turn on his heel to save his life. Who is there to mourn for Logan? Not one."

It is not needful to relate in detail the further incidents of the disputes between the Indians and whites, and the terms of the treaties by which the former were gradually despoiled of their possessions.

A remembrance of the kindness received from their ancestors, and a feeling of sympathy with them in their impoverished condition, led several of the Yearly Meetings, Baltimore among others, to raise sums of money and appoint committees to use it for their help and improvement. In furtherance of this concern, Friends in Great Britain remitted £7,000 sterling, which was divided between the Indian Committees of New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore Yearly Meetings.

The labors of Philadelphia Friends were mainly exerted among the Seneca Indians of New York, for whose benefit a boarding school is still maintained at Tunesassh. This branch of the subject, although its history is interesting, need not be pursued further in this article.

The correspondence between the two Yearly Meetings contains frequent references to Indian matters.

The Epistle from Baltimore Yearly Meeting in 1790 speaks of their labors with Congress and the legislature of their own State, on behalf of the African race; and of their concern to discourage the unnecessary use of spirituous liquors.

The reply from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1791 refers to these subjects, encouraging their brethren to renewed efforts as way may open; and conveys the following caution growing out of the disturbed condition of the Indian frontiers: "We have had renewedly to see at this time that the safety and strength of Israel is promoted by abiding in their tents, and not mixing with the spirit and policy of this world; but faithfully maintaining our testimony against war and bloodshed, which in the present season is more especially needful for those Friends whose residence is contiguous to the Indians' country."

The Epistle from the Baltimore Yearly Meeting in 1792 mentions that divers persons had been received into membership by request, and that several persons not of our Society had manumitted their slaves.

That from Philadelphia in 1793 speaks of the number at the Yearly Meeting being much fewer than usual, "by reason of a great sickness now prevailing in this city, which indeed appears awful, many being daily summoned to their long home by the stroke of death; the awakening tendency whereof sensibly affects our minds with the language of—'Be ye also ready.' Yet amidst this outward calamity each quarter of this meeting is represented, and we have frequently felt our hearts nearly united in sitting together, tending to strengthen and encourage us more and more in placing our confidence in the Divine Arm for support in times of trial.

The Epistle also refers "to the situation of affairs between the rulers of these States and the natives of this land" as "gloomy and sorrowful;" and expresses the desire for a watchful care over our members, that none may inadvertently be drawn aside from our peaceable testimony.

The Epistle from Baltimore in 1795 states, that the case of the Indians had engaged their solid attention, and that they had opened subscriptions and recommended it to their subordinate meetings.

The Epistle to Virginia in 1796 contains the following instructive hint:

"As a moderate share of labor is found to be beneficial both to body and mind, we feel a renewed desire that our youth may be trained up to habits of industry, as it may obviate the necessity of taking into our houses as domestics persons whose conversation may prove injurious to our families."

The Epistle from Baltimore in 1797 mentions that some Friends had paid a visit to the Indians northwest of the Ohio River, whose report was favorable to their prospect of affording them some assistance.

Their meeting had been unusually small owing to the prevalence of disease similar to that which Friends of Philadelphia had passed through.

The Epistle to Baltimore in 1798 cautions against the inflammatory productions of party writers, and that they should religiously guard against the leaven of that spirit which is opposed to our peaceable principles.

[About the period when this epistle was written, party spirit in the United States had risen to an uncommon height. The French Revolution, which was an effort of the people to throw off great oppression and abuses, had awakened much sympathy with them in the United States as fellow-republicans. France and England were then at war, and between them the commerce of the United States suffered grievously. There was a powerful party who would willingly have plunged our nation into war with one or the other; and it required great coolness and judgment on the part of those at the head of affairs so to steer the ship of State as to avoid wrecking it on the rocks. There was, therefore, peculiar need that those who professed the principles of peace, should guard against the leaven of a warlike spirit.]

The Epistle from Baltimore in 1799 mentions that they had a committee appointed to promote the welfare of the Indians.

The Epistle to Baltimore in 1800 sympathizes with their Friends in the discouragement to their efforts on behalf of the Indians, arising from the introduction among them of spirits by unscrupulous traders. It also extends a caution to those disposed to remove into countries newly opened for settlement, weightily to consider the advantages resulting from Religious Society, and opportunities of uniting with their friends in meetings for Worship and Discipline.

The Epistle to Baltimore in 1803 says, that at the Yearly Meeting they had been "renewedly animated and encouraged to attend to the law and the testimony; a desire being prevalent that the same energy of concern may be carried home to our smaller meetings, and into our separate families." It also mentions that its Meeting for Sufferings had lately addressed the legislature of Pennsylvania, and met with a kind reception; and adds, that in order to keep an open door with others, it is necessary to walk among them as becometh the Gospel of Christ.

The Epistle from Baltimore in 1805, in addition to the subjects usually referred to, contains a paragraph on war, which expresses an "earnest solicitude that our brethren in every part of this continent may guard against taking any part therein, but faithfully bear a testimony against it, as followers of Him who came 'not to destroy men's lives, but to save them.'"

We desired to purchase a home, but money was not poured into our hands, but came in slowly through days and days of work; but we were blessed with health and strength, and we made the desired purchase. The result was a heavy debt, and but poor hopes of lessening it. Our family increased, sickness and death entered with its attendant expenses, until my companion was altogether discouraged and said, "It is useless; it may as well go now as after awhile," but I knew God's promise to be true and faithful, and I felt encouraged thereby and said, "It will surely be all right." We counted our cost, no article was brought but its price was recorded; coffee was dispensed with as one article the dispensing of which would help liquidate the debt; the secular papers followed the coffee, our housework was performed largely in the dark hours of the night, and when the money was received for labors, the first question was, which debt should be paid first? The result was that the poorest people were paid first, and many a time, one day after receiving our money not a cent remained in our possession, but a neatly folded receipt gladdened our hearts. So little by little the debts were paid in this way, and to-day I feel to thank the Lord that the debt of justice is gone and freedom is again felt.—Herald of Truth.

Little Maud Hood, of Sydenham.—Maud Hood is only a tiny mite, of 13, and, therefore, not capable of doing anything on what the world would call a great scale; but nevertheless her name merits a place in the large "Book of Golden Deeds." There are seven motherless little ones in Maud's home, in Lower Sydenham, all young. Their father, working watchmaker, has to earn the household bread, and one brother helps in the process by acting as a green grocer's errand boy. Another is an invalid, confined to bed, and the cares of the household and the oversight of the younger ones all fall upon Little Mother Maud. While she was attending to the invalid, Arthur, four years old, severely scalded himself, by upsetting a teapot at the fireplace. Maud and the elder brother got him into bed and dressed the wounds with oil as best they could. The green grocer's customers were waiting, and the errand lad had to go, leaving his sister in sole charge. She decided that the burned child required better treatment than she could give, so she marched off to the Home for Sick Children, to lay the case before them. Yes, they would take him in, but she must get a letter of admission. Where? They gave her the names of several subscribers. Off she went to canvass, and was happily successful. How to get him to the home? She borrowed a perambulator, carefully placed the injured child upon the cushions, and wheeled it herself to the institution, where the invalid was at once admitted. All this energy and devotion were of no avail, for the burns were too severe.—Pull Mall Gazette.

KIND WORDS—Kind words cost but little, yet they accomplish much. They help one's own good will—they soften our own soul. While angry words are fuel to the flames of wrath, and make it blaze more fiercely, kind words soothe and quiet and comfort the hearer.

MY GUIDE.

BY ANNA B. TROTCH.

I asked for a guide; my sight was dim,
The way grew dark, and I asked for Him
Out of my pressing need.
My wandering feet were prone to stray
Off from the beaten, well-worn way,
And I was faint indeed.

One came. His voice was low and sweet,
And I marked how torn were his weary feet,
As He said, "The path I know,"
While He kindly laid my hand on his arm,
And whispered, "To thee there shall come no harm,
In the path we twain shall go."

Was he a stranger, ye ask, and think
I must needs from his gentle guidance shrink,
Till I had proved Him true?
Scarcely before had I looked on Him;
But his sight was strong though mine was dim,
He had watched me my whole life through.

Yea, more than this, when He saw me lost,
The space from his Father's house he crossed,
A wilderness bleak and wild.
He came through the briars and thorns and heat,
Though He left in blood the print of his feet,
And sought me, a wandering child.

* * * * *
Marvel ye now that I trust my Guide,
Or my smallest needs to Him confide,
With his words so kind and true,
Spoken afresh to me day by day,
As He bids me journey, or bids me stay
Where He gives me work to do?

I only long that my eyes may be Steadily fixed on Him, that He May guide me as at his will—
That my hands be faithful in work begun,
And my willing feet on his errands run,
Or, when He bids, stand still.

Will ye not try this Guide so good?
He hath bought you, too, with his precious blood,
And watched you your whole lives through,
There is room on his arm for you to lean,
He will ever be, and aye, hath been,
"A Leader" strong and true.

TRUE WORTH.

BY JAMES BUCKHAM.

Who longs for larger work to do,
To his own task let him be true,
A patient waiter,
It is not most by tier and span
God judges worth,—behold, the man
Who works is greater!

The hand which guides the simplest tool,
So it guides true, by honor's rule,
A patient waiter,
With God, the spirit shapes the deed;
The thing done, that hath not the meed,—
The doing, purely.

Believe me, friend, essential worth
Is Heaven's most precious gift to earth,
How'er men measure,
The humble heart that loves its lot,
Does well its part, and envies not,
Hath time's best treasure.

THE PRINCE OF PEACE.

"What means this glory round our feet,"
The magi mused, "more bright than morn?"
And voices chanted, clear and sweet,
"To-day the Prince of Peace is born."

"What means that star," the shepherds said,
That brightens through the rocky glen?"
And angels, answering overhead,
Sang, "Peace on earth, good-will to men."

'Tis eighteen hundred years or more
Since those sweet oracles were dumb,
We wait for Him like them of yore,
Alas! He seems so slow to come.

But it was said, in words of gold,
No time or sorrow e'er shall dim,
That little children might be bold,
In perfect trust to come to Him.

All around about our feet shall shine
A light like that the wise men saw,
If we our willing hearts incline
To that sweet life which is the Law.

So shall we learn to understand
The simple faith of shepherds then,
And kindly clasping hand in hand,
Sing, "Peace on earth, good-will to men."

For they who to their childhood cling,
And keep their natures fresh as morn,
Once more shall hear the angels sing,
"To-day the Prince of Peace is born."

THE BRAVEST OF THE BRAVE.

BY JOAQUIN MILLER.

"Europe was never so ferocious and terribly armed. Woe to him who sets fire to Europe now!"—MOLTKE.

And who the bravest of the brave;
The bravest hero ever born?
'Twas one who dared a fowler's grave,
Who dared to bear the scorn of scorn,
Nay, more than this; when sword was drawn
And vengeance waited but his word,
He looked with pitying eyes upon
The scene, and said, "Put up thy sword?"
Could not one king be found to-day
As brave to do, as brave to say?

"Put up thy sword into the sheath."
Put up thy sword, put up thy sword.
By Cedron's bank this spake beneath
The olive trees our valiant Lord,
Spoke calm and kindly: "Sword and stave
And torch, and stormy man of death
Made clamor. Yet he spoke not, save
With loving word and patient breath,
"Put up thy sword into the sheath,"
The peaceful olive boughs beneath.

Ye Christian kings, in Christ's dear name
I charge you live no more the lie.
"Put up thy sword." The time they came
To bind and lead him forth to die,
Behold this was his last command!
Yet ye dare cry to Christ in prayer
With red and reeking sword in hand!
Ye dare do this as devils dare!
Ye liars, liars, great and small,
Ye cowards, cowards, cowards, all!

O God, but for one gallant ear,
One valiant king, one fearless queen!
Yea, there would be an end of war
If but one could be heard or seen
To follow Christ; to bravely cry
"Put up thy sword, put up thy sword,
And let us dare to live and die,
As did command our valiant Lord;
With sword commanded to its sheath,
The blessed olive boughs beneath."

THE HEIGHTS, OAKLAND, CAL.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 240.

Neal Dow, in the form of a conversation with a fellow-traveller, explains in a very clear manner the nature of the satisfaction derived from smoking tobacco with those who have acquired the habit. He says:—

My new friend and I were no sooner started on our little journey, than he took a cigar-case from his pocket, and said:—

"Will you have a cigar?"

"No thanks; I never smoke nor use tobacco in any way. That part of my education was neglected."

"But it is a very great pleasure to smoke; I could not get on without it."

"In what does the pleasure really consist?"
"Well, after eating, a good cigar is a greater pleasure even than a good dinner to a hungry man."

"But I wish to know in what the 'pleasure' consists? We have just had a good dinner. I am perfectly satisfied and comfortable. I cannot think of anything to eat or drink that I should like. But you want your cigar, and if you could not have one, wouldn't you be uncomfortable?"

"Yes, I confess that I should!"

"Would you be very uncomfortable?"

"Yes, I acknowledge that I should be so."

"Pray excuse me for pressing the matter, because I am really anxious to ascertain, as accurately as I can, whether any real pleasure comes from tobacco—a pleasure that a sensible man need not be ashamed of. No man likes comfort, real downright comfort, better than I do. I greatly enjoy suitable and intelligent pleasure. Now, if I were to allow myself to be influenced by your example, so as to have a share of the pleasure you speak of, what would happen? I could not smoke freely at once, I suppose, as you do now?"

"You must learn to smoke by slow degrees."
"During this process of learning I suppose I should be very sick."

"Yes, of course you would be sick."

"Very sick, I suppose. I have heard it said there would be deadly nausea at the stomach, and violent, prolonged vomiting, with a cracking, snapping headache. Is that a fair description of what I should suffer?"

"Probably; but all beginners do not suffer so much."

"Yes, I understand that; there are differences in physical constitutions. And besides that, some children are saturated with tobacco smoke;
they live in a tobacco atmosphere, so that they could not suffer so much in learning to use tobacco in any way. But, as a rule, people learning to use tobacco are dreadfully sick and suffer very much."

"Yes, as a rule they do. I did."

"For how long a time does this suffering continue?"

"That varies in different persons. I was sick for about four weeks. That's the average time.
Some people suffer less and some more, and some persons cannot learn to use tobacco; they are always sick if they touch it."

"Yes, that corresponds with what I've often heard. But now, suppose I've fully made up my mind to learn to smoke, so as to have my share of the 'pleasure,' the 'comfort' coming from it. I have great powers of endurance; I sit down to my task as in a dentist's chair to have all my teeth pulled out. I don't flinch, but endure heroically the torture of the dreadful nausea, the retching and violent vomiting, and the crashing headache. My lips are livid, my face has the pallor, the anguish of a painful agony. You stand by to keep my courage up. 'Don't be afraid,' you say, 'you'll not die. I've been through it all, and more. For all this suffering and anguish you'll be rewarded many-fold in the pleasure and comfort of smoking.' Would you say all that to encourage me?"

There was a pause. He didn't answer at first.
Then he said: "I've never thought of it in that way. I do not think I should encourage you, or even stand by the bedside of anyone learning to use tobacco and encourage him to persevere."
Laughing heartily. "I never thought of the ridiculous, absurd figure a man makes in learning to use tobacco. In fact, men never acquire the habit, and then very rarely, and then under exceptional circumstances. It's boys who learn, because they think it smart and manly to use tobacco. They steal away into secret places; they hide behind the barn, or creep under the wood-shed, out of sight, because they're ashamed, and there they smoke and vomit. That's the way in which ninety-nine of every hundred tobacco-users have acquired the habit."

"But to come back to myself. I do not nauseate now, or but very little. I've conquered that, but I have no desire whatever for a cigar. I can smoke one without being sick, but I would not touch one but for the example of others. Isn't that exactly what would happen?"

"Yes, that was precisely my case."

"But I persist in smoking; and by-and-by it becomes a necessity, because if I omit the customary cigar I should suffer. After a year or two of the tobacco habit I should suffer very much if I could not have my cigar."

"Yes, that is a fair statement of the case."

"Then, in short, I continue the tobacco habit only to avoid the intense suffering which would otherwise torment me. The 'pleasure' the 'comfort' coming from the tobacco habit is this—only this, and nothing more; it wards off pain."

"I've never heard the matter put in that way before, but I must confess that that is the whole of it. If I cannot have my cigar I suffer; while I am smoking the pain is relieved, and, in fact, that is all the pleasure that comes from smoke."

"Upon the whole, then, I do not think I shall learn to use tobacco; to acquire a habit which is very costly; which makes one offensive to many people—a habit which unmans one so far that he feels himself under a bondage which he cannot throw off without an effort that few men find themselves equal to."

Sam Hobart was a railroad engineer on the Boston & Albany Railroad, and an earnest Christian, who worked in the temperance cause and opposed the use of tobacco, which he believed often led those who used it into other evils. In his life the following incident is related:—

On one occasion when in Vermont, he was welcomed by a minister whose mouth was full of tobacco.

"Glad to see you, Mr. Hobart. There is great need of a movement in favor of temperance up here."

Sam eyed him, saw him expectorating tobacco juice, and in a polite and quiet way walked on. At night he was to speak. The house was crowded. The minister presided. Sam told this story:

"My pastor was up in the northern part of New York to speak on temperance. A minister of great prominence welcomed him. The minister was an inveterate user of tobacco. My pastor gave up tobacco to save a son of a deacon from making him an excuse for intemperance. He has fought tobacco as relentlessly as he fights rum, because by striking tobacco he hits the idol of vast numbers in the church."

The minister who was by his side began to move uneasily. His mouth was full of tobacco and he could not expectorate without drawing attention to himself. Sam went on:

"My pastor told this story: A man given up to strong drink, who was bringing ruin upon his family, was remonstrated with by a man who used tobacco. He said:

"Neighbor I have come to see you. All the neighbors are worried about you."

"Why?"

"Because you are drinking up health, property and happiness."

"I am no worse than you."

"Than me; what do you mean?"

"Simply this. You use tobacco and I use rum. Your wife knows that you dirty your house more than I do mine; and when they ask you to give up tobacco you say it is necessary to you. That is what I say about rum."

"The man went home under conviction. He called to his wife and inquired:

"Have you been telling of my filthy habit?"

"Certainly; I was telling the wife of our neighbor not to think she had all the trials; that I had mine, and that I thought the use of tobacco was worse for the house than drinking, but not so bad for the man. Look at that spittoon. Think how our clothes are scented by the fumes of tobacco. You don't get crazy from the use of the weed, but go without it and you act like a fool or a madman, and it must be had."

"Wife, you are right. Bring my box and pipes."

"She brought them. He worked at the fire diligently while she was away, and when she came he had got up a good blaze. Taking the box of tobacco and pipes he threw them on, and while his idols were burning he asked his wife's pardon for having been so oblivious to the comfort and neatness of his home. The next morning he called again upon his neighbor.

"Good morning, my friend."

"Good morning."

"I have come to talk to you about your peril because of the use of strong drink. Its effects are telling on you."

"No worse than yours."

"Why?"

"You use tobacco and I use rum. Yours is as much an appetite as mine, and I think quite as disgusting."

"You are mistaken, neighbor."

"In what?"

"I don't use tobacco."

"Since when?"

"Since yesterday. I gave up the practice that I might have power with you. Now, neighbor, let us both be clean."

"Agreed."

"The men signed the pledge and kept it, and the minister who had greeted my pastor so warmly felt the rebuke and became a champion of cleanliness, which is next to godliness."

"Hold up, Mr. Hobart. I am converted," said the minister in the desk with Sam. "Henceforth I will be free."

There is no season of the year in which the lover of nature will not find material to interest him, if he will walk abroad among the fields and woods with an attentive mind.

Being fully impressed with the truth of this remark, I sought a hill-side, covered with bushes and small trees, and sloping down to a stream of water, and situated a mile or more from my home. It was in the afternoon of the 8th of First Month, and, although the ground was covered with snow, the temperature was mild—only a degree or two below the freezing point.

The first object of interest that I encountered, and that before leaving the streets of our village, was a specimen of the tramp, who according to his narrative had been somewhat of a traveller, having been both in the army and navy, and had visited Calcutta, Alexandria, Malta and other places. His present destination was Mt. Holly, only a few miles distant—but weakness arising from an attack of sickness rendered it difficult for him to walk, and he was trying to raise money enough to pay the railroad fare. He was not an attractive looking object; but remembering how much I owed to our common Father, I did not feel it right to turn unfeelingly away. Yet, as I was afraid to trust him with money, knowing how easily some of his class are tempted to use it in the purchase of spirits, I invited him to accompany me to the railroad station, and there purchased him a ticket for Mt. Holly. A train came along very soon, and we parted, perhaps forever. He said he had met with me eighteen years ago.

The next interruption to my walk was more quickly disposed of. A respectable-looking colored man, who was driving along the road, stopped, and inquired if I wished to speak to him. He had seen me looking in his direction, and, thinking I had something to say, had politely halted his horse.

A row of Locust trees (Robinia pseudacacia) stood by the roadside, and some of them still supported numerous seed-pods, which had succeeded the flowers of the past summer. The outside of these pods was a dull brown, but the inside a beautiful satiny white, ornamented with a row of ten or more brown seeds hanging from the upper edge. Although the pods still clung with some tenacity to the twigs of the tree, yet nearly all of them had lost one of the valves of the pod. The trees bore such an abundant crop of seeds, that I wondered whether any of our birds had discovered this source of supply, or whether there was some principle in the seeds which rendered them unpalatable or unwholesome.

Soon after leaving the public road and entering the wooded hill-side, I saw numerous Alder bushes (Alnus Serrulata) near the water's edge, some of which retained the fruit cones of the preceding year. The scales had opened and allowed the seeds to drop out. In appearance they closely resembled the open Pine Cones which were on some neighboring trees, only very diminutive in size. But the Alders presented still more interesting objects in the little catkins of staminate and of pistillate flowers formed in the previous fall, in which the florets were so compactly crowded together, as to defy the efforts of storm and cold to injure them. When the sap of the shrub begins to circulate in the early spring, these catkins will grow and expand and soon be ready to perform their share in the perfecting of the fruit.

Climbing over some of the bushes were green briar vines still holding their clusters of dark blue or black berries; and the red seed pods of the Carolina Rose were also plentiful.

A pond of water fed by springs issuing from the hill-side was the farthest point in my ramble. It was frozen over and there were several spots of clear ice which had evidently been formed subsequently to the main coating. I was interesting to notice how the long, straight crystals had shot out from the margins of these open spaces, until the whole had been covered. They were still recent enough for one to observe the style of crystallization which belongs to freezing water.

Years ago I had found growing on dead stumps on this hill-side a beautiful species of fungus, somewhat similar to that which furnishes the puk sometimes used as tuder to receive and keep fire. It is a dark cream color, and on the under side, the gills, instead of being arranged in straight lines as in the common mushroom, are most curiously twisted and convoluted. Seeing a large specimen on a stump, I broke off a piece to renew my acquaintance with it, and was surprised to find in a torpid state on the under side a good specimen of the wood butterfly, which is seen early in the season flying through the woods, with dark wings having a light yellowish edging. It had crowded itself close up to the stump, and was so thoroughly protected by the umbrella of the fungus, that but for my curiosity, it would probably have safely passed through the winter, unharmed by wind or storm. I hope it may still do so, for I carefully replaced the fungus with the butterfly adhering. I suppose it was the Antiope Butterfly (Vanessa Antiope), which is common to this country and to Europe, and of which Flint says, "It passes the winter in some sheltered place in a partially torpid state. I have found it in midwinter sticking to the rafters of a barn, and in the crevices of walls and stone-heaps, huddled together in great numbers, with the wings doubled together above the back, and apparently benumbed and lifeless; but it soon recovers its activity on being exposed to warmth. It comes out of its winter quarters very early in spring."

When I reached home and emptied the contents of my overcoat on the desk, there were several other objects which, for brevity sake, I pass over; and I was confirmed in my belief, that a winter walk is not destitute of interest to the lover of nature J. W.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Quicksand.—About five miles south of Plattsburgh, Neb., is one of the most dangerous pieces of road in the whole country, and while in some seasons of the year it is safe for travelling, at others it is all a man's life is worth to go over it. The cause of this is a quicksand which lies directly across the road which is used in the fall of the year, but is abandoned in the spring and summer. To prevent strangers from getting into trouble there is generally a signboard at the forks warning them of their danger. In some manner this signboard was removed, and the result was that Henry Girard, who lives at Joplin, Mo., came near losing his life.

Girard tells the following story of his adventure: "I was coming to Plattsburgh to transact some business regarding some lands in which I have an interest, and as I wished to see the land before I got there, I concluded to come on horseback. The horse is a regular pet, and is one raised by myself. He comes to my call or whistle like a dog. When I got to the forks of the road, I saw that the river road was not used, but that the travel went over the hill; but I concluded to go along the bank, and thought that I could pick my way without trouble. I got down off my horse and turned him loose to follow me as I walked along. He stopped to graze, and I walked slowly, watching the river.

"Having got some distance ahead of the horse, I sat down to wait for him. How long I sat there I do not know, but I was suddenly aroused by finding that my legs were firmly grasped by a quicksand. I was slowly but surely being drawn into the earth. I threw myself on my back and tried to draw myself from the sand. I shouted for help until almost exhausted, but could get no response, and was forced to believe that my last hour had come, and that I was to suffer a most horrible death. It was late in the evening, and I wondered why my horse did not come. I called him again and again, but he was evidently too far away to hear me. As I lay there, sinking deeper and deeper every minute, I heard a party of people on the river. It appeared to be a pleasure party of young folks, and as they floated down the stream, they were singing. The song came distinctly over the water, but for some reason I could not make them hear, and they passed down the river singing 'Home, Sweet Home,' while I lay there thinking I had seen my home for the last time.

"By this time the sand had pulled me down almost up to my shoulders, and I lay with my arms spread out, in order to give as much resistance to the terrible suction as possible. I thought I heard my horse, and called him with all my might, giving a peculiar whistle which I had taught him to answer. He heard me, and came running to where I lay, but could not see me on the ground where I was in the hole, as it was rather dark by this time. I called him again, until he found where I was, and then he came to me and I tried to reach up and get some sort of hold on the saddle or bridle, but I was too slow.

"By some chance he stepped by me and I got a firm hold on his tail and then urged him to go on. It was an awful pull, but I could feel that I was being dragged out of the sand. It was such a strain that I was compelled to stop and rest often, but at last I was pulled so far out that I could extricate myself, and then managed to hold on to his tail until he dragged me away from the place, and there I lay until I heard a wagon on the road and was brought to this city to recover from the terrible mental and physical sufferings. It was a narrow escape; and I do not think I will ever hear 'Home, Sweet Home' again without feeling a spasm of thankfulness."

Tasmanian Glow-worm Caves.—At the meeting of the Royal Society of Tasmania in June, an account of some fine caves that had been discovered near Southport, Tasmania, was given by Mr. Morton, who had visited them. They are situated about four miles from Ida Bay, and a fairly good road leads to them. The entrance is through a limestone formation. A strong stream flows along the floor of the chambers. The first chamber reached by Mr. Morton and those who accompanied him showed some fine stalactites, and along the floor some fine stalagmites were seen.

On the lights carried by the party being extinguished, the ceiling and sides of the cave seemed studded with diamonds, an effect due to millions of glow-worms hanging to the sides of the walls and from the ceilings. Further on several chambers were explored, each revealing grander sights.—Scientific American.

A Strange Death and its Parallels.—Two or three weeks ago a poor-looking, third-class passenger in the train from Paris to Turin was taken seriously ill as the train approached the latter place. When the station was reached he was taken into the waiting-room, where he soon died. It was found that he wore a belt containing thirty thousand francs in gold, and death had been caused by the pressure of this belt. He also had rouleaux of gold under his arm-pits, though he was dressed in rags.

Many are the parallels of death of the soul, though few of the body, by the pressure of gold. He that is rich toward himself and toward God has laid up his treasure upon the earth, and Jesus has declared that this is incompatible with the salvation that He came to bring. After tenaciously clinging to vast fortunes many nominal Christians make their wills, considering chiefly how they will be estimated on earth, seldom, it is to be feared, endeavoring to forecast what opinion will be held by the authorities of the country to which they hope to go.—Christian Advocate.

Questions of Dress.—Among the perplexing questions that come before native Christian communities in such countries as India and Africa is that of dress. The scanty clothing of those countries becomes to them distasteful as they are better educated and enjoy more of civilization. This is especially true of the matter of clothing of the women. The Madras Native Christian Association has been discussing the matter, and seems to have arrived at a general agreement that some change is necessary, and that in place of the loose garment a coat or jacket is generally desirable, as also are shoes for those who can afford them. They seem also to appreciate the wisdom of retaining the native style of headress, and to realize that the turban is handsome, useful and comfortable, far more so than the European hat. In general, however, the tendency to adopt European costumes is becoming more and more evident, and in some respects while it has distinct advantages there are disadvantages in that it involves a more expensive style of living.

Higher spiritual truths cannot be kept within the limits of human logic. Supernatural truths are superlogical. Human logic cannot show the entire consistency of Divine sovereignty with man's free agency, or of the infinitude of God with the existence of finite beings, or of many other biblical paradoxes. Hence the man who holds to a logically complete system of theology, is necessarily limited in his view to a moiety of God's revealed truth.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 23, 1892.

The Independent of New York mentions that since the attendance at Chapel Services at Columbia College had been made voluntary, the number who attend had fallen off very much; and that to secure larger audiences a noted choir-master had been appointed organist to the college.

On this subject it makes the following comments:

"It is a serious question whether this device of obtaining famous singers and brilliant performers for the purpose of attracting hearers is wholly in the line of Christian worship. It is only so far as that line as bait may be employed in Gospel fishing. We suppose the idea is that people will not come for religious instruction or for mere worship, if they can be persuaded to come by some factitious attraction they may then be brought within some of the other religious influences which they do not care for.

"Nevertheless, it should clearly be understood that singing as singing, as mere music, whether on the organ or vocal, is not a part of religion."

The worship of the Almighty is so solemn an engagement, one indeed that can only be performed in truth by the aid of his own Holy Spirit, that we regard it as a mistake and an injury to the cause of religion to employ outside attractions in order to draw persons to places of worship. Those who are drawn by this sort of "bait" are not likely to be led by it to "worship the Father in spirit and in truth." They come for the sake of amusement, and amusement is about all they will receive; although some of them may absurdly imagine that some virtue or merit may attach to them from their mere presence at such performances. They are like the frequenters of the Oratorio, on whom Cowper vents his keen satire, as being "Content to hear,

O wonderful effect of music's power,
Messiah's dirge for Handel's sake."

During the dark period of the Church's degeneracy, there was a large development of these outward allurements—magnificent buildings, costly ornaments, elaborate performances in the form of worship, and carefully prepared rituals; but all these had no power to prevent the decline of vital religion, or the introduction of darkness and superstition, which seem to flourish best where ritualism has the strongest hold.

In some parts of our own Society, we regret to see the growth of a disposition like that which actuated the managers of Columbia College—a tendency to encourage, or at least admit, the introduction of singing into our meetings for worship, in the hope that it will prove an attraction to our younger members. We believe it would be far better for meetings to adhere strictly to our ancient, informal way of waiting upon God for ability to offer Him spiritual worship, than in any measure to compromise—and that such a course will not only be most effective in preserving the meetings in consistency with our principles, but that it will most effectually tend to the spiritual welfare of those members who may not at the time be fully settled in an attachment to the doctrines and usages of the Society of Friends.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 17th inst. Secretary Tracy made public a despatch from Commander Evans, of the Yorktown, Valparaiso, Chile. The Chilean Minister has demanded his mind, allowing the refugees on the Yorktown, and now they may be taken out of any merchant vessel touching at Chilean ports by any local authority. They were still on the Yorktown and Commander Evans asked for instructions.

On the 15th Secretary Tracy sent a telegram to Commander Evans, suggesting that he should allow the Peru, and land the Chilean refugees at that place, but to use his discretion as to the time of his departure.

On the 15th inst. the Holman resolutions, declaring against subsidies and bounties, and pledging the House against expenditures of the public money, were passed by a large majority. The effect of these resolutions on the action of the House in passing upon measures involving appropriations will be nil. Whenever a majority determines upon voting a sum of money for a particular purpose they will not be deterred by an exhibition of Holman's declaration on fragility.

The Senate reported on the 12th inst. a report from the Committee on Fortifications of a bill which appropriates one hundred million dollars, extended over a period of eleven years, for coast defence, ten millions to be appropriated for the first year, and nine millions for each of the following ten years. The large sum proposed to be appropriated will be the approval of Messrs. Berry and Chilton, two members of the committee, who believe that the revenues of the Government do not warrant so large an expenditure at this time. The chances for passing a bill at this session involving an expenditure of $100,000,000 are very small.

The United States Supreme Court, on the 18th, announced its decision in the case of Nishimura Ekin, a Japanese woman, to whom entry into the United States was refused by the immigration officers and Collector at San Francisco, on the ground that she was likely to become a public charge. The Court sustained the contention of the Government that the ruling of the Treasury Department with reference to entry of immigrants was final and not reviewable by the Courts.

The National Department of Scientific Temperance Instruction in Public Schools and Colleges has just issued a history course for its use in the ten years of its existence the department has secured legislation in thirty-five States and in all the Territories requiring scientific temperance instruction in all the schools. "This means," says the report, "that there are between twelve and thirteen million children whom the laws declare shall be taught the truth against strong drink and kindred narcotics." The nine States which have no laws on the subject are New Jersey, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Arkansas, Tennessee, Indiana, Kentucky and Texas.

The output of the flouring mills of Minneapolis is 37,000 barrels a day.

It is thought that the mountain near Cascade Springs, S. C., contain drinking water of the purest quality. This is due to the fact that the intense cold of the past week there revealed huge volumes of steam issuing from holes in the mountain side, which appeared to be honey-combed with holes made by the steam.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 588, which is 65 per cent. more than the previous week, and 155 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number, 283 were males and 305 females; 91 died of pneumonia; 61 of consumption; 49 of influenza; 41 of diseases of the heart; 32 of diphtheria; 23 of old age; 20 of typhoid fever; 19 of bronchitis; 14 of convulsions; 12 of scarlet fever; 16 of apoplexy; 15 of malarial; 12 of inflammation of the brain; 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 11 of croup; 10 of inanition and 10 of Bright's disease.

—The Duke of Clarence and Avondale died at Sandringham on the 14th inst. The intelligence has caused a deep sensation throughout Europe, and manifestations of widespread grief are apparent throughout the United Kingdom. By the death of the Duke of Clarence and Avondale, Prince George of Wales becomes the heir to the throne of Wales, and therefore heir presumptive to the throne of Great Britain. The distinguished Catholic Cardinal Manning died in London on the morning of the 14th inst.

The correct figures of the French census which was taken last Fourth Month were published recently in the Journal Officiel. According to these figures, the total population of France is 38,218,903, an increase for the four years and ten months and a half embraced by the census of only 124,289, as compared with the increase of 545,855 in the shorter period comprised between 1881 and 1886. The figures prove that the lamentations of the patriots and political economists who have been sounding the alarm as to the gradual depopulation of the country are not without cause.

Heavy floods prevail in the province of Huelva, Spain. The damage done is already enormous, but it is almost impossible to get details, as telegraphic communication has been very seriously interrupted by the cascades of rain which have fallen since the 28th inst.

The German Reichstag on the 16th, by a unanimous vote, adopted a resolution appropriating 900,000 marks ($220,000) to defray the expenses incident to securing an effective exhibition of German industries at the approaching World's Fair at Chicago.

—The 14th inst. says: It is reported from Constantinople that, by his personal influence, the Sultan has succeeded in bringing about a satisfactory settlement of the Chadoanie affair, as Servia is ravaged by diphtheria. Two children of one of the ministers died in one night. All the hospitals in Belgrade are closed in consequence of the epidemic.

Cardinal Simeoni, formerly Papal Secretary of State and Prefect General of the Propaganda, died in Rome on the 14th. His death was due to an attack of influenza, from which he had been suffering for several days.

—Sake drinking, according to a writer in the "American Antiquarian," is one of the great curses of Japan. In 1879 the amount of rice converted into sake, a distilled spirit, amounted to 15,000,000 bushels.

A dispatch from the City of Mexico says that "smoke is being blown from the Almolongo mountains, in Chiapas, and an earthquake is feared." The volcano of Colima is also in eruption.

DIED. in Camden, N. J., on the 28th of Twelfth Mo. last, at her old residence, which had been her home during her long life, RACIEL COOPER, in the seventy-ninth year of her age. This dear friend had been in feeble health for some time, but she was an excellent example of cheerful resignation to the Divine Will. Although not a member of our Society she was firmly and zealously attached to its principles, and when health permitted was an acceptable attendee at our Meetings for Divine Worship. She was one who shrank from the appearance of much profession, but was a true friend, and she was a most successful example of cheerful resignation to the Divine Will. —Her remains were interred in Friends' Burying Ground at Newton, N. J., on the 31st of Twelfth Mo. —, First Mo. 3, 1892, at her residence in Toughkenamon, Chester Co., Penna., MARY C. HOOPES, wife of Caleb Hoopes, in the sixty-ninth year of her age.

—Beloved member and Overseer of New Garden Monthly Meeting, Particular Clergyman, who spent an unassuming in her disposition, she was a useful and valued member of Society, being warmly attached to its doctrines, principles and testimonies. Prominent in her life and character, was her loving and unselfish devotion to her family, and a kind and thoughtful consideration for the comfort of those with whom she mingled, manifesting that "quietness and confidence" of spirit, wherein lies the "strength" of those who are taught in the school of Christ. Her last illness was of short duration, the messenger of death came suddenly and unexpectedly—yet the broken household was comforted in believing their great loss. Her dear gain, and that the sheltering arms of redeeming love and mercy have gathered her to rest within the sacred inclosure, "not one of whose inhabitants can say—I am sick!"

—The residence of his son Henry, Elsinore, California, THOMAS D. LANGFATHER, aged 71 years, died seven months. He was a member of Springville Monthly Meeting of Friends, Iowa; was faithful in the attendance of meetings where he resided, bore a short and severe illness without a murmur, and with an expression that his way was clear and bright, quietly passed away, as one entering eternal rest.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

1851.—"At the burial of a woman Friend at Lynn, in Indiana, I felt drawn to labor to impress on them, the solemnity of such events, and the necessity of laying them to heart, that each one may be prepared for the close of life when it comes to them. But how easily do such impressions pass away! The indifference shown by many, to the subjects of religion, and the importance of preparing for death, is very distressing; and almost induces the thought, that little benefit results from all the labor we pass through."

"Attended Vermilion Meeting. It appeared right to hold up to them the distinction between works of benevolence and kindness, which unregenerate man can perform, and a submission to the baptism of the Holy Ghost and fire, by which man is made free, and kept free from the spots of the world. Divine help was present, qualifying to enforce the necessity of this spiritual, inward work, as the only way by which we shall come to the knowledge of God and of his Son Jesus Christ, which is life eternal."

"We had an appointed meeting at Ellwood. After a season of patient waiting, the Lord gave ability to open the doctrine of Friends, on the subject of Divine worship; the necessity for all to be gathered, when thus assembled, into an humble, inward waiting for Christ; to know Him to prepare our offerings; which, if only a broken heart, and a contrite spirit, will be regarded by our Heavenly Father. These humble, struggling ones, will be at times baptized by one Spirit into one body, and made to drink into one Spirit; and if two of them shall agree touching anything they shall ask, in the name of Christ, it shall be done for them, said our Lord, by my Father; for 'where two or three are met together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.' The discouraged and mournful ones were exhorted to keep the faith, and to struggle on, and they will be helped, and see of the travail of their soul. I thought the hearts of some were comforted; and the meeting was closed with prayer for Divine support and preservation; and for the renewal of the faith of the lowly ones; and for the dear young people, that the Lord would visit them by his blessed Spirit, and defend them from the power of temptation; that there may be a band raised up to support our principles and testimonies."

"Eighth Month 5th. At Cedar Meeting I felt for a long time as if we might hold the meeting in silence; remembering the advice of the apostle, 'That they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after Him, and find Him, though He be not far from every one of us; for in Him we live, and move, and have our being.' The way was finally opened, for showing that this was the object of our thus assembling together; not to deliver lectures, nor to hear them delivered; for no man can do anything to promote his own salvation, or that of others, independent of Divine aid. Our business is to gather to Christ, that we may know Him to minister to our condition. Afterwards the necessity of the new birth was opened, and of being clothed with the righteousness of Christ; which He brings forth in us by the effectual workings of his Spirit; and of our final, complete justification by the washing away and pardoning of our sins by his blood. The effect of the doctrines preached, must be left to the Lord; but I believe there were those present who drank in and united with them."

"Notice having been given for a meeting at Rocky Run, we had a satisfactory time with Friends and others, who met there; chiefly in the way of encouraging the sincere ones, to be faithful to their Lord; by which they would prove that godliness is profitable to all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come; keeping the duties of religion uppermost, and the things of the world in their proper place. Here substantial happiness is enjoyed, by walking with God in this life, and when the end comes, the full fruition of it in the world to come. Went to a Friend's house near by, where we were comforted with the appearance of the children, and a feeling of peacefulness."

"At Pleasant Plain Meeting I endeavored to keep inward, with my eye to the Lord alone, and after some silence, the expressions of our Lord in his address to the Father were presented to my mind: 'And this is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent,' attended by the impression to rise with them; and I was enabled to preach the Gospel in Divine authority; that this saving knowledge of God and of his dear Son, is only received through the revelation and operation of his Spirit, in the heart of man. Our Lord declared that, 'Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.' No one can give himself a true sense and sight of his condition, as he stands in the fall. It is the Lord from heaven, the quickening Spirit, who is the resurrection and the life, that alone can quicken man, and make him rightly feel his lost and sinful state. As man submits to Him, He opens the blind eye, enabling him to see himself in the true light; gives him the power to turn from sin; to repent of his past evil deeds; destroys the kingdom of Satan in him, and sets up his own everlasting kingdom in place of it.

It is thus man is brought to see the kingdom of God, being made a new creature; old things are done away, and all things are made new. The new heavens and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness, are brought forth in him. In this heart-changing work, he livingly knows God and Christ, by the powerfully redeeming and sanctifying operations of the Holy Spirit. This is the knowledge that is life eternal to the soul. Some of the exercises which the redeemed soul passes through, in its heavenly pilgrimage were further opened; and the meeting closed with humble, reverent prayer to the Lord, for his continued mercy and preservation, in the trials to which we are subjected, and wherein Satan seeks to destroy the blessed work which the Lord had begun in us. It was a solid time; and we returned to our lodgings, humbled and thankful that the Lord had owned his cause.

"Before leaving our comfortable sojourning place, we had a little opportunity with the parents and children; in which they were reminded, that here we have no continuing city, and of the importance of seeking one that is to come; laying up treasure in heaven. The children were entreated to mind the convictions of the Spirit of Christ, that they may be preserved from temptation, and become what the Lord would have them to be; and in conclusion, with tender feelings, I was led to express the desire, that the blessing which makes truly rich, may rest on the heads of the parents, and upon their beloved offspring; which had a melting effect on all of us."

"At the Quarterly Meeting of Salem, the simplicity of the means which the Lord makes use of, to carry on his purposes, was presented to my mind, and though clothed with weakness, and my faith low, I believed it right to stand up, and say what the Lord furnished me with. The simple means by which the leprosy of Naaman was cleansed, and the clay by which the blind man's sight was restored, were brought to view; and that without obedience to the command given in those cases, neither the leprosy nor the blindness would have been removed. So in the work of grace in the heart, obedience to the little requirements of the Holy Spirit must be yielded, or we cannot be cleansed from the leprosy of sin, or receive spiritual sight to discern our fallen condition, and the way out of it. Submission to the washing of regeneration is indispensable to the salvation of the soul, and without it we cannot be prepared for usefulness in the church of Christ. We must be changed men ourselves, before we are prepared to aid in changing others. Divine kindness was extended, enabling me to open some things, relating to the efficacy and spirituality of the Gospel, and the way by which alone we can be partakers of it."

"Ninth Month 3d. Attended the regular meeting at Bloomfield; in which I was much borne down with a lifeless, formal spirit, trusting in creaturely performances, and greatly neglecting the inward, spiritual work of religion. It appeared to me there was a disposition in some, to despise the sanctification of the soul, by the cleansing, baptizing power of the Holy Spirit, and to adopt, in its place, a mere liberal belief of the truths of Christianity, as explained by their own wisdom and learning; and to lead people away from the hope of deriving the true and saving knowledge of Christ, by the operative power of his Spirit in the heart. That dark and subtle spirit was felt to be at work in this place, with great decreasableness; and after speaking of the favor it is to have humble, lowly travellers preserved among us, who are brought to mourn over themselves and the degeneracy among us as a people, I was led and enabled to bring to view the deceivable workings of this spirit, and to contrast, with its erroneous imaginations, the purity and powerful efficacy of the inward, regenerating religion of Christ, where He is received as the teacher, and feeder, and captain of his people. It is only in his school that we are livingly taught the truths of the Gospel; know them to be applied to our state by Him; and receive from Him that faith which gives the victory, and by which we truly believe the testimony of the Holy Scriptures, and experience Him to become our Saviour and Redeemer. It fell to me there are those of our Society, who dislike this spiritual doctrine, and hold it in contempt. Such will turn away others from the truth, and if they persist, will fall themselves into increasing darkness. But the time will come, when the worm that dieth not, and the fire that is not quenched, will bring them into deep distress, unless they are favored to repent, and turn their back on all their delusions."

"Had an appointed meeting at Bethel, a newly established meeting. The testimony that a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of that which he possesseth, was revived; neither doth the strength of a people, or a society, depend upon their numbers. There is no substantial peace or happiness, but in living and walking in the Truth; neither is there any other ground of strength in a religious body, but in living under the government of the blessed Head of the church. Here only are we preserved amidst the trials and temptations of time; enabled to keep the outward blessings in their proper place, and to witness a growth and an establishment in Christ, the Shepherd, Rock and Foundation of his people, individually, and as his church. The dangers of being swallowed up in a worldly spirit, were plainly spoken to; and the importance of being solid, grave, exemplary Christians; not light and frivolous, talking about trifling things, so as to turn the young people away from Christ, instead of drawing them to Him, when they are brought under his convicting power. Some appeared to be brought under religious feeling, and were tendered."

Unseen Protection.—A lady was awakened one morning by a strange noise of pecking at the window, and when she got up she saw a butterfly flying backward and forward inside the window in great fright, because outside there was a sparrow pecking at the glass, wanting to reach the butterfly. The butterfly did not see the glass, but it saw the sparrow, and evidently expected every moment to be caught. Neither did the sparrow see the glass, though it saw the butterfly, and made sure of catching it. Yet all the while the butterfly, because of that thin invisible sheet of glass, was actually as safe as if it had been miles away from the sparrow. It is when we forget our Protector that our hearts fail us.—Forward.

The following impressive narrative, we met with many years ago, and more recently in one of the publications of the American Tract Society, from which what follows has been taken. It exemplifies in a striking manner the danger of putting off for "a more convenient season" the great work of religion. Such foolish persons do not sufficiently consider, that it is only when Divine help is extended that they can take any step in the way of salvation; and that they cannot command a fresh visitation of the Grace of God, but are entirely dependent on the Lord's goodness and mercy.

"My children," said the old man, "the words of your dying father will be few. I wish them to sink deep into your hearts." Then raising himself a little in his bed, with a degree of strength which he had not been able to command for several of the last weeks of his sickness, he proceeded:

"When young, I enjoyed religious privileges, and was the subject of occasional serious reflection. When just entering my sixteenth year, religious impressions were made on my mind with unusual force. I seemed to hear a voice continually saying to me, Seek religion now. I was unhappy; my former amusements lost their relish. Still I was not willing wholly to relinquish them, and obey the voice which urged me to seek religion immediately. One day, after much reflection, I deliberately promised to God, that, as soon as the season of youthful amusement was past, I would give myself to religious pursuits. My anxieties immediately left me; I returned to my amusement, and the whole subject was soon forgotten.

"When at twenty-five, the monitory voice returned, reminded me of my promise, and again pressed upon me the importance of eternal things. Though I had not thought of my promise for years, I acknowledged its obligations, but an immediate fulfilment seemed more impracticable than it did nine years before. I vowed with increased solemnity, that, when the cares of a rising family should subside, I would certainly attend to the concerns of religion.

"Again I applied myself to worldly avocations, and soon buried all thoughts of the admonition I had received. At fifty, when you, my children, were diminishing instead of increasing my cares, this heavenly monitor returned. 'Fulfil your promise, seek religion now!' was continually pressing upon my mind. I knew that I had made such a promise, but I felt dissatisfied that its fulfilment should be claimed so soon. I regretted that I had not attended to the subject before, when I could have done it with less difficulty; but such was the extent and pressure of my business, that to do it then seemed impossible. The subject made me unhappy, and, after much deliberation, I sought relief to my troubled feelings by most solemnly renewing my promise to God. I said, when the pressure of my business is past, I will devote my whole attention to a preparation for eternity.

"No sooner had I fixed my mind on this course, than my anxieties left me; and the strivings of the Spirit ceased in my bosom, and ceased for ever. When sickness warned me of approaching death, I sought to fix my feelings on this subject, but it was in vain. There was a gloom and terror drawn around religion, at which my soul shuddered. I felt that I was forsaken of God, but it did not move me. I had no love to God, no repentance for his sin, nor wish to forsake it. I felt nothing but the sultry gloom of despair. I knew I was in the hands of a justly offended God, from whom I expected no mercy, and could ask none. With these feelings I am now about to enter the eternal world. To you, my children, I can only say, Profit by my example: quench not the Spirit; seek religion now, if you would avoid a miserable eternity; put not off the concerns of your soul till"—The sentence died upon his lips, his strength, which had been all summoned to make this last effort, suddenly failed; he fell back upon his bed, and with a groan that seemed to speak the pains of another world, the immortal spirit took its flight from that body which it had inhabited nearly four score years, to receive according to that it had done.

This little narrative I had from a grandson of the old man, who stood by his dying-bed. He was a minister of the Gospel, and dated his first permanent conviction of his sin, and exposure to eternal ruin, from the solemnities of that awful scene. The descendants of the old man were numerous, many of whom became hopefully pious; several were first awakened by his dying charge.

Three years before his death there was a revival of religion in the place where he resided, and the son with whom he lived was a subject of its influence. He made the most violent opposition to his son's religious feelings.

A similar lesson is taught by the facts narrated in another of the American Tract Society's publications:

At a public religious service in R—, Pennsylvania, in 1829, a gentleman was present who had not been at a place of worship for years. He was a man of wealth; of a proud, independent spirit; notoriously opposed to religion and to ministers of the Gospel.

He was not observed by the speaker, but some remarks made on the violation of the Sabbath, set one of his sins before him, and he went homewards in a state of high excitement; saying to his daughter, "The preacher was very hard on the Sabbath-breaker this evening"—and again, "I don't know but he spoke the truth." On reaching home, he began to walk the room, and to speak violently against the sermon; and it was eleven o'clock before he ceased, and retired to rest.

In the morning he again complained of the sermon, and walked the room in great mental agitation. At breakfast he said he was sick; that he had lost his appetite, and must have a physician. As the physician was not a Christian, the daughter, a young lady of devoted piety, dreaded his influence on her father's mind; but as she could not dissuade him from his purpose, she went herself to the physician, told him she thought her father was not sick, but was distressed in view of his sins, and in the fulness of her agonized heart, begged to remind him of the responsibility of any influence he might exert in what she thought so critical a moment in her father's history.

The physician came. After an examination of his patient, he said there were no symptoms of disease, and he knew not what to prescribe.

"What shall I do, then?" said the gentleman, "for I cannot live in such distress."

"Were I in your case," said the physician, "I would send for Mr. —," the preacher on the evening previous.

First-day Schools for Friends.

A Friend at Harrisville, Ohio, suggests the republication of an article which appeared in our journal more than thirty years ago; believing "the advice it contains seems very much in place for some of the meetings and neighborhoods in Ohio, where quite too much time is spent on First-day in social visiting, and matters pertaining to worldly business are prominent themes of discussion."

The reference in the commencement of the article is to an editorial notice of some remarks made by Dr. McNeile at a meeting of "the Sunday School Institute" of Liverpool, England; in which the doctor took the ground that the necessity for such schools was an evidence of the low state of Christianity in the community—for it was the duty of parents to instruct their children in the principles of religion, and to cultivate the growth of right feelings in their minds.

The article is as follows:

The notice in "THE FRIEND," relative to First-day schools, was, I believe, a relief to the minds of many Friends, believing as they do, that these schools have been, and may be, a blessing to a certain class of children, whose parents may not have time, qualification, or even a desire to instruct them, or in any way further their religious improvement, by suitable advice, reading in the Holy Scriptures, or other books, calculated to strengthen their desires to walk in wisdom's ways, from the experience and example of many dear children, who have been gathered into the fold of rest, by yielding obedience to the teaching of Him who said, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

But for Friends' children to need such instruction, manifests great inattention, and even indifference, on the part of parents, to the best interests of their beloved offspring, whose concern should be to tarry at home on this day (when not at meeting), and endeavor, as ability is afforded, to instruct by precept, example or religious reading, endeavoring to impress upon their tender minds, the necessity of watchfulness and prayer, in order to be kept in the strait and narrow way that leadeth unto life. Not that this duty should be performed on this day only, but as it is set apart for rest from labor and toil, for these outward tabernacles, let Friends be especially careful to spend it in such way and manner as not to increase the burden and labor of those in our employ, or cause any of us to lie down in sorrow, from having passed it in such a way as neither to bring honor to our blessed Master, or in any degree further our progress towards that city that hath foundations whose builder and maker the Lord alone is. Oh! I believe if Friends, especially country Friends, who have young families about them, were to keep them near them on this day, instead of visiting and receiving visits, which has a tendency to scatter the good impressions which may have been made, might we not hope, a blessing would rest upon such parents and children, and the comforting and consoling language be administered, that was uttered respecting Abraham—"For I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment; that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which He hath spoken of him."

"What," he replied, surprised and excited: "Doctor, I thought you were not one of these praying people."

"I am not one of them, but I have known something about conviction within a few months; and the truth is, Mr. C—, you are under conviction for your sins." Having said this, he rose, and immediately left him.

The gentleman was almost overwhelmed. His physician, in whom he had the most implicit confidence, was "of no value" in the present crisis. Every resource had now failed. The hour was one of untold agony. It was a mighty conflict with pride. He could endure it no longer. He called his daughter, and requested her to "send for the minister."

In a few moments I entered his room. He was lying on his bed. When he saw me, he said, "I am not sick, sir. I know not what is the matter. I have called a physician, but he says I have no disease. I have no appetite for food. I have sent for you, but I hardly know what to say to you."

I inquired if he had any bodily pain—in his head or side, or breast. "No, I have not."

"Have you ever been subject to such feelings or attacks?"

"No, sir, I have never been in such a state before."

"Your state, Mr. C—, I think, is not peculiar to yourself; others have been affected in the same manner."

"How is that, sir? Did you ever see a man in such a state? What do you think is the matter with me?"

"My opinion is, Mr. C—, that the Spirit of God is striving with you, and is causing you to feel that you are a sinner."

"No, no, it cannot be so; it is nothing of that kind."

"If you will give your attention a few moments, I will attempt briefly to describe some of the views and feelings of a man when awakened by the Spirit of God, and then you may judge whether you are in that state."

"He listened for a while with intense interest, but suddenly interrupted me by saying, 'O, that is not my case. I am not a sinner. What have I done?'"

"You must surely know, Mr. C—, that you are a sinner, for all are sinners; and if you will suffer me to proceed, I may help you to see that you are an awakened sinner."

"Oh, I don't wish to hear any more. It distresses me to hear you. Do let me alone."

His daughter, who, with a tearful eye, had silently heard every word, now said, very affectionately, "Father, you are willing, I suppose, that Mr. — should pray with you before he leaves us?"

"O, no, I don't wish to hear prayer. Do leave me, Mr. —, I wish to be alone. This distress, I hope, will soon pass away, and I shall then feel better."

The agonized daughter now burst into tears. I rose to take my departure; but at this solemn and critical moment I could not refrain from dropping on his ear, in Christian kindness, a few words of caution.

"I cannot retire, Mr. C—, without saying that I believe you are now an awakened sinner. The Spirit of God is striving with you, and you are resisting that Spirit. Should you now grieve Him away, you have reason to fear He will not return to you again. If you do not now repent of your sins, and believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, you will probably yet be a hardened sinner. Your 'last state' will be 'worse than the first;' and the fearful probability is, that you will be taken from the world without any warning of your end. These words are not uttered merely to excite alarm, but as the honest convictions of my own mind in view of your present state. Time will show whether they are true or false. Be entreated, then, Mr. C—, to commit yourself to Christ, and make your peace with him without delay. I say this in view of our expected meeting at the judgment-seat of Christ. May God have mercy upon your soul."

Soon after I left him, he was in an agony of feeling. He called his daughter, and asked her if she would pray for him. They bowed together, while that daughter, whose prayers and religion had often been the subject of his ridicule and opposition, called upon the Lord for his salvation.

The tidings soon spread over the town, that Mr. C— had sent for the minister to visit him. Nothing could have been more unexpected and surprising.

Early the next morning, a party of his old companions called upon him. They were men of wealth and influence, and brought a carriage in which they said he must ride. At first he declined; but at length their importunity prevailed.

He entered the carriage while the tears and prayers of his daughter besought him to remain at home. His cruel friends took him away, and did not return until ten o'clock that evening; when—awful to utter—they brought him home in a state of intoxication.

When he awoke from his protracted slumbers in the morning, he was again in great agony. He had never before been intoxicated, and the recollection of this disgraceful sin enhanced his distress. But while his soul was thus keenly smarting under the lash of bitter remorse, his companions again presented themselves, requesting him to ride; and immediately on entering the house, began to laugh at him for turning Christian.

Their ridicule had more influence than the authority of God and his own danger of eternal destruction. Like so many demons, they beset him and persuaded him to ride with them on the second, and then again on the third day, and each night brought him home intoxicated.

After this he did not require the guardianship of his wicked friends to secure him in a course of sin. Their wit and opposition, aided by the palsying influence of the intoxicating draught, seemed to have seared his conscience, and to have swept away all conviction of his sin or danger.

For months after this, I saw him daily in the streets, but had no opportunity of personal conversation with him. He never again visited a place of worship. He was known to be a bold blasphemer. He spoke publicly and with much apparent enmity against ministers of the Gospel and professors of religion.

About nine months after my introduction to him, I received a letter from a lawyer residing in R—, stating that early one morning Mr. C— had ordered his carriage, that he might ride to Pottsville. The driver not being ready as soon as he expected, he went to his carriage-house to hasten him. Returning towards his house, he beckoned to his brother, who was standing in the door, to come to him, and immediately fell upon the earth. His body was taken up, but the spirit had departed forever.

"He that being often reproved, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy."

For "THE FRIEND."

The Epistle from Maryland in 1805 expresses the belief "that the great Shepherd of Israel is making way in the hearts of many, and is about to increase the number of those that will not be ashamed to confess Him before men, and that will stand for the cause and testimony of his ever blessed Truth."

"And, dear friends, it is our fervent desire that we who make so high a profession to the world, may none of us by our conduct be as stumbling blocks, but that we may be strengthened and enabled to walk steady and upright before the people."

The reply to this Epistle, from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, expresses the desire that those in whose hearts the Shepherd of Israel is making way, "may abide under the purifying operation of his power, whereby they will be enabled to own his Truth, and confess Him before men."

Baltimore Friends, in 1807, thus refer to the elevation of the persons of African race amongst them:

"To restore them to their proper rank and condition as our fellow free agents, and common partakers of the manifold grace of God—and by bestowing what further labor may be called for at our hands, in order to instil into them a better acquaintance with their moral and religious duties—we rejoice in believing that this will be hastening that day, when 'Ethiopia,' no longer bowed down in body or mind by heavy chains, 'shall,' indeed, 'stretch out her hands unto God.'"

The Epistles of both Yearly Meetings in 1808 speak of the necessity of being preserved from the contending party spirits that are in the world.

There was indeed occasion for concern on this subject; for the popular mind in the United States was greatly agitated over the disputes with Great Britain in regard to the impressment of sailors from American vessels; and especially in connection with this, of the attack by a British war vessel on the American frigate Chesapeake, and the taking from her crew, by force, of four seamen claimed as deserters from the British navy. The danger of war was aggravated by the fact that Thomas Jefferson, then President of the United States, entertained hostile feelings towards Great Britain.

The life and death struggle between Napoleon Bonaparte and Great Britain, which above all other countries stood in the way of his ambitious schemes, led each of them to issue orders designed to prevent the United States from carrying on any commerce with their antagonist. These orders were destructive to the commercial interests of the United States, and were both unjustifiable attacks on a nation at peace with them. As a measure of self-protection or retaliation, the United States Government passed an embargo act, prohibiting all foreign commerce to vessels of its citizens. The New England States especially were then in possession of a profitable carrying trade, and this act caused great distress to her seamen, ship-owners and merchants; which, as the embargo continued, created so much hostile feeling as to threaten armed resistance to its provisions.

In 1809, the Meeting for Sufferings of Baltimore Yearly Meeting issued an Epistle of advice to the subordinate meetings, cautioning the members against participating in party strifes and contentions; and reminding them that "the work of righteousness is peace; and the effect of it, quietness and assurance forever." This Epistle quotes from one addressed to Friends in 1666 by Stephen Crisp, in which he tells them to "take heed of being moved to this party or that party, or giving your strength to this or that; but stand single to the Truth of God, in which neither war, rent nor division is."

The Epistle from Baltimore of that year, as in many others, speaks of their labors among the Indians, and contains the following sensible remarks:

"Among those things which continue to retard the progress of the blessed cause of Truth, we are deeply sensible that the love of the world holds a conspicuous station; and whether it assume the appearance of vanity, covetousness, or political party spirit, is alike productive of an alienation from that pure fountain of Light and Love, an union with which furnishes the only substantial foundation for comfort in this life, or for hope in regard to that which is to come."

The Epistle from Baltimore in 1810, says: "In our endeavors for the civilization of the Indian natives, way has not opened since last year, for much to be done. We, nevertheless, hope the causes which have operated to suspend our endeavors will only be temporary—having been produced by the delusive counsels of an Indian among them, who styled himself a prophet."

"The 'prophet' here alluded to was a twin brother of the celebrated Tecumseh, a Shawnee chief of great foresight and ability, who was alarmed at the rapid encroachments of the whites on the Indian lands, and endeavored to unite the western and southern tribes in a grand confederacy, whose object was to prevent the further spread of the whites, or, if possible, to drive them to the east of the Ohio River. His reputation as a warrior, and his oratorical powers gave him great influence among the natives.

His brother, "the prophet," claimed to have direct intercourse with the Great Spirit, and to possess miraculous powers. He taught the Indians that they must renounce the use of whiskey, and all else that had been borrowed from the whites, including the new religious opinions, which the missionaries had been laboring to introduce. Of course the tendency of his teachings was to interfere sadly with the efforts of the agents of Baltimore Yearly Meeting.

"The 'prophet' removed his village from Ohio to Tippecanoe, a northern branch of the Upper Wabash. Harrison, then Governor of the Indiana territory, becoming uneasy with the hostile intentions of Tecumseh, led a military expedition up the Wabash in the fall of 1811, which encamped within a few miles of the 'prophet's' town, where it was attacked about sunrise the following morning, and suffered a severe loss in killed and wounded—but compelled the Indian assailants to retreat.

War soon after broke out between the United States and Great Britain, in which these Indians became involved. In one of the battles between the two nations, in the fall of 1813, Tecumseh was killed.

The Epistle from Philadelphia in 1811 mentions the ardent desires expressed among them "that the members of our religious Society may guard against partaking of the party spirit so prevalent in the exercise of human policy, and that by the integrity and uprightness of our lives we may manifest to others that we are under his government, whose kingdom is not of this world."

The party spirit thus advised against continued to be cherished by many of the politicians of that day, and eventually brought about a declaration of war against Great Britain in the Sixth Month of 1812. The grievances complained of were chiefly of two classes. One was the restrictions placed on the commerce of neutral vessels. The oppressive "orders in council" by which these were enjoined, were repealed in the fall of that year by both the French and British governments. The other grievance was the right long claimed by England to forcibly impress British seamen for service in her navy even when found in the vessels of other nations. This, then, was the only unsettled grievance of much magnitude. After a war of between two and three years, in which much blood had been shed and much property destroyed, peace was gladly hailed by all parties, and no reference in its terms was made to this, the ground of its commencement. It was left to be settled by future negotiations, or to drop into oblivion by a prudent ceasing to enforce it.

The Epistle from Baltimore in 1811 mentions the request of the Quarterly Meetings west of the Allegheny Mountains to be formed into a Yearly Meeting; to be held northwest of the Ohio River; and invites Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to unite with them in deliberating thereon.

In response to this invitation, Philadelphia Yearly Meeting appointed a committee to attend the next Yearly Meeting at Baltimore. They did so, and reported that it was concluded to establish the Yearly Meeting of Ohio, to be opened in the Eighth Month, 1813—and that Baltimore Yearly Meeting desired that some of the meetings belonging to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting might be attached to theirs. A committee from Baltimore being present, a committee was appointed to confer with them on this subject; who reported that "As the Western and Southern Quarters were more peculiarly interested in the proposal, it should be communicated to them for their consideration."

As the Minutes of the Yearly Meetings for several years subsequent to this reference contain nothing further on the subject, it may be inferred that the proposal did not commend itself to those Quarterly Meetings.

It is probable that Baltimore Yearly Meeting, in common with other meetings of Friends east of the Allegheny Mountains, felt the effect of the great emigration which poured into the fertile country northwest of the Ohio River, when it was opened to settlement. This was especially the case in the Southern States, where the members were stimulated to escape the oppressive presence of the system of slavery, as well as to secure fertile lands at a low price. I well remember the remark made by an elderly Friend from Indiana, who visited Philadelphia as companion to a minister from that State. In referring to his removal from North Carolina to the West, he said his motive was to take his family out of the influence of slavery. He had no fear that he himself would ever be drawn into the support of that cursed system. But he had a family of young children; and he thought it possible, if he should be removed, that some of them might let fall the testimony against enslaving their fellow-creatures. So, he thought it safer to remove them to a State where slavery did not exist.

MANY can talk of redemption, justification, sanctification, and salvation of Christ; but he is a christian who is a witness of such things wrought in himself.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

AN EVENING'S REFLECTIONS.

BY C. S. COPE.

"In life's last scenes what prodigies surprise,
Fears of the brave and follies of the wise!
From Marlborough's eyes the tears of dotage flow,

DR. JOHNSON.

While musing on the checkered lines
Of life's eventful page;
And scanning o'er the various signs
Of dim, declining age;
Thus, in mild evening's mellow calm,
My pensive mind could see,
What once I was, what now I am,
And what I soon may be.

If some rude stroke should cross my way
With overwhelming blight,
Involve the evening of my day
In intellectual night;
May I have lived a holy life
So innocent and true;
That habit's force on virtue's path,
Might bear me safely through.

But if unguarded passions reign,
Uncurbed by reason's force;
May some kind hand in love restrain
Their wild, ungoverned course;
Deal gently with declining years,
The mind that time has foiled;
O'erlook my follies, fears and cares,
And soothe the aged child.

But still I hope, when nature's course
Shall have relaxed her powers;
That something more than habit's force
May guide life's lingering hours.
When all earth's prospects here grow dim,
And all her props shall fall;
I'd humbly ask increasing faith,
To look behind the veil.

What cause of reverent gratitude,
As evening shades draw near,
To have a mind serenely calm;
And mental vigour clear.
But Oh! be pleased, most holy One,
To nurse that feeble ray;
That when his flickering light is done,
This fabric may decay!

WEST CHESTER, Twelfth Month 29, 1891.

"AMEN."

BY F. G. BROWNING.

I cannot say
Beneath the pressure of life's cares to-day
I joy in these;
But I can say
That I would rather walk this rugged way,
If Him I please.

I cannot feel
That all is well when darkening clouds conceal
The shining sun;
But then I know—
God lives and loves; and say since it is so,
"Thy will be done."

I cannot speak
In happy tones; the tear-drops on my cheek
Shew I am sad;
But I can speak
Of Grace to suffer with submission meek
Until made glad.

I do not see
Why God should e'en permit such things to be,
When He is love;
But I can see
Though often dimly, through the mystery
His hand above.

I do not know
Where falls the seed that I have tried to sow
With greatest care,
But I shall know
The meaning of each waiting hour below
Sometime, somewhere.

I do not look
Upon the present, nor in Nature's book
To read my fate;
But I do look
For promised blessings in God's Holy Book,
And I can wait.

I may not try
To keep the hot tears back, but hush that sigh,
"It might have been"
And try to still
Each rising murmur, and to God's sweet will Respond "Amen."

John Audland.

"In the Church of God there is no irrevocable golden age in the just.
In God's battles leaders cannot fall."—Author of "The Schonberg-Cotta Family."

When John Audland was about twenty-two years of age he was a very popular minister amongst the Independents. Sewel describes him as "a young man of a comely countenance, and very lovely qualities, very religious, and having a good understanding." One morning, in 1652, he preached at Firbank Chapel, in Westmoreland. Before noon George Fox arrived at this place; it was soon rumored that he would preach there that day, and whilst some people went away for a time to dine, a large number remained.

George Fox, having quenched his thirst at a stream, seated himself on the summit of a rock near the chapel, and from this elevation he, in the afternoon, addressed the vast multitude gathered around him. In this congregation were several preachers, including John Audland, who had brought his wife, a young lady of good family, with him. Probably as their thirsty souls drank in the words which fell with heavenly power from the stranger's lips, they were hardly conscious that he continued speaking for about three hours, directing all to the Spirit of God in themselves. Glorious was the heritage he portrayed as the present portion of believers in Christ; that they "might know their bodies to be prepared, sanctified, and made fit temples for God and Christ to dwell in." He strove to turn the thoughts of his hearers away from all figures and shadows to Christ the Substance; "Christ was come," he said, "who ended both the temple and its worship, and the priests and their tithes; and all now should hearken unto Him."

Effectual as was George Fox's message to many that day, perhaps it was more so to none than John and Anne Audland, and it was to their house that he adjourned when the meeting was over. Both were "chosen vessels unto the Lord to declare his name," and the life-long ministry of each began in the following year. Deep was John Audland's distress when his eyes were opened to see that his high profession of religion was valueless. "It is a Saviour that I long for," was now his cry,—it is He that my soul pants after, Oh, that I may be gathered into his life, and overshadowed with his glory, sanctified throughout by his word, and raised up by his eternal power!"

The answer to his continued prayers was not long delayed; the Lord, in accordance with his promise, fulfilled his desire, heard his cry and saved him.

"Oh, how wonderful his ways!

All in love begin and end;

Whom his mercy means to raise,

First his justice bids descend.

Thus baptized into Christ John Audland was, ere long, qualified to preach the word with extraordinary power. The remuneration which he had previously received for his ministerial services, he now returned to the parish of Colton.

Anne Audland was the daughter of a gentleman of the name of Newby, who also became a Friend about this time; she had been well educated, and during a seven years' residence with an aunt in London had often associated with Puritans. Before her marriage, when at her home at Kendal, she chose the most serious people of that town for her friends, uniting with some who often met together to wait on God in silence, or for religious conference and fervent prayer. Perhaps on the day of George Fox's memorable visit to Firbank she was already "not far from the kingdom."

Two years later we find her, at the age of twenty-seven, preaching at Auckland, in Durham, on a market day, in consequence of which she was confined for some hours in the town jail, through the window of which she continued to address a not unmoved audience, one of whom, a gentleman named Langstaff, who was much respected in the neighborhood, was so much impressed by her ministry that he accompanied her to prison, and afterwards took her to his house: here, however, she declined remaining when she observed his wife's annoyance at the arrival of a Quaker guest, and went out into the fields to seek for some sheltered spot where she might spend the night. But Anthony Pearson, a justice of the peace, who had lately become a Friend, had been told by George Fox, who was staying at his house, of Anne Audland's arrival in the town, and came with a horse and pillion to escort her to his residence.

During the following winter, whilst travelling with Mabel Camm, she was committed to prison by the Mayor of Banbury, who had induced two witnesses to swear that she had spoken blasphemy; but, after some days, two residents in the town gave bond for her appearance at the assizes, and thus an opportunity for holding a succession of meetings was afforded her.

A remarkable blessing rested on these labors; several hundreds, including her two bondsmen, were effectually led to Christ; many were added to the Society, and not only was a large meeting formed in Banbury, but several others were established in the neighborhood. These things, of course, kindled the wrath of her enemies, who threatened that she should be burned. Her husband and other Friends were present at the trial, when the indictment drawn up against her was that she had said God did not live, because, when speaking of a clergyman at Banbury, she had remarked that "True words may be lie in the mouth of some that speak them," quoting Jer. v. 2. When the judge had questioned her he soon discovered the falseness of the evidence adduced, nor did he fail to observe the innocent fearlessness of her deportment. Some gentlemen on the bench, being afraid that the case would fall to the ground, followed the jury, and induced them to bring in a verdict of "Guilty of misdemeanor." It is satisfactory to find that these gentlemen were told by one of their coadjutors that he would not sit with them until they had more regard for justice, and other officers in the Court strongly manifested their disapprobation.

A series of meetings were held in 1654 by John Audland and his friend John Camm, near Bristol, in a field called Earl's Mead, and were very largely attended, nearly four thousand persons being sometimes present. Edward Burrough and Francis Howgill were their fellow-laborers for a short time. These meetings were continued during three or four months, and Charles Marshall describes this period as "the glorious morning of the day of visitation of the love of God, in particular to the city of Bristol." He was then about seventeen and an earnest seeker after God. Having been unable, as he says, to "find the living among the dead professions," he had spent much time alone in fields and woods, where "strong, great, and many," were his cries unto the Lord.

Charles Marshall, before the arrival of John Audland, had been in the habit of meeting with a few others on one day of the week, which they kept in fasting and prayer; they assembled early in the morning, and sometimes sat down in silence, but if any felt it right to engage in prayer vocally they did so, and even children occasionally uttered brief petitions. To one of these meetings John Audland and John Camm came; "They spake," writes Charles Marshall, "the powerful word of life in the dread of his name who lives for ever; and we were seized on and smitten even to the heart; and that day, and the visitation of it, overtook us, which we had longed and waited for, and from darkness to the marvellous light of the Lord were we turned."

One morning Charles Marshall went with the ministers about a mile and a half into the country, to a little spring of water, by the side of which he had spent many solitary hours; here they sat down for a considerable time, and then Charles Marshall observed that the minds of his companions were greatly exercised, and soon John Audland said, "Let us be going into the city." When they reached Broadmead Street they found several people who were inquiring for the strangers; John Audland asked if any of them had an interest in a field, in which they might assemble, and an old man answered that he had one pretty near. Thither the company repaired, increasing in number whilst passing through the streets. John Audland is described by Charles Marshall as "of a sweet and amiable countenance, and cheerful spirit, one of the wise in heart, filled with the excellent, bright, glorious power of the Lord God."

After John Camm had spoken tenderly and fervently, John Audland arose, and to Charles Marshall it seemed that his face shone as, with a voice of thunder, he uttered the message of his Lord. "I proclaim spiritual war," he began "with the inhabitants of the earth who are in the fall and separation from God." And the word of the Lord had free course and was glorified: so intense was the emotion of some present that they fell on the ground, whilst others cried out as the preacher laid bare their inward states; many were effectually turned from darkness to light. "Indeed it was a notable day," writes Charles Marshall, "worthy to be left on record, that our children may read and tell to their children, and theirs to another generation, that the worthy, noble acts of the arm of God's salvation may be remembered."

After this day the meetings became larger and larger, so that it was necessary to hold them in the open air, even in frost and snow, and the ministers labored unweariedly to lead their hearers "to look from dead ways and worship unto Christ Jesus, the Fountain of Life;" and many of these sought eagerly night and day to obtain salvation through Him, giving up their hearts wholly to his government, and walking in a way of self-denial—for we read that "This visitation of God's holy and blessed day was signal and inexpressible." Some, in their eagerness to obtain an opportunity for private conversation with the ministers, called on them before they arose in the morning, so that their labors began at 6 A. M., and did not end until 11 or even 1 o'clock at night. They were, indeed, so sought after that "every day was like one long meeting."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

On page 149 of the present volume of "THE FRIEND," an article begins with the Query, "Why is it that there exists not among Friends as powerful and reaching a ministry, as in the earlier days of the Society?"

On reading this, it seems to the writer that it was assuming what is not true as regards some portions of our loved and favored Society. Where there has been a departure from the doctrines of Friends, a sliding off the ground that "the spirit giveth life," to a dependence on "the letter which killeth," it cannot be otherwise than true.

It is true that in the early days of the Society there seemed to be an unusual outpouring of the Holy Spirit—those were the days of her espousals; and as is the case with individuals, so with a church, there comes a time when we are to walk more by faith and less by sight. Of our own selves have those arisen who have reasoned away one precious testimony after another, and "the kings of the earth and all the inhabitants of the world would not have believed that the adversary and the enemy would have entered into the gates of Jerusalem," and attacked the corner-stone of our fabric, "the main distinguishing principle of our Society, the light of Christ within as God's gift for man's salvation." No wonder then that where that is the case there does not exist such a powerful and reaching ministry as in the early days. But where the same doctrines are lived in and upheld as were so powerfully preached by our early Friends, there are preserved, and from time to time those raised up, who are eminently qualified to preach the Gospel with the power of the "Holy Ghost sent down from heaven"—so that, even in this day of degeneracy, as it is truly called, in some of our large meetings, hundreds are reached and solemnized by the baptizing ministry, and overshadowing of Divine goodness. Such a ministry is a great help and blessing to the Church; and it is a high favor that we are preserved a people to this day; and S. L. Grubb said in London Yearly Meeting, "It is not the will of the Head of the Church that this people should ever cease to be a people."

Look at some of the dignified instruments of a generation just passed away: Joseph Edgerton, Ann Branson, Ellwood Dean, William and Elizabeth Evans, Joseph Scattergood, David and Samuel Cope, and many others; some of whom were as "Boanerges." And there are many now living, who received the gift in the same way, "not of man nor by man, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ."

There is a diversity of gifts, and a large gift in a few words, &c. Some may think their gifts small by comparison, but it may be just such as will serve the Master's purpose. Some of the smaller gifts distil as the dew over an assembly. Whatever the kind and extent of the gift, it is required of stewards that they be found faithful; the end and purpose being to bring the people to the great Teacher.

S. L. G., above quoted, said, near the close of one of her large public evening meetings, "If I were to speak to you till midnight, and thence to the break of day, it would be to bring you to the influence of that which you now feel."

So that I wish to encourage the true ministry of the present day. Think it not in vain that ye endure the weeks of preparation while eating the roll of prophecy and lying on your sides, as Ezekiel, for the iniquities of the people. Be not discouraged if the results do not appear to be in any proportion to the amount of exercise and labor. It takes many showers to produce a crop in the outward; so it takes line upon line, line upon line, &c., in the spiritual.

Perils from Wild Bees.—A few months after his return to Bombay with his bride, in 1847, Dr. Wilson was out with his colleague, — Henderson, and a few friends and pupils, making some researches in Salsette Island, when a remarkable incident occurred.

"We were attacked," writes Dr. Wilson, "by an immense cloud of wild bees, which had received no sensible provocation from any of our party, and nearly stung to death. Mr. Henderson was the first who was attacked. He soon sank on one of the jungle roads, in the hopeless attempt to guard himself from injury; and he had lain for about fifty minutes in a state of almost total insensibility before he was found by our friends and any relief could be extended to him. It was on my joining him from behind, when he first gave the alarm, that I came in contact with the thousands of infuriated insects. I sprang into a bush for shelter; but there I got no adequate covering from their onset. In my attempt to free myself from agony and entanglement, I immediately slid over a precipice, tearing both my clothes and body among the thorns in the rapid descent of about forty feet. From the number of bees which still encompassed me and multiplied upon me, and my inability to move from them, I had a pretty strong impression upon my mind that, unless God himself specially interfered on my behalf, all my wanderings and journeyings must then have been terminated, though by the humblest agency—the insects of the air. That interposition I experienced. I had kept hold of a pillow with which I had gone to Mr. Henderson, and, tearing it open on the bushes when I was unable to rise, I found within it, most unexpectedly, about a couple of square yards of blanket. It was to me, in the circumstances, like a sheet let down from Heaven to cover my head; and, partially protected by it, I lay till the bees left me, when, from the poison of the numerous stings which I had received, violent vomiting and other agitation came on, and my pulse failed and my heart fainting; a native, a Phakoor, one of the aboriginal sons of the forest, who had come up, pulled me into the shade." Mr. Henderson and Dr. Wilson were removed in native carts to their tents, and subsequently brought to Bombay, where, under the skilful care of Dr. Barn and other friends, they gradually recovered. The wild bee of India is of a dark chocolate color, and about an inch and an eighth in length. Instances have been known of natives losing their lives through an attack of the kind described.—Conquests of the Cross.

Waste of Timber.—Fortunately, the supply of coal in the earth is so great that the possibility of its exhaustion need not greatly disturb us. It is very different, however, with another, and scarcely less important gift of nature. The supply of wood and timber is constantly diminishing, and at the present increasing rate of consumption it cannot be long before all available sources of supply will be exhausted. More timber is annually destroyed by fire and waste than is used in the arts, and it is a matter of highest importance that the greatest possible care should be taken of our forests, and that the present supply of timber should be utilized with a care and economy commensurate with its real value.

The Moose.—Some apparently new facts regarding the habits of the moose, by J. G. Lockhart, appear in The Zoologist, an English scientific journal. He says that moose generally lie with the tail to windward, trusting to their senses of hearing and smelling, which are remarkably acute, to warn them of approaching danger from that quarter, using their eyes to warn them from danger to leeward. While they are sleeping or chewing the cud, their ears are in perpetual motion, one forward, the other backward alternately. Lockhart also claims that the moose has the remarkable habit of making a short turn and sleeping below the wind of their fresh track, so that any one falling thereon and following it up is sure to be heard or smelled before he can get within shooting distance.

"Loco" Plants.—On the Plains cattle herdsmen find plants which "loco," or make insane, their cattle, and often with fatal results. Chemists have supposed the cattlemen were mistaken in the plants producing the trouble, as no toxic properties could be found in them. Astragalus mollissimus is one of the plants indicated as causing the most trouble. Dr. Power and Cambier contribute a paper to a German serial, in which they say the plant really does possess small amounts of toxic alkaloids, sufficient to produce the results claimed.

A Large Convolvulus.—Those who only know morning-glories and moon flowers as climbing species of convolvulus and ipomoea, will be interested in knowing that one species grows as a tree, in Western Mexico, twenty or thirty feet high, and with a trunk three feet in circumference. It has been described as Convolvulus marianthus. The flower is about two inches long, and white, though yellowish below. It was found by Dr. Palmer, last year, very abundant about Alamos, where the Mexicans called it "Palo santa."

Scorpion Eaters.—From statements in the newspaper press it appears that the natural enemies of the scorpions in Death Valley in Southern California are the chaparral cock, which devour great numbers of them, and also a rodent called the "scorpion mouse." The chief habitat of the scorpion is under stones, where they are found in Utah and Nevada.

The Last State Worse than the First.—Fifteen years ago the Government of Jamaica introduced the Egyptian ichneumon into that country to rid the island of an animal called the "cove rat," which damaged the sugar crop. Now that animal has multiplied until it is to Jamaica what the rabbit is to Australia and the parrot to this country. Naturally a carnivorous animal, it has after exterminating the cats and reptiles, taken to eating bananas, mangoes, and fruits of all kinds, and according to the Philadelphia Record, which gives these facts on authority for which it vouches, it occasionally devours a Negro baby. The Record further states that Jamaica now has an Ichneumon Commission which offers a prize for the most successful method of exterminating the pest.

This illustrates several things: That some remedies are worse than the disease; to use the devil's weapons against the devil's work is dangerous; even a useful medicine taken too long or for the wrong complaint, makes a disease; but it illustrates most clearly the mistake of those persons who try to drown sorrow in alcohol.

Conversion of a Jewess.—The Salvation Army in San Francisco, Cal., is reported, in a dispatch from that city, as highly elated over the conversion of a prominent young Jewess. She is said to belong to a leading Hebrew family, and to have been reared in the straightest order of the Jewish faith. Her acceptance of the Christian belief has caused a regular sensation among her friends and acquaintances. A natural curiosity to see and know what was going on in the barracks, where the Salvationists were operating, led her to visit their quarters and to listen to their peculiar way of explaining the Scriptures. Soon she became interested in what they said and did. At last came the struggle between the old and new religion. Light dawned upon her path, and grace triumphed over prejudice, when she appeared, as a penitent, among the lowly representatives of Christ, and sought mercy and salvation at the hands of Him whom her people once crucified. The convert is now an active and zealous worker among them, and, notwithstanding Rabbi, and parents, and others have tried to dissuade her from the course, she has avowed her fixed purpose to cling to the faith of Christ, and to live and die as a Salvationist.

Evil Books.—Many books now in the hands of old and young so cover with the green vines of fancy the black and ruinous nature of the sins they portray, that the sins themselves grow as picturesque and witching as Melrose by moonlight. These books are supposed to look at evil "artistically," and ignore its moral quality. It is hardly good form to suggest that whatever passes under survey may be right or wrong. It is old-fashioned or provincial wisdom, these romances appeal to the imagination of the young, and weave around many a thought and action and object a garment of light and fascinating beauty that completely conceals the unsightliness of the sin it renders so skillfully deceiving and alluring. A reverted imagination alone can disguise the ugliness of sin. The clear and holy vision of an angel could only see the relation in which they are related to God, and to other souls. A seraphic gaze would penetrate beneath the rose-colored exterior, and instantly apprehend the moral essence of any act.—Selected.

Superstitious Ornaments.—A Protestant Pym! it sounds like a contradiction in terms. Yet it is a fact, that a church calling itself Protestant, in the City of New York, has lately possessed itself of a solid gold Pym, adorned with sixty-seven diamonds, two pearls, and one large and fourteen small emeralds, wrought into the form of a Maltese cross, and valued at $5,000. Our informant, The Churchman, chronicles the reception of this costly shrine as a noteworthy event.

Now the Pym, prescribed by Pope Innocent III, A. D. 1215, is one of the principal articles on the altar of a Roman Catholic church. There placed, and containing, as that church teaches, the actual body of Jesus Christ—the elements of the Eucharist after transubstantiation—it is the sign and receptacle of the highest and the only true adoration and worship of its priesthood and laity.—Selected.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 30, 1892.

A Friend in Ohio has sent to us a paper, advertising an entertainment to be given by a literary society "at the Friends' Meeting House, Damascus, Ohio. The exercises," it is stated, "will consist of a semi-play and recitations, dumb-bell exercises, and Indian club swinging, instrumental and vocal music."

What is meant by semi-play we do not know;

but the general character of the entertainment is such, that we suppose it to be altogether unsuitable for a house professedly built for Divine worship and church services.

As some of our readers may not be familiarly acquainted with Ohio localities, it is proper to mention that Damascus is not the place where the Ohio Yearly Meeting convenes, with which we are in unity, for that meets at Stillwater, near Barnesville. The house referred to is that belonging to those who separated from Ohio Friends more than thirty years ago, and who are frequently spoken of as the "Binns' Meeting."

There have been evidences from time to time, of a departure among these people from the primitive doctrines of Friends; but we hope and believe that there must be many among them, to whom such an exhibition as that furnished by the poster we received, will be distasteful. We should be glad indeed, if such occurrences should lead their more thoughtful and religiously inclined members to reflect seriously on the situation of things among their members. For, although we do not feel much more responsibility for their actions, than for those of any other denomination of professors of the Christian religion, yet we would gladly see practical righteousness and obedience to the law of Christ as manifested in the hearts of mankind, increase and spread from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The demands made by the United States upon Chile several months ago for explanation and reparation for assault upon United States sailors was rejected last week, and Chile is informed that answer must be made without delay if the two Governments are to continue diplomatic relations such as exist between friendly nations.

On the 25th inst. the President sent to Congress his message on the Chilean dispute, together with the diplomatic correspondence on the subject. In submitting these papers to Congress, the President said: "I desire to say that I am of the opinion that the demands made of Chile by this Government should be adhered to and enforced. If the dignity as well as the prestige and influence of the United States are not to be wholly sacrificed we must protect those who, in foreign ports, display the flag or wear the colors of this Government against insult, brutality and death, inflicted in resentment of the acts of their Government, and not for any fault of their own."

A dispatch from Santiago states that the Chilean Government is willing to withdraw the Matta letter and its demand for Minister Egan's recall, and proposes arbitration as to the Yarraraso affair. If that is not acceptable to the United States a reference of the matter to the United States Supreme Court is suggested.

Associate Justice Joseph P. Bradley, of the United States Supreme Court, died at his residence in Washington, D. C., on the morning of the 22d inst. He was born in 1813.

Sir George Baden-Powell arrived at New York on the 24th inst., on the Etruria. He comes as a Commissioner for Great Britain to endeavor to bring about an amicable settlement with the United States in the Behring Sea Fishery question. He will probably go to Canada, and after conferring with that Government proceed to Washington, D. C.

Senator Joseph N. Dolph, the senior Republican Senator of Oregon, has introduced a bill in the United States Senate to legalize saloons in the Territory of Alaska. Alaska is now under a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. Senator Dolph's excuse for introducing the legalized liquor traffic is that the prohibition is violated and that it is better to repeal it and enact laws that will be enforced. As the laws against murder and burglary are violated, why not have them repealed?

Lancaster County, Pa., it appears, still stands at the head of all the tobacco-growing countries in the United States, with her 19,217,800 pounds grown in the season of 1889. Four other countries—Christian and Henderson, in Kentucky; Dana, in Wisconsin, and Pittsburg, in Virginia, grow over 10,000,000 each. There are seventeen other counties that grow from 5,000,000 to 10,000,000 pounds each. Lancaster County's product in 1889, as is known, was sold at exceedingly low prices—about the lowest in our history—and even then produced the amount of $249,000. The average appears to this by any other individual county was $886,840 by Hartford County, Connecticut. The product of Lancaster County, in fact, fetched more money than that of the entire State of Connecticut, or of Wisconsin, or of New York and Massachusetts combined.

Articles of good quality has been struck at Robeson, and is said to be the first found in Eerk County.

Valuable deposits of coal have been discovered on the Niga Islands, on the coast of Alaska. It is said that the coal is virtually inexhaustible in amount, and that large cargo lots can be delivered in San Francisco at $4.00 a ton.

A dispatch from San Antonio, Texas, dated the 21st inst., says: The whole of the Rio Grande frontier is covered with snow, the first time ever known. The suffering among the poorer classes has been intense for the past two days.

The National Surgical Institute, in Indianapolis, was partially destroyed by fire early on the morning of the 22d inst. About 250 crippled people were in the Institute at the time. Every effort was made by the police and ambulances corps to rescue the unfortunate. The sleeping apartments were on the third and fourth floors, and the flames cut off all means of escape. When the floors gave way and fell to the bottom, nineteen men were killed and nineteen others injured.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 544, which is 44 less than during the previous week, and 149 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number, 260 were males and 284 females; 87 died of consumption; 72 of pneumonia; 43 of obstructions of the heart; 36 of diphtheria; 22 of bronchitis; 21 of typhoid fever; 12 of cholera; 12 of cholera; 17 of convulsions; 14 of inanition; 13 of paralysis; 13 of cramp; 13 of typhoid fever; 13 of congestion of the lungs; 12 of cancer; 12 of Bright's disease and 11 of marasmus.

FOREIGN.—The British steamer Imperial Prince, Captain Cox, from New York, First Month 4th, for Leth, has arrived at Portland. Captain Cox reports that at 11 o'clock on the morning of First Month 16th, when the steamer was in latitude 48 N., longitude 19 W., he saw heavy clouds of smoke and a large thing, which twice shot high into the air as though thrown up by explosions. Soon afterward he perceived a large ship on fire, about six miles distant from the steamer. Heavy northwest gales had been blowing since the morning, and the weather became so thick that the ship was hidden from view. The captain believes that her crew must have perished, as it would have been impossible for a small boat to live in the sea that was running. There was nothing left to indicate either the name or nationality of the lost ship.

The principal political event in England last week was the General Election for the Electoral Division, caused by the elevation to the peerage of Lord Hartington, the leader of the Liberal Unionists in the House of Commons. The returns of the election were: J. H. Madden, Liberal, 6,006; Sir Thomas Brooks, Liberal-Unionist, 4,841. Madden's majority, 1,225. In the preceding election the victor was Lord Hartington, 3,909; E. Newbinger (Home Ruler), 3,948. Lord Hartington's majority, 1,450.

There are said to be 18,000 newspaper women in London, who have twenty-two press clubs and authors' societies among them.

Lord Salisbury, in conjunction with the leading statesmen of the Central European Alliance, is working for great diplomatic issues. Russia, crippled by famine, and with the prospect of successive years of the same terrible condition of things, with the result of a growing increase in her financial difficulties, can now be dealt with either as a submissive friend or as a determined enemy. If the negotiations now proceeding at St. Petersburg between the allies of the representatives of England, the Dreihund and the Czars shall fail to determine their differences for a long time to come, then the Kaisers will force a general European war.

The main object of all the diplomatic movements at this moment on foot is to preserve the peace of Europe by tying Russia hand and foot and leaving France alone and impotent. The alternative is a general war to decide a permanent status.

Influenza has been ravaging not only London but all England. The epidemic is somewhat less virulent here than elsewhere, but it affects it in a very widespread. There are thousands of victims among the employes of the Underground Railway, and thousands more among the post-office clerks. These services are so badly crippled as to cause public inconvenience. The number of members of Parliament produced by the disease is so high that the sanitary condition of the House of Parliament so bad that the ministers are likely to postpone the session until the wave of illness shall have subsided.

The hospitals in Paris are crowded with patients suffering from influenza. The disease prevails in all parts of the city, and the municipal authorities and Assistance Publique are making arrangements to convert available vacant buildings into hospitals. De Freycinet, the Minister of War, will be asked to allow the barracks on the outskirts of the city to be used as infirmaries. There is a great increase in the number of deaths resulting from influenza.

A joint statement has been issued by the Catholic Archbishops of Paris, Toulouse, Rheims, Lyons and St. Mais complaining that the State had become atheistic. This will increase the probability of the separation of Church and State and awake the hopes of the Protestants.

The Sultan of Morocco has granted permission to Great Britain to erect a senaphore on Cape Espartel, on the northwest coast of his dominions, at the entrance to the Straits of Gibraltar. This concession is made on the condition that in the event of war the senaphore must be closed on the demand of any European power.

During service in a worship-house at Slobodskoi, Russia, in the Government of Viatka, the roof gave way and fell upon the worshippers beneath. A scene of the wildest excitement followed. The villagers crowded to the scene and with great difficulty rescued the persons imprisoned by the fallen timbers, boards, etc. The wreckage was soon cleared away, when it was found that fifty persons had been either killed or injured.

The Brazilian Chambers have been prorogued until Fifth Month. The bill authorizing the Government to assume responsibility of the bank paper issues did not pass the Senate owing to the opposition of the Senators did not attend the meetings of that body.

The demand for platinum for use in science has raised its value to three-quarters that of gold. Three years ago it was worth $80 a pound. It now costs $160, or 16 times more than silver. It is found in small quantities in Brazil, Colombia, Brazil, Mexico, Montana, California, Oregon and Idaho. The yearly output has never been more than four tons and is now three.

DIED, Twelfth Month 16, 1891, at his residence in East Whitehall, Chester Co., Pa., JOHN AITKEN, in the eighty-eighth year of his age. An esteemed member of Goshen Monthly and Malvern Particular Meetings.

—, in Camden, N. J., on the 20th day of the Twelfth Month, 1891, at the house of her friend Amy J. Brooks, CATHERINE LA CONEY, aged about eighty-eight years.

She was not originally a member of the Society of Friends. In early life she went to reside in a Friend's family as an assistant, and continued in the family for nearly seventy years. For over sixty years she has been a regular attendee at our meetings, and becoming truly awakened to the importance of a religious life, we have no doubt she was favored to experience the great work of Christian Redemption. She joined the Society on the ground of true conviction and from a sense of religious duty, about forty years since. She was quite remarkable for her quiet, retiring disposition, with a very humble estimate of herself, but was nevertheless endowed with good understanding in religious matters and a capacity to distinguish things affecting the welfare of the Church under our name. We believe her end was peace. By the grace of God, said Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, I am what I am, and it is to the efficacy of this grace all must be ascribed.

At the residence of her aunt, Amy J. Brooks, Camden, N. J., Twelfth Month, 1852. AMY ROBERTS, in the forty-sixth year of her age, a member of Germantown Particular and Frankford Monthly Meetings of Friends, Philadelphia. She had been for many years a faithful and conscientious teacher in Friends' School, Germantown. By her marked usefulness, ever ready to spend her time and strength for others, she endeavored herself to a large circle of friends and relatives. As the end approached, she could say that she felt nothing in her way, and to her we feel that the language is truly applicable, "Well done, good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

At her residence, Americus, Kansas, First Mo., 4, 1892, ROXANA R. REEVE, daughter of Hannah and the late J. Whitall Reeve, aged thirty-nine years.

When quite young she was attacked with rheumatism, which later assumed a chronic form, causing her hands and limbs to be much drawn and deformed; and for the last twenty-nine years of her life she was unable to walk, even with the aid of crutches, and for twenty-six years she could not bend or straighten her right arm. During this period she was busily engaged with needle-work and correspondence with her friends, though it was with difficulty her fingers could grasp the needle or pen. She early gave her heart to her Saviour, and lived in the love of God, and the friends who were allotted her, she experienced his arm of unailing strength to be underneath her support; and her cheerfulness and Christian resignation were conspicuous traits in her character, and made her a striking example to others. In a letter to a relative, written a few weeks before her death, she commemorated many blessings, contrasting her situation with others whom she deemed more unfortunate than herself, and remarked, "An almighty Heavenly Father kindly keeps the hard things from us till they come, and since I first learned to lean on Him in trials, I have found His grace to be sufficient for me." She was ever many blessings, contrasting her situation with others whom she deemed more unfortunate than herself, and remarked, "An almighty Heavenly Father kindly keeps the hard things from us till they come, and since I first learned to lean on Him in trials, I have found His grace to be sufficient for me." FOR "THE FRIEND,"

1851.—Ninth Month 9th. "Had a meeting at White Lick. After a season of waiting upon the Lord, the temptations and dangers to which even the believer, who has attained to some steadfastness and experience in Christ, is exposed,—like standing upon a sea of glass, mingled with fire,—were a little opened to their view. Though the Lord's tender mercies are over all his works, we cannot expect preservation without watchfulness and prayer, walking in lowliness of mind before Him. All self-sufficiency, and relying on past attainments, must be relinquished, and a willingness lived in to be emptied and stripped, by Him who knows our infirmities, and what baptisms and reductions are needful for our refinement and growth in Divine Grace. Some things relating to the work of regeneration and sanctification, were brought before them; and the meeting was concluded with vocal prayer for Divine regard, and for the Lord's sustaining power in our trials.

"Went back to our lodgings and dined. Just before we left, two Friends coming in, we fell into silence, and the departure of a large portion of our members from that inward exercise for themselves and for the right support of the cause of Christ, which every one ought to experience, was alluded to; and the desire expressed that those present might keep to it. Where are those travelling ones, the mourners in Zion, the burden-bearers among us? Many seem not to understand the doctrine of regeneration, and daily suffering; such a state of ease has come over us."

"11th. At Sugar Grove Preparative Meeting, the indispensable work of inward sanctification, and daily waiting upon the Lord, for strength and preservation, were enforced; and the danger of relying upon a literal, or educational assent to the truths of the Christian religion, without the inward work, was declared among them. I was fearful that some were too self-confident, and not acquainted with daily walking in the path of humility before the Lord."

"17th. Attended Raysville Preparative Meeting. In the first sitting, the great importance of inward, vital religion impressed my mind; and the testimony of the apostle, that 'He is not a Jew who is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Jew who is one inwardly, and circumcision is that of the heart, in the Spirit, and not in the letter, whose praise is not of men but of God,' was revived; and the hatred which Satan has to genuine Quakerism, as striking at the root and fabric of his kingdom, was adverted to. He cares not by what means he can destroy us, and our religious profession. If he cannot induce those who hold it, to deny the principles with the tongue, but succeeds in drawing them into the friendships of the world, and the love of its profits and delights; and thereby they lose the inward life and power of godliness, it answers his purpose. Of this, there appeared to me, to be great danger; the love of ease, and the flatteries of worldly men, lying so near the natural inclination; which shrinks from the baptism of the Holy Spirit, and those dispensations which purge the branches, and keep them alive in the Vine. It was a season of rather close exercise; and yet Divine love and fervent desire for my brethren and sisters covered my heart; that we might all become more what the Lord would make us, were we entirely given up to Him."

"18th. Attended the Preparative Meeting at Carthage. It was not large; but I hoped there was a remnant of the suffering seed, who are acquainted with the hidden life; keeping at the feet of Jesus, where they are instructed in the faith and patience of the saints. These are the salt among us; and though the unregenerate man, whose eyes are not anointed with the eye-salve of the kingdom, cannot discern their safe abiding, yet it is in Christ; and even the worldlings are compelled to confess to their firm and upright standing. The dear young people were affectionately pleaded with, to bow to the yoke of Christ, and in the obedience of faith, serve Him; that they may know Him to become the chief of ten thousands, and altogether lovely to their souls; and He would qualify them for service in his church. I hoped it was a time of renewed visitation and encouragement to some."

"19th. At Pleasant View we had a pretty good sized meeting, made up of a class which loves ease, in relation to the performance of religious duty, some unfaithful ones, and some who hold back through fear and diffidence. I was enabled to enter into their condition; bringing to their notice the parable of the wedding feast of the king's son; to which, though provided without expense or trouble to those who were invited, they refused to come; pleading various excuses. So in this day, many neglected the offers of Divine regard, excusing themselves from obeying his requirements; and thus they fail to be brought to the feast of fat things, and of wine well refined on the lees. Some on the ground of their unfitness, desiring to put upon others what the Lord calls on them to do, and from this cause never come to the growth in Christ, and that standing in his church, they would be brought to, were they faithful in the day of small things. Here is one of the causes of weakness, and why our Society does not shine with that brightness it should appear in. There was a renewed call extended to some, old and young, to obey the drawings of the Saviour, that they may become servants and pillars in the Lord's house. The meeting closed with solemn supplication for their help and strength. It was a favored, good meeting; in which holy help was extended to me, a poor creature, and for which I was humbly thankful."

"21st. At Spiceland I felt much emptied, and thought it might be my place to set an example of silence; but after waiting a long time, the passage was revived, with an intimation to stand up with it: 'The light of the body is the eye; if, therefore, thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light; but if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. If, therefore, the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness?' The subject was gradually opened, and the Lord enabled me to warn some of the danger of relying upon their own wisdom and understanding, substituting them for the guidance of the light of Christ in the heart; by obedience to which alone, the work of regeneration and sanctification can be experienced. Without this, all educational faith and knowledge; all that man may do in his own strength, will avail nothing in the work of salvation. He may think to do good, by talking of the truths of the Gospel, and making much display of them before men; but without the inward, heart-changing work of Divine grace, all this will be no better than fig-leaf coverings; our own righteousnesses, which are as filthy rags. All classes were encouraged to come under the operation of the Spirit of Christ in the heart, that they may know the work of salvation to be going on with the day. To the fathers and mothers in the Truth, the language of sympathy and consolation was addressed, with the expression of faith, that as they persevered in watchfulness, the Lord's covenant with them would not be broken; but they would know preservation to the end. They would be made a blessing to the dear young people; who were also tenderly invited to take the yoke of Christ upon them, for which they would receive the reward of sweet peace, and never have cause to regret serving so gracious a Master. I thought it was a day of Divine condensation, and of unmerited favor to us, poor unworthy creatures."

"25th. At West Grove Meeting, a plain and unequivocal testimony against the habit of sleeping in meeting, was delivered among them; in which they were reminded of the fervor of blind Bartimeus to have his eyes opened, when he cried out to the Master, 'Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me.' Were we livingly engaged in our religious meetings to wait upon, and cry unto Him, our eyes would be opened to see wondrous things in his law, and we should be raised above this drowsy spirit."

"27th. We attended the Monthly Meeting at Milton. I was enabled to labor with the young people, to induce them to give up in early life to the will of their Heavenly Father, inwardly revealed in their hearts; by which alone they can be fitted for usefulness in the church, and experience a growth from stature to stature in the blessed Truth."

"28th. At Bethel Meeting, I was engaged to draw Friends into an individual examination, whether the life and power of Christ reigned in them, that they might be made and kept branches of the living Vine, and by their spirits and example, show forth the efficacy of the religion of our Lord Jesus Christ. I felt afraid the strong man had not come down into the state of a little child; but that some were judging and acting too much in their own wisdom and understanding, by which the Seed of the kingdom was borne down, and did not rise into dominion."

"Tenth Month 7th. Attended Indiana Yearly Meeting held at Richmond. Much time was consumed in discussing subjects in which the expenditure of money was concerned; which has the effect to keep the attention occupied with outward things, instead of a travail of spirit for the welfare of the members, and the advancement of the cause of Christ, by a life of religious exercise, and showing forth the fruits of the Holy Spirit. So many concerns of an outward nature, all of which are reported upon, and long discussions entered into, it appeared to me, kept the mind so aloft, that the meeting did not experience that inward feeling after the solemnizing presence of the Head of the church, and the pointing of the Divine finger, which would give sound judgment, and tend to the edification of the body, in the life and power of the Holy Ghost. To get the great number of these subjects, with others of a different nature, disposed of, the business was crowded on the meeting. I wish not to judge uncharitably, but I did fear that the great object for which the church is brought together annually, is not, under these circumstances, as fully answered as it should be. There is some danger of such a Yearly Meeting becoming like a great philanthropic or benevolent association; and the minds of the members being much absorbed by these objects, as if they constituted the work of religion; and by which the activity of the natural man may be substituted for the leadings and direction of the Head of the church."

Reaching his home on the 11th, he thus records his gratitude:

"Under a sense of the goodness and protection of the Lord, our holy Helper, in preserving us from dangers, furnishing ability from time to time, to do his will, and bringing us safely home to our dear families, gratitude many times warmed my heart; with the desire to ascribe unto Him, thanksgivings and praise, and to bless his ever-adorable name. Many Friends greeted me very warmly on being restored to them."

"Since getting home, I have passed through seasons of great stripping and desertion, which have been followed by the renewal of Divine good, and some ability to testify to others, of the faithfulness of the Lord to his poor creature, in raising him up, and renewing his faith in his unchangeable power and goodness."

1852.—Second Month. "The proper holding of our approaching Yearly Meeting, is a subject of great weight; and, at times, it seemed as if I should be willing to be released, and gathered away from it. But the exercise must be borne by some, if the cause of Christ is upheld by our religious Society. When we consider the awfulness of eternity, and that we have individually a work to perform, we have need to resign ourselves unto the Divine hand, and ask of the Lord strength to endure our trials, and to follow Him faithfully, so that the work and the wedding garment may be finished by the time the end comes."

"Third Month 17th. At North Meeting I felt moved to utter the language of the prophet, 'O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted, behold, I will lay thy stones with fair colors, and lay thy foundations with sapphires. And I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones.' 'In a little wrath I bid my face from thee for a moment; but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer; and to say, that under the clothing of peace, which had spread over my mind, from the early part of the meeting, I was prepared to bear testimony that our God is a God nigh at hand and not afar off; and that He who joined himself to his sorrowing disciples, after they had seen their Lord crucified, dead and buried, would also join himself to us, as we walked by the way, and would satisfy us, that it was He, and would sustain us by his power.'

"Fourth Month 4th. My wife was enabled to hold forth a word of encouragement, this morning, to the tribulated members; and afterwards it seemed to be my duty, to bend the knee, and vocally implore the compassionate Shepherd, to remember mercy in the midst of judgment; to renew the faith of the fearful, disconsolate ones, and to defend his heritage from the attempts of the cruel enemy to destroy it. I hope we had a little renewed evidence that the Lord was with us, the meeting closing with much solemnity."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

In illustration of the extent and character of the movement to the West, which affected so many of our members in the south, the following account is introduced, originally published by John and Isaac Comly in Friends' Miscellany.

A brief account of the regular movements of the Carolina Friends who went to settle over the Ohio River, in the year 1800: to which is prefixed a copy of Boston Stanton's letter to Friends of Wrightsborough Monthly Meeting, in Georgia, on the proposal of their also removing to settle in what was then called The Northwestern Territory; dated the 25th of the Fifth Month, 1802, being as follows:

Dear Friends:—Having understood by William Patten and William Hogan from your parts, that a number among you have had some thoughts and turnings of mind respecting a removal to this country; and, as I make no doubt, you have had much struggling and many reasonings about the propriety of it; and also considering the undertaking as a very arduous one, that you have been almost ready at times to be discouraged and faint in your minds: under a sense of which I have felt a near sympathy with you. As it has been the lot of a number of us to undertake the work a little before you, I thought a true statement (for your information) of some of our strugglings and reasonings concerning the propriety of our moving;—also of our progress on the way, and the extension of Heavenly regard to us;—together with the progress of Friends, both temporally and spiritually, since we have got here,—might afford strength and encouragement to you in the arduous task you have in prospect.

I may begin thus, and say that for several years I Friends had some distant view of moving out of that oppressive part of the land, but did not know where until the year 1799, when we had an acceptable visit from some travelling Friends of the western part of Pennsylvania. They thought proper to propose to Friends for consideration, whether it would not be agreeable to best wisdom for us unitedly to remove north west of the Ohio River,—to a place where there were no slaves held, being a free country. This proposal made a deep impression on our minds; and it seemed as if they were messengers sent to call us out, as it were from Egyptian darkness (for indeed it seemed as if the land groined under oppression) into the marvellous light of the glory of God.

Nevertheless, although we had had a prospect of something of the kind, it was at first very crossing to my natural inclination; being well settled as to the outward. So I strove against the thoughts of moving for a considerable time; yet the view would often arise, that it was in accordance with pure wisdom for Friends to leave that part of the land. But I had often to turn the fleece, as Gideon did, and to ask counsel of the Lord, being desirous to be rightly directed by Him:—more especially, as it seemed likely to break up our Monthly Meeting, which I had reason to believe was set up in the wisdom of Truth. Thus, I was concerned many times to weigh the matter as in the balance of the sanctuary; till, at length, I considered that there was no prospect of our number being increased by conviction, on account of the oppression that abounded in that land. I also thought I saw in the light, that the minds of the people generally were too much outward, so that "there was no room in the inn" of the heart for much religious impression, being filled with other guests; and notwithstanding they have been visited with line upon line and precept upon precept, yet they remain in too much hardness of heart.

Under a view of these things, I was made sensible, beyond doubting, that it was in the ordering of wisdom for us to remove; and that the Lord was opening a way for our enlargement, if found worthy. Friends generally feeling something of the same, there were three of them who went to view the country, and one worthy public Friend. They travelled on till they came to this part of the western country, where they were stopped in their minds, believing it was the place for Friends to settle. So they returned back, and informed us of the same in a solemn meeting; in which dear Joseph Dew, the public Friend, intimated that he saw the seed of God sown in abundance, which extended far northward. This information, in the way it was delivered to us, much tendered our spirits, and strengthened us in the belief that it was right. So we undertook the work, and found the Lord to be a present helper in every needful time, as He was sought unto; yea, to be as "the pillar of cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night;" and thus we were led safely along until we arrived here.

The first of us moved west of the Ohio in the Ninth Month, 1800; and none of us had a house at our command to meet in, to worship the Almighty Being. So we met in the woods until houses were built, which was but a short time. In less than one year, Friends so increased that two Preparative Meetings were settled; and in the last Twelfth Month, a Monthly Meeting alled Concord, also was opened, which is now large. Another Preparative Meeting is requested, and also another first- and week-day meeting. Four are already granted in the territory, and three meeting-houses are built. Way appears to be opening for another Monthly Meeting; and, I think, a Quarterly Meeting.

Having intimated a little of the progress of Friends in a religious line, I may say that as to the outward we have been sufficiently provided for, though in a new country. Friends are settling fast, and seem, I hope, likely to do well. Under a sense of these things, and of the many favors the Lord has conferred on us, I have been ready, and do at times cry out: "Marvellous are thy works, O Lord God Almighty! just and true are all thy ways." And Oh! that we may ever be sufficiently thankful, and ascribe the praise to Him alone to whom it is due.

Now I may inform you a little of the nature of this country. It is in the main very hilly; though most of the land may be profitably cultivated, and produces abundantly. Corn, from thirty to forty bushels per acre, ploughed twice; sometimes more when well worked; some places have produced from fifty to sixty bushels per acre. Wheat, from twenty to twenty-five bushels. The soil appears to be very natural to grass of the best quality; and we make plenty of good sugar. Salt-works are being erected; and in some places considerable quantities are made. So that I think people may live here as independent of European trade as in any country.

Feeling my mind clear of apprehended duty towards you, and not desiring to enlarge, I hid you farewell; commending you to God and to the word of his grace that is able to make a way for you where there may seem to be no way, and to direct you aright in all things, yea, to make you wise unto salvation, and to build you up in that most holy faith without which (I believe) you will not journey safely along.—I conclude, with unfeigned love, your friend,

BORDEN STANTON.

It appears by a copy of the minutes of a Monthly Meeting on Trent River, in Jones Co., North Carolina, held in the Ninth and Tenth Months, 1799, that the weighty subject of the members thereof being about to remove unitedly to the territory northward of the Ohio River, was and had been before that time, deliberately under their consideration. And the same proposal was solemnly laid before their Quarterly Meeting held at Contentney the 9th of the Tenth Month; which, on weighing the matter and its consequences, concluded to leave said Friends at their liberty to proceed therein, as way might be opened for them: yet the subject was continued till their next Quarter. And they having (before the said Monthly Meeting ceased) agreed that certificates be signed therein for the members, to convey their rights respectively to the Monthly Meeting nearest to the place of their intended settlement, showing them to be members whilst they resided there; such certificates for each other mutually were signed in their last Monthly Meeting held at Trent aforesaid, in the First Month, 1800; which was then solemnly and finally adjourned or concluded; and their privilege of holding it, together with the records of it, were delivered up to their Quarterly Meeting held the 18th of the same Month, 1800.

They removed accordingly; first to the settlement of Friends on each side of the Monongahela River, in Fayette and Washington counties, in Pennsylvania, to reside a little while, in order to prepare for beginning their intended new settlement over the Ohio. Having brought their certificates with them, they laid their circumstances, with extracts from the minutes of their former monthly and quarterly meetings in Carolina, before Redstone Quarterly Meeting, held the 2d of the Sixth Month, 1800, and received the advice and assistance of Friends there.

Thus they proceeded and made their settlement in the year 1800; and were remarkably favored with an opportunity to be accommodated with a quantity of valuable land, even at the place which was chosen for their settlement by the Friends who went to view the country before the office was opened for granting lands in that territory. And thus they were allowed to enter for, and secure divers sections (so-called) or tracts of land, containing square parcels of about six hundred and forty acres each, even as some of the first purchasers, before any others came in to interfere with them; which appeared as a marvellous affair to themselves and others.

Indirect Results of Christianity in India.

BY GEO. F. PENTECOST, D.D.

I have said that the first thing which strikes the visitor to India is the many material evidences of the presence and rule of the British. I say material evidences, for of the actual presence of the British the number is so small as almost to be overlooked. It is true that there are 60,000 British soldiers in the cantonments, but these are rarely seen. The entire English population, apart from the soldiers, is not another fifty thousand. Yet everywhere is the evidence of British occupation. I repeat this fact about the smallness of numbers of English in India, in comparison with the greatness of their influence and power, for the purpose of illustration.

It is common for superficial observers to speak of the progress of Christianity in India as painfully and discouragingly slow; nay, it is common for missionaries themselves to lament the fewness of their converts and the comparative immovability of the Indian heart and conscience toward God. But to judge of the power and progress of Christianity in India by the comparatively few native Christians to be met with would be as great a mistake as to suppose that because there are no more than one hundred thousand English soldiers and civilians together therefore British rule was not firmly established.

The thing that surprises me more and more every day and month I am in India is the marvellous progress Christianity has made and the rapidity and length of the strides it is now making. It is impossible to understand the progress of Christianity in India by studying the Missionary Reports of the various societies or by looking over the census returns of the Government. One must be here on the ground, go in and out among the people, compare the habits and customs of to-day with those of fifty years ago. One must take into account the present state of Hinduism, especially in the upper classes, with what it was fifty or a hundred years ago. As a matter of fact there is scarcely an institution, a caste, a belief, or a social custom in India that the spirit of Christianity has not breathed upon and to some extent affected and modified. It would require more than one article even to indicate the evidences of progress in this direction. But I will try and set some things before the readers of The Independent which may help them to understand what is being done indirectly toward the Christianizing of India.

Let me then begin with the altered faith of Hinduism under the influence of Christianity. One hundred years ago Hinduism was solid. There were practically no schisms in its vast body. The schools of the Brahmans were crowded; the temples were flourishing; the rites and ceremonies of their grossly idolatrous system were practiced universally, by the great as well as the small, the rich as well as the poor. The Brahman reigned supreme everywhere, the spiritual (?) lord of all the people. Widows were being burnt in the name of Hinduism, and the rite was considered one of the most sacred and most pleasing to the gods. Religious suicide in a dozen forms was encouraged and practiced. All over India men were burying themselves alive; drowning themselves in the sacred rivers; starting themselves to death; and in many other ways offering themselves in religious self-sacrifice. Child murder was the common practice all over India, especially the murder of girl babies. The rites of Jagganath were in full force, and though not as commonly as is popularly supposed, yet it was true that religious devotees did cast themselves under the wheels of the cruel car, and they were encouraged and applauded for it. This has ceased out of the land. The cruel rites of the ascetics were everywhere practiced. Men were found hanging head downward from the limbs of trees; lying in beds of iron spikes; torturing and lacerating themselves in an hundred ways, all in the name of the gods, with the encouragement of the priests, and in entire harmony with the universal faith of the Hindu. The Thug practiced his profession under the patronage of the gods, and the thief caste was recognized as really as any other caste. All these things have entirely or in greater part passed away in the last hundred years. It may be said that these have been put down by the strong hand of British rule and law and not by Christian influence. But in these things as in many other the British Government (in no sense a Christian Government) has acted in obedience to the Christian conscience of both Europe and America.

In a later article I shall more particularly set forth the rapid decadence of caste under the constant attacks of Christianity both directly and indirectly delivered. In this place I shall content myself with simply remarking that the caste restrictions of India to-day are no more what they were fifty years ago, than the relation of the English aristocracy is the same to the commons to-day as it was in the days of the Norman supremacy. Fifty years ago or a little earlier the gates of the cities and towns were closed at five in the evening and not opened again till nine the next morning, and the low-caste people excluded lest the shadow of some low-caste man under the slant rays of the sun should fall upon some passing Brahman and so defile him. To-day the low-caste boy, even the son of a sweeper (the very lowest of the low-castes) and the son of the Brahman, sit together in the same schoolroom, engage with each other in the common sports of the school or college. The railway trains are crowded with thousands of men of all castes and no caste, and no thought is taken of it; whereas at the time of the introduction of the railway system into India separate carriages had to be provided for the different castes. A hundred years ago the Brahman was the protected and privileged caste; he did no work, followed no occupation except to receive the gifts and offerings of the people. He was not only a favored man and entirely supported by the people, but he was a god and must needs be worshipped. Even fifty years ago it was a common thing for men of other castes to prostrate themselves on the ground and openly worship a Brahman. Now Sir Brahman has ceased both to be a god and a supported man, except in the comparatively few cases where he still is the guru, or household teacher, or a priest actually serving in a temple. Brahmans to-day have to work for their living like other people, and are by hundreds and thousands performing the smallest offices in the employ of the Government and private business establishments on salaries ranging from 86 to 825 a month, and count themselves happy if they can secure such positions. Moreover, they have to compete for their bread with the boys and men of the lower and even the lowest castes who come up from school and college as well as they and demand employment. It is true that caste is the chief outward obstacle to the open spread of Christianity in India to-day; but it is safe to say that all the outworks of caste have been taken, and it is to-day fighting for life in the very keep of its castle. It has been steadily beaten back till it has retreated to its last stronghold, and the siege is so hot and the investment so strait that it is only a question of time when this great master-device of Satan will be surrendered. Already the desertions from caste, even the highest, are more and more numerous; and where it is not abandoned altogether its bands are being loosened and its restrictions more and more minimized. It does not require that one be a prophet to foretell the utter collapse of the whole system within the next fifty years. For myself I do not believe it will last out another twenty-five.

LAHORE, PUNJAB, November 3, 1891.

[WRITTEN PROBABLY ABOUT THE YEAR 1782.]

The following lines may have an interest for persons who have studied the habits of thought of the Friends of the last century. The author, Mary Walker, was the daughter of Abel Chapman, and of his third wife, Hannah Gaskin, both of Whitty. Of the two other daughters of the same marriage, Hannah became the wife of Bartlett Gurney, and Jane of Joseph Gurney, both of the Keswick and Norfolk families. Mary Chapman was married to John Walker, in 1769. He had then left Whitty and settled in Northumberland. The number of their descendants is unknown to the writer, but the amiable character and intellectual gifts of their daughter Mary Walker were long remembered in North Shields. She became the wife of Benjamin Flounders, of Yarm, from whom Flounders College takes its name, and died a year or two after her marriage.

A. O. B.

My much-loved daughter, on whose infant years
I've watch'd with pleasing hopes and anxious fears;
In infant hours a nurse may well supply
A mother's place, if not at all times by;
Maternal love, which will for ever bind,
Now watches over thy expanding mind.
A few choice volumes should thy thoughts engage
Such as instruction breathe through every page.
To Scripture records due attention pay;
Without their precepts never pass a day;
Beg the Almighty may each text expound;
Thine, only thine, they will be useful found.
Cambray's good Bishop in thy closet place,
He'll teach thee purest love and Christian grace.
Ask where thy God his gifts doth best impart,

He'll bid thee seek him always in thy heart.
His truths have often stay'd my wandering mind,
Be sure attend them, thou! thy instruction find.
Read of Penn's "Maxims," and observe his rules,
He'll teach thee more than e'er thou'st learned at schools.

Observe his book in which is plainly shewn
Without the Cross we ne'er can wear the Crown.
Mark Barclay's reasonings—wise and truly just,
And never take religion upon trust.
Our ancient Worthies—Sewall plainly shows—
'Midst dire oppression and tyrannic woes,
Hurl'd into prison—punish'd with death,
Maintain'd their faith until their latest breath.
Oh, may that Spirit be to thee renew'd,
Whom above all they through their lives pursued!
Thou wilt see how right to live—how well to die!
Read with attention all the volumes o'er,
They'll lead thy judgment to a number more.
I do conjure thee, by each tender tie,
Let not romance or play e'er catch thine eye;
They only tend to lead the mind astray
From that All-good which points a better way.
If thou wilt wish in social life to shine,
Exert thy reason, every thought refine.
Good sense will stagnate, if 'tis not improv'd
By men or authors who are well approv'd
As through the flowery tribe we often see
Calling each sweet, the wise, industrious bee,
So from each author take the finer part,
That will improve and 'not dullify' the heart.
Thy country's history view from early times,
Before thou study that of other climes.
Observe each period—well remark the age
When Reformation first adorns the page.
Britons, we find, first bore the Pagan name,
To those who wish in social life to shine,
They founded Monasteries, enrich'd each shrine
And wish'd to think them something half-divine!
They join'd the wars, wearing the Cross as brand,
And went as pilgrims to the Holy Land.
I'd have thee pass o'er those obscurer days
To those where Truth shone in full resplendent rays.
I've only nam'd them just to let thee see
In those dark days they own'd a Deity.
No doubt thou'lt ask when a Reformer came,
See the page honor'd with a Wickliffe's name!
Great Alfred's law in Magna Charta stands,
Secures our right from false despotic hands.
My pen would stray, nor has a wish to do
How William conquered and how Rufus fell.
Or how the Edwards' armies could advance,
Or conquering Henry join'd his power to France.
I'd rather speak of Edward—pious youth!
Whose mind was fraught with knowledge and with truth.

When foreign Embassies to England came
He spoke each language by its proper name;
Still better wisdom did his mind inspire,
The Reformation was his great desire;
This to promote his hours he did employ
And his weary nights to his bestefest joy.
The pious mourn'd that in youth's first bloom
He should be summoned to the silent tomb.
Suffolk's good daughter next, in pious youth,
Took for her guide the powerful Word of Truth;
Amidst a court where gayeries abound
Her constant study was the Bible found.
Such pure religion from her heart had sprung
That many lines gained beauty from her tongue;
Taught her to look with fear upon a Crown,
With Christian fortitude to lay it down!
In a dark prison with his gloomy scene,
The good Priest, nor yet a direful Queen
Could change his faith—It he held his latest breath;
She calmly met the messenger of Death!
In hope the spirits of the just to join,
Made perfect by obedience like her own.
The worthy Bishops' sufferings next appear,
Reading his lives, who but must drop a tear!
I've view'd this period with religious awe
Of Him who gave the Word, and gave the Law!
That Word which spake above the Axe's power
And gave true comfort in a dying hour.
They took that law of conscience for their guide
Through burning piles, nor turn'd from their aside;
They found that peace the heart can never give—
That peace alone by which the righteous live.
May these examples so inform thy mind
To leave the world's allurements all behind,
Always to hearken to that inward voice
Which will direct thee to a proper choice.
Constant attention will thy faith increase

And every season bring new scenes of peace.
When Divine Influence overspreads the mind,
To every virtue it is then inclined.
If from unwatchfulness we lose that power,
What will assist us in temptation's hour?
When wrapt in silence, every passion still,
Then is reveal'd the Almighty's holy Will.
Each morn collect thy thoughts to silent prayer
That through this day thou guard with pious care
Thy mind from joining with the giddy throng
In those pursuits thy conscience says are wrong.
Read at night with diligence the Word of God,
If right, thy heart will amplify the Word.
Self-approbation will more comfort give,
Than all the honors that the great receive.
They who refuse not conscience' voice to own
Will never heed they're flattered when alone.
Thrice happy they who can with Justice say:
"Rejoice, my soul, thou hast done well to-day!"
Will not this sentence more true comfort bring
Than thou canst find who sparkle in the ring?
I will not say religion lies in dress,
But watchful minds will vanity suppress;
I know it well, my own experience tells
That placid peace with true obsequious drells.
Throughout the whole, I'd have the Quaker seen
Alike in dress, in manners, and in mien.
The great Apostle to the Gentiles saith:
"Let Christian meekness so adorn your faith,
That pearls nor jewels, nor embroidered hair
With those professing godliness agree."
Let their adorning be, to be
A quiet spirit and humility."
These are the ornaments the Lord will prize;
The wearer will be pleasing in his eyes.
The Scripture better will these lines impart
I beg thou'lt mark them deeply in thy heart.
There's one great duty, and ad union—
Always to visit an afflicted friend;
If thou a pleasing sentiment can find
Let every word be with affection join'd.
The balm of friendship pour into the heart,
And seek in all their griefs to bear a part.
Do not think e'er of sad affliction's door,
But view thouself the houses of the poor,
Inspect their sorrows, see them as thine own,
Thus, true humanity with duty join;
And give thine aims with such a pitying eye
As speaks more comfort than the real supply.

Thou'lt find these lines with no fine coloring dress'd,
In simple guise the truth is best expressed.
Some future period they perhaps may please
And may be found like bread cast on the seas.
My only wish is virtue to promote,
With pure religion that improves each thought.
Oh, may thou join with duty and Truth,
The hope of age—the brightest gem of youth,
That when thine eye shall sink, thy cheek turn pale,
Thy lips no longer move in tender tale,
When all life's springs forever cease to play—
Thy soul may live in realms of Endless Day!

—The British Friend.

KING TOMMY DOWER writes, "I am aboriginal native, but know QUEEN SENDS out five thousand pounds every year. Yet me and my friends want clothes and more food. White fellow come here, build houses and railways on our land and drive away possum, kangaroo, snake and bandicoot, then teach me turn and hacca. White fellow sell em land in Perth and Fremantle and make out of one grant more than Queen gives to all the blackfellows in all the colony. Lots of old blackfellows very cold and hungry want place sleep in. Blackfellow wants travel in train, but can't even get into with white man's dog. Blackfellow help whitefellow to find lots of country and show em whitefellow where he can feed sheep and make lots of money. Sheep eat blackfellow's kangaroo grass then die, if not die whitefellow kills kangaroo and sells em skins. But blackfellow kill em sheep he is locked up, but whitefellow can kill all the blackfellows kangaroo and nothing lock em up. If white fellow let blackfellow have some clothes and food, no kangaroo all gone, and sheep feed em where kangaroo used to and blackfellow too old to walk where whitefellow has driven kangaroo,

COURAGE.

In the life of Dorothea L. Dix, the philanthropist, it is mentioned that a lady once said to her, "Are you not afraid to travel all over the country alone; and have you not encountered dangers and been in perilous situations?"

"I am naturally timid," said she, "and different like all my sex; but in order to carry out my purposes I know that it is necessary to make sacrifices and encounter dangers. It is true I have been, in my travels through the different States, in perilous situations. I will mention one which occurred in the State of Michigan. I had hired a carriage and driver to convey me some distance through an uninhabited part of the country. In starting I discovered that the driver, a young lad, had a pair of pistols with him. Inquiring what he was doing with arms, he said he carried them to protect us, as he had heard that robberies were committed on our road. I said to him, 'Give me the pistols; I will take care of them.' He did so reluctantly. In pursuing our journey through a dismal looking forest, a man rushed into the road, caught the horse by the bridle, and demanded my purse. I said to him, with as much self-possession as I could command, 'Are you not ashamed to rob a woman? I have but little money, and that I want to defray my expenses in visiting prisons and poor-houses, and occasionally in giving to objects of charity. If you have been unfortunate, or in distress and in want of money, I will give you some.' While thus speaking to him I discovered his countenance changing, and he became deadly pale. He exclaimed, 'That voice,' and immediately told me that he had been in Philadelphia penitentiary, and had heard me lecturing to some of the prisoners in an adjoining cell, and that he now recognized my voice. He then desired me to pass on, and expressed deep sorrow at the outrage he had committed. But I drew out my purse and said to him, 'I will give you something to support you until you can get into honest employment.' He declined at first taking anything, until I insisted on his doing so, for fear he might be tempted to rob some one else before he could get into honest employment."

In the life of Samuel Hobart, an engineer on the road between Boston and Worcester, are given some interesting instances of courage and self-possession exhibited by railroad engineers.

A few years ago, Osborne, an engineer on the Morris and Essex Railroad for twenty years at least, was once delayed by snow on the track for several hours; but received explicit orders from the superintendent "to go ahead," for the road was clear, no other train was on the track. After satisfying himself that he had not misunderstood the order, he left the summit on a steep down grade, and in rounding a sharp curve came on a train that was ascending the same grade under full head of steam. In an instant he whistled down the brakes and reversed his engine. The noble thing, under such a tremendous strain, as if fully aware of the danger, obeyed and threw itself back to avert the catastrophe. Meanwhile the other engineer had done the same thing with his locomotive; but it was possible only to modify the shock. Together rushed those two panting and reluctant giants, their joint weight not less than six tons, with the gathered momentum of their following trains. They rose like two furious animals in fight, standing on end, and in a trice the two splendid machines were in ruins. The cars behind them were also badly crushed. Osborne did not leap from his engine; but never moving his hands from the lever which controlled it, he stood as resolute as a rock at his post until the shock came and then quack as though adjusted his valves to allow the steam to escape without explosion. Man can furnish no clearer proof of the finest courage. During the war an incident occurred on the Pennsylvania Central. A regiment of soldiers was on a train, stopped by a freight-train off the track. It was in the night, and most of the thousand men were asleep. Four heavily loaded coal cars belonging to a train ahead had by accident become detached and had begun the descent from the summit toward Johnstown. The engineer heard the roar of the descending cars, and, surmising what was the matter, put on steam to meet the approaching line, if possible, to break its force and save the train. His locomotive was a large freight, and he had moved several rods ahead when the cars struck him like a thunderbolt and crushed his engine back on the train; but his heroic courage had saved many lives. The man's name was Strong, and his grateful beneficiaries presented him some elegant silver-plate, with the deed itself and their names engraved on the pieces. When asked why he did not abandon his train, he replied, "Quick as lightning I thought I had better die than to have those runaway cars cut clean through the train destroying hundreds." It was an heroic answer.

On the Marietta and Cincinnati Railroad formerly were a number of trestle bridges. The funds were low. The men were not paid. A train with the directors on board was going over it. A miscreant determined to throw it off and kill them all. The engineer discovered the obstruction. He seemed to know instinctively that the momentum was too great to save the whole train, and he signaled the brakes down and reversed the engine—to stop, if possible, the cars before reaching the chasm. Then opening the throttle-valve his engine sprang forward so violently as to break the connection with the train, and dashed to the awful leap. The bold man as this was going on ran out of his window on the engine and opened the escape-valve. While standing there the engine went over with him and, marvellous to relate, he, falling under the huge weight, was preserved from being crushed by the engine-bell at his side. The train for the rescue of which he had exhibited such incredible pluck, stopped just soon enough to escape the horrible leap after the engine.

That the roll-call of heroes is constantly filling up was proved on Tenth Month 22, 1882, as a train composed of ten passenger cars containing over six hundred persons passed through Bergen Cut, on the Pennsylvania Central, at the rate of thirty miles an hour. "Fire! Fire!" was shouted by conductor and passengers as a volume of smoke and fire suddenly burst through the open door of the smoking-car next to the tender. Great consternation instantly prevailed among the passengers of the crowded car. Their alarm became a panic when the fireman came clambering over the tender into the car and it was found that the train was dashing wildly on with the engine pouring forth flames which, if not promptly checked, must speedily involve all the cars in destruction. The speed of the train made it hopeless to think of escape by leaping off, and the passengers began to contemplate the possibility of death in one of the most horrible forms which the imagination could possibly conceive.

"Shut the door! Shut the door!" was shouted. The door was closed, but almost immediately it flew open again, and the engineer and fireman emerged from the fire and smoke and stumbled into the car. The train dashed on with no one to govern the engine. Men rushed to the rear platform and there met a frightened crowd from the next car. Others raised windows only to realize at what speed the train was going, and to know that to jump out would be death. "Get to that closet," shouted engineer Joseph A. Seeds to the fireman, pointing to the rear of the car, "and work the air-brakes." But the passage was blocked with passengers and the fireman found it impossible to make headway.

"What is going to be done?" asked one, of the engineer.

Seeds made no reply. There was no time to talk. Action was now the imperative necessity. See him. He is well. He is in the prime of life. In face and form he has a comely appearance. All is forgotten. The lives of six hundred passengers are in his hands. He must dare death that they may have life. He does not hesitate, but plunging into the seething sea of fire he climbs upon the tender and disappears. The flames originated from the "blow-back" on the engine, forcing the flames out of the furnace when the door was opened. Seeds must go through the flames to reach the air-brake and the throttle-valve. He went through. He reached the throttle-valve and with burning hand pulled the "air brake" and reversed the engine. He knew that whatever came to him, the train would stop and its precious load be saved. Nearly a minute passed and then the train came to a stop on the bridge over the Hackensack River, and all knew that the brave man had put on the "air-brake" and reversed the engine. This done, he tried to save himself; ran back to the tender, lifted the lid off the water-tank, and leaped in.

In the meantime the peril was past. The passengers, wild with delight, began to wonder what had befallen the engineer. Rushing forward to the engine they found that the cab was still enveloped in flames, while the head and shoulders of a man appeared above the water-tank on the tender. They sprang to drag him out. They found him weak and half unconscious. His clothes were completely burned from him. His face was disfigured and his hands were shockingly burned. His body was blistered so badly that some of the flesh stripped off in moving him. Tenderly they cared for him. To the Jersey City Hospital they bore him, and there he died four days afterward. No wonder that little children and mothers and friends united in contributing money to create a fund for his family in Philadelphia. Such heroism deserves to be rewarded. J. W.

JOHN HUNT TO HANNAH WARRINGTON.—"Sometimes I have thought some are like a certain king I have heard of, who was determined to have all his men just of his own length, so got an iron bed-stead; and them that were too long, he would chop them off, and them that were too short, he would stretch them to his own length. I fear there are too many yet that are disposed to use the iron bed-stead; I found it was so when we were zealously engaged in what we called the work of the reformation recommended to us from our Yearly Meeting, I could see the disposition of some was—You must come as far as I have come, but you must not go before me."

For "THE FRIEND,"
John Audland.

One day, as John Camm and John Audland were crossing a bridge on their way to a village where a meeting had been appointed, they found themselves surrounded by a rabble, by some of whom they were beaten and kicked, whilst others shouted, "Knock them down, kill them, hang them!"—so that they narrowly escaped with their lives. Charles Marshall was one of those who found in John Audland "a dear friend and father in Christ Jesus," and he afterwards became a very powerful preacher, the deep conflicts through which he had himself passed, the better enabling him to draw out his soul to the hungry, and satisfy the afflicted soul.

William Penn writes that "he was one that waited for the feeling of God's living and heavenly power to carry him forth in his ministerial exercises," by which, we find, many were turned to righteousness, and some induced to more earnestly love the best gifts. George Whitehead—who says that he "truly loved him for love's sake"—remarks, that "his sincere love and regard to Christ's ministers and messengers appeared to be a good and necessary preparation for him to be a witness and partaker of the same ministry." His faith was strong; and, unhindered by the heat of persecution, he visited the various meetings throughout the land, his labors being attended by an abundant blessing. When, in 1670, at the age of thirty-two, God called him to the ministry, and laid this work before him, he said in his soul, "How shall I visit Thy people in these times, when the rod of the wicked is upon their backs? Then this reply seemed to be given him, "Go, I will prosper thy way; and this present exercise, which is over my people, shall be as a morning cloud, and I will be to them as the tender dew through the land of thy nativity."

Although during the next two years he visited every county in England, no hand was laid on him, nor did he know of any one who lost five pounds on account of attending his meetings. When describing subsequent labors, he says that he believed thousands received the word of life; and in some places, which had never before been visited by a Friend, meetings were established. "Oh," he writes, "the tenderness which mine eye has seen in many places through the land: the watering showers that descended on the Lord's plantation is beyond description."

In one of his pamphlets, "The Way of Life Revealed," &c., he writes:—

"The travail in spirit of the messengers and servants of the Most High in ages past, was the same as now it is, viz: To turn people from darkness unto light, and from the power of Satan to the power of the living God; thereby in nowise invalidating Christ Jesus, his manifestation in that bodily appearance, neither his sufferings, death, resurrection, nor ascension; but brings all people guided thereby unto that which will open the eyes of their understanding, whereby they all come unto such a condition and spiritual understanding, as to see and know their benefit by the appearance of the Saviour of the world; for this we testify, all are perfected by that One Offering that are sanctified."

By profession Charles Marshall was a physician; and he was remarkable for his kindness and generosity to the poor, and on his death-bed he urged this duty on others. In the year 1682, he was prosecuted by a clergyman for the non-payment of tithes, in consequence of which he was committed by the Barons of the Exchequer to the Fleet Prison. After he had been confined there for two years, the clergyman's conscience was so much troubled that he came in person to release him. Charles Marshall then settled with his family near London, where, during many years, he diligently worked for his Lord. He died in 1698, at the age of sixty-one.

Another of the converts of John Audland and John Camm during this extraordinary visit to Bristol was a lady named Barbara Blaugdon, who had been seriously inclined from childhood; she became a minister, and suffered much from persecution: once, when coming out from a private house at Bristol, where a meeting had been held, a man in the street stabbed her very severely, though no vital part was reached. After her release from a six weeks' imprisonment at Marlborough, she had some conversation with the gentleman who had committed her, in consequence of which he never again persecuted Friends, but behaved with much kindness to them, even aiding them when able to do so. He once called at Barbara Blaugdon's house at Bristol, and confessed to her that he was convinced of the truth of the views which she held, although he said that he could not himself walk in the way of self-denial.

During a visit to Devon, where she was thrice imprisoned, she called at the residence of the Earl of Bath—where she had formerly often been received as a visitor—with the intention of speaking to his family on the vanity of the pursuits in which she had once joined them. When she inquired for the Countess, a servant, who recognized her, asked her to go to the back door, through which he said his lady would soon go into the garden. But when she reached the back premises a very fierce mastiff was unchained, in order that he might attack her; but before he reached her his ferocity seemed to be altogether subdued, for he suddenly turned and went away whining. Soon the Countess came to her, and after listening to her counsel, thanked her for it.

When Barbara Blaugdon was at Great Torrington she was sent for by the mayor, who was not inclined to treat her with harshness; but a clergyman, who was very anxious that she should be whipped as a vagabond, succeeded in persuading him to send her to Exeter Prison, where she was confined for some time, not being brought to trial when the assizes were held. One day the sheriff came and took her to another apartment, where a beadle, who had accompanied him, whipped her until the blood ran down her back; meanwhile such joy was granted her at being counted worthy to suffer for Christ as to cause her to sing his praise. "Do ye sing? I will make you cry, by-and-by!" exclaimed the beadle, whilst increasing the severity of the strokes; but so graciously and wonderfully was she sustained, that she afterwards said that had she even been whipped to death, in the state she then was, she should not have been terrified or dismayed.

The sheriff, finding how unavailing their cruelty was, at length bade the beadle cease striking her. He had imagined that he had only a woman to deal with in her weakness, but found that she was fighting against God: the following day she was liberated. The Mayor of Bideford before whom she was brought, was much impressed by some serious conversation which she had with him, and was so eager to resume it, that, when she left the town, he followed her on horseback, and rode three or four miles with her; before parting she knelt down and prayed for him. Apparently the influence which she was permitted to exert was blessed to him; once, after leaving the county, she wrote him a letter, which he received not long before his death.

In the winter of the following year, 1655, Barbara Blaugdon crossed to Ireland. The vessel in which she sailed was in great peril from a tremendous storm, which the superstitious sailors attributed to the presence of a Quaker, and conspired to throw her overboard. When she became aware of their design, she successfully appealed to the captain for protection, saying that, if he permitted such a deed, her blood would be required at his hands. The tempest continued, and as the chaplain was too much terrified to hold the usual service, Barbara Blaugdon went on deck, feeling that it was her duty to address the crew and pray for them. They were very grave and quiet, and afterwards remarked that they were "more beholden" to her than to their chaplain.

On landing at Dublin she went to the house of the Viceroy, but was told that it would be useless to seek for an interview with him, as only on the previous day he had banished Edward Burrough and Francis Howgill from the island; but after a while she was shown into a drawing-room, and a gentleman came to her from the Deputy's chamber, before whom those who accompanied him stood uncovered. Notwithstanding this artifice she was convinced that he was not the Deputy but a clergyman; and, when asked by those present why she did not speak to their lord, replied, "When I see your lord, then I shall give my message to him." Ere long the Viceroy made his appearance, and after he had seated himself on a couch she addressed him, bidding him beware lest he should be fighting against God by opposing his cause and persecuting the innocent; at the same time expressing her belief that he was not so much in fault as were those who instigated him to this conduct. He was evidently impressed by her solemn words; and, when she spoke of how the teachers of the people caused them to err, he said to the clergyman, "There's for you, Mr. Harrison!" and afterwards asked him what reply he could make her. "It is all very true and very good," he said, "and I have nothing to say against it if she speaks as she means." Barbara Blaugdon answered that the Spirit of God was true and spoke as it meant, and meant as it spoke; but men of corrupt minds perverted the Scriptures by putting their own construction on them and deceiving those they taught; but the Scriptures were of no private interpretation, being written by holy men of God as they were inspired by the Holy Ghost.

From Dublin she went to Cork, where some of her relatives and acquaintances dwelt; frequent were her imprisonments, though whenever she preached there were some who willingly received her message, whilst many of her former friends trembled at her words of warning. Once, when she was addressing the people in a market-place, a butcher swore he would cleave her head, but whilst lifting his cleaver to do so a woman seized his arms and presently some soldiers came to the rescue. On her next voyage to Ireland the ship founded near Dunraven, and she had a most narrow escape of her life, but was providentially saved by the bravery of the captain and one of the sailors.

In Dublin she suffered much in a filthy prison, having given great offence by a religious exhortation to the judges in a court of justice.

After awhile she was arraigned at the bar, and when requested to plead Guilty or Not Guilty, answered that there was no guilt upon anyone's conscience for what was done in obedience to God. But as this was not considered a satisfactory answer she was sent back to prison. Here she was visited by some of her friends, Sir William King, Colonel Fare, and Lady Brown, who afterwards went to the judge to endeavor to obtain her release; they laughed when he told them, in allusion to Barbara Blandin, that he was afraid of his life—saying they had known her from childhood, and were so strenuous in their efforts for her liberation that they at last secured it.

A Samaritan Poodle.—Col. Wickersham tells a singular story about a favorite dog.

In the fifties I was presented with a young French poodle, which I put in the pocket of my overcoat and carried home. He was a very bright and intelligent animal, and gave many evidences of attachment to my two young daughters. He was named Flora, and when walking with them along the pavement, his watchfulness over them attracted much attention, he would promptly place himself between anything, whether man, boy or animal, that seemed as though they would run against them. He was in all respects a thoroughbred dog, and all became much attached to him.

At this time we lived on Penn street, a few doors above Pitt Street (now Fifth Street.) Dr. Addison, a great lover of animals, lived on the same street about the same distance below Pitt Street on the opposite side. It was Flora's habit to lie in the morning on my doorstep, and the doctor stood a good deal on his doorstep, when not otherwise engaged. One morning in passing down Penn Street the Doctor hailed me "Mr. W.," I must tell something wonderful of your little dog: For some days past I have noticed him get up from your steps where he had been laying, and trot down to Pitt Street, and up Pitt Street towards the Market House, after a while returning down to Pitt Street, with a piece of meat and a bone in his mouth and in order of going to the step and eating his food, crossing Penn Street and continuing down Pitt Street. This occurring several days in succession, my curiosity was excited and the next day when the same occurred as the little dog crossed the street, I walked to the corner and watched him.

The old brewer stood on the upper side of Pitt Street, occupying about half the distance between Duquesne Way and Penn Street. Along the wall on the pavement were a number of empty hogsheds lying on their sides their ends toward the building. The little dog stopped at one of the openings between the hogsheds and entered carrying his bone, at once reappearing and laying down just inside the opening. Other dogs came there and Flora sometimes had to fight them to hold his position. After a time he would leave and return to his rug on the steps.

At last Dr. Addison investigated the enclosure and found a disabled dog, who had been kept from starving by my dog. Was Flora guided by instinct or reason?—Alleghenian.

A Large Seal.—A 700-pound seal was captured alive off Fort Point the other day, and was purchased by the Spring Valley Water Company and placed in their Lake Merced reservoir. The company already have 13 seals that are useful in destroying the carp that abound there in such numbers as frequently to fill the outlet pipe. The big seal will be a great help in reducing the number of fish in the reservoir.—San Francisco Call.

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 6, 1892.

The report of the Indian Commissioner for the year ending Seventh Month 1st, 1891, is an octavo pamphlet of 210 pages. Its perusal impresses the reader with a sense of the heavy responsibilities devolving upon this officer of the Government, and with the very numerous branches into which his duties ramify.

It is pleasant to notice the humane feeling manifested in the following paragraph of the Report: "It should be borne in mind, that this peculiar people are our brethren, made of the same blood, and as such have claims upon us. This vast country which is now the scene and the support of our greatness once belonged to them. Step by step they have been driven back from the hills and beautiful valleys of New England, the fertile fields of Ohio, the prairies of the West, until to-day, for the most part, they are gathered together on reservations poorly suited for agricultural purposes, and where the conditions of life are the hardest. The buffalo and the deer, which only a few years ago were found in countless thousands and afforded them food, raiment, barter and occupation, are about gone; and they are in many cases, driven by stress of circumstances, over which they have no control, to desperate straits for food. As a people they are poor and weak, and well nigh helpless. The vast and resistless tide of European emigration and the overflow of our aggressive population have despoiled them of their hunting grounds, robbed them of their richest fields, restricted them in their freedom, destroyed thousands of them in battle, and inflicted upon them great suffering.

"A large part of this, of course, has been the inevitable consequence of the conflict of a higher, stronger civilization with a lower and weaker one. In this day of our greatness and prosperity we can afford to treat them with the greatest kindness. We cannot afford to be cruel. For their own sake, and for ours as well, and for the sake of the history we are making as a Christian nation, we should treat them not only justly and humanely, but with as much generosity as is consistent with their highest welfare."

On the important subject of the allotment of lands in severalty, the Commissioner states that the proposal is being received with increasing favor by the Indians. Since the last report, 2104 patents have been issued; 2830 other allotments have been approved, and the issuance of patents directed; and a large number of allotments have been reported to the office, which had not been acted on.

Among the difficulties in the way of carrying out this scheme is the fact, that among the Indians as among the whites, are many wealthy, powerful men who object to the land which they have been accustomed to control being equally divided with their poorer neighbors. In many instances the lands "are sandy plains absolutely sterile and unfit for cultivation without extensive and costly irrigation. So that to give an Indian 80 acres of land and ask him to make it a home and gain from it a subsistence, when he has no farming implements, no horses or cattle, no knowledge of farming, no ability to bring the wild land under cultivation, seems but a mockery."

"Another very serious matter to consider in this connection is that when they have received their land in severalty they become thereby citizens of the United States, and have thrust upon them the obligations of citizenship, for which they are often absolutely unprepared. They are brought under the operation of laws which they do not understand; are taken largely from the care and guardianship of the General Government, upon which they have been accustomed to lean for protection; and are subjected to the fierce competition of border civilization, for which they have little or no preparation." The conclusion at which the Commissioner arrives is, that severalty and citizenship should come to them gradually, as they are prepared for the change.

During the previous fiscal year, upwards of 8,000,000 acres had been purchased from different tribes, reducing their reservations by that amount. While the Commissioner looks forward to the ultimate abolition of tribal reservations and the absorption of the Indians into the great mass of citizens, he thinks it would be disastrous to them to endeavor to effect this suddenly and violently.

Considerable space in the Report is occupied with the subject of education, which the Commissioner regards as of prime importance. The annual appropriation for this purpose has been pretty steadily increasing for a number of years, and for 1892, was $2,291,650.

There are 12 industrial training schools supported by the Government and located off the reservations; of which that at Carlisle is the largest—the gross enrollment of which is 2,788 pupils.

There are 67 Government boarding-schools, with a capacity for 5,290 students, located on the different reservations.

There are 91 Government day-schools, with accommodations for 3,295 scholars, the number of these the Commissioner thinks ought to be considerably increased.

In addition to the schools directly under the charge of the Government, 8600,000 is being expended by it the present year in the support of schools controlled by others, mainly different religious denominations—of this sum the Catholics receive $387,000, much more than half of the whole amount, showing that they have been more energetic than others in establishing schools among the Indians. While appreciating the good that may be done through these missionary efforts, the Commissioner thinks that it is not consistent with the letter and the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, to use public funds in the support of sectarian institutions.

One of the tables contained in the Report gives the whole number of Indians as 243,534 of whom 57,966 receive subsistence supplies from the Government.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement shows that the interest and non-interest bearing debt decreased $1,395,652.50 during the First Month, 1892. Total cash in the Treasury, $775,700,871.74.

The United States Supreme Court, on the 1st inst., upheld the constitutionality of the recent anti-labor law, affirming the decision in the case of the publishers of the New Orleans States and Mobile Register, indicted on the charge of sending through the mails newspapers containing both advertisements and Secretary Blaine's cable message, accepting Chile's propositions for settlement of the differences between the two Governments, contains these words: "The President notes with gratification the expressions of regret for and condemnation of the assault upon the sailors of the Bahimore, offered by Mr. Pereira, and congratulates the Chilean Government upon the frank and ample withdrawal of their fleet, and upon the terms they have offered towards Minister Eggen."

In the House of Representatives, on the 1st inst., Representative Arnold presented for reference a resolution requesting the President to recall the Minister of the United States to Chile, Patrick Eggen, to the end that reciprocity of trade relations between the two countries may be had and maintained.

The Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee, by formal action, has adopted the Springer policy and decided to attack the McKinley tariff by various separate bills. Upon this policy the Democratic members of the committee decided to act as a unit.

A dispatch from the City of Mexico says that "it is not denied that Garza has begged for pardon from President Diaz, offering to betray his followers." It is stated that Garza will be there shortly with the intention of arranging the matter. Several of Garza's lieutenants are petitioning for pardon.

The State Department has been informed by the United States diplomatic representative at Peking of the practical suppression of the rebellion in Mongolia. He says the troops of the Imperial Chinese Government have routed the insurgents in various encounters, and are forming a solid line, with reason to rejoice in the success of the Emperor's army.

A dispatch from Boise City, Idaho, says that ex-United States Senator McConnell has started a movement for a re-survey of the boundary between Idaho and Washington, believing that the present line is about 100 miles in error. If this contention should prove correct, Spokane would be in Idaho, and a population of 75,000 would be added to the latter State.

A meeting of 2,000 railroad men, representing every State and Territory of the United States and all branches of railway work, met in New York City last night. One object of the meeting is to effect consolidation of the various orders at no distant day, and to bring about closer and more friendly relations among the members. A resolution was unanimously adopted favoring the equipment of all freight trains with automatic couplers and air brakes.

Arrests for drunkenness and disorderly conduct since the enactment of High License have increased as follows: 1888, 22,638; 1889, 20,997; 1890, 24,663; 1891, 24,785.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 325, which is an increase of 19 over the previous week, and 91 more than during the corresponding period last year. FOREIGN.—London, and indeed almost all Europe, is suffering from the influenza. In London the death rate has risen to forty-six. Deaths from influenza are twice as many as last week, not counting those of which this malady is the indirect cause. Altogether there were 3,701 deaths in London, which is 1,762 above the average. In other parts of England things are worse, though in some places they are all but exempt, and in some great cities the death rate is less than usual. Pending the appointment of the royal commission on influenza the British Medical Journal has been collecting information which has more than local interest. The medical officers of health throughout England, who are Government officers, were asked to say whether their opinion influenza is infectious, and whether it can be brought within the provisions of the various acts of Parliament compelling notification to the public authorities, isolation, &c. With regard to the first of these points, of forty-three medical officers who express an opinion all but three are of opinion that influenza is infectious and is conveyed directly from person to person. Several believe that it can be transmitted by clothes, &c. The majority of these experts also hold that personal communication alone is insufficient to explain the rapidity and wide extent of its diffusion, and believe the poison may be carried to a considerable distance by the wind. They are of opinion that infectiousness varies according to the individual, weakly persons, and especially those whose lungs are delicate, being particularly liable to it. The disease is most infectious in the early stage. On the Continent the malady still manifests itself, though in Italy its virulence has considerably abated.

With regard to the second point, the present statistics proved more disastrous than the last cholera epidemic.

All the hospitals of Paris are so crowded with patients, as a result of the epidemic of influenza, that there is no room for new sufferers, and the municipal authorities have been compelled to have Government troops to take up the vacant barracks as temporary hospitals for the large number of afflicted persons seeking relief. The week's mortality has been increased by 100 daily.

Of Prince George of Wales the New York Times says: "It has been successively noted Prince George of Wales had many fine times in one order 'to make the successful bride.' No one knew yet who will be the favored bride, but we are assured to day that 'the universal expression of approbation of the Duke of Clarence's selection of a bride who was English by birth and training has not been lost on the Queen and Prince of Wales, and that as anything well can be that Prince George will in this respect emulate his deceased brother's example.'"

The eminent minister Charles H. Spurgeon died at Mentone, England, on the night of the First Month 31st.

Dr. Alfred Carpenter, the well-known English physician, died in London on the 27th ult. He was the author of many medical works. Among his literary productions are a number of works and monographs bearing on drainage and sanitary questions, a paper on "Fogs and London Smoke," and an interesting treatise on "Alcoholic Drinks as Diet, as Medicines and as Poisons."

An Edinburgh dispatch says the floods caused by the general thaw which has followed the great snowstorm of First Month 11th, liberating the immense masses of snow which then fell, are increasing with disastrous results. The Grampian Hills are pouring down the snow torrents, and the waters are overflowing the low-lying regions of Perthshire. Water is standing knee deep in the streets of Perth. The embankment of the Highland Railway has been carried away, and traffic on the road and railway in the North is stopped.

The New York Tribune's special correspondent in London gives the following account of the troubles of the young Emperor in the past week over the new Educational bill which he has attempted, so far in vain, to force through. The correspondent says: "The German Emperor, not content with being Emperor, now wishes to be a legislator, and he has been the meaning of the new Education bill which the Lower House of the Prussian Landtag has been so fiercely debating all this week. The object of this measure is to put the Prussian schools in the hands of the clergy, to make what is called religious instruction obligatory, to exact a measure of conformity from all students. In Count von Caprivi's words, it is a bill against atheism. The Chancellor and his Imperial master seem both to believe that matters of faith are to be settled by statute, and that the people of Prussia are prepared to put their consciences and their relations with God in the keeping of his King."

Dr. Virchow spoke, denouncing the attempt to set up a political religion in Prussia. The bill leads straight, he declared, to the domination of an organized priesthood. Count von Caprivi's reply was an admission, and more than an admission, of the truth of these criticisms. He justified the bill on the express ground that the question was whether Prussians are to be Christians or atheists. This bill is to forbid them to be atheists, to compel them to be Christians, according to their King's conception of Christianity.

In a letter to the Russian Government Count Leo Tolstoy declares that the bill on the distribution of land is inadequate in method to meet the needs of the situation. He says that there are three types of peasants. The first of these is relatively well-to-do, having twelve acres of land and probably four horses, and those next in possessions land and two horses. Over the second class, which is the vast majority, the sword of famine is continually suspended, and they must be helped to keep them from sinking to the level of the third and lowest class, who are actually starving, and for whom lack of assistance means death. The government is, however, only helping the lowest class, assuming apparently that no aid should be given to those who have a remnant of property left. Count Tolstoy thinks this policy wrong, and that the second class, on the verge of absolute want, should be prevented from falling over the brink.

ELIZABETH HUDDLESTON was born in North Carolina, Second Month 18th, 1803; removed to Union County, Indiana, in her fourteenth year, was married to David Huddleston in the year 1827, removed with her husband and settled in Dublin, Wayne County, Ind. In 1868, where they continued to live until the death of her husband, which occurred in the year 1890. She died at the home of her son-in-law, Aquila H. Binford, near Thornton, Ind., Twelfth Month 16th, 1891, aged eighty-four years, lacking two months and two days. The deceased was a life-long member of the Society of Friends, a full and active member of the Indiana Society of Friends, and carried them out as best she could in her every day life. She was a useful member of society, of an unassuming disposition, said but little of her religious experience, but they that remember best, saw in her the true Christian. She often said in her last sickness, that her trust was strong in the dear Lord, and that she had none other to look to, but that her peace was made, and she was willing and anxious to die and be at rest, but willing to wait the Lord's time.

DIED, at her home, near Springdale, Iowa, the 29th of Twelfth Month, 1891, after an illness of about five days, of erysipelas, ANNA E. MATHER, daughter of John and Asenath H. Mather, aged twenty-two years. She was a full and active member of the Indiana Society of Friends. Having been an exemplary at-tender of the Conservative Body of Friends at West Branch, Iowa, for years, she adorned their doctrine by her amiable and upright life. She will be greatly missed by her relatives and friends.

DIED, at her late residence in this city, on the 7th of First Month, 1892, of erysipelas, daughter of the late James and Hannah Logan Smith, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

MARRIED.—Twelfth Month 17th, 1891, at London Britain Meeting, Cwelfth County PA., JOHN PILLING, JR., of Newark, Del., to HANNAH THOMPSON, daughter of Joel and S. Cornelia Thompson.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

1852.—Sixth Month 9th. "The meeting of the general committee having the oversight of Westown School, was very satisfactory; a concern being revived, that this Seminary may continue to be conducted on the original ground, the religious, guarded education and control of the children. It appears to be in a satisfactory state; and Friends were much united in the same religious exercise; which comforted many present, who have long had its welfare at heart; desiring that the simplicity and propriety which become our profession, may be steadily maintained. I hoped it was a little token for good."

"30th. This morning a concern came over me, to go to the Western Meeting. I felt calm and peaceful in sitting down among them. The sweetness and preciousness of the Truth came over me, to speak of, and to testify that the only way to grow in grace, and in the saving knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, was by obedience to the manifestations of his Spirit in the heart. The subject of the inward work, the danger of turning back after being enlightened, and having made some sacrifices, and the certainty of being made victorions, through steadfastly following Christ, and the precious reward and Divine support and consolation which the obedient ones are blessed with, were opened."

"Ninth Month 1st. Our meeting to-day was refreshing to me, under the belief that the Lord's tender mercies are round about us; and that He is secretly sustaining his children by his omnipotent arm. Many parts of the meeting were concurring to my spirit, and I thought it equired of me to encourage Friends to faithfulness, and to keep their trust in the Lord's unailing goodness, and also to keep near to one another in spirit.

"2d. Though I had an humbling view of myself, and fears of being mistaken in what I apprehended to be my duty, yet this morning, went to the Arch Street Meeting, and sometime after Samuel Bettle, Sr., had delivered a hort testimony, I felt engaged to speak to the tates of those who had been often favored with the visitations of Divine love, showing them their condition, and what the Lord required them to do or to leave undone; but who, from negligence and disobedience, were sensible at times that they were not what they ought to be, and that the work of salvation was not going on in them. They were warned that the day of account was drawing on, and urged to examine what ground they have for hoping for acceptance, should they be called to appear before the judgment-seat of Christ in this condition. They profess to believe in Him, and hope for the forgiveness, and pardon of their sins, through his precious blood; but it is those who live and walk in the light, as He is in the light, that experience his blood to cleanse them from all sin. Men may live what the world esteems moral lives, and yet be gratifying their own will and carnal propensities; having their household idols, and their heart's beloveds, which they worship; but it is as their will is nailed to the cross, and the life they have in things which the Lord's controversy is with, is slain, and they baptized into death, that they can know Him, who is the resurrection and the life, to quicken their souls, and make them alive unto God. Those who were neither cold nor hot, were warned of their danger; for He declared to a church formerly, that He would spew such out of his mouth. It is by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, that we can be prepared for communion with the Father of lights and spirits; and to those who give up all, and seek Him daily, He condescends to manifest himself; humbling their hearts before Him, and enabling them, as with their mouths in the dust, to put up their petitions to Him; which He will hear and answer from heaven, his high and holy dwelling place. The doctrine of Christian purity and perfection, as delivered to Abraham, and enjoined by our Lord upon his disciples, was held up. It seemed as if the Lord gave fresh access to his treasury, opened by Him, and qualified to warn and to persuade all, to mind the day of their visitation; that they may be prepared in the end, for an admission into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, among saints and angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect; whose employment it is, to ascribe unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb, glory and honor, thanksgiving, might, majesty, dominion, and praise, to whom alone it belongs. I returned to my dwelling with feelings of quiet peacefulness."

"9th. At Germantown Meeting, I was unexpectedly drawn, to show the distinction between the religion of mere education, and the religion of regeneration. The first is that of opinion and habit; the other of conviction and submission to the heart-renewing power of Divine grace. We may lose the latter through unwatchfulness; as being once in grace, is no surety for being always in grace. However valuable a sound education, by the example and precepts of religious parents and friends, may be, and for which we are responsible, yet if the work of regeneration is not experienced, we shall be mere formalists; and it will be evident that the life of religion is wanting. There seemed to be a warning for some, who may be correct in the eye of their fellows, and yet are in an indolent state; regardless of that exercise of mind and daily prayer for heavenly food, by which the immortal soul is nourished, and enabled to do the Divine will, and to bear fruit to the praise of the great Husbandman, and to the benefit of the church. I thought there was evidence that the Lord's power was present, to arouse and quicken some to greater diligence in their day's work."

"We cannot be too sensible of the blessings we partake of, as members of a religious Society, professing the principles of the Gospel of Christ; and which feels bound to extend a re-training influence over old and young, to guard them against the seductive power of temptation, as it is presented in the world at large, and in the private associations of men and women, who reject all religious control. How grateful and consistent in our conduct, ought we to be, for the salutary provisions and influences we have around us; associated as we are, or may be, with solid Christian friends, whose sentiments and deportment are like salt, to preserve, or as the dew upon the tender grass, to nourish and feed the good in us. In relation to forming connections for life, it is of great importance to have part in such a Society, where purity of principle and practice is inculcated. There is great safety in dwelling, like the Shunamite woman, among our own people; and if it be our lot to enter into a married life, to make choice of one, whose training has been within our own pale, or who has been brought in by conviction, under the regenerating power of Divine grace. In such training, the minds of the members receive a similar bias and stamp. Thus they need not break up nor forego the sentiments of their education on religious points, in order to conform to each other. A union in this respect has already existed; and when bound together in the most tender and endearing ties of human life, the way will be open to be constant help-needs in their heavenly pilgrimage, as well as to aid and cheer one another, in the difficulties that pertain to their temporal duties.

"What a sad loss is sustained by those young people, who despise their birthright, and part with it, as Esau, for a mess of pottage. If they are not favored with repentance in time, so effectual as to return, they will wander from the path of safety, and confusion and embarrassment in some way will follow. I believe that forsaking a Society, where there are many means for spiritual help and preservation, and where the true nature of vital religion has been clearly unfolded, will be attended by serious disadvantages; and that very generally such are swallowed up by the world and its corrupting spirit."

"Twelfth Month. I have mourned over the weaknesses observable in many, who seem to be almost insensibly drawn aside by the influence of rich men, the love of grandeur, and the pride and self-consequence which wealth gives. There is a powerful temptation to fall in with the stream of fashionable life, and to coincide with the opinions of rich, nominal Quakers; to mingle with them, and to give children an education conformable to the standard which they erect; however different from the course that true, consistent Friends, believe the Holy Spirit leads into. This makes an unfavorable distinction between the children of those who despise the cross, and the children of conscientious members, who feel bound to regard its restrictions. But I have seen and felt, that it is far better to keep to the requisitions of Grace in all things; bearing the cross faithfully, and disregarding the shame which the world attaches to a life of self-denial, both for our own everlasting good, and for the sake of our children."

"As wealth is acquired, large showy houses are sometimes provided, to suit the standing of the rich man, with sumptuous, fashionable furniture to correspond." "The children of such persons become exalted above the simplicity of the cross, and are in danger of looking with a degree of contempt, on their young friends, whose parents have not the means, or are not easy, to go into a fashionable, luxurious mode of living. They are in danger of growing up with, or imbibing an enmity to the testimonies and discipline of our Society, and of becoming lost to it. Our strength is thereby wasted, and we fail to exert that influence in the world, for which we were designed. Instead of carrying on the work of reformation, by lives of purity and self-denial, many are in great danger of going back into the customs of the world, out of which Friends were originally gathered."

"20th. As we walked to meeting this afternoon, observing the plain dresses of Friends, who mingled with others, I recalled that more than two hundred years have elapsed since George Fox commenced his ministry; opening to the people the spiritual nature of the Gospel dispensation; what it requires, and what a change it effects in those who yield to the renovating power of the Holy Spirit; cleansing the heart and regulating their whole deportment. Here is still a people, distinguished by their doctrines, their simple garb, their scriptural language, and their unshowy manners; all which is an evidence of the continued care, power and goodness of the Lord towards us; and which ought to unite us in gratitude, increasing fervor, and faithfulness to our God. In proportion to the greatness of the testimonies committed to us, and the clear discovery of the doctrines and precepts of the Gospel, is our responsibility; and did we keep steadfastly to our Divine Guide, in living up to his heavenly nature and dictates, we should be like an army with banners; that would be enabled to shake the kingdom of anti-christ, and turn the people effectually to Christ, in his spiritual appearance in their hearts; that they might know Him to be their hope of glory."

The first step to a life of righteousness, is to acquaint ourselves with that in our own hearts that reproves us for unrighteousness; for until we come to this, we are strangers to the foundation of a right conversation: for all building, all journeying, all rising, all approaching near to the kingdom of God, depends on our denying, turning from, and utterly forsaking what the light of righteousness in our own hearts doth convict us of, and reprove us for; for by such denials the deeds of the body come to be mortified.

EDITOR NEWS.—Thomas Chalkey, of whom our beloved Whittier wrote in "Snow Bound:"

"Of Chalkey's Journal, old and quaint,— Gentlest of skippers, rare sea saint!—
Who, when the dreary calms prevailed
And water-buff and bread-cask failed,
And cruel, hungry eyes pursued
His portly presence, mad for food,
With dark hints muttered under breath
Of casting lots for life and death,
Offered, if heaven withheld supplies,
To be himself the sacrifice.
Then suddenly, as if to scare
The good man from his living grave,
As ripples on the waters grew,
A school of porpoise flashed in view.
Take, eat, he said, and be content!
These fishes in my stead are sent
By Him who gave the tangled ram
To save the child of Abraham."

In his early life Thomas Chalkey was somewhat given to card playing. His recovery from that idle pastime is thus related in his interesting Journal, a copy of which may be found in the West Chester Public Library:

"Unknown to my parents I had procured a pack of cards, with intent to make use of them when I went to visit my relatives in the country, where was liberty in the family to do so at a place called Woodford, about seven miles from London. On my way I went to meeting at Winstead, where a minister of Christ declared against the evil of gaming, and particularly of cards. * * * From this meeting I went to the house of my relations, where the parson of the next parish lodged that night, who used to play cards with them sometimes. The time drawing near that we were to go to our games my uncle called to him, my cousin and myself to come take a game at cards, at which I had strong convictions upon me not to do it, as being evil, and I secretly cried to the Lord to keep me faithful to Him; and lifting up my eyes I saw a Bible lie in the window, at which I was glad. I took it and sat down and read to myself, greatly rejoicing that I was preserved out of the snare. My uncle called again and said, 'Come, doctor, you and I, my wife and daughter will have a game at cards, for I see my cousin is better disposed.' Then he looked upon me and said, 'He was better disposed also.' So their sport for that time was spoiled and mine in that practice forever. As soon as I came home I offered my new and untouched pack of cards to the fire. I am certain the use of them is of evil consequence and draws away the mind from heaven and heavenly things."

The attention and obedience of Thomas Chalkey to the voice of Divine truth in this instance was rewarded by further and greater manifestations of the Divine will, becoming afterward an eminent instrument directed and supported by "best wisdom" to spread the truths of the Christian religion in many parts of the world, he being a sea captain and a valued minister of the Gospel in the Society of Friends.

A striking instance of the convicting and converting power of the Holy Spirit, as well as of the goodness and mercy of the Blessed Redeemer in following the heedless and rebellious sons of men even into the haunts of wickedness, is manifested in the following narrative, taken from a sketch of the life of Phebe Cary: A gentleman in China intrusted with packages for a young man from his friends in the United States learned that he would probably be found in a certain gambling house. He went thither, but not seeing the young man, waited, in the hope that he might come in. The place was a bedlam of noises, men getting angry over their cards and frequently coming to blows. Near him sat two men, one young and the other forty years of age. They were betting and drinking in a terrible way, the older one giving utterance continually to the foulest profanity. Two games had been finished, the young man losing each time. The third game, with fresh bottles of brandy, had just begun, and the young man sat lazily back in his chair, whilst the oldest shuffled the cards. The man was a long time dealing the cards, and the young man, looking carelessly about the room, began to hum a tune. He went on, till at length he began to sing that sweet hymn of Phebe Cary's, commencing,

"One sweetly solemn thought," etc.

The words, says the writer of the story, repeated in such a vile place, at first made me shudder. While the young man sang the elder stopped dealing the cards, stared at the singer a moment, and, throwing the cards on the floor, exclaimed, "Harry, where did you learn that tune?" "What tune?" "Why, that one you have been singing." The young man said he did not know what he had been singing, when the elder repeated the words with tears in his eyes, and the young man said he had learned them in a Sunday school in America. "Come," said the elder, getting up; "come, Harry; here's all the money I won from you; go and take it for some good purpose. As for me, as God sees me, I have played my last game and drank my last bottle. I have misled you, Harry, and I am sorry; give me your hand, my boy, and say that for old America's sake, if for no other, that you will quit this infernal business." The gentleman who tells this story (originally published in the Boston Daily News) saw these two men leave the gambling house together and walk away arm in arm and he remarks: "It must be a source of great joy to Miss Cary to know that her lines, which have comforted so many hearts, have been the means of awakening in the breasts of two erring men on the other side of the globe a resolution to lead better lives." The poem alluded to is the following:

"One sweetly solemn thought

Comes to me o'er and o'er;

I'm nearer home to-day

Than I have ever been before.

Nearer my Father's house,

Where the many mansions be;

Nearer the great White Throne,

Nearer the Jasper Sea;

Nearer the bound of life,

Where we lay our burdens down;

Nearer leaving the Cross,

Nearer gaining the Crown.

But lying darkly between,

Winding down through the night,

Is the dim and unknown stream

That leads me at last to the light.

Closer, closer my steps

Come to the dark abyss;

Closer death to my lips

Presses the awful chrisin.

Saviour, perfect my trust,

Strengthen the might of my faith;

Let me feel as I would when I stand

On the rock of the shore of death;

Feel as I would, when my feet

Are slipping over the brink;

For it may be I'm nearer home—

Nearer home than I think!"

It is a sad conclusion to arrive at, but the fact has arisen that gambling is practised to a considerable extent in this beautiful town of ours, also to express the mournful but firm conviction that if persisted in and unrepented of by those who practice it it will eventually lead down to the chambers of eternal death and misery. Is it not a time just now to think of these important matters? The desire is fervently felt that "when the Lord's judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants will learn righteousness!"

WEST CHESTER, First Month 12, 1829.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Baltimore Yearly Meeting.

In 1816 Baltimore Yearly Meeting mentions the resumption of aid to those Indian tribes that had formerly been under their care.

Successing epistles show that the interests of the Indian and African races continued to claim the care and labors of Baltimore Friends, and that they appealed on their behalf to the general and (as to the Africans) to the State governments.

In 1821, their epistle speaks of deficiencies among them which were a source of deep exercise, and mentions among others "an evident departure in many instances from that simplicity of dress, deportment and language which so eminently distinguished our worthy predecessors."

That a concern on account of this evidence of degeneracy continued to be felt, is shown by its epistle of 1823, which deplors "the departure of many from our ancient simplicity in plainness of speech, deportment and apparel."

We suppose that at that time and long subsequently, the more active and influential members of Baltimore Yearly Meeting adhered to that "ancient simplicity," into which our early Friends were led by the Spirit of Christ in their day, and which thousands since then have felt to be a Divine requiring to them also, being convinced that it was their duty thus to manifest that they were members of a religious Society, which practically believed in the declaration of our Saviour, "I am not of this world," and who required his disciples to take up the cross and follow Him.

The Epistle of 1824 expresses a desire for the continuance of unity: "May we, dear Friends, however sectionally circumstanced, ever be one people, realizing that apostolic description of the Ephesian Church, 'Ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints and of the household of God, and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone.'"

We do not know that there was any special circumstance which had awakened this concern, yet it may have been prompted by the unsettlement which had begun to pervade the Society of Friends in America, growing out of the doctrines preached by Elias Hicks, and which a few years later (in 1828) caused a separation in Baltimore Yearly Meeting. An epistle addressed to its members, after this separation had taken place, says: "The minds of many Friends within this Yearly Meeting have been under much suffering and concern for several years past, in consequence of the promulgation of sentiments in our religious meetings, and also in social conversation, the evident tendency of which is to invalidate some of the fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion; to under-value the truths recorded in the Holy Scriptures; and to destroy a belief in the Eternal divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; his mediation and intercession for us as our advocate with the Father; and in that most precious sacrifice He made of himself on the cross, without the gates of Jerusalem, whereby He became the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world."

The number of members of Baltimore Yearly Meeting at the time of this separation has been estimated as from four to five thousand. Of these it is supposed that four-fifths joined the party which supported Elias Hicks, and that not more than one thousand remained in unity with those Yearly Meetings which rejected him and his doctrines. Considering how greatly mankind are influenced by their surroundings, and by the course pursued by those to whom they have been accustomed to look for guidance and counsel, it would not be charitable to assume that all of the thousands who were lost to our Society at the time of this separation, had imbibed the views into which Elias Hicks and some of his followers had reasoned themselves; and which by their course they practically endorsed.

As the control of the Yearly Meeting's proceedings was in the hands of this party, they proceeded to identify themselves with the adherents of Elias Hicks elsewhere; and those Friends who felt that they could not submit to such affiliation, withdrew from that Meeting-house and convened in the McKendreau School-house, the use of which had been obtained for this purpose.

The epistle already referred to, says: "We have felt ourselves constrained, for the due support of our Christian Discipline, and the precious doctrines of our holy religion, as well as to maintain our brotherly connection with the ancient Society of Friends, to meet select from those who have departed from our regular order, and to hold Baltimore Yearly Meeting agreeably to its original institution, as a part of the great body of Friends." This Epistle was signed by Hugh Balderston and Elizabeth Gillingham, as clerks.

During a recent visit to Baltimore, an elderly Friend described to me the solemn procession of Friends going to the new place of meeting. He was then a boy of but nine years of age, and seeing his mother in the company, he went to her to learn the meaning of the movement. He went into the house with her and sat the meeting, which he described as a most solemn and tendering season.

Among the old papers which refer to Baltimore Yearly Meeting, is a memorial of Deer Creek Monthly Meeting, Maryland, concerning James Rigbie, which contains an instructive instance of the need of those who have been favored with gifts from the Head of the Church, being preserved in humility and watchfulness. From this account it appears that his father was a wealthy planter and slave-holder, belonging to the Episcopal Society. Almost as soon as he was of age, James was appointed High Sheriff. Soon after, about the year 1742, he was reached by the ministry of Edmund Peckover, of England, then on a religious visit to America; was convinced of the necessity of taking up the cross; experienced an advancement in the inward work of religion; and joined Deer Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends. He was useful in promoting the Discipline of the Society, especially its testimony against holding slaves. In 1749 he was recommended as a minister. But after a time, says the testimony, "for want of more humble watchfulness, the Enemy of souls was suffered to prevail over the weakness of his nature, and to lead him out of that meek state of mind wherein stability and a growth in the pure, unchangeable truth is witnessed, which was to his own great loss, and to the great grief and exercise of many friends, for a number of years."

Towards the close of life he was favored with a renewed visitation of Divine Grace, and was thereby restored to love and unity with his brethren. About nineteen months before his decease, he gave forth a testimony for the relief of his own mind, setting forth as a warning to others the manner of his being misled, and his thankfulness for his restoration.

During his decline he manifested much meekness, sweetness and composure of mind; and signified that he did not find anything remaining to hinder his entering into everlasting rest. He died in 1790, in the seventieth year of his age.

The testimony referred to is as follows:

"Whereas, through the goodness and favor of the Almighty Father and Preserver of men, which has been extended to me renewedly under bodily infirmity in the decline of my life, whereby I have been instructed and assisted to adore his merciful compassion and great loving kindness towards weak and fallible creatures, favoring me with fresh light to see the bewildered state which is brought on through a want of attention to our Holy Guide, and furnishing even the disobedient with ability freely to submit to the operation of his Holy Power, which subjects the will of the creature, purgeth out the dross of nature, and perfects the work of sanctification. Feeling myself, at this time and for some time past, as a brand plucked out of the fire; in a degree of deep thankfulness to the Lord for his adorable mercy, am I constrained to give this, for the information of my beloved friends wherever it may come to be read or heard; acknowledging that in time past, for want of humbly watching in the gift received against the weakness of my natural part, I was led to give way too much to the subtle whispers of the enemy, and thereby to prefer my own judgment in some respects, which gradually brought me into a light esteem and disregard of the seasonable advice and solid admonition of my friends, contrary to that meekness or humble, teachable disposition, wherein our true safety as self-denying followers of holy Jesus consists; and whereby the unity of the one ever blessed Spirit in the bond of peace is maintained; by which means my understanding became darkened, and my mind led away from the path of innocent simplicity; having sometimes given way to expressions out of the right line; and, in some parts of my conduct towards others, deviating from that brotherly love and patience which becomes the followers of Christ; to my own very great loss in the best things, and causing a long, painful burthen of sorrow and distress to others, who were constrained from time to time to seek my restoration to that state of unity with the living members, which through renewed mercy I am again favored to see and feel is a most endearing, precious bond; and therefore do heartily condemn my deviations; desiring and humbly hoping it may be as a warning to others to keep in a lowly, watchful state, to prefer plain, honest dealing to all flattery or unskillful pity, and to keep a heart and ear open to the wholesome counsel of their fellow-members on all occasions.

"Thankful for the restoration I have witnessed, and in tender love and affection to my beloved friends, whosoever my name or case has been known, do I freely give and sign this; with fervent desires that grace, mercy, peace and unity may increase through faithful obedience to the Divine principle of life and truth in all, and be witnessed to diffuse, like the holy dew, throughout every branch of the Church.

FOR "THE FRIEND."
GOING TO THE GOLDEN CITY.

[The following incident is vouchsafed for as strictly true.]

Lame and old, lame and old
She lived alone in a mud-built cot,
Walls and windows let in the cold,
Desolate, desolate seemed her lot.

Food in winter was hard to win,
Fuel to warm her harder still,
She had buried her last of kith and kin,
She was poor and lonely and old and ill.

Never a fire in her tiny grate,
Had shone to-day with its feeble spark,
The sun was setting in pomp and state,
Setting, to leave her alone and dark.

Whence the light in her aged eye?
Whence the smile on her furrowed brow?
'Tis a beam from the Saviour's throne on high!
A seal of his presence with her now!

Surely for some the golden gates
Are opened awhile, ere they enter in;
And they taste the glory which yet awaits
The spirit ransomed from death and sin.

The setting sun of God's holy day
Had seen her kneeling beside her cot,
The Sabbath service so far away
Though loved as ever, she could not reach.

But she knelt on the rough, uneven floor,
And bent her cheek on the broken bed,
And want and weakness were felt no more,
For tears of joy were the tears she shed.

"Oh Father in Heaven, Thy love has been Ever around me in weal or woe;
I thank Thee for all that mine eyes have seen
Of all Thy faithfulness here below.

"I thank the Great Shepherd that followed me
And brought me home to his happy fold,
And kept me there, when wilfully
I else had left it, times untold.

"And day after day, Thy Spirit's grace
Has led me on my upward way,
And now I soon shall behold Thy face
In the happy home of Thy saints above.

"Father in Heaven! be with me still.
Jesus my Saviour! Oh quickly come,
Wash me from every stain of ill,
And bear me speedily, safely home."

She raised her head, and the western sun
Gleamed in bright glory on her brow,
Seldom surely, since time began
Sank he, in such a gorgeous glow.

Yon saffron sea with fair isles of light,
Rich purple mountains of cloud enfold;
While crimson canopies softly bright
Rest o'er it, broiled with changeful gold.

The glow has faded, the vision ends,
And sleep and darkness are on the earth;
Sleep, which a sweet oblivion, lends
Alike, to the children of grief and mirth.

The widow slept, and while her eyes
Were closed in slumber, a dream she dreamed
Filling her soul with sweet surprise,
So strange and yet so true it seemed.

When morning dawns, and the widow awakes,
'H could only have been a dream!" she cried.
"How swift a journey the spirit it takes,
I tho't at first I had surely died!"

Her scanty store for a scanty meal
She carried into a neighbors' near;
"I should like the warmth of your fire to feel
And to eat my morsel in comfort here."

"Ay, ay, come in, there is always room
And put thy chair in the old man's nook,
And let me show you of your fire the gloom,
Out of thy favorite holy Book.

"Thou hast a scanty breakfast!"
"It is enough," she quickly cried,
"The promise fails not from day to day,
I know that my Father will still provide.

"And if it so be He should want me home,
It is a token that's easily read;
Whenever He comes to bid me come
And not before; He will stop the bread."

"You're happy, Nancy?" "Ay, ay, she cried,
"And so would you be, if you were me;
There's never a sinner for whom Christ died,
Whose life on earth should unhappy be.

"And yesternight I was dreaming too
A happy dream, you would like to hear,
A dream I know which is mostly true,
I wish the end might be true and near.

"I tho't I stood by a river's side,
And far away on the other shore,
Was the Golden City, the gate of flung wide,
But there was no one to take me o'er.

"I saw the shining ones in the street,
I heard their harp strings, music pour;
I saw them waiting my soul to greet;
But there was no one to take me o'er.

"I tho't I saw where the Saviour's throne
Shone in midst of that City fair,
Oh! how I longed to be up and gone!
And suddenly, suddenly, I was there!"

She ceased, and after a pause, they said,
"And what did you see in that City fair?"
No answer—the spirit to Heaven had fled;
Suddenly, suddenly, she was there.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Josiah Cole was about twenty-one when the powerful ministry of John Audland and John Cannm proved an effectual message to his soul. "I saw," he says, "that my heart was polluted, and that there was no habitation for God, which caused me to mourn in desolation, and to wander in solitary places, until I was ready to faint; and I said in my heart, Never man's sorrow was like my sorrow. . . . If 'Thou O God,' was now his cry, "will help me thoroughly, then will I teach transgressors Thy ways, and sinners shall be converted unto Thee." This was no vain vow; it became his "life and joy" to declare the Gospel, and with lips touched as with a live coal, he labored valiantly for his Lord, at home and abroad; on one occasion travelling with two other Friends from Virginia to New England through vast wildernesses and dense forests which had been thought impenetrable to all but the Indians, who treated the white strangers most kindly, although they had previously been greatly exasperated by Europeans. Yet their lives were often endangered by the proximity of beasts of prey and serpents, the marshes which intercepted their path, and the effects of hunger and cold.

Amongst some of the aboriginal tribes of Massachusetts, especially, Josiah Cole discovered true yearnings after God. "Through the goodness of the Lord," he writes, "we found these Indians more sober and Christian-like towards us than the Christians so-called." After his release from Sandwich gaol, the youthful minister labored amongst the Algonquins, whose King said to him, "The Englishmen do not love the Quakers, but the Quakers are honest men, and do no harm; and this is no Englishman's sea or land, and Quakers shall come here and welcome."

Two or three years later, when imprisoned in London, he writes: "Though great suffering and afflictions attended, as yet my heart, praised be the Lord, is not troubled, neither has fear seized me, because I see the intent of the Lord in it. . . . For the sake of the residue of the seed which is yet ungathered is my life freely sacrificed into the hand of the Lord. . . . So let your prayer unto God be for me that I may be kept unto the end, and finish my course with joy, and in all things bring glory and honor to the name of the Lord." He died at the age of thirty-five, cheerfully laying down his life, we are told, "With perfect understanding, and in an extraordinary enjoyment of the Lord's life, majesty and presence." Amongst the many hundreds who attended his funeral was Sewel the historian, who, young as he then was, greatly loved and revered Josiah Cole, and highly appreciated his kindness; always availing himself of opportunities to attend meetings where it was said that he would be present. In 1656, two years after they had held the memorable succession of meetings at Bristol, John Audland revisited that city. They were devoted friends, and had in the meantime often travelled together, whilst much blessing rested on their labors for their Lord.* Thomas Cannm, in consequence of the delicacy of his father's health, often accompanied him. The strain on the voice and chest of the latter in large meetings, especially when held out of doors, seemed greater than his consumptive constitution could withstand, and he did not long survive his second visit to Bristol. As his strength slowly ebbed away he told his friends that his "inward man revived and mounted upward towards its habitation in the heavens."

On the day of his death, after addressing his family, he seemed to be in a sweet sleep, from which they thought he would never awake. But, hearing their loud lamentations, he said, "Dear hearts, ye have wronged me, for I was at sweet rest; ye should not so passionately sorrow for my departure; this house of earth and clay must go to its place; and this soul and spirit is to be gathered up to the Lord to live with Him forever, where we shall meet with everlasting joy." Then, once more taking leave, he lay down and soon expired. His birthplace was Camsgill, Westmoreland, the ancestral seat of his family. From childhood he had been earnestly inclined, and, like John Audland, had eagerly received the truths taught by George Fox, when he visited their native county in 1652. At that time, we learn from his son, "the world seemed to smile upon him, and the riches and glory of it had exceeding increased and were then likely to increase more." But he willingly counted all things loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord.

He was a powerful minister, and was one of the Friends who visited London in 1654, and first preached and published the doctrines of our Society there.

John Audland, who was about twenty-six years younger than himself, keenly felt his death, though he found comfort in the companionship of Thomas Cannm, who was often his associate in Gospel service. John Andland died at the age of thirty-four, his life being doubtless shortened by the hardships and persecution which he had endured; for, in addition to close imprisonments, we find allusions to "great perils, sore beatings, and cruel mockings"—both of the rabble and also of the bitter-spirited professors." He was very patient during his illness, and often said, "Ah! those great meetings in the orchard at Bristol, I may not forget! I would so gladly have spread my net over all, and have gathered all, that I forgot myself, never considering the weakness of my body. But it's well. My reward is with me, and I am content to give up and be with the Lord; for that my soul values above all things."

Notwithstanding his weakness, marvellous power was granted him to make the friends who visited him, in some measure, sharers of his joy and overwhelming sense of the love of God, with whose praise his heart was filled. As his strength failed he asked to be raised up in order to kneel, and then fervently besought the Lord that his whole heritage might be preserved in the Truth, out of the evil of the world. Though tenderly sympathizing with his beloved wife he said to her, "My will is in true subjection to the will of the Lord, whether life or death; and therefore give me up freely to his disposing."

In reference to her loss she writes: "The Eternal God revealed his Son Christ in us, and gave us faith to believe in Him, the eternal Word of life, by which our souls came to be quickened and made alive. . . . Our hearts were knit together in the unspeakable love of Truth, which was our life, joy and delight, and made our days together exceeding comfortable. . . . The dour of my heart, my tongue or pen is not able to declare; yet in this I contented myself that it was the will of the Lord." Anne Andland afterwards became the wife of Thomas Cadman, and for forty years, "in the utmost harmony and nearness of affection," they mutually served their Lord and suffered for his sake. Once he was imprisoned at Apley for six years, and again at Kendal for three. But trials seemed only to fan the flame of devotion in the heart of his wife, who was greatly gifted as a minister; she spent much time alone in fervent prayer, and in reading the Scriptures and religious books. Humble and retiring herself, she was always ready to encourage the weakest of the flock. During a very severe illness she spoke of how she had enjoyed unspeakable peace here, as well as the full assurance of everlasting joy.

In the autumn of 1705, when in her seventieth year, in a farewell sermon at a Monthly Meeting at Kendal, she implored her friends to be diligent in the service of God. The following day she was attacked by the illness which terminated her chequered life. After begging her husband to freely give her up, she added, "I have loved thee with my soul and God has blessed us, and will bless thee and be with thee, and make up all thy losses. . . . I am full of assurance of eternal salvation and a crown of glory, through my dear Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

She spoke of how much she had desired to send a farewell epistle to Friends at Bristol and Banbury, to "tenderly advise professors of Truth to keep under the power of the Cross of Christ, by which they will be more and more crucified to the world, and baptized into Christ, and put Him on, the new and heavenly man, in whom they will become new creatures and be enabled to serve God in spirit." As she grew worse, her husband suggested sending for one or two of her relatives, but she answered, "Be not careful in the matter; the Lord my God is near me and I have thy company, and it is enough. . . . The Lord gave us to each other; let us bless his name, if He now take us from each other in the outward, that is all, for our joining in spirit remains forever."

Some of her last words were, "My hope is only in Thee, my dear Lord." When, more than fifty years earlier, George Fox was enabled to sow the good seed of faith at Firbank Chapel, he probably little foresaw the marvellous results which would, directly, or indirectly, arise therefrom.

Though the rough blasts of persecution were permitted in that age to be the means of causing Quakerism to take deeper root, can there be any need that it should droop and wither in the sunshine of this? However true it may be that

"New to the world at every hour,
New runners find new races, yet are the conditions of discipleship the same as ever they were—an outward cross to be clung to, and an inward cross to be borne, for the sake of that Saviour who can inspire the heart with "a love so deep as to make obedience a delight." From one source, and one alone, must vitality ever spring, and Jesus Christ is the same, yesterday, to-day, and forever.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 243.

When at the house of our friend John S. Comfort, in Bucks County, Pa., in the First Month of 1855, the late Mableton Moon revived the account, related many years previously by Hinchman Haines, of the origin of one of the meetings in Cornwall Quarter, N. Y.

A Friend named Edward Hallock and his wife had removed from the limits of Nine Partners Quarterly Meeting, and settled across the Hudson River, in a neighborhood where there was no meeting of their religious Society. To meet this difficulty so far as they could, they adopted the practice of meeting by themselves at stated times in their own house, for the performance of Divine worship.

One day, whilst they were thus sitting in silence, waiting on the Lord, a neighbor came in; and observing their solemn demeanor, and seeing a cradle in the room in which their child was lying, he thought the infant must have died, and that they were mourning over its loss. He sat down with them, and when the meeting was over he was surprised to find that nothing unusual had happened in the family. Being informed that it was their custom thus to worship the Almighty, he felt drawn to come and sit with them. Others afterwards joined the little company; and thus grew up the first meeting of Friends that was settled in those parts.

Among those convinced of the principles held by Friends, was David Sands. He also began to sit down for worship in his own house; and another meeting grew up around him.

The following interesting incident was furnished by an aged Friend, and is given in the narrator's own words:

One day as I was waiting for a train at Tremont Station in Massachusetts, an old man came up to me and said, "I perceive by your appearance that you belong to the Society of Friends. And so I feel drawn to speak with you. For I love the Friends, and I want to tell you the reason why I have cause to love them. I was at a Methodist Conference. The presiding Elder said there were two meetings that Sunday that were not supplied with ministers, and he wished me to be at one of them. I was at the morning meeting. A woman who was a member of your Society requested the opportunity to be at the meeting in the afternoon. As that day had been assigned to me for public service, I felt glad to give her the opportunity to use it as she might prefer. When the congregation had assembled, she was found sitting there before us in devout silence, which continued for some time. Then she arose and took off her bonnet, turned round and laid it upon the seat, and as she turned back the tears were seen falling down her face. And there she continued standing, speechless and weeping with the company. In that silence there were more tears shed than I ever saw in any public company before; while a spirit of solemnity, tenderness and contrition seemed rolling over us more and more deeply for half an hour; till at length her mouth was opened with the words, "Surely God is in this place; and there are many here that know it!" As she continued with her message in that Gospel power, a baptism of tears seemed to possess the company. It was the most powerful preaching I ever heard. A deep concern for eternal life was received at that meeting by many. I was put in charge of that meeting for the year. I must say, it was the beginning of the greatest religious awakening and conversions in that place that I ever knew. So you see I have good reason to love the Friends, and I never see one of your people without being reminded of that woman's ministry."

The same Friend also related an instance, in which a minister on First-day morning before going to his usual place of worship was brought under a deep exercise, and a feeling raised in his heart that God in some way might be glorified, even if it was through him. After a little time of silence before a large company and full house, he knelt under the power of God, and so remained for one hour without uttering a single word, but it was a contriting season throughout the assembly, and when he arose from his knees there was scarce a dry eye to be seen in that company.

J. J. Spraggon, in the London Friend, relates some incidents which show the appreciation in which truly religious people hold the hush of solemn silence which sometimes overspreads an assembly of worshippers, when the presence of the Head of the Church himself is sensibly felt. He says:

I attended a meeting in St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, where the eminent Methodist minister, Hugh Price Hughes, was giving an address on "Conscience." I was told 2,600 people were present. After speaking with much power on hypocrisy, and the thousand ways in which men excuse or delude themselves in regard to the sins they love, a deep hush of solemnity seemed to overshadow the meeting; we were in the very presence of God. The speaker after a short pause, said, "Oh, I do wish we could adopt in all our meetings one of the practices of the Society of Friends, and have a time of silent meditation, so that God's voice might be heard without distraction, and his truth sink into and saturate our heart and mind."

In closing, he said, "The constant sound of human voices, telling of pleasures or troubles, politics or so-called religious work, tends to down the sound of the still small voice of God."

Dr. Parker, of the City Temple, recently said, "I believe in the quietism of the poet Wordsworth in relation to nature, and of George Fox in relation to the enlightenment and guidance of the Holy Spirit. It is possible for the noblest discourse to be given in silence. God can do without us, and I want to encourage the habit of occasional silence in his house. We are living in such a busy, fussy age, that what do you think we say if a few minutes of quietness occur in a meeting? We say, 'Oh, this is a Quakers' meeting.' Poor foolish souls that we are, cannot we keep silence ever so short a time. A service, so called, that rattles along is said to be lively, and people say there is spirit in it. Yes, there is, but what kind of spirit? When I cross the Atlantic, which I have done ten times, I always seek the very front point of the ship, that I may sit there alone for six hours at a stretch. Men come to me wonderingly, and say, 'What do you see here?' I reply, 'Nothing—but God!' That answer always shortens the interview. Such men see all they want in a few moments; others cannot, they know the Divine Presence, the very air is alive with God, and all the white waves, as they come in kissing the ship, bring messages from far away shores."

A deeply-instructed writer says: "God wants a listening people. We say, 'Oh, I pray, and seldom get any answer.' God says to us, 'When I spake ye did not hear.' Some of us have poured out our souls, perhaps by the hour together, and when we have had our say, we have not waited five minutes, perhaps not five seconds, to hear his gracious words. We have knocked, and when He has opened we were no longer there."

"Of the benefit of religious retirement and communing with God, the Evangelical Churchman thus speaks:

"A dear old mother, telling of the busy life she had to lead in her younger days, when she was bringing up her children, said: 'I had plenty of work in the valley, but I always found time to go up to the Mount of Vision and talk with God. A few moments in my own room by myself, asking Him for help and strength to aid me in my daily home work, was an inspiration for me. If I were impatient with the little ones, inclined to be what so many of us call 'nervous,' ready to say quick words or give unjust judgment, a few moments on the mount would restore me to my better self. Many a time I have taken the baby in my arms when I went, for there are so many days in a mother's life when she cannot lay her work down, even for a few moments. So much happiness and equity is needed in the household every day and every hour, and so many look to the mother for wisdom, guidance and example, that she needs to go up to the Mount of Vision, and see with 'eyes of light' the beauties of the Master's character, and try to get full of his spirit, for her work is so much like his in so many ways.'"

J. W.

To Them That Are Spiritual.

"They that are after the Spirit, do mind the things of the Spirit." According to our growth in the truth, and proportion of faith, our consciences become more and more exercised to distinguish between that which is of man, and that which is of God; between the things that belong to the nature and sphere of a man and the things of the Spirit of God, the heavenly things of the gospel sanctuary and of the Divine service. We become less and less inclined to labor after external results and visible effects, knowing that the first essential to all good service, is to be of one mind and spirit with the Lord, and to do nothing of our own will and impulse without Him. The subjection therefore of the earthly nature and carnal mind of man to its proper condition and sphere, under the heavenly order and kingdom of Christ within us, is one of the first to attend to, of all the good works of the Christian faith. Except this is experienced and done, we cannot be saved, in the full sense of that precious word. We cannot come forth out of the great tribulation, to put on those robes of white through the blood of the Lamb, for higher and holier things. But submitting to this, we shall be enabled, through his grace, to stand in the power and counsel of God, as living witnesses for Christ. We shall be preserved in his patience and kept from intruding, by the eager attempts of the will of the flesh, into things not yet seen, and which the Lord's all-manifesting light has not yet shown us. We shall find enough to engage us, with true profit and peace in the things already made known; not stretching beyond them until we are led thereto, by Him, whom we have known from the beginning. So let us walk in the Spirit and labor in the Spirit as the diligent and trusted servants of Christ; so that, whether for the time being, we abound, or are in want; whether present or absent; we may be accepted of Him; may not be ashamed before Him at his coming, but may open unto Him immediately.

Let us also remember, for our admonition and godly care, the saying that is written, yes, the saying that was spoken by the Lord, himself: "That which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God." Many precious babes of the Kingdom are of one mind with Him in this particular; as they begin to exercise their spiritual eyesight, and to see things as they are. Oh! what an amount of men-pleasing, time-serving, and of looking for the support of the wealthy, the prominent or the great, hangs about them and works unto the policy of the "good causes" in philanthropy, charity, temperance, peace, &c.; and in some of the missionary exertions and enterprises of our day. Our blessed Master never practised such methods, nor instituted them among his genuine disciples. Neither did the founders of our beloved Society betake themselves to popularizing methods of gaining support to that worthy cause, for which they gave so much of their personal liberty and lives. What would they have thought of the prevailing modern customs in the churches, of relying on the charms of music and of ecclesiastical art? Of raising money, and of interesting the young by means of concerts, bazaars, and fancy fairs? The Society that we belong to, could never have been formed or established by any such means. No more could the Methodist Society, in the Eighteenth century. And surely, if we practice and adopt them, we must sell our birthright for it, and become more assimilated to that world, out of which we have been called by our Lord and Saviour, to be witnesses for Him.

As in the days when He made this solemn declaration, so now; the Pharisaic mind goes largely after popularity, and loves to work in ways that are noticed and seen. "Ye are they," said He, "that justify yourselves before men; but God knoweth your hearts." It is most evident, therefore, that their way is a very unsound principle, and ground of Christian action, either in private life, or in public service. "First cleanse the inside of the cup, and of the platter," is elementary wisdom; and as necessary as it is wise. I verily believe it is the good purpose and design of our heavenly Redeemer, who gave himself an offering for our sins, to cleanse and purge us thoroughly, both as individuals and as churches, in the inward parts. Then the outward and the inward of our whole experience will harmoniously agree. May we more and more, therefore, as He sees that we can bear them, and as He calls us to them, submit to these most needful and blessed operations of his power upon, and Spirit within us. That Sabbath of the Christian is a Sabbath indeed, both in its dawn and its fullness; when man is enabled to cease from his own works, as the Lord did from his. All then becomes perfected; and the Seed that was long under suffering, arises to reign over all! D. P.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Temperate Drinking vs. Total Abstinence.

[The Editor has received within a short time an unusual number of communications on this subject—so many indeed that it would not be best to publish them all. The one which follows was sent by a valued friend, and we think it clearly indicates the propriety of the advice which Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has given to its members, to abstain from all drinks that can intoxicate.

The use of alcoholic drinks has an insidious tendency to gradually alter the constitution, so as to make their continued and increasing use almost a necessity. Therefore, it is in harmony with the petition—"Lead us not into temptation," that we should not expose ourselves to this danger.

Independently of this, we are under strong obligations not to lead our weaker brethren into danger by our example. The Apostle Paul exhorted the Corinthians not to let their liberty become a stumbling-block to them that are weak. Surely, we ought to be so under the influence of the love of God, as to be willing to deny ourselves many things, if thereby we can promote the welfare of others.

Therefore without sitting in judgment on any, so far as our influence goes, we would encourage all our readers to abstain from all that can intoxicate.—Ed.]

The following practical observations on the use of Alcoholic Drinks are extracted from the Autobiography of John G. Paton, a man born in humble life, and for several years engaged as a City Missionary in Glasgow, Scotland.

"From observation, at an early age I became convinced that mere Temperance Societies were a failure, and that Total Abstinence, by the grace of God, was the only sure preventive as well as remedy. What was temperance in one man was drunkenness in another; and all the drunkards came, not from those who practised total abstinence, but from those who practised or tried to practise temperance. I had seen temperance men drinking wine in the presence of others who drank to excess, and never could see how they felt clear of blame; and I had known ministers and others, once strong temperance advocates, fall through their 'moderation' and become drunkards. Therefore it has all my life appeared to me beyond dispute, in reference to intoxicants of every kind, that the only rational temperance is total abstinence from them as beverages, and the use of them only as drugs, and then only with extreme caution, as they are deceptive and deleterious poisons of the most debasing and demoralizing kind. I found also, that when I tried to reclaim a drunkard, or caution any one as to intemperate habits, one of the first questions was—

'Are you a pledged Abstainer yourself?'

By being enabled to reply decidedly, 'Yes, I am,' the mouth of the objector was closed; and that gave me a hundred-fold more influence with him than if I had had to confess that I was only 'temperate.' For the good of others, and for the increase of their personal influence as the servants of Christ, I would plead with every minister and missionary, every office-bearer and Sabbath-school teacher, every one who wishes to work for the Lord Jesus in the family, the Church, and the world, to be a Total Abstainer from all intoxicating drinks."

Natural History, Science, etc.

The Influence Which Plants Have Exercised on Human Life and History.—The sixth lecture of the Michaux course was delivered in the Academy of Natural Sciences by Professor Rothrock, of the University. Speaking of plants as influencing human history, the lecturer said that the production of cotton was supposed by the South to demand the perpetration of slavery, and that "King Cotton" had become important enough to support a new throne. The civilized world, however strongly it sympathized with the rebellion, was not willing to become tributary to a power based on slavery. It was this, more than anything else, which alienated the nations of the Old World from the South.

Our war, based on slavery, gave occasion to England and France to attempt to place an European Prince on the Mexican throne. We remember the result. The close of the rebellion ended all hope of a monarchy on American soil. While the war lasted it stimulated the production of iron and coal to such an extent that serious financial disasters followed when these articles were no longer so largely required.

Furthermore, the war started an era of speculation, and it led to such a thirst for official position and power as has demoralized our whole political system.

The cotton war created questions in international law which had never arisen before.

Or, as a further example of plant relation to history, take the so-called opium war, in which the English Government forced that drug upon the Chinese at the very hour in which the British Government was striving, might and main, to banish opium from its borders.

Wheat is our guarantee of peace—as long as the Old World depends upon the New for its breadstuff. When such a dependency exists it must be more than a mere whim which would lead Europe into a war with us. No mere pretext would suffice for a sundering of the relations between nations one of whom sells and the other of whom buys the cereal grains.

A microscopic fungus which produces the "potato rot" was the cause of such a famine in Ireland as led to the loss, by death and by migration, of one-fourth of the population of that country. It shook the whole political system of England. It started an overwhelming advent to our own shores.

And the assimilation of that vast body of newcomers by our country led to many strange phases in our national politics.

Among the most important inducements led ing to the circumnavigation of the globe by Vasco were the spices of India.

When Brigham Young halted in Utah to raise a crop for his followers of the next season, California was confirmed to the United States. That stop of a few months changed the whole destiny of the Pacific coast, and, probably more than any one thing, limited the spread of Mormonism.

Nature's Make of "Beeswax."—At the mouth of Nehalem River, on the coast of Oregon, a very queer substance is found. It has the appearance of a mineral at first sight, but on close inspection and under practical tests it appears to be pure beeswax. It has all the useful properties of beeswax, and it is sold in Astoria at the regular market price of the bees' work. It is washed ashore at high tide in quantities ranging from a lump the size of a walnut to a chunk weighing 150 pounds. It is also found on shore in black soil where trees are growing, at considerable elevations above the water. A piece of this strange substance has just been submitted to expert examination in New York, and is declared to be what is known as mineral wax. This substance has for years been known to exist in the lignite beds of the Northwest. The quantities found on the coast of Oregon would seem to indicate the existence of a tertiary lignite bed in the neighborhood. It belongs to the hydro-carbon series allied to the retinites and ambers—fossil remains of resinous trees of the tertiary age.—Detroit Free Press.

Agricultural Fairs.—Bucks County, Pa., has not been able to make its Agricultural Fair pay. The Board of Directors have decided to recommend the sale of the property, and the president of the association is convinced "that a strictly moral fair without beer and gambling will not pay in that county."

We do not at this time say;—but should we say, that agricultural fairs as generally conducted do more moral damage in a week than the ordinary saloons and pool-rooms of the place where they are held do in a month, we wonder how many close observers would think the assertion extravagant.

Is it not time for Christian farmers to unite to prevent liquor-selling and all racing that is directly calculated to stimulate gambling, and failing in that to withdraw from all connection with the institution?

Formal Worship of no Avail.—The outward forms of reverence may be most diligently observed in the almost total absence of the reality. I well remember a striking illustration of this in my own experience. One beautiful First-day morning I happened to be at Zrnat, under the shadow of the mighty Matterhorn. Passing a Roman Catholic chapel at the hour of service, I went into the vestibule and mingled with the worshippers. My handsome Tyrolense guide, in the picturesque dress of his native district. At the elevation of the host, not satisfied with imitating the reverence of his fellow-worshippers, he positively prostrated himself on the stone floor. Throughout the whole of that service his attention and his apparent reverence were conspicuous and greatly impressed me. When the service was over, I happened to walk out of the church immediately behind him. To my horror, he had scarcely crossed the threshold of the sanctuary in which he had been apparently so reverent, before he began to swear in the most blasphemous manner, and to use grossly obscene language. There could be no more overwhelming evidence of the fact that all the forms of outside reverence may be most scrupulously observed, and at the same time be absolutely meaningless. But this does not in the least imply that we ought to neglect them altogether, or be indifferent to them.—The Independent.

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 13, 1892.

Under the heading—"The Elapse of the West," the British Friend of First Month publishes a communication, which extracts from the Christian Worker the following account of the last Yearly Meeting of Indiana.

At nine o'clock a Testimony Meeting was held. John Henry Douglas read from the Book of Deuteronomy, and dwelt upon the land of Canaan as the type of the Christian's experience, in that rest of soul, which is his heritage through the fulness of faith in Christ, at the close of the atonement-salvation. He then called for witnesses on the line of present believing and entering into that rest; many scores of short pointed testimonies followed in rapid succession until the hour for the preaching service (viz 10 o'clock. At this hour the portable partition was closed, and Timothy Nicholson, stepping upon the pulpit platform in the west room, requested those crowding the centre aisle to pass to the side, and Eli Rees led the vast congregation in singing "Jesus, Lover of my Soul," after which Nathan T. Frame offered prayer. Then — of Birmingham, England, was accorded the courtesy of being announced by John Henry Douglas as the "speaker of the morning;" but when Bro. Douglas, at the close of the English Friend's sermon of some forty minutes, arose and proceeded in a masterly sermon of fifty minutes in length, it was generally felt that he himself was the speaker of the hour. When — took his seat, John Henry Douglas arose and made a few complimentary remarks upon the nature and compass of —'s discourse, and proceeded. (Two columns of description follow.)

Eli Rees very fittingly and with pleasing effect supplemented this sermon by singing "We are Building;" and the benediction was evoked by Francis W. Thomas.

At the afternoon Meeting "Lizzie Larkins sang solo," several other solos are mentioned and various Friends "opened" Meetings for worship with a few introductory remarks, or talked for several minutes on a text. At 7:30 the "sermon of the evening" was again preached by John Henry Douglas.

After expressing his hesitation at disapproving a religious movement so earnest, the writer proceeds:

We have here a religious movement of the type set by the Wesleys. Surely no one in England will have the hardihood to assert that there is any Quakerism worth the name left here. Except for the fact that the clergy and episcopate are not yet fully crystallized into a rigid and shapely system, and that Baptism and the Supper are still matters of controversy, we recognize at once an ordinary Evangelical Methodist connection, based on the doctrines of Geneva held in their strict crudeness. When one Friend announces another as the speaker of the evening, it is with an instinct that something else has taken the place of faith in that Guidance in worship which has hitherto been cherished by Friends; and the language of compliment from one minister to another is of all things most fatal to the tender breath of the inspiring Spirit, to the hearing of the voice which can only be heard in the silence of the instrument. This intrusion of our own personality in the thought of our own performance in our service is a snare against which the poor preacher has ever to guard. It must indeed be hard to keep out the professional spirit when receiving the professional fee.

In Indiana we find from the Y. M. Minutes that over one-third of their Meetings are "under pastoral care;" and that about 21,900 sterling has been spent on pastors and evangelists in the various Quarterly Meetings. The Y. M. Committee on the ministers report having employed fifty-six evangelists at a cost of about £580; which they remark, only leaves a small sum for each; they therefore remind Friends that when evangelists come into their locality only a small part of their support has been provided by the Committee. The plan seems to be to hold a series of Meetings lasting two or three weeks, of which 156 series are reported for the year; and then give the evangelist a few guineas for his services, to be supplemented by collections in the lecture. The pastors are resident, and distinct from the above system. The ministry in each Quarterly Meeting is managed by a "Q. M. Superintendent," with position strikingly analogous to that of the Bishop at an early stage of Church History. The stiffening of the ecclesiastical organization of the early Church is here repeating itself before our eyes.

Is this a release of the Western Friends into the old type of religious organization which George Fox came out of, what concern have we? They are the best judges of their own needs and tastes, and any clog on the wheel which could be provided by London Yearly Meeting would greatly irk, but would not really regenerate. We may therefore safely consider the problem as it affects ourselves only.

How closely we were affected and our liberties impeded by the creed which emanated from this same Richmond in 1887, we shall not soon cease to remember. Such aggressive movements may recur.

Whilst we are connected by the tie of a formal correspondence with these bodies of Christians we shall continue to receive ministerial visits from them, and it is needless to suppose that the preacher who has learnt his methods in the Meetings of the Western States of America, has probably his closest affinities there; even though he may, whilst travelling or residing in England, carry out the Pauline precept of 'being all things to all men, until the time be ripe for more advanced methods.'

English Friends do well to take our weather forecasts from America. Developments there in business and many other things, are on the same lines as they are here, but the forces of resistance are less than they are in the established order of the old country; so things move more quickly, and by a continual process of what we call Americanizing our institutions, we are apt unconsciously to follow them. We find ourselves on a risky or doubtful path, how these our eyes and ears see what they have come to in America. Are we moving at all in the direction of a professional ministry?

Having seen the system operating on a large scale at their Yearly Meeting, I will conclude by giving a specimen of its every day working. The following is an extract from a private letter, not originally intended for publication, written to her father by a young English Friend who has recently married in the State of Indiana:

"A — and I went to a Meeting one Thursday night about a month ago, but I was dreadfully disappointed, for it was more like a ranting experience Meeting of Salvationists than Friends. It was a sort of prayer meeting in which every one was supposed to pray and give their experiences, and whoever prayed in one or two other places, was called continually. 'The Lord bless us,' 'May the Lord-ord bless us,' 'Lord prolonged to such a length that it was quite painful to me' and 'Praise his name,' and 'Oh grant it!' and all such things as those, that it was quite impossible to enjoy or even hear the prayers. We sang hymns, and there was a harmonium in the room. Every one was very very cordial and so welcome, asked our names and wanted us to come again to 'the Lord-ord bless us,' but I was so disappointed, that we have not been again. They have announcements in the papers, such as 'The Pastor of the Friends' Church, the Rev. So and So.' I never heard of Friends having a pastor or being called reverend. Did you?"

Thy Friend,
M."

We are aware of the tendency that exists to feed upon the faults of others, and to let our censure of their shortcomings take the place of that humiliating repentance for our own misdeeds which is profitable to frail, erring mortals; and we do not desire to dwell too frequently or too long on such evidences of departure from our principles as are afforded by the account above given. Yet some knowledge of what is transpiring elsewhere may be useful in putting us on our guard against the introduction of similar departures amongst us ourselves; and it is an encouragement to sincere advocates of our principles to find that some Friends in Great Britain are awake to the tendencies of the times.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Secretary Blaine has written a letter to the Chairman of the National Republican Committee, in which he announces that he is not a candidate for the Presidency, and that his name will not go before the Republican National Convention for the nomination.

The Territorial Convention of Utah, held at Salt Lake City last week, adopted a memorial to Congress against the passage of Teller's Statehood bill or Fulkner's quasi Statehood bill, setting forth that the Territory is settled by people who know nothing of American politics, and have never learned to appreciate democratic institutions; refers to the progress made under the latter party, but says it is not yet sufficient to justify turning over complete control to those who have so long been hostile and are yet imperfectly weaned from their old ways. It also calls attention to reasonable doubts of the sincerity of the Mormons in their present professions of party division and abstention of polygamy.

A statement was issued to the people of Louisiana on the 2d inst., by John A. Morris, on behalf of himself and his associates, withdrawing the proposition of the Louisiana Lottery for an extension of its charter. J. A. Morris stated that even though the pending constitutional amendment were adopted by the people of the State, it was his purpose to resign his associates "to respect the law and abstain from violating it in any way." It said in conclusion: "Convinced that the granting of another lottery charter in the State would be the cause of continued agitation and discontent on the part of a number of citizens of Louisiana, and that the State, for which a charter might be granted, would be unwilling to accept such a charter even though it was given to us without the payment of one dollar of license tax."

A caucus of the Republican members of the Iowa House has decided to "stand by Prohibition." The Political Grand Jury sent some of the Republican members have left the Republican party and voted with the Prohibition party, if the contrary course had been pursued, thereby giving the State to the Democrats. Hence their action.

A dispatch from Bangor, Maine, says it is reported that the Grand Jury will, in session has indicated every one of the two hundred and over liquor sellers in the city.

It is said that more than 5,000 new books were published in this country last year.

A wild Albino swan was captured recently in Dougherty County, Georgia.

A special dispatch from Topeka, received in Chicago, contains reports that the winter wheat crop of Kansas had been damaged by unfavorable weather. Copious rains have virtually insured a magnificent wheat crop. "There will be a little over 5,000,000 acres in winter and spring wheat in the State, and, if conditions are favorable, the total yield of the State this year will be 75,000,000, an increase over last year of 15,000,000."

The Hotel Royal, a five-story brick building at Sixth Ave. and Fortieth St., N. Y. City, was destroyed by fire early on the morning of the 8th inst. The flames spread with great rapidity and four persons perished by having been trapped in the upper stories. A number were succeeded in getting out were badly injured or burned. There were 135 persons in the house. How many of these escaped is not known. The bodies of seventeen men and women have been found up to this time.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 508, which is 17 less than during the previous week, and 106 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing, 271 were males and 237 females; 78 died of pneumonia; 60 of consumption; 47 of diseases of the heart; 29 of diphtheria; 22 of bronchitis; 15 of cholera; 15 of old age; 15 of typhoid fever; 15 of Bright's disease; 14 of old age; 12 of consumptions; 11 of apoplexy; 11 of cancer; 11 of convulsions; 10 of debility; 10 of influenza and 10 of congestion of the lungs.

FOREIGN.—Sir Morell Mackenzie, the distinguished English physician, died in London on the 3d inst. He had suffered from bronchitis and asthma following a severe case of influenza. His illness, however, it was considered, had taken a favorable course. He was attended by his brother. His death was quite sudden. Only his wife was present when it occurred. His most important contribution to medical literature is his systematic treatise in two volumes on "Diseases of the Throat and Nose." He has also written monographs on diphtheria and hay fever, and numerous magazine articles.

A bottle which was found floating near Lerwick, a burg of Scotland, and the chief town of Mainland, one of the Shetland Islands, on Bressay Sound, has been picked up. It contained a message from Fowla, an island of the Shetland Islands, sixteen miles west of the other islands of the group, stating that, owing to the absence of communication with the other islands, caused by the exceedingly stormy weather that has prevailed for the past five weeks, the inhabitants of Fowla are on the verge of starvation. They had at first the bottle was thrown into the water only a few potatoes and a little meal left.

The new French tariff, with many augmented duties, took effect on the 31st of last month with results, the New York Tribune correspondent says, curiously like the first results of the McKinley tariff. Prices went up by leaps and bounds. The French to take advantage of a small increase in duties to make a large increase in their charges. Mutton, for example, has gone up some ten cents a pound, the extra duty being about two cents. Beef went up out of pure sympathy. Wine and many other things went up, prices depending on an equation between the greed of the dealer and the credit of the buyer. It is an open question, whether French Socialists foment, just as British free traders, masquerading in American colors, fomented ignorant discontent with the McKinley tariff. The protective policy is, however, pushed much farther in France than in America, and the expediency of some provision in respect to the latter is not to be doubted.

Dr. Wolf, of Heidelberg, has discovered two minor planets by means of photographic plates taken on Twelfth Month 22d and 23d. One of these is new (No. 323), but the other is probably identical with Sapientia (No. 275), which has only once been observed in our hemisphere.

The influenza, which has prevailed in Vienna for a long time, is greatly abating. During the past week there were 298 new cases reported, these figures showing a falling off of about half from the previous weekly record.

Reports come from many places in the northern part of the Kingdom of Austria-Hungary, stating that heavy floods are devastating the country there. Already great damage has been done and greater is feared, as the waters show no sign of subsiding.

A brief dispatch from St. Petersburg announces that the Emperor of the Empire has approved measures to render the land and sea forces of the Empire, and to establish relief and pension funds.

DIED, on the 31st of First Month, at her residence in this city, REBECCA C. SHEPPARD, a daughter of Clarkson Sheppard, aged forty-seven years. A member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Northern District.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

1853.—First Month 29th. "At our Monthly Meeting; in which all the Queries were answered. I thought a religious weight covered us; and some lively remarks were made, to guard the members against submitting to temptation to depart from our testimonies; particularly relating to the plural language to a single person, and against a sumptuous and fashionable mode of living, which leads to an improper education of children; by which they are taken out of the Society.

"Having felt my mind drawn in tender sympathy to some of the small meetings in Chester and Delaware Counties, Pennsylvania, I laid the concern before the Monthly Meeting, and was liberated, by a general expression of unity, to visit the meetings of Caln, the Western, and Concord Quarterly Meetings, as way may open for it."

"Second Month 9th. Attended their usual mid-week meeting at Whiteland; at which we had the company of a dear young minister, visiting Friends' families of this place. I felt drawn in spirit to some exercised ones, to whom the language of the Most High was addressed, 'Fear thou not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, I am thy God;' 'I will never leave thee nor forsake thee;' also that of our Saviour to his disciples, 'Lo, I am with you alway, even to the end of the world;' and the way was opened to comfort and strengthen the lowly, tribulated ones, whose faith was deeply proven. Afterwards to show forth to a different class, the great importance of obeying the discoveries of the Holy Spirit, by which the work of salvation is begun and perfected in man, as he yields to and follows it. Our beloved friend knelt in thanksgiving, for the help extended to the poor in spirit, and for the renewed call and offer of mercy to the rebellious; also praying that the dear children might be gathered. It proved the truth of the saying, 'He that watereth shall be watered also himself;' affording me comfort from a young, devoted child of the Lord, particularly as I was now just setting out on a journey."

"10th. We were at Uwchlan Monthly Meeting; in which the dear Master furnished fresh authority and ability to labor in his cause; many appearing to be immersed in the love and pursuit of the things of the world, whereby their strength is much laid waste, and the life and power of religion at a low ebb. That love which seeks the everlasting welfare of all, clothed my mind; in which I was enabled to bring some things home to their feelings with much plainness, and which appeared to be well received. But oh, how are the minds of many going into the earth, and losing the little zeal they may once have felt; and their children taking wings into the air, soaring above the witness for God, and setting at nought the testimonies which our faithful predecessors nobly bore."

"13th. At Downingtown Meeting it was rather a laborious time, among a class who seemed much in a worldly spirit; but Divine help was extended, and the importance of regeneration, and a life of godliness, was enforced. Towards the close, I was enabled to prostrate myself, in humble supplication, for the negligent and unfaithful; for the young people and the few burden-bearers; that the Lord would work in us all by his love and mighty power, to the reduction of everything into obedience to himself, and preserve us every moment from the power of temptation; that we may fill up the measure of allotted suffering and duty, to the glory of his Name, and our salvation in the end. It was a tendering close to some, and I came away cleared and peaceful."

"15th. At the Quarterly Meeting at Concord, I was led to declare as my belief, there is still preserved among us, those who are standing for the Truth, and who are clothed with fear on their own account; to whom the language of the Saviour is applicable: 'Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.' Towards these, with whom I was united in the love and fellowship of the Gospel, the stream of encouragement and consolation flowed freely. Then in the tender love of God, I was drawn to address the dear young people, and to invite them to come to the Saviour and follow Him, and He would prepare them for his work in the church. The power of the adorable Head rose into dominion, and it was an humbling, contriting season; I thought more so than I have often known; for which I was humbled and thankful to the Lord's great Name."

"Attended the Select Quarterly Meeting at Caln. It appeared to be in a low condition, and I was drawn to hold up the importance of faithful dedication to the cause of Christ, as examples of the flock; to warn them as watchmen on the walls, which the great Head has placed around us, of the snares with which the enemy seeks to lay us waste. Also of the importance of deep, inward abiding with Christ, that wherever we go, the savor of Divine life may go with us, and have an influence upon others. They were also reminded of the tendency of our young people to go into the fashions of a corrupt world, and to become rulers over their parents, instead of their parents governing and restraining them in these things. These remarks flowed like a gentle stream, accompanied with an affectionate desire for their strength and encouragement."

"20th. First-day. Attended Bradford Meeting. It was not so comforting a time as at some places; yet there was ability afforded to open many things pertaining to the condition of man in transgression, the means to bring him out of it, and the necessity of continued watchfulness after we are brought out; for Satan is at work, even to draw down those, who may be as stars in the firmament of God's power. The necessity of rightly governing the children, restraining them from wrong things, and setting them a proper example, was laid before them. As we come under this religious exercise, we shall be favored, at seasons, to hold communion with our heavenly Father, and thus know our strength renewed. He said, respecting his servant, 'Shall I hide from Abraham that thing that I do? For I know him, that he will command his household and his children after him;' hereby confirming the importance of rightly governing our beloved children; which can be done only as we are living under the Divine government ourselves, feeling the great importance of this subjection to, and communion with the Lord, and receiving wisdom and ability from Him to order our own households."

"25th. Attended the Western Quarterly Meeting for business. After a time of inward reduction, and looking to the alone Helper of his people, the quickening power of his Spirit sprung up a little in my mind, and under its guidance, I was led to open the simplicity and certainty of the Gospel dispensation; adapted to all capacities, and brought home to every heart; that man with all his wisdom and research, cannot find out any other way, by which the soul can be saved; nor is he able by any power that he possesses as a creature, even to give himself a sight of his lost condition. He only, who is the way, the truth and the life, can show him where and what he is, and what He requires him to become; giving him power to forsake sin; and He alone can set up his kingdom in his heart. When the rich man, in a state of torment, besought Abraham to send one to warn his brethren, lest they should come into that place, Abraham answered, they have Moses and the prophets, let them hear them; but still urging his request, he was told, 'If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead.' When Christ came, He said, 'I am the door. He that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber.' And the apostle said, 'Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you, than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accused.' All these show there is no way of salvation but that which is appointed by our great and gracious Creator; and unless man complies with the terms, there is no ground on which to rest any hope of being saved in the end. I thought the humbling power of Christ spread over the meeting, and brought with it a feeling of so-

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 244.

Jacob Chamberlain, a missionary in India, wrote out for the New York Independent an account of a remarkable deliverance he met with in the Ninth Month of 1863. It is headed "In the Tiger Jungle, Does God Hear Prayer?" He says:

I was taking a long exploring, preaching and Bible-distributing journey up through the Native Kingdom of Hyderabad, where no missionary had ever before worked. It was a journey of twelve hundred miles, on horseback, of four to five months, and through a region little known and difficult to traverse, and, by many, regarded as exceedingly dangerous. I was accompanied by four native assistants, picked men from the larger number who had volunteered to be my companions. We took with us two cartloads of Scriptures, Gospels, New Testaments and Bibles, and tracts, in the five languages we would meet, and which could be used by some of our party, for each one of us could preach in three.

We had already been out two and a half months. My sturdy Saugur pony had carried me seven hundred miles, and we had already distributed, chiefly by sales, seven thousand Scriptures and books.

Of the dangers promised us we had experienced some. In one city, indeed, we had seen the mob, angry because we preached another God than theirs, swing to the iron gates, shutting us within, and tear up the pavingstones to stone us with; but, by an artifice, obtaining permission to tell them just one story before they should begin the stoning, I told the story of the Cross, in the graphic language that God himself gave me that day, and the mob became an absorbed audience, down the cheeks of many a member of which I saw the tears trickle, as I pictured Christ upon the cross, in agony for us, that we all might be freed from sin, and the stones were thrown in the gutter, and when I had done, they bought and paid for eighty Gospels and tracts, to tell them more of that wonderful God-man, of whom they then first heard.

We had, indeed, been washed away by a flood, my pony and I being whelmed under by a tropical torrent that rolled swiftly down a fordable river, as we were in the middle of it, crossing; but we had all succeeded in swimming to the same bank.

We had, indeed, been kept awake through the night, more than once, by the roaring of the man-eating tigers around our camp in the jungle, as we heaped wood and brush upon our camp fires all night long, lest there be no one to tell the tale in the morning; and we had passed through a jungle where three men had been carried off by tigers from the same cart track in broad daylight, just a few days before.

We had now, however, come to the greatest strait in our journey. We had reached our farthest northern point, up among the Mountain Gonds, or Khonds, who for centuries had offered human sacrifices, and, after telling them of the one and all-sufficient sacrifice for sin, by Jesus Christ, had turned to the east and south, on our return journey, by another route. We were to find a Government steamer when we struck the Pranbita River, an affluent of the great Godavery. The Government were then endeavoring to open up those rivers to navigation, and had succeeded in placing one steamer on the river above the second cataract, to run up to the third. The Government officers in charge of the works, having heard, months before, of my proposed journey, had offered to send that steamer up to the third cataract on any date I would name, if I would but take the journey, and transport myself and party rapidly through that stretch of fever jungle, which was deadly at this season of the year. I had named the date, and received assurance that we could depend on the steamer being there. We timed our journey, and struck the upper river at the date named. No steamer was there. The heavy torrents of the monsoon had come on unexpectedly early and unprecedentedly severe. The Godavery became three miles wide, of tumultuous waters. Village after village on its shores was swept away. We watched on the banks for a week. A messenger then succeeded in getting through to tell us that the steamer, in attempting to stem that fierce current, to come up to us, had broken its machinery and could not get to us. We must, then, march through that seventy-five miles of doomed jungle, to reach the next steamer, which was to meet us at the foot of the second cataract, and take us down to the first, and another on.

The Government Commissioner of the Central Provinces at Sirocha (for the north bank of the Godavery is under British rule), kindly came to our relief, and detaching thirty-six coolies from the Government works, ordered them, with an armed guard, to keep them from deserting, to convey our tents, baggage, medicine chests, and remaining books down to the foot of the second cataract; and we started on.

I need not stop to recount the exciting episode of our desertion, on the north bank of the Godavery, with no human habitation anywhere near, by the whole party of coolies, armed guard and all, nor of our desperate efforts, finally successful, to cross the Godavery's three miles flood, in order that we might reach a large town of the Nizam's Dominions, the headquarters of a high native official, a sort of deputy governor, of whom I hoped to obtain help.

Forcing my wiry pony through the three miles of flooded marsh that lay between the river and the town, I appeared at the door of this magnate, and politely presented my appeal to him for coolies to take my party down his side of the river, to the second cataract. He, as politely, told me that it was an utter impossibility; that at this season of the year, with the fever so deadly and the man-eating tigers so ravenous, now that the herdsmen had taken their flocks and herds away to the healthier highlands over the fever season, so that they had no flocks to prey upon; and the floods and backwaters from the river damming the way, no coolies could be induced to go through.

I told him that I must, in some way, get down to the second cataract; that the steamer that was to come for us had broken down, and that I must have the coolies. I took from my pocket, and slowly unrolled a long parchment paper document, a hookam, or firman from the Nizam, which the British Minister at that court had kindly pressed upon me, as I had tarried a few days at the capital of the kingdom, in passing, saying that, though I had not asked it, he would sleep better if he knew I had it in my possession; for I knew not what I would pass through nor how much I would need it. I had not thus far opened it. The need had now come. In it the Nizam, at the request of the British Minister, had not only authorized my journey, but ordered any of his officials, of whatever rank, to render any assistance I should call for, either in the way of protection, transportation, or supplies, at lenny and contrition of spirit. My sister Hannah Rhoads, knelt in supplication and thanksgiving, which humbled the hearts of many."

"The visit to most of the meetings of this Quarter has been attended with the apprehension, that the spirit of infidelity in some form, is striving to lay waste the doctrines of the Christian religion, and to draw some of our members into its dreadful vortex. Unless Friends keep watchful over themselves and their children, prohibiting the use of those pernicious publications that set forth and contend for these delusions; and also abstaining from associating with unbelievers, the minds of their young people may be poisoned, and the Society in these parts be scattered."

"Third Month 6th. At West Chester the Lord condescended to furnish ability to call upon all who had not submitted to his convicting power, and to show to them that He had not dealt with us according to our deserts; but in merciful and unmerited long suffering and forbearance, was still following after the rebellious, and striving to draw them into the obedience of the cross of Christ. These were pleaded with, in the love of the Gospel, to receive the Lord Jesus in the way of his coming, whether in tendering their hearts, with an humbling sense of his goodness, or when He reveals his righteous judgments, and shows them the inevitable consequences of walking in sin and transgression. Those present, who had entered into covenant with their Lord and Master, were encouraged to persevere faithfully to the end; that they may be lights in the world, preachers of righteousness to others, and thereby be made instrumental in drawing souls to Christ. That in the end, the language may be addressed to them, 'Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful in a few things, I will make thee ruler over more. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'"

"10th. Attended Wilmington Monthly Meeting, and labored among them in the love of the Gospel, to strengthen the hands of the faithful, and to persuade the worldly-minded and the negligent to turn to the Lord, with full purpose of heart, and serve Him, that they may become partakers of the peace which He gives, which passeth all understanding of the natural man; and being joined to the Lamb's army, may support his blessed cause in the earth. Satisfaction was expressed with our company, and the labor."

"13th. Went to Springfield Meeting in much weakness, yet after a time of waiting before the Lord, a measure of holy help was extended, and I believe the Gospel was preached in the authority of Christ. I was also bowed in deep prostration of soul, and enabled, vocally, to return thanks to our gracious and merciful Helper, that He had not cast us off; and to ask for the continuance of his preserving power; and that He would, in tender compassion, gather the dear children, to submit to and follow their Saviour. The heart-tendering power of Truth went over the meeting, and contrited many; for which thanksgiving and praise were rendered to Him who alone is worthy.

"After dining at my brother Joel's, rode to my home, and I was glad to be again united to my dear wife and children, under our peaceful roof; and for the preservation of my health and safe return, I was thankful to my heavenly Father."

Of what worth is the form of Godliness without the life and power of it?

the shortest notice, and under the highest penalties for non-performance. The moment he saw the great royal seal his whole appearance changed, and, shouting in imperious tones to his belted and armed attendants, he ordered them to run with all speed, each to one of the surrounding villages, and bring in, by force if necessary, the quota of bearers which each village was bound to furnish for a royal progress, or for a journey thus authorized.

I had called for forty-four stalwart men, for I felt sure that more than my original thirty-six would be needed before we reached the next steamer. In an incredibly short time the forty-four bearers appeared. They went at once down to the river and brought up all our goods, and with them came the native preachers. They placed the goods in front of the magnate's house. I made a harangue to them as they stood in a row, each man by his burden, telling them I was sorry to be obliged to compel them to go through the jungle at such a time, or to go ourselves, but that we must go; that to show them that I meant to treat them well, I should now give each one, in advance, as much hire as he had ever received for going through to the cataract, and that, on reaching there, I should pay each one twice as much more, in view of the extra risk they ran.

Asking the magistrate what the highest pay was, I placed that sum, in the Nizan's coinage, myself in the hands of each man, with the magistrate as witness, and, when each of the forty-four had grasped it in his palm, I told them that now they were sealed to accompany me through; that any one who attempted to desert me would bring the consequences on his own head. The magistrate also harangued them and told them that travelling under such authorization as this gentleman was, they would each be publicly whipped and put in jail if they appeared back at their homes without a line from me that they had taken me through.

To make still more sure, I had separated them into four squads of eleven men each, ordering each squad to march in a compact body, and placing one of the native preachers in charge of each party, to march with them and watch them, and give me instant signal if any one put down his burden, except at my command. The two royal guides of the region had been ordered to guide us through, and promised a high reward, and had sworn faithfulness.

We struck into the jungle. We had to go single file. Footpaths there had been, but now choked and grown over from the long rains. The second senior native preacher went with the first eleven; the senior preacher at the rear of the last party. The pouring rain would drench us for a half hour, and then the sun, blazing forth between the sundered clouds, would broil us. The country was flooded and reeking; the bushes were loaded and dripping. Get through we must, or the steamer at the second cataract might not wait for us, and we would have to march through another fever stretch.

MADANAPALLE, INDIA.

(To be concluded.)

UNTIL an humble, lowly, meek, lamb-like spirit be raised in us, and come to have the rule over us, we know not the Lord, nor can we depend on his providence; for the rule and government of this spirit reduceth every member to an excellent qualification, and as many as are taught thereby, learn therefrom in all states to be content.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Doctrine of Preterition.

According to the "Century Dictionary," Preterition in Calvinistic theology, is the doctrine that God having elected to everlasting life such as should be saved, passed over the others. This is not to be confounded with the doctrine of the Preterists who believe that the prophecies contained in the Book of Revelation in the New Testament, have all or nearly all been fulfilled.

The Presbyterian committee on revision of the Westminster confession of faith, recently in session in New York City, were divided on the doctrine of Predestination, and a majority of them decided to strike out the sentiment that "God has foreordained others to everlasting death," and to substitute that it has pleased Him "not to elect them unto everlasting life, but to ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sin to the praise of his glorious justice, yet hath he no pleasure, &c." This is election and preterition; it is also Calvinism. Some of the committee desired to strike out the whole chapter on this subject, which would seem to be a wise disposition, and one that would accord with the desires of a large number of Presbyterians.

According to the revised confession all who die in infancy are regenerated, and therefore there cannot be any non-elect infants. It says that the non-elect, "inasmuch as they never truly come to Christ cannot be saved. Neither is there salvation in any other way than by Christ through the Spirit, however diligent men may be in framing their lives according to the light of nature and the law of that religion they profess." This, with another paragraph still more clear, allows that some heathen may possibly be among the elect.

Several chapters on the work of the Holy Spirit are given; also a statement of the sufficiency of Christ's sacrifice for the whole lost race of man. The Westminster confession had no chapter on the Holy Spirit.

The amended confession will, it is expected, be submitted to the General Assembly which meets in the Fifth Month next for its action. The individual members of this body will not be bound by the decisions of the sub-committee, but may vote in accordance with the views of their several constituencies. If adopted it will be sent down to the presbyteries for acceptance or rejection. If rejected, it will be on account of its Calvinism, which a large number of the members desire to see eliminated. The disposition the controversy evinces of a desire to break from the old moorings and sail into a more liberal and spiritual atmosphere, is to my mind an encouraging sign.

That Divine Revelation ceased when the Holy Scriptures were completed, and that they contain the entire and only record of the Divine Will for the guidance of mankind, so as to entitle them to be called the Word of God, has been a part of the creed of most of the sects into which professing Christendom is divided. I do not find anything in the Scriptures themselves to warrant the belief that the revelation of the will of our Creator to the mind of man has ever ceased, but on the contrary much to show that this revelation is given to every man to profit withal; and as a true light that lighteth every man coming into the world.

Based upon the fallacy above mentioned, history shows that many men of talent and scholastic learning, exercising their unlightened reasoning powers, all the way from the second century of the Christian era, to the present time, have placed an interpretation on certain Scripture texts that have resulted in the formation of the differing and conflicting sects that have from time to time come into existence. The discussions that originated in this way, expended in efforts to prove certain doctrines true, have, I believe, been detrimental to the cause of Christ, in two ways.

One of these is the effect on persons who, while disposed to examine into Christianity as the only true religion in existence, are bewildered because of the conflicting claims of its professors. The question is a natural and proper one for such to ask: "By what rule am I to judge, if I decide to become a Christian professor, which of its sects hold the pure truth?" They will be answered, probably: "By the Holy Scriptures, which were written by Divine inspiration." Yes, but the Roman Catholic tells me that the Pope is the head of the church, and appeals to the Scriptures to prove the assertion. The other sects put a different construction upon the texts quoted and utterly deny the Catholic claim. The Presbyterian asserts that some persons are predestined to be saved and some to be eternally lost. Other sects look with horror upon this doctrine. The Baptist thinks sprinkling with water or immersion to be essential for the Christian; others think not. And each and all of them will refer to the Scriptures to prove their respective positions. What is the matter? They have searched the Scriptures, thinking that in them is to be found eternal life, instead of coming to Him who inspired the sacred writers, and whom, if we follow, we shall not walk in the darkness of our own intellectual powers, but shall have the light of life.

The other detriment to the good cause is that people are liable to have their attention turned to the discussion of questions of comparatively little importance to themselves, instead of being directed to that individual work, essential to our salvation, which can only be performed inwardly, by a co-operation of the human soul with the Divine power. When a preacher becomes interested in investigating some subject to which his attention is turned in studying the meaning of a particular text or class of texts, it is no matter of surprise that he should give an undue importance to his deductions. Thus we find some who uphold the doctrine of the resurrection of these bodies of ours after death. Some inculcate the belief that our Saviour will come and reign outwardly on earth in due time. And now the Presbyterians discuss the question whether or not "man hath wholly lost all disposition to any spiritual good accompanying salvation," while at the same time he "is, and remains a free moral agent, retaining full responsibility for all his acts." Both of these seemingly contradictory statements being given in the revised confession. We may have our convictions on these subjects, pro or con; but how much do the belief or disbelief of any of them compare in importance with that work of preparation for a never ending eternity, into which all of us must sooner or later enter?

While the creed-makers and humanly-educated ministers thus occupy their time in the effort to prove positions which are often untenable, it is cause of rejoicing to believe that the number of members of the different denominations, as well as others who are not connected with any outward profession, is on the increase, who are following Christ in obedience to the in-shining light of his Spirit in their hearts; who know the voice of the true shepherd and are known of him; and that light is more and more breaking forth in the earth, and the Redeemer's kingdom more and more making headway therein.

If the question is put to a Friend, where the pure truth is to be found, he may answer in the language of the apostle: "God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation [whether he have the Scriptures or outward knowledge of Christ or not] he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is acceptable to him."

The salvation of the soul is to be wrought out with fear and trembling, for it is God which worketh in you, both to will and to work, for his good pleasure. Walking day by day in the light, as God is in the light, Christian fellowship is experienced, and the blood of Jesus Christ cleansing from all sin. Not that it has cleansed us, but that it cleanseth us as we truly walk in the light. This is a very simple doctrine, easily understood by the babe in Christ, although overlooked, set aside and disregarded by the worldly-wise.

It is my conviction that if Friends will faithfully uphold their root doctrine of direct and immediate Divine revelation to all mankind, in their daily walking before the world, they will be made instrumental in convincing others of its truth; that those who receive it and are made living partakers of its blessed manifestations, will be brought to see that all the several testimonies that Friends hold are the legitimate fruit of the goodly tree of doctrines springing from this root; and finally, that the knowledge of the Lord which is to cover the earth as the waters cover the sea, can be obtained in this way and in no other. For "all thy children shall be taught of the Lord; and great shall be the peace of thy children."—Isaiah liv: 13. E. M. Second Month, 1892.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

We have been much interested and instructed through selections from the journal of William Evans, as appearing in THE FRIEND; particularly those on the 16th of last month. The trials and proving of those who have dedicated themselves to the Lord's service seem to have been in some sort very much the same in every age of the world. The prophets of old were harassed and bound down by the people whom they loved, and for whose good they labored, delivering messages from the most high God, tendered for their warning. The apostles and primitive believers in Jesus, were persecuted and driven from city to city, and "accounted as sheep for the slaughter"—yea even our dear Lord himself "was a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." So with George Fox and his co-laborers—in fact almost all of that day and time who labored to turn the people from the evil of their ways, "suffered persecution;" but in Him who overcame the world, have found peace. So in coming down to our own times—the times of toleration and greatest liberty of conscience, "all who will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution" in some sort or other. Thus it is well for his followers of every age to call to mind the charge delivered to his immediate disciples: "Remember the word that I spake unto you; the servant is not above his master, nor he that is sent above him who sent him. It is enough for the servant that he be as his master, and he that is sent that he be as him that sent him. Think not strange that the world hate you, remember that it hated me before it hated you. If they have heard me they will also hear you, but if they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you." In looking back at the cruel scourgings, imprisonments, racks and tortures, and even death, inflicted on innocent sufferers for the Truth, we are able to see that it did not begin with hatred for the servant; but the loving, forgiving, harmonizing spirit of the Master was first banished from the minds of their persecutors. So late as 1659-61 we find four of the Lord's servants executed by the hangman (supported by what all the world now recognize as anti-Christian law) in the now cultured city of Boston. Having first "called the master of the house Belzebub" (by rejecting the humanizing influence of his good spirit upon their hearts) "how much more they that be of his household." And when we find worthies such as our friend Wm. Evans, often brought into the stripping-room, and at other times with "matter which opened before him of such close nature as to be afraid almost to look at it," it brings to the conclusion, nothing has happened unto us but what is common unto men." These things admonish us to "thank God and take courage;" "gird up the loins of our minds, watch and be sober;" and so much the more as that day approaches wherein we shall stand before the just Judge of quick and dead, to give account.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Baltimore Yearly Meeting.

The Epistle of Baltimore Yearly Meeting in 1829 has the following paragraph:

"The very interesting document, prepared in the Seventh Month last by the General Conference held in Philadelphia, was read to our satisfaction and cordially united with."

The document here referred to was prepared by a conference of committees appointed by the different Yearly Meetings in America, at the suggestion of Ohio Yearly Meeting, and entitled "The testimony of the Society of Friends in the Continent of America." The Minute of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting concerning it, said: "The Conference Committee reported that way did not open to offer any proposition as to the closer agreement of the rules of Discipline of the Yearly Meetings, but they had prepared a summary of doctrines and testimonies which the Yearly Meeting adopted, and directed to be printed, if it should be sanctioned by the other Yearly Meetings. All of these adopted it, as appears by their minutes prefixed to the printed document.

The moving cause which led to the appointment of these committees of Conference and to the preparation of this "Testimony" was, we believe, the struggles with error in doctrine, and the dissensions and schisms growing out of it, through which the Society had just passed. Accordingly, the "Testimony" in its early pages speaks of these divisions as the result in part of "speculative opinions" introduced under specious colorings. The main bulk of the document is occupied with a statement of doctrines ever held by the Society, and which were then distinctly re-affirmed.

The reply sent by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1831 to the last-received epistle from Baltimore, thus refers to the subject of plainness, &c., which Baltimore Friends had spoken of on different occasions: "We believe there must be a recurrence to first principles, ere Zion can again shine forth in her ancient beauty. And, dear Friends, may you and we continually remember, that it is not sufficient by profession merely to bear testimony to the Truth; but that we manifest in life and conduct, our faith to be that which works by love to the purifying of the heart: this would produce an adherence to that Christian simplicity and exemplary deportment which Truth leads into, and would also preserve from the inordinate pursuit of worldly things, by which some have made shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. On these very important subjects this meeting has been brought under close exercise and travail, and the concern which has been felt for the preservation of our members in plainness of speech, behavior and apparel, the furniture of their houses, and other branches of our Christian testimonies, has been recommended to their serious attention and observance—"by an epistle."

The "Testimony" adopted by all the American Yearly Meetings, and first published the year before this epistle was written, in speaking of plainness in dress and address, &c., uses this strong language: "The same Divine Spirit which led [early Friends] to lay aside everything unbecoming the followers of Christ, would still lead us in the same path; and notwithstanding many of their successors in religious belief, who have widely deviated from that exemplary simplicity in their language, their garb, and the furniture of their dwellings, may endeavor to persuade themselves, that these are merely outward and non-essential things, yet the love of them is a certain indication, that whatever they may profess, they are not in possession of that life and power which was the substance of their forefathers' religion."

In 1834, Philadelphia addressed an epistle to Baltimore, which contained an instructive reference "to the original ground of our profession—a deep indwelling with the Seed of life in their own hearts. It was by a faithful adherence to the teachings of this Holy Spirit that our worthy ancestors were brought out of the lifeless forms and professions of their day, and established on Christ Jesus the unchangeable foundation; and it is only as we walk by the same rule and mind the same thing, that we can be preserved from the pollutions which abound in the world; or be made instrumental in exalting the standard of truth, and promoting the kingdom of our Holy Redeemer in the earth."

The correspondence between the Yearly Meetings shows, that they continued alive to the cases of the Africans and Indians. The epistle from Baltimore in 1834 mentions that they had co-operated with Ohio and Indiana Yearly Meetings in the extension of aid to the Aborigines removed from their late reservations to new settlements beyond the Mississippi, "where a large field of labor appeared to open for assisting them in the education of their offspring and in cultivating the arts of civilized life."

The Shawnee Indians were those to whom the labors of Friends were principally confined. As already mentioned, this tribe was of an unusually migratory disposition. When first known to European settlers they lived in Wisconsin, but moved eastwardly, and coming in contact with the Iroquois south of Lake Erie were driven to the banks of the Cumberland. Some passed thence into South Carolina and Florida, and others spread into Pennsylvania and New York; and many of them afterwards crossed into Ohio. In 1795 the main body of the tribe were in the Scioto.

What directed the attention of Baltimore Friends towards this tribe especially, we do not know; possibly the fact that a part of the Shenandoah Valley had been their former home may have had some influence.

The history of the Ohio Indians is a sad and humiliating one, as is that of almost all the other tribes in their relation to the United States Government. By successive treaties they were gradually despoiled of their wide range of forest and plain to make room for the ever-growing influx of white settlers.

In 1786 the United States allotted lands to the Shawnees near the Miami River, but the title to these was claimed by the Wyandots. In 1817 the United States Commissioners gave patents to the Shawnees for two tracts of land, amounting to about 125 square miles, at Wopaukhonneta and Hog Creek, in Auglaize County in Western Ohio.

Friends erected at Wopaukhonneta on the Auglaize River a grist mill and a saw mill, and sent a superintendent and his wife to reside among them. The Indians soon made considerable advances in agriculture, and learned to raise corn, beans, pumpkins, &c. They gradually acquired cows, oxen and other domestic animals.

But in 1831 their quiet was disturbed by a demand from the Government that they should sell their lands in Ohio and remove to the Indian Territory. Henry Harvey, a Friend, who was present and signed the treaty as a witness, kept full notes of the whole transaction, and from his account the Indians appear to have been grievously defrauded. Promises made by the Commissioner, and on which the agreement to sell was founded, were not included in the written treaty, which was not read to the Indians, but which they signed, trusting to the declarations of the United States officer. When they found that they had been badly cheated, there was much dissatisfaction, and a deputation, accompanied by some Friends, was sent to Washington to procure redress.

Lewis Cass, then Secretary of War, received them kindly, and urged on the President, Andrew Jackson, to have the treaty set aside and a new one made, but he was immovable, and declared that the Shawnees should fare no better than the Cherokees had. Joseph Vance, a representative from Ohio, exerted himself to have their wrongs rectified, and ultimately an additional compensation of $30,000 was voted by Congress.

The principal complaints of the Shawnees as to this removal, are summed up by Henry Harvey under the following heads:

The United States offered at its own expense to remove the Shawnees comfortably to their new homes and to support them for one year. But many of them had to furnish their own teams and wagons and bear a large part of the expense of the journey, and the season selected was so far advanced that they were overtaken by winter long before reaching their place of destination, and suffered much.

Their farm improvements were to be valued and the amount paid in money, in order to enable them to make farms in their new country. But the Commissioner, without sending any person to fix a value on their improvements, paid only $13,000, which was not half their worth.

They were to have good mills erected for them in Kansas, in place of those they had in Ohio. But the Government made them pay $6,000 for these new mills.

They were to be furnished with grind-stones, cross cut saws, and rifles to shoot buffalo, &c. These were furnished, but they had to pay for them themselves. And, contrary to the information given by the Commissioner, there were no buffalo or elk within 200 miles of their new home.

They were promised a house and shop for a blacksmith, in lieu of those left behind them. The buildings were erected, but they were charged $844 for them.

They were promised 100,000 acres of land adjoining the tract of fifty miles square, which they held under a former treaty. But the treaty was so worded that the Government was only bound to lay off the 100,000 acres within the tract already reserved to their tribe.

The United States Government was to liquidate all the Shawnees' debts out of its own funds. But this clause was not inserted into the treaty.

It is pleasant to be able to add that Congress in 1853 granted the Shawnees $66,000, as an additional compensation for their Ohio lands; and this amount was paid to them at their homes in Kansas.

OF "THE FRIEND."

The question of right and wrong is one that Creatures of Intelligence have to do with. How is man to know whether he is in the possession of a right spirit, unless shown of God? In case he makes it a rule to do or not do as others may do—he will surely fail in the matter of success in finding what is sought for.

Conscience is not to be quieted except by an appeal to God. To deny that conscience is not a faculty of the soul would be to incur the risk of becoming an unbeliever in the immortality of the Soul. Whereas holy men of old, who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, have settled that question. And the blessed Saviour has established it for all time. Man greatly errs when taking imagination for revelation in matters of right and wrong.

Great is the difference between a spirit of despondency and an humble spirit—one leads to depths unfathomable, the other to heights of inexpressible joy. The spirit of the meek shares in blessings infinite—while finite, desponding minds receive neither dew nor rain suited to an upward growth in the ever blessed Truth as it is in Jesus. See to it, believer, that thou quench not the right Spirit.

"I ask Thee for the daily strength

To none that ask denied.

And a mind to blend with outward life

While keeping at thy side,

Content to fill a little space

So Thou be glorified."

P. R. GIFFORD.

PROVIDENCE, First Month, 1892.

DIVINING AMONG THE MONGOLS.—The only incident which broke the daily monotony of our life in this desert was when, having finished our evening meal, the Mongol Dowé pulled out of his saddle bag a sheep's shoulder-blade, and, after reciting a short prayer over it, put it in the embers. Here it remained till thoroughly charred, when it was carefully removed, and we all crowded around to hear what was in store for us on the morrow. He examined closely the cracks made in the bone by the fire, the longitudinal ones represented our journey, the transversal ones what was to befall us, one side of the bone was reserved for our animals, one for ourselves. Then by the color of the bone, he foretold the weather; in fact there was nothing hidden from him. Fortunately, luck appeared to be with us, and the signs were always favorable, but augured disasters for the horses. —The Land of the Lamas.

SELECTED.

SUPPOSE.

Suppose, my little lady,
Your doll should break her head,
Could you make it whole by crying
Till your eyes and nose were red?
And wouldn't it be pleasanter
To treat it as a joke,
And say you're glad 'twas Dolly's,
And not your head, that broke?

Suppose you're dressed for walking,
And the rain comes pouring down,
Will it clear off any sooner
Because you scold and frown?
And wouldn't it be nicer
For you to smile than pout,
And so make sunshine in the house
When there is none without?

Suppose your task, my little man,
Is very hard to get,
Will it make it any easier
For you to sit and fret?
And wouldn't it be wiser,
Than whining like a dunce,
To go to work in earnest,
And learn the thing at once?

Suppose that some boys have a horse,
And some a coach and pair,
Will it tire you less while walking
To say, "It is not for me?"
And wouldn't it be nobler
To keep your temper sweet,
And in your heart be thankful
You can walk upon your feet?

Suppose the world doesn't please you,
Nor the way some people do,
Do you think the whole creation
Will be altered just for you?
And isn't it, my boy or girl,
The wisest, bravest plan,
Whatever comes, or doesn't come,
To do the best you can?

SELECTED.

IF WE COULD KNOW.

If we could know
Which of us, darling, would be first to go,
Who would be first to breast the swelling tide,
And step alone upon the other side—
If we could know!

If it were you,
Should I walk softly, keeping death in view?
Should I my love to you more oft express?
Or should I grieve you, darling, any less—
If it were you?

If it were I,
Should I improve the moments slipping by?
Should I more closely follow God's great plan,
Be filled with sweeter charity to man—
If it were I?

If we could know!
We cannot, darling; and 'tis better so.
I should forget, just as I do to-day,
And walk along the same old stumbling way—
If I could know.

I would not know
Which of us, darling, will be first to go.
I only wish the space may not be long
Between the parting and the greeting song:
But when or where or how we're called to go—
I would not know.

SACREDNESS DOES NOT MEAN SECRECY. Many persons suppose that sacred things are profaned by the violation of their secrecy. There is truth in this sometimes. But there are souls to whom the utterance of some of our most sacred thoughts or experiences would be a life blessing. The question is, sacred to what, or to whom? Every high and holy experience ought to be sacred to a high and holy purpose, and that purpose is not always to be attained by burying an experience utterly out of the sight of men.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

I was attracted by some articles in late numbers of THE FRIEND comparing the ancient and modern ministry among Friends. The question which was the greater! if a mere question of curiosity, were perhaps not a proper one to be considered, but in its bearings on the prosperity of Truth it has points of legitimate interest.

In the first few decades of the Society convocations were vastly more numerous than they have been at any time since. In the wonderful accounts we have of the fruits of the labors of E. Burrough, J. Audland and many others of that day, I would not detract from the power inherent in their ministry, but I have believed that those extensive convocations were largely due to the minds of the people being prepared for the seed thus sown.

That was a period when profligacy and wickedness abounded, not only amongst the common people, but also the rulers and those high in place in the church. Those "who should be saved," are as sheep without a shepherd and much disposed to enquire, "who shall show us any good?" The thousands who were waiting in this condition were quickly gathered around the standard now set up. It was like the first fruits of a vintage. What remained were "but as gleanings-grapes, when the vintage is done."

Friends had now largely fulfilled their mission in the line of making proselytes. By the end of the Seventeenth century we read of no more general convocations. The journal of Wm. Edmundson illustrates the condition of things, throughout this period. In the earlier years of his ministry he tells of numbers being reached by the power of Truth and of new meetings being settled along the line of his travels. Towards the close of his life this same faithful servant with no loss of "the lip and power" that we are informed of can only say that in visiting settlements of Friends he had comfortable meetings among them.

We may not fathom the inscrutable purposes of our Heavenly Father in thus cutting off the harvest, where he had sent his servants to reap. However general may have been the conviction effected among the common people of that period, multitudes remained, estranged from the cross of Christ. And the next succeeding generations evolved other multitudes, quite strangers to the way of life and Salvation. Among these such a one as Samuel Fothergill, and I doubt not there were many others as faithful as he was without power to arouse them from lethargy, and awaken an interest in the life to come.

The coadjutors of John Wesley seem to have been better adapted to awaken this mass of unregenerate humanity. Just at that period when Friends seemed stagnated or going retrograde the labors of those called Methodists were attended with marked success.

Now it were quite paralyzing to our hopes as a Christian Church maintaining as we do, the necessity for a religious qualification and call to the Christian Ministry, to admit that the Divine Arm is in any wise shortened towards us as a people.

Without undue praise toward any who are or have been our contemporaries we may boldly claim that in their devotedness and fitness they have not fallen behind those who have been called "sons of the morning." The signalized conversions under this our modern ministry may not be numerous, but the sum of its effects only the records of eternity can tell.

Perhaps it is the young and inconspicuous, whose minds are tenderly susceptible and who speak but little of their feelings, that derive the most benefit from an anointed ministry.

I was sometimes asked by a dear Friend (the late J. P. B.) why the ministry was so much less impressive now than when he was a young man.

At that time he said "it was a common thing if a stranger in the ministry should drop into their meetings, they would have such a baptizing season the whole company appeared melted into tenderness." I gave it as my answer that the difference then and now was not so much in the ministry as in himself. Those were the days of his espousals, when he was carried as a lamb in the Good Shepherd's arms. But now that he had attained to the stature of manhood in spiritual growth, he was expected sometimes to "endure hardness, as a good soldier of Christ."

I was ready with this answer because it was just in the line of my own experience, and this carries us back for truly heart searching ministry, not to the days of Wm. Penn, but to an earlier period in this present century.

Let us trust it has not yet failed us. But perhaps it were well for us to look around, and see whether our whole duty is being discharged, in gathering in those who may be standing off as strangers.

We are becoming a refined people and some of our neighbors who may be less so, less educated, less affluent and withal perhaps, less religious, should their minds be turned towards us whether by ministry or otherwise, they are held back by the feeling that they would be slighted in our company.

Perhaps if all who may from time to time have been awakened at the many public meetings of later years had seen a door wide open they might have continued to meet with us for worship, and the fruits of those labors would have been more apparent.

While so many of our members are "sitting at ease in their ceiled houses" too comfortably and as they may fancy, too securely, to be disturbed, we may look to the highways and hedges as a source of supply for our diminished numbers.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Variation in the Earth's Poles.—The subject of the variation of latitudes on the earth's surface continues to attract a great deal of attention among astronomers and geodesists. The observations at Berlin and other European stations during the past season have confirmed in a general way the results of previous years; and what is very interesting, Marcuse, who was sent to the Sandwich Islands to observe there, finds at Honolulu a change of latitude just opposite in direction, but of almost the same amount as at Berlin. This is just as it should be if the pole of the earth really shifts its position upon the globe, since Berlin and Honolulu are nearly opposite each other in longitude. Mr. Chamaller, of Cambridge, has been investigating the subject by discussing a number of accurate observations, made at different places within the last thirty years for various purposes, and of course without any reference to the special problem in hand. As a result he finds that all of them present clear evidence of a periodical change of latitude like that ascertained in Germany, and of about the same amount (0".6). That is to say, the latitudes of all stations change as if the pole of the earth were moving from west to east in a circle about sixty feet in diameter. But he arrives at the further very remarkable result that the period of this revolution instead of being a year, as hitherto assumed by every one, is really nearly fourteen months (427 days). There is no obvious explanation for such a period; while it is easy to imagine any number of ways in which an annual periodicity could be accounted for, a period of 427 days is, as yet, absolutely unaccountable. It should, perhaps be added that while the observations so far are all satisfied on the hypothesis of a conical motion of the earth's axis within the earth itself, it is not quite certain that they may not be accounted for in some quite different way; the discussion of the subject at the meeting of the Academy of Sciences a few weeks ago brought out a considerable difference of opinion.

Soap Bubbles.—To make soap bubbles which will last for several hours, dissolve one part by weight of Marseilles soap, cut into thin slices, in forty parts of distilled water, and filter. Call the filtered liquid A, and mix two parts of pure glycerine with one part of the solution A, in a temperature of 66° Fahrenheit, and, after shaking them together long and violently, leave them to rest for several days. A clear liquid will settle, with a turbid one above. The lower is to be sucked out from beneath the upper one with a siphon, taking the utmost care not to carry down any of the latter to mix with the clear fluid. A bubble blown with this will last for several hours, even in the open air. Or the mixed liquid, after standing twenty-four hours, may be filtered.

Sweet Scented Wood.—Few of our native trees have odoriferous wood like the sandal wood of the islands in the Pacific Ocean; but a few of the conifera on the Pacific slope have sweet-scented woods. The fine church at Metlakatla, built by the civilized Indians of Alaska, is as fragrant as if incense was continually floating through the air, from the wood of the great arbutus—Thuja gigantea—of which it is built. Libocedrus decurrens, found farther south, is known as "incense cedar," from its fragrance. The yellow cypress—Cupressus nutkensis—and the Monterey cypress—Cupressus macrocarpa—have also scented wood.—Mehan's Monthly.

American Trees.—Forest vegetation is much richer in North America than in Europe, and comprises 412 species, of which 176 are native to the Atlantic region, 106 to the Pacific, 10 are common to both, 46 to the Rocky Mountain region, and 74 are tropical species near the coast of Florida, as against 158 species in Europe. Six North American species of forest trees—the Judas tree, persimmon, hackberry, plane tree, hop-hornbeam, and chestnut—are also indigenous in Europe, all now growing there naturally south of the Alps.

Cigarette Poisoning.—It is not a pleasant fact to record, but illustrates strongly the power of an evil habit, that the greatest cotton planter in the country has just died of "nicotine poisoning." Richardson was a man of large wealth, of great business foresight, and of influence in political and business circles. But when a slight disease attacked him, it was found that his body had been so weakened by medical cigarette-smoking that he succumbed at once. A cigarette stick could do nothing when all the functions of the system were found vitiated by the fatal habit. A custom which at the first seemed to be as light as the filament of the spider's web, at last grew to be a manacle strong as iron, from which there was no escape.—Selects.

Reforms in India.—Since the legal abolishment of Sutteeism, the horrible self-immolation of widow on the funeral piles of their husbands, few religious or social reforms in India have been more hotly contested than the proposed change in the age for legal consent to the marriage of girls from ten to twelve years. Hindu Traditionalism and Conservatism have contested the humane and righteous change with a persistency indicating a consciousness that, if forced to yield here, they might as well fold their banners for a final retirement from the field of conflict with a humane and beneficent Christianity. But all Hindus have not occupied this position of hostility to a merciful reform. From the beginning of the controversy over this important subject, there has been a small, but influential, party of enlightened Hindus which persistently advocated the bill before the Government Council providing for this great and humane reform, and who now rejoice in the final adoption of the measure by the Council. The former opponents of the bill are now divided into two parties. The larger embraces the more moderate and conservative opponents of the reform, who now urge their former co-laborers to a loyal acceptance of it and an impartial trial of its merits. The storm is over; the reform is assured, and Christianity has won another memorable triumph in India.

Financial Effects of License.—M. R. Sooy, a prominent lawyer of Mt. Holly, N. J., has contributed to the Mirror of that place an article on the results that have been obtained from licensing the sale of liquors in that town.

The total revenue from licenses has been $8,500. The fees paid for arresting and committing to jail 2,061 drunken and disorderly persons during one year were $6,000.30. Jail expenses for same, $2,111.87.

The account then stands thus:

Expenses due to interference in Mount Holly	$9,211.67
Revenue derived from license in Mount Holly	3,500.00
Excess of expenses over revenue	$5,711.67

This sum is the direct loss. The indirect loss—the amount of life absolutely destroyed, the amount of industry sacrificed, the sorrow, the poverty, the profligacy, the waste of vital and financial resources—no arithmetic can calculate, no mortal powers can declare.

It is often claimed for high license that it would ultimately destroy the traffic by "taxing it to death." Our experience develops these facts:

1. That it does not reduce the number of drinking places; 2. That it does not restrict the amount of liquor sold; 3. That it does not abolish the worst places; 4. That it increases drunkenness, crime and pauperism.

How many more places will our judges license? They say that another hotel in Mount Holly is necessary and will conduce to the public good. Each new place licensed must have recruits. These recruits must come from our boys. What family has one to give? Unless these licensed places can get boys from them must close out, and the public revenue will dwindle. Have our judges any boys to contribute? If not, some other family will have to contribute more than its share. Is it fair that the public license places to destroy boys and then do nothing to keep up the supply?

The truth is that there is no question before the American people to-day that begins to match in importance the temperance question.

Old-Age Pensions.—Among the schemes that have been brought forward in England to relieve the pauperism that so largely exists, one proposes that a pension of £13 a year should be given to every person over sixty-five years of age. This in England and Wales would add about £14,000,000 to the cost of the Government. If this sum is raised by an income tax, it would benefit the whole people, while the wealthier class alone would provide the funds.

Chinese Coolie Emigration.—Henry Varley has written a letter to Lord Salisbury, stating that the Chinese coolies who are imported to Singapore are kept in confinement and shipped to various points "to a system of enforced labor, where they have no voice concerning their position, work or pay."

Obeah Worship in the West Indies.—The Public Ledger of Philadelphia publishes a communication from Dr. E. M. Aaron, who resided for a time in Jamaica, which asserts that the superstitious belief in Obeah—the worship of the snake—is still deeply rooted among the West Indian negroes. When he commenced house-keeping at Kingston, he found the trees in his yard were hung with charm-bottles to ward off ghosts and evil spirits. On grand occasions the instincts of the primitive savage seem to be awakened, the orgies are beyond description, and no white person could venture to intrude, but at the imminent peril of his life, and the whole scene becomes one of savage and drunken debauchery.

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 20, 1892.

As several inquiries and suggestions have reached the Editor of "THE FRIEND," respecting an anonymous circular which has recently been sent to some of our readers, it seems proper to reply to them collectively by stating that it was issued without the endorsement or knowledge of the "Contributors to the Friend," and that the Editor does not know who wrote it.

We have heard with much regret that the managers of the great Fair to be held at Chicago, under the auspices of the United States, to celebrate the 400th anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus, have decided to sell to liquor dealers the privilege of retailing their wares in its grounds.

We regret this because we believe that on the whole the business does more harm than good; and such permission, accompanied, as we believe it will be, with a seductive display of various kinds of intoxicating drinks, will lead many of the weak into temptation, and give a show of respectability to a pernicious traffic.

It is discreditably to those who control the management of this enterprise, that they should descend to such miserable expedients for providing for its expenses. It seems to us very much on a par with the plan of introducing into our agricultural fairs, horse races, with their attendant evils, in order to attract enough spectators to make the fairs pay. We believe it would be better for the morals and the real welfare of the country, that all fairs should be dropped, than that they be made sources of corruption to its inhabitants—for surely, "righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people."

The late excitement (now happily died away) that had its origin in a street squabble in Chili, in which some sailors from a United States vessel were concerned, gave a lively illustration of the danger which the advocates of peace foresaw, when the propositions to largely augment the navy of the United States were brought forward. The existence of military power is always a temptation to use it. During the recent discussions, it was stated in the public papers, that in army and navy circles the possibility of war was hailed with pleasure, as opening a channel for employment and for the acquisition of wealth or renown. The larger and more important these circles become, the more influence for evil they possess. Hence in Europe, where the preparations for war are on an enormous scale, and embrace a large part of the population, military men have so much influence in the governments, that the real interests and welfare of the people are often sacrificed to the views and desires of those high in station in the army and navy.

The danger to our country from this source will be increased as we increase our military preparations. A recent article in the Independent of New York, in enumerating "the things that make for war," mentions "the fact that we have naval and military schools to train men in the art of war, and the nucleus of an army and navy, with great guns, irresistible projectiles, impeneable armor plates, and the last and most improved war appliances. Our naval and military men want a chance to test these improvements. Their profession is war; they seek opportunity to practice it. Army and navy life is humdrum in peace; war is craved to stir the martial ardor. It is in these 'circles' at Washington that eagerness for war is displayed whenever a diplomatic controversy of unusual earnestness arises. The Government cannot but feel the impulse of this sentiment."

FAMINE IN RUSSIA.

We are glad to notice that public attention is becoming more and more awakened to the terrible suffering and probable great loss of life in many parts of Russia, arising from the failure of the crops caused by want of rain in its extensive plains east and southeast from Moscow.

We wish success to the efforts making in Great Britain and in this country to raise funds to be applied to the relief of the sufferers. It is especially important that this be done at an early day, as on the thawing of the ground in the spring, the country roads become so bad that the difficulty of supplying the impoverished districts will food will be greatly increased.

The Meeting for Sufferings of London have issued the following circular:

The attention of the Society of Friends having been called to the widespread distress occasioned by the Famine in Russia, two of their members, Edmund Wright Brooks, of Grays, Essex, and Francis William Fox, of Dean's Yard, Westminster, were willing, at the request of the Meeting for Sufferings, to undertake a journey to that country, with a view to personal investigation as to the extent of the calamity, and the possibility of affording effectual relief.

These Friends have now returned to this country. They have had interviews with influential persons in Petersburg and Moscow, from whom they have received assurances that their assistance will be cordially welcomed. They have also visited many of the important places to the south and southeast of Moscow, and on the banks of the Volga, in the famine-stricken districts, have made a tour through the villages in those districts, and have had several interviews with governors and other influential persons in the course of their journey. Their reports confirm our gravest apprehensions. The direct distress undoubtedly exists throughout extensive districts containing eighteen provinces, each of them with an area about as large as England. It is not only that the supplies of ordinary food are wanting in many places, but also sed for the future harvest.

In view of this great calamity which has been permitted to befall our brothers and sisters in Russia, we have decided to open a fund for their relief, which will be placed under the management of a committee, and in which a reply to the Meeting has been committed, and as treasurer we would say with the great satisfaction of adding that our friend Edmund Wright Brooks is willing again to go to Russia, and to make use of the knowledge and experience which he has already acquired, in superintending the distribution of the funds placed under the care of the Committee. It is, in his view, of urgent importance that prompt action should be taken, as the means of relief, which is now comparatively easy by sledge, &c., will become, in many places almost impracticable on the breaking up of the frost, which may be expected to take place in the early spring.

The Society of Friends feel that this is a rare opportunity for themselves and their fellow-Christians of other denominations in this country to manifest their sympathy and good feeling towards the people of Russia, in their distress, and they earnestly trust that their appeal may meet with a generous response.

Remittances may be forwarded to the Friends' Russian Famine Account, care of J. G. Barclay (Barclay & Co., 54 Lombard Street, E. C.).

Signed on behalf of a Special Meeting for Sufferings, held in London, First Month 15, 1892.

CALEB R. KEMP, Clerk.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The negotiations between the representatives of Canada and the Secretary of State of the United States, in regard to reciprocal trade relations, were formally opened in Washington on the 10th inst. by the Hon. Charles Blair. The Hon. Blair and the Commission were authorized to conclude a reciprocal treaty, they replied that they were not, whereupon the negotiation came to an abrupt termination.

Our Department of State confirms the report from London that Great Britain and the United States had agreed to invite the Governments of France, Sweden and Italy each to designate a person to serve as a member of the tribunal, to be selected to arbitrate the Behring Sea controversy.

This tribunal will have seven members, two representing the United States and two Great Britain, and three representing neutral Governments.

Representative Bland from the Committee on Coinage, Weights and Measures, reported to the House of Representatives, on the 10th inst., a bill for the free coinage of gold and silver and for the issue of coin notes. A minority of the committee presented on the 15th, a report in favor of the majority.

The Executive Committee of the Russian Relief Committee of New York has decided, in view of the charter of the steamer Indiana by Philadelphia, to send all contributions in kind to this city for shipment to St. Petersburg, and to send all money collected to the United States Mission at St. Petersburg. Twenty thousand barrels of flour are to be only a part of the cargo of the Indiana.

The Atlantic Transport line, through its President, B. N. Baker, of Baltimore, has offered to the North-western Miller the free services of the steamship Missouri to carry the 2,000 tons of food collected by it for the Russian famine sufferers.

A large party is to leave Anacortes, Washington, for Alaska, to explore and prospect the Yukon River.

On the 11th inst. Governor A. H. Burke, of North Dakota, who was in St. Paul, said that he wished "to see to it that 10,000 to 15,000 men for spring and summer work in his State." Owing to the extent and amount of the immense wheat crop of North Dakota could not be threshed last fall, and threshing has continued all winter, and is still going on.

A vein of tin, 100 feet in width, and said to be "run 15 to 20 feet in metal, is reported to have been discovered in the mountains, about fifty miles north of Denver, Colorado.

It is said that the postage stamps sold in New York last year aggregated thirteen tons in weight.

A brilliant display of the aurora borealis was visible on several days evening last, over a large portion of the United States, being observed throughout the Middle and New England States, as far west and north as Iowa and Michigan.

The Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company has secured the lease on the Lehigh Valley and Centennial New Jersey roads for a term of ninety-nine years. The Delaware, Lackawanna and Hudson R. R. being now under control of men favorable to the Reading, gives the latter company advantages of vast importance in connection with an eastern and western trade and the control of about 75 per cent. of the coal traffic of the State.

Typhus fever has been introduced into New York City through Russian emigrants from the famine districts.

The number of deaths reported in this city last week was 525; being 17 more than the previous week, and 111 more than the corresponding week of 1891. Of these foregoing, 273 were males, and 252 females; 82 died of pneumonia; 51 of consumption; 40 of disease of the heart; 31 of diphtheria; 25 of bronchitis;

22 of convulsions; 19 of old age; 18 of typhoid fever; 18 of influenza; 17 of inflammation of the brain; 15 of apoplexy; 14 of inanition; 13 of Bright's disease; and 12 of marasmus.

The number of deaths in London last week from influenza were only 314, the death rate falling from 40 to 30, and in Brighton descending to 25. There is, moreover, a general improvement in the general statistics of health all over the kingdom.

The Vienna correspondent of the London Grapic sends a dispatch to his paper about the suffering that exists among the laboring classes in that city. He states: "The destitution that prevails here at present is greater than it has been in many years. Thousands of respectable persons of the laboring classes are idle and starving through the operation of the new American tariff. A large percentage of the expert mechanics here are now emigrating to other countries, not doing so by conscription. The misery of the poor people in this city is enhanced by an influx from the provinces of a large number of persons who are out of employment and are flocking to Vienna in the hope of obtaining work. The total number of unemployed persons in this city amounts to 70,000. It is to be feared, however, that the extension of the city limits will give an impetus to building operations, and public works, which the Government is inaugurating, will also improve the present deplorable state of affairs."

Heavy snow storms are reported in the Tyrol. In the city of Innsbruck seven feet of deep and the closing of the railway to the north is interrupted and passes are completely blocked. Avalanches are frequent. The railway through Koppersthal has been obstructed by an avalanche of snow which it will take a month to clear away. The Danube is rising, threatening inundation.

Dr. Peters, in Berlin that Dr. Peters, the German explorer, has discovered a vast field of sulphate at Mount Kilimandjaro, Eastern Africa. It is said also that he has found bromine and chlorine springs, and that he has sent a consignment of bi-carbonate of sodium to the coast.

Poland is rapidly forcing itself forward upon the consideration of the neighboring nations as a problem of great magnitude. It is not alone that terrible international events threaten to agitate outside humanity, but the refugees are pouring over its frontiers by thousands, bringing with them a half-dozen different varieties of typhus, all peculiarly contagious and marvellously fatal. In the north, Germany and Austria are more exercised over this pestilence than they were during the influenza epidemic. Hospitals are being exterminated for these suffering swarms of strangers and manned by the medical staffs of the various regiments, and naturally renewed attention is being paid to guarding the frontiers. The Russian and the even more strenuous efforts of the Russian authorities to prevent their escape, the exodus of the Polish Jewish poor continues. They give incredible accounts of the horrors they left behind them, where the army of occupation devoured everything like a locust upon the wretched and famine, pestilence and anarchy desolate the land.

General Gourko has hastily gone to St. Petersburg to confer with the Czar on the situation, and it is reported from Berlin that the remedy he suggests is more troops. There are already some 400,000 quarters upon the unhappy kingdom, which is about the size of the State of New York.

Official notice has been given that a famine prevails in the Presidency of Bombay, and that the famine code will be applied over an area of 5,000 square miles in the districts of Bijapur, Belgaum and Dhawar.

A dispatch from Calcutta dated the 11th inst. says: "A petroleum well belonging to the Assam Railway Company has been sunk to the depth of 650 feet, at which point a vein was struck which is flowing at the rate of 700 barrels daily. This is taken to indicate that there is a rich supply of oil in the district in which the well is situated."

The great Chinese cyclopedia, consisting of 5,000 volumes, is the largest in the world.

The Japanese Parliament has voted half a million yen ($500,000) to enable Japan to take part in the World's Fair at Chicago.

At New Zealand, has been shaken by several earthquakes, which are supposed to be connected with the violent eruption of Mount Ngesuhoe. The flames from the volcano reach a great height, presenting a grand spectacle at night.

According to the latest data, as published in the "Popular Science Monthly," and there quoted from the "Encyclopedia Britannica," the population per square mile is as follows:—Europe, 94; Asia, 47; Africa, 14; America; 8; Australia, 1; Oceanic Islands, 10; while the population of the Polar regions is much less than one per 20 square miles.

The Ameer of Bokhara has informed Baron Wrecks, Governor-General of the Russian Empire, that, having heard of the distress in Russia and the great sympathy for the Russian Throne, he has decided to contribute the sum of 100,000 roubles to the Famine Relief Fund, of which the Czarewitch is President.

DIED, at his home near Estacado, Crosby County, Texas, First Month 22, 1892, GEORGE SCHILL, Cox, in the seventieth year of his age. He was born in Randolph County, North Carolina, 1822; a member of Holly Spring Monthly Meeting of Friends. While living in Guilford County, N. C., he was appointed an Elder by Deep River Monthly Meeting. In 1881 he left his home and came to Westwood, Pa., where he was joined by a father in the church and been loved and respected by other denominations, also by non-professors. He was confined near two months with general debility, which he bore with patience, desiring that he might go and be with those that were gone before.

At her residence, First Month 14, 1892, SARAH SCHILL, wife of George Schill. A beloved member and an active worker in the Holly and Elksland Particular Meetings of Friends, Penna. Aged seventy years, and ten days. She was an example of true simplicity, adorning the doctrine she preached by a consistent life and conversation. Her communications were generally brief and weighty, having the savor of life. She was faithful in doing what she believed to be required of her, and in her conduct she was a pattern to all of her kindness and care of others. She was careful to attend all her religious meetings when health permitted. As she drew near the close she was deeply exercised on account of some in the neighborhood, especially the young, and imparted much good counsel and advice to them. She was calm and resigned and could say, "Not my will but thine, O God, be done! Through redeeming love and mercy her relatives and friends believe she has been permitted to enter one of those mansions prepared for the righteous of all generations.

Second Month 8, 1892, after a short illness of the prevailing influenza, MARY WRIGHT, in the eighty-sixth year of her age, died at her close was calm and peaceful. She was buried beside the husband of her youth, who preceded her to the grave in 1829. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord," they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them." (Continued from page 234.)

1853.—Fifth Month 9th. "Since returning from Delaware and Chester Counties, in the Third Month, I have been almost entirely shut up in silence. The country, after frequent showers, has a beautiful verdure, and appears likely to be covered with rich crops of grain and grass, for the subsistence of rebellious man. What multitudes of blessings we have to be thankful for. So great iniquity abounding in the land, these bounties are an evidence of the compassion and long-forebearance of a merciful God, who continues to cause the rain to descend, and the sun to shine, on the just and on the unjust, and the earth regularly to yield such abundant food for man and beast."

"Sixth Month 15th. In our own meeting, I was not easy when near time to close, without mentioning the parable, in which our Lord compared the kingdom of heaven to 'A net that was cast into the sea and gathered of every kind; which when it was full, they drew to shore, and sat down and gathered the good into vessels, but cast the bad away.' And it is said, 'So shall it be at the end of the world; the angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from the just.' It appeared to me that many had the offers of salvation by the grace of God in their hearts, and had in days past given up to it in degree, but through negligence and disobedience, were in danger of suffering the time to pass away unimproved; and awful will be their condition, if the end of all things here, comes to them in this state."

"31st. I was engaged in our First-day Morning Meeting, in declaring our faith in the Divine authority and the value of the Holy Scriptures; also in the universality of the gift of Divine grace, through our Lord Jesus Christ; by which the work of regeneration and sanctification is effected in the heart of man, and he is brought up into the image of God, in which Adam was created, and from which he fell by transgression. Holy help was mercifully extended, opening these Divine, essential truths with clearness, and clothing with authority to communicate them; so that, I trust, they reached the witness in some hearts present."

"Eighth Month 11th. I felt drawn in love to Friends of Salem Quarterly Meeting, and went to Woodbury through some discouragements; where I was kindly received by many Friends. The removal by death of several substantial and elderly members out of this meeting, is keenly felt by the rightly-concerned among them. But it seems to me, though we may not always be able to see it, that the Lord is leading some of the young ones in secret, to look at the condition of Zion, and to long for her strength and enlargement. Whatever may be the discouragements which this class, and those of deeper experience may endure, if they look to Him, He will sustain through all, bring them up out of low places, and cause them, if faithful to his pointings, to go on their way rejoicing. 'The Lord's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance; He found him in a desert land, and in the waste, howling wilderness; He led him about, He instructed him, He kept him as the apple of his eye.' It is often He thus instructs his children, and prepares them for service in his church; and as they are entirely devoted to Him, He gives them gifts to be occupied for the edification of others, and their own salvation.

"In his renewed mercy, He raised me up to declare of his goodness and compassion, and my belief that a succession of testimony and standard-bearers, would be again and again raised up among us, to maintain the principles and testimonies which He called our forefathers to promulgate. It was a season of renewed favor and comfort to us, and I hope some were cheered and strengthened, and the praise ascribed to Him to whom alone it belongs. In the afternoon returned home peaceful."

"Ninth Month 8th. In conversation on the peculiar state of our Society, and in reference to the wishes of some for separation, I took the opportunity to say that I did not unite with Friends running out of a back door, to get away from trouble. Our place is to stand firm and face it openly, contending for the truth, and opposing wrong things as they appear. Separation deprives those who leave, of the opportunity of opposing error in the members from whom they have separated; and none know how soon something may again arise among themselves, to create contention, and lead to another separation. If we keep our places, and bear a faithful testimony for the truth, and against all departures from it, though at the time we do not see the effect, yet we may believe that the Lord will carry that testimony home to the hearts of some, so that it will arise from time to time with convincing power, and finally prevail. Jerusalem is a burdensome stone, to those who would pervert and turn judgment backward, and the Lord can save by few or by many."

"25th. We have had a good meeting this morning at Orange Street. My dear wife addressed those who were brought under conviction for their empty, fruitless manner of life, and were now favored to see the need of a change. Near the close, I underwent the humiliating service of vocal supplication, in much brokenness, for the deliverance of such souls out of bondage and Egyptian darkness; and that during the Divine administration of judgment, they might know the Spirit of the Lord lifted up, as a standard against the enemy, who would seek to frustrate his work in them. Also, for the Lord's children; that as He knew the trials, fears and buffetings they passed through, He would not forsake them; but renew their faith, and keep them in the hollow of His Omnipotent hand, that so they may show forth the efficacy of the religion of the Son of God, for the sake of those among whom they dwell, and for generations yet to come: that from the rising of the sun, to the going down of the same, his great Name, and the name of his dear Son, may be glorified and magnified, and through mercy, salvation may be granted to us in the end."

"Tenth Month 9th. I felt impelled to bring to view the great difference there is between those who, according to the apostolic injunction, pray without ceasing, and in everything give thanks, and those who rarely pray, and who feel thankful for none of the blessings they partake of; which is truly a fearful condition. It appeared to me, if we live in the element of prayer and thanksgiving, there will be Divine life, and a fervent concern for the support and promotion of the cause and kingdom of Christ. But when the rich ride on the pale horse, whose name is death, is sent to our habitation, what hope can those have who neglect true prayer, but have been wrapped up in their own selfishness and the things of time, without gratitude for favors; and have turned the back on the convicting power of Divine Grace? They may cry, if they have the time granted to do it, Lord, have mercy upon me! but how can they expect mercy, seeing they have rejected the calls of the Lord, when He visited and extended to them the offers of his mercy, and they refused to receive and obey Him. Another class was also present, who are concerned to dwell in the spirit of prayer for strength and preservation; and to give thanks in the fire and in the waters, which are not permitted to kindle upon or to overwhelm them. I thought Divine help was extended, and that the power of Christ was felt among us.

"19th. This morning, under a humbling sense of the many mercies which have been extended to me, I was contrited to tears before my gracious Heavenly Father, and enabled to breathe to Him fervent prayer, that He would be pleased in his mercy, to preserve me from doing anything that would grieve his Holy Spirit, wound my own soul, or the precious cause which He has called us to support before the world. Secret desires were also raised for our religious Society, that He would defend it, and the tribulated sufferers in it, from the enemy that is seeking to divide and scatter us, and prevent us from exalting the doctrines and testimonies of the Gospel, as they have been opened unto us by the power of the Holy Spirit."

"Eleventh Month 7th. For many days I have been shut up, and all ability to preach the Gos-

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Shawnees were removed to west of the Mississippi in 1832 and 1833. Friends followed up their proteges, and renewed their labors for the welfare of these people; which, indeed, are still continued.

As an evidence that these labors were appreciated, we quote from Harvey's book, his account of a farewell interview with about twenty of the chiefs and councillors in 1842, when he was preparing to leave them and return to Ohio. They came early in the morning and spent the day. "In the afternoon they saddled their horses, and tied them near the bars, and then returned to where we had been sitting. When evening drew near, I observed them become very solemn and thoughtful. Soon they divided something among themselves that looked like fine seeds.

"One of the chiefs, who acted as interpreter, informed me that they were now ready to return home. They wanted me to have everybody but my wife and children leave the house, and for us to arrange ourselves in order, according to our ages, so they could take a last look at each one of us, and bid us farewell. Henry Clay came to the door, looked in, saw us all standing in order on the floor, and then returned to the others, when they came into the house, one after another, according to their stations. John Perry first took my hand, and said, 'Farewell, my brother.' Then taking my wife by the hand, said, 'My sister, farewell.' Tears streamed down his aged cheek, as he bid our children adieu, talking all the time to them in the Shawnee language. The others followed in the same way. Some of them were crying, and trying to talk to our children, as they held them by the hand. The children cried the whole time, as if they were parting with one another. The ceremony lasted for some time. When they were through, every one started directly and mounted their horses, and set off for their homes across the prairie, one after another. Not one looked back, but they observed the same order as if they were returning from a funeral."

Since the preceding paragraph was written, I have received from a Friend in Baltimore, a summary account of the different visits paid to the Indians beyond the Ohio by Friends of Baltimore, from which the following is taken:

The tribes of Indians visited were the Miamis, at Turdetown, eighteen miles from Fort Wayne, on Eel River. Their chief was "Little Turtle," a very noted Indian, who made one or two visits to Baltimore and Washington; one in 1802. Also the Pottowattomies, on river St. Josephs, (tributary to Lake Michigan), forty miles from Fort Wayne. Their chief was "Five Medals." We sent a Committee in Ninth Month, 1803, who went on horseback to visit Fort Wayne. Also Gerald T. Hopkins and two Friends who made a visit in 1804, leaving Second Month 23d, by way of Loudon Co., Virginia, stopping at Winchester, Red Stone, &c. They took out a Friend, Philip Dennis, who remained several years, as instructor in farming, &c., to the Miamis.

In Sixth Month, 1799, our Committee, Evan Thomas (father of Philip E. Thomas) and others visited the Wyandotts on the Upper Sandusky. Their chief was "Tarhie" (the crane), a well-known and noted Indian of that day.

The Committee of 1804 took two young Friends from Red Stone, one a carpenter and the other a blacksmith, who were employed upon arrival at Fort Wayne to teach the Indians, and paid by the Government. Probably the first case of this kind on record. History is now repeating itself!

Gerald T. Hopkins and his party—George Ellicott and Joel Wright—returned by way of Detroit, the Lakes to Niagara by vessel, then horseback to Buffalo and Albany, and vessel to New York City, thence horseback to Philadelphia and Baltimore. They visited the Seneca Indians, of the Six Nations, en route. This tribe was then virtually civilized and had over $100,000 in United States Bank stocks, the proceeds of sale of their land to the Government. They also visited the Oneida tribe, near Oneida Lake, Utica.

Philadelphia Friends aided our Committee in furnishing supplies, seeds, farm implements, &c., to the Indians, about this date.

The first Indian Committee of Baltimore Yearly Meeting was appointed 1795. They were directed to collect money in aiding the Indian work. This Committee addressed a letter to the Six Nations. In Fifth Month, 1796, the Baltimore Committee appointed a sub-committee to visit the Delawares, Shawnees, Wyandotts, etc., "northwest of the Ohio River." They took letters of introduction from Timothy Pickering, United States Secretary of State, then in Philadelphia, dated Fifth Month 31, 1796, addressed to Governor St. Clair of Ohio, General Wayne, at Fort Wayne, etc., etc. Gen. Wayne was then commanding at Fort Wayne military post.

In Fifth Month, 1797, a sub-committee also visited the Wyandott nation, at Sandusky, and the Delawares and Shawnees and other tributary tribes.

In Twelfth Month, 1798, visited Georgetown, Ohio (via Red Stone) and the Tuscaroras. In Ninth Month, 1798, Philadelphia Friends visited the Wyandotts near Detroit.

In Second Month, 1799, the Miamis wanted Friends to send instructors to them. Thomas Wistar, clerk of the Philadelphia Committee, wrote to our Committee on this subject, requesting joint action.

In Fifth Month 7, 1799, Baltimore sent Committee to visit the Wyandotts on the Upper Sandusky. The other tribes then visited were the Weas, Eel Rivers, Pinkashaws, Kickapoos, Kaskaskias, Chippewas and Ottawas.

In 1802 the Committees memorialized Congress to stop the sales of whiskey to the Indians by the traders and others in Ohio. Laws were enacted authorizing the President to take steps to stop the liquor traffic, also providing for temporary Indian Agents, to furnish domestic animals and farming implements and utensils to the Indians.

In 1803 our Yearly Meeting appointed a large "Standing Committee on Indian Affairs." Philip E. Thomas, Secretary, and Elias Ellicott, Treasurer. The latter had been serving as Treasurer to the temporary Committee since 1795. He remained in office till his death in 1827.

In an Epistle from Virginia Yearly Meeting issued in 1830, it is stated that their numbers had become so reduced, as to lead them to look towards the dissolution of their Yearly Meeting, and that they had requested North Carolina and Baltimore Yearly Meetings to send deputations to their next Yearly Meeting to assist them in deliberating on this subject. Their weak condition, they say, is produced "principally from the removal of many of our members to States where slavery does not exist; and also pel has been withdrawn, as though I should never more be called into the work. I have been almost destitute of any sense of the quickening power; and I saw that no former openings or favors would give the least ability or authority to put forth a hand in this solemn and weighty work. I have endeavored to keep inward, and looking to the Lord, though I could not see or feel Him present; yet I believed it was the only place of safety, and the right way to be profited by these stripping dispensations. None know the feelings of destitution, produced by the absence of the Beloved of souls, but those who have been bound to Him in the everlasting covenant, and can be satisfied with nothing but the balm which He gives, and the fresh arisings of the Sun of Righteousness, with healing in his wings. Here is exercised and known the faith and the patience of the saints. As these are steadily kept, these dispensations purge man from all confidence in his own wisdom and strength, and bring him to see that he is nothing; and that nothing but the renewed visitation and putting forth of the blessed and compassionate Saviour, can ever qualify for the work of the ministry; or any other religious service in the church."

"23d. Our Monthly Meeting was held to-day. The subject of purchasing a piece of ground out of the city for a graveyard, was before us, and the proposition to do so adopted. I felt drawn to express the desire, that if it should be accomplished, we might keep to our plain way of interring the dead, without any kind of ornament, or monument about the graves. If a proper place is procured, safely and substantially inclosed, and put in charge of a suitable, trusty caretaker, and the bodies decently interred, it is all we need. The dust shall return to the earth as it was, and the spirit unto God who gave it. But if we depart, by little and little, from our religious testimonies to the purity and simplicity of the Gospel of Christ, in our humble manner of living, or our plain way of laying out and burying the dead, we shall fall by little and little, and gradually lose the character we have once had as a body of humble, spiritually-minded Christians. Several Friends expressed their full unity with the remarks I made on the occasion."

THE OPERA, THEATRE AND CIRCUS.—The editor of The Waycross Herald, who has had a personal experience of the stage, thus sets forth in his paper, published in Georgia, what he holds to be consistency to his convictions in relation to theatre:—

"From and after this date, the columns of this paper will be closed against opera, theatre, and circus advertisements. The editor feels that he cannot comply strictly with his Christian profession, the aims of the church, and the religion of Jesus Christ, by selling his columns for advertising such amusements, thereby drawing revenue from them. This conclusion has been arrived at after a day of thought and prayer, and while this course may cause some loss financially and severe criticism generally, he believes that God and the Christians of Waycross will sustain him."

THE LIGHT OF CHRIST.—An evil spirit in man is the root of all evil deeds; so every deed that proceeds from that root is to be mortified; and nothing can manifest such deeds giving us a true sight thereof, but the Spirit of the Lord, or light of righteousness in our own hearts, as it comes to shine in brightness.

from the departure of many of our youth from the testimonies and simplicity of our ancestors." The result of these deliberations was, that the time for taking so important a step had not fully arrived.

The subject was again revived in 1842, when Virginia Friends requested North Carolina, Baltimore and Philadelphia Yearly Meetings to appoint committees to attend their next Yearly Meeting, and advise with them as to what should be done in the reduced condition of their meeting.

In 1843 their Epistle states, that they believe the time has fully come when this ancient Yearly Meeting should be suspended. The meeting was united to that of Baltimore, the few Friends remaining in Virginia forming a Half-Yearly Meeting subordinate to Baltimore Yearly Meeting. In 1844 was held the last gathering of Virginia Friends as an independent body.

Virginia never appears to have proved a very fruitful soil for the growth of Quakerism. For though the wonder-working power of Divine Grace produced there as well as elsewhere noble specimens of Christian character, as manifested in the consistent Friends who were raised up in its limits; yet the population generally were in early times members of the established Church of England, and but scant tolerance was given by the laws to other professors of the Christian name.

In 1662 an act was passed, imposing a fine of 2,000 pounds of tobacco (then the recognized currency) on every person who refused to have his child baptized by a lawful minister. No marriage was to be reputed valid in law, but such as is made by the minister.

In 1663 it was enacted—"If any Quaker or other separatists whatsoever in this colony, assemble themselves together to the number of five or more, of the age of sixteen years or upwards, under the pretence of joining in a religious worship not authorized in England or this country, the parties so offending, shall for the first offence forfeit and pay 200 pounds of tobacco; for the second offence, 500 pounds of tobacco; and for the third offence, shall be banished the colony of Virginia."

A fine of 5,000 pounds of tobacco was to be levied on every master of a vessel that should bring any Quaker to reside in Virginia; and the same penalty was prescribed for any one who should entertain any Quaker in or near his house, to teach or preach.

At the time of the revolutionary war, Friends in Virginia suffered much for adherence to the principles of peace, as they would not bear arms, serve in the militia or hire substitutes. Great spoil was made of their goods on this account, and their personal property was sold under the hammer to raise these public demands.

Among the dissenters who suffered in Virginia for their religion, the Baptists were conspicuous. About the middle of the eighteenth century, they increased much in numbers, and many of their preachers were imprisoned for preaching. In Middlesex County there was a young man named John Walter, who gave himself up to wickedness, and for his profanity had acquired the name of "Swearing Jack Walter." He was furious against the Baptists, and a member of a Grand Jury who had presented one of their ministers for preaching. The jury being dismissed, the clergyman thanked them for the honor they had done him, and added: "While I was wicked and injurious you took no notice of me, but since I have altered my course of life, and endeavored to reform my neighbors, you concern yourselves much about me. I shall take the spoiling of my goods joyfully." This meekness of the preacher touched the heart of Walter, and it resulted in his conversion, and becoming himself a pastor among the Baptists.

The increase of the dissenters in numbers and political power was shown by the efforts made to secure the repeal of the law by which all the people were assessed for the support of the Episcopal clergy. The first step gained in this contest was the exemption of dissenters from this assessment for the year 1776. This exemption was annually renewed for several years, until in 1779 the laws for the support of the clergy were unconditionally repealed.

NATIONAL HONOR.—A great deal is said just now in the columns of the press about our national honor. It is not quite clear what is meant when that term is used.

The same rules ought to govern the national conscience which apply to the individual conscience, with respect to honor. Can the dealings of a collection of people be subject to a different moral code from that which regulates the conduct of private persons? Is not national honor essentially the same as personal honor, and to be guarded with the same sort of care?

If a man strikes me, am I to return the blow for the sake of preserving my honor? Nay, it is the honor of my antagonist that is injured by his assault. He cannot hurt my honor by any action of his. His failure to make apology for insulting me does not impair my honor. If our citizens remembered this simple truth it is probable we should not be so anxious to insist on a reparation of our national honor from Chile. Our honor is certainly not in the hands of Chile or any other power. It is in our own keeping, and will be just exactly what we make it.

If we do right our honor will be unstained; if we commit wrong we do it violence.

There is danger that in precipitating a war we may dishonor our fair name. Let our high-minded men speak out and stem the tide of disgraceful sensationalism which is threatening to involve the American reputation.—T. WISLAR BROWN, JR., in the Public Ledger.

Philadelphia, First Month 26th, 1892.

In the British Friend, J. Rendel Harris speaks as follows of some points of difference between the early Christian gatherings and those of modern times. He says:—

"My impression is, that if the saints of the first century could come to life again, there would be two things that would startle them more than all the changes which nineteen centuries have necessarily made in our modes of life; the first would be the death of the Holy Spirit in Christian assemblies, the second the merchandise that is made of things divine.

This zeal for hiring our brother out to be inspired for us, reminds me of a trick which was practised in some heathen temples in times not very remote from our Lord. The cunning priests had a curious sacrificial vessel or fountain, which normally was inactive, but flowed freely when the worshipper introduced money. Modern science has explained and exposed the secret of Hero's fountain; but no modern wisdom can explain away the singular analogy that there is between this old device of the heathen temples and the order of Christian worship in the later centuries."

Extracts from "My Christian Experience."

BY T. G. TAYLOR, THE CONVERTED CONVICT.

THE BELIEVER'S COURSE IS A WARFARE.

It requires real courage to be never ashamed of Christ and his words. There are times and places in life, in which it is easy for a Christian to be on the side of truth, when all about him are professed Christians, and hold to his own view of Christ's truth, he can go with the crowd conscientiously. But when alone among his polite scoffers, when irreligious and fashionable visitors look upon him with scorn and contempt; and, harder still, when his daily companions speak slightly of truths which he deems vital to Christ's cause, then it is not so easy to be true to his convictions and to Him whom he professes to serve. But fidelity to Christ in these testing times, is the fidelity on which He pivots his eternal recognition of us as his faithful followers, and the reward for this shall be peace.

Traveller o'er life's rugged pathway
We shall meet with many foes;
But we have this thought to cheer us,
Every conflict, Jesus knows.

Jesus marks each weary footstep
When the burden heavy grows;
He is ever near to help us
For our weakness, Jesus knows.

ONE STICK AT A TIME.

I compare the troubles which we have to undergo, to a great bundle of faggots far too large for us to lift, but God does not require us to lift it all at once. He mercifully unties the bundle and gives us first one stick which we are to carry to-day, and another which we are to carry to-morrow, and so on. This we might easily manage if we would only take the burden appointed for us each day, but we choose to increase our trials by carrying yesterday's sticks over again, and adding to-morrow's burden to our load before we are required to bear it.

Now, Christian brother, if thou art considering whether thou art sufficient for the trials that threaten thee—for the duties that devolve upon thee, and for the responsibilities that are before thee—hear what Christ says, "As thy days, so shall thy strength be."

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform."

Nothing is more impossible than for the carnal heart to serve God acceptably, therefore God in his unerring wisdom often takes ways which seem strange to us, to change the current of our thoughts and draw our affections from earth to heaven; and we should ever bear in mind that He is our kind Benefactor, and the way He appoints is the best for us. Our songs of joy may sometimes be turned to sorrow, but this sorrow eventually brings forth fruit, more to be desired than all the treasures of the earth.

Some sad reverse may suddenly deprive us of all home comforts, and perhaps we may be forsaken by friends and relatives; but it is when the heart is hardened with sorrow which no human aid can relieve, that we learn how precious is Divine aid. Trials and afflictions help us to unbar the door of our hearts, and invite the Comforter in, bringing joy and peace, which the world can never afford, and teaching us patience, and humility and tenderness of heart.

SPRINGVILLE, IOWA, First Month, 1892.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"
ICE-BOUND.

BY JESSE EDGEMONT.

Our Whittier sang of "Snow-Bound,"
And tuned his touching lays
To the rhythm of old time,
And simple country ways.

Be mine the humbler duty,
The theme as grand and true—
To tell of nature ice-bound
This year of Ninety-two.

'Twas winter, and the fallen snow
Was white on wood and field; the glow
Of evening faded into night,
Yet not to darkness, for the light
Of the full moon came drifting down,
In slushy waves upon the town.
Not the clear silver glow that seems
The ideal moonlight of our dreams,
But tangled in the murky bars
Of haze and mist, that quite shut out
The twinkling of the silent stars,
But, compensating, wrote about
The moon's pale face, an aureole,
Fresh from Refraction's mystic hand,
Which Nature's children understand
Portends the coming of the storm.

Down the long streets the serried ranks
Of incandescent lamps aglow,
Flung out their dazzling rays, that fell
In sparkling whiteness on the snow;
And falling from the maple boughs
Which in the chill wind swing and sway
The moving shadows sharp and dark,
On pavement and on sidewalk lay.
While darkly rising high aloft,
Were ghostly spire and spectral roof.

And thus the night came down. The wind
Was moaning fretfully without;
Within, the cheerful hearth about,
Is gathered from the toil and care
Of the world's tasks, its work and wear,
The members of the household band.
Happy the man for whom the night
Brings rest and comfort, and the bright
Enjoyment of the social life
Of home, where mother, sister, wife
Or children sanctify and bless
His lot with love and tenderness.

When morning woke the world again
From slumber; on the widow pane
We heard the music of the rain,
The patter of the tiny feet
And solemn voices of the sleet.

And thus all day the clouds that hung
Low, over wood, and field, and town,
From out their folds of darkness lung
Their wealth of liquid droplets down,
Which freezing as it fell, became
Of other form and other name.

The day, of darkness and of rain,
Without a glimpse of sun or sky
To cheer its brevity, went by
And brought the silent night again.

Thus pass our days of sorrow,
Thus come our nights of tears,
But we find that God's to-morrow
Is brighter than our fears;
And we find the cherished sweetness,
And the ecstasy of life
Are following up the bitterness,
The anguish and the strife;
And Heaven's angelic anthem,
The discord of our life.

So, when the morrow came again
Forgotten was the gloom and rain.
We only saw the beauty spread
Around, beneath and overhead.
Far south the sun rose; and his rays
Kindled the tree tops in a blaze
Of glory, which the artist's skill
May never copy. On the hill
The forest trees were bending low
With burnished silver all aglow.

Upon the nearer shrubs and trees
The icy sheathing hung, and these
With hues prismatic greet the eye
Like those that arch the summer sky.

Even the unsightly weeds that grew
Upon the roadside now became
The peers in fact, if not in name,
Of lily white and violet blue.

Hung from the eaves o'erhead
Fung like a thousand crystal spears,
Forged by the frost-king from the tears
The dark and pitying clouds had shed.

The drifts of snow beside the road,
In beauteous forms and bold designs
With sweeping curves and graceful lines
In the same brilliant armor glowed.

Poles on the street-side in the sun
Stand glistening, and the wires that run
From post to post like ropes of glass,
Through which the electric currents play,
Catch up the sunbeams as they pass,
And fling them glorified away.

Such lavish beauty everywhere!
Such loveliness of field and wood!
Even the pure transparent air
Seems throbbing with the voiceless prayer
Of Nature in her rev'rent mood.

Teach me, O Father, more to see,
That all the beautiful and grand
In Nature, speaks aloud of Thee,
And gladly owns Thy forming hand.

That all the sparkling gems of light,
That dance and glitter in our sight,
Ruby and sapphire, that a king
Might envy, Thou alone could bring
To grace the shining earth to-day
And render beautiful and sweet
The footsteps of Thy glorious feet.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 245.

IN THE TIGER JUNGLE.

But now a new, and seemingly insurmountable difficulty confronted us. The dank jungle, the rain, the fever, the tigers, had been taken into account; but in spite of them we had determined to push through and reach the second cataract before the Sunday. But difficulties breed. We now met two fleet-footed, daring huntsmen, who had been down to a point two miles beyond, to inspect their traps, and were on the full run back to shelter for the night. Swift and sure of foot, with no impediment, they could, before dark, make the last village we had passed as we entered the jungle in the morning.

We halted then to inquire of the region ahead. We knew that some two miles in front was an affluent of the Godavery, which ran down from the bluffs to our right, and which we had expected to ford, and pitch our camp for the night on an open knoll a little distance beyond it, where, with bright camp-fires and watchfulness, we could pass the night in comparative safety. But from these hunters we learned that the back-water of the Godavery flood, which was thirty feet higher than usual, had made these streams absolutely unfordable.

"Was there no boat?"

"None."

"No material for a raft?"

"None whatever."

And on the hunters dashed for safety. The two royal guides and I had called them apart, alone, and questioned them. The guides knew the country well, but this unprecedented high back-water was entirely unexpected, and they seemed dazed by the news. The party kept plodding on. We were marching about a mile to the south of the Godavery and parallel with it. Two miles further south were the high bluffs; but with dense, impenetrable, thorny rattan jungle between us and them. The country between river and bluff was flat and flooded.

We knew of only this one knoll beyond this affluent where we could encamp. Ten miles beyond it again was another affluent; but that would be flooded as much as this. Still, could we not in some way get across this one and secure safety for one night?

"Guides! If we press on to this little river can we not make a raft of some kind and get over before dark?"

"Alas! there are no dry trees," they said, "and these green jungle trees will sink of themselves in the water, even if there were time to fell them."

"This I knew to be true.

"Is there no knoll on this side that we can pitch on?"

"No, from the river to bluff it is all like this."

We were standing in wet and mud as we talked. "Keep marching on. I will consider what to do."

I drew back and rode behind the marching column. The native preachers had partly overheard the statement about the cross river being unfordable. From my countenance, as I fell back, they gathered that we were in straits. "They knew that in an hour it would be sunset. Dense clouds even now made it seem growing dark. Already could we hear the occasional fierce, hungry roar of the tigers in the rattan jungle at our right. I said not a word to my assistants, but I spoke to God. As my horse tramped on in the marshy path, my heart went up and claimed the promised presence. "Master! Was it not for thy sake that we came here? Did we not covenant with thee for the journey through? Have we not faithfully preached thy name the whole long way? Have we shirked any danger, have we quailed before any foe? Didst thou not promise 'I will be with you?' Now we need thee. We are in blackest danger for this night. Only thou canst save us from this jungle, these tigers, this flood. O Master! Master! show me what to do."

An answer came; not audible, but distinct as though spoken in my ear by human voice: "Turn to the left, to the Godavery, and you will find rescue." Riding rapidly forward, I overtook the guides. "How far is it to the Godavery?"

"A good mile."

"Is there no village on its bank?"

"No, none within many miles; and the banks are all overflooded."

"Is there no mound, nor rising ground on which we could camp, out of this water?"

"It is all low and flat like this."

I drew apart, and prayed again, as we still plodded on. Again came the answer: "Turn to the left, to the Godavery, and you will find rescue." Again I called the guides and questioned them. "Are you sure there is no rising ground by the river, where we can pitch, with the river on one side for protection, and camp fires around us, on the other, through the night?"

"None, whatever."

"Think well. Is there no dry timber, of which we could make a raft?"

"If there were any it would all be washed away by these floods."

"Is there no boat, of any sort on the river? I have authority to seize anything I need."

"None nearer than the cataract."

"How long would it take us to reach the Godavery by the nearest path?"

"Half an hour; but it would be so much time lost, for we would have to come back here and cut our way through this jungle to the bluff, and climb that. There is no other way of getting around these two flooded streams that we must pass to reach the cataract."

"How long would it take to cut our way through to the bluff?"

"At least six hours, and it will be dark in an hour."

"What shall we do for to-night?"

"God knows," and they looked the despair that they felt.

I drew aside again, and prayed, as I rode on. "Turn to the left, to the Godavery, and you will find rescue," came the response the third time. It was not audible. None of those near heard it. I cannot explain it, but to me it was as distinct as though spoken by a voice in my ear. It thrilled me. "God's answer to my prayer," said I. "I cannot doubt, I must act, and that instantly."

Hastening forward to the guides, at the head of the column, "Halt!" said I, in a voice to be heard by all. "Turn sharp to the left. Guides, show us the shortest way to the Godavery. Quick!" They remonstrated stoutly; that it was only labor lost, but that we should be in a worse plight there than here, for the river might rise higher and wash us away in the darkness of the night. "Obey!" said I. "March sharp, or night will come. I am master here, and intend to be obeyed. Show the way to the river."

All the party had surrounded me. My native preachers looked up inquiringly at my awed face. "There is rescue at the river," was all I said. How could I say more? Provisionally, we had just come to where an old path led at right angles to our former course, and directly toward the river, and down that path we went. The step of all was quicker than before. "The Dhora has heard of some help at the river," I overheard the coolies say to one another. I had heard of help; but what it was I knew not. My anxiety seemed to have gone. There was an intense state of expectancy in its place. Half a mile from the river I spurred forward past the guides. I knew the coolies would not desert me now. There was no place of safety they could reach for the night. They would cling around me for protection.

I entered out from among the bushes to the bank, keenly observant. There, right under my feet, was a large flat-boat, tied to a tree at the shore, with two men upon it trying to keep it afloat in the rising and falling current.

"How did this boat get here?" said I.

"Oh, sir, don't be angry with us," said the boatmen, taking me to be an officer of the British India Government, to whom the boat belonged, and thinking I was taking them to task for not keeping the boat on its proper station; "we tried our best to keep the boat from coming here; but, sir, it seemed as though it was possessed. This morning we were on our station, on the upper river, caring for the boat as usual, when a huge rolling wave came rushing down the river and snapped the cables and swept the boat into the current. We did our utmost to get it back to that bank of the river, but it would go further and further out into the current. The more we pulled for the British bank, the more it would work over toward the Nizam's

We have fought all day to keep it from coming here, but it seemed as though a supernatural power was shoving the boat over, and an hour ago we gave up and tied it here and tied it up for safety to this tree. Don't be angry, sir; as soon as the river goes down, or gets smooth, we will get the boat back where it belongs. Don't have us punished for letting it come here. We could not help it."

"All right, my men," said I; "I take command of this boat. I have authority to use any Government property I require on this journey. I shall use the boat and reward you well, and give you a letter to your superior that will clear you of all blame."

The boat, a large flat-boat, with strong railings along both sides, and square cuds to run upon the shore, had been built by the British military authorities in the troublous times following the mutiny in those regions, and placed on an affluent of the Godavery, higher up, on the north bank, to ferry artillery and elephants across in their punitive expeditions; and it was still kept there. These men were paid monthly wages to keep it always ready, at its station, in case of sudden need.

Who had ordered that tidal wave in the morning of that day that had torn it from its moorings and driven it so many miles down the river; that had thwarted every endeavor of the frightened boatmen to force it to the north shore, and had brought it to the little cove-like recess, just where we would strike the river? Who but He on whose orders we had come? He who had said: "I will be with you;" He who knew beforehand the dire straits in which we would be, in that very place, on that very day, that very hour. He who had told us so distinctly: "Turn to the left, to the Godavery, and you will find rescue?" I bowed my head, and, in amazed reverence, I thanked my God for this signal answer to our pleading prayer.

The guides now came in sight through the bushes, with all the party following, and looked dazed as they saw me quietly arranging to put our whole party on the boat for the night; and I heard some say to others: "How did the Dhora know of this boat being here, and come right out on it? None of us knew of it." To my native preachers I simply said: "God heard our prayers, and this is the answer;" for I knew that they had been praying on foot while I was praying on horseback. "Yes," said they, reverently. "He has heard our prayer, and delivered us. We will never doubt Him again."

We pitched our raoti, or long, low, soldier's tent upon the boat. It exactly covered it, so that we tied the eaves of the tent to the railings of the boat, and made a tight house and a secure abode for the night, and within it the whole party were able to gather, with all the baggage. Before dark all hands had gathered a sufficiency of wood and brush to keep a bright camp fire burning through the night on the shore, at the end of the boat. It had not rained for the last hour and a half before we reached the boat, nor did it begin again until we were all safely hosed on the boat and the camp-fire well burning, with such large logs well on fire that it burned on, with replenishing, in spite of the rain through the night; and it was well that it did, for the tigers had scented us and were eager for prey. The tent was large enough for us all if we sat up, but not to lie down in; and I sat watching at the shore end of the boat, pistol in hand, through the night, lest, in spite of the fire, a tiger should try to spring on. We heard their roaring and snarling in the bushes near at hand, and once I fancied I saw the glaring eyes of a royal tiger peering at us between the two nearest bushes. But "He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways," was the thought that kept running through my mind after we had, as we settled down for the night, read the ninety-first Psalm in the beautiful Telugu language, and offered up prayers of thanksgiving and praise to the Most High, under the shadow of whose wings we were abiding.

At the dawn of day, taking down our tent, we shoved out into the stream, and floated down twelve miles, past both affluent streams, that were too high for us to ford, and until the roaring of the cataract warned us that we were just coming into the rapids; and there we moored the boat, and left it, that the coolies, after they should have taken us to the foot of the barrier, might come back, and, in it, go up again past those rivers, and so reach their home.

Of our twenty miles further march, around the cataract and rapids, in the alternating blazing sun and drenching rain, when one after another of my native assistants fell under that terrible jungle fever, and each, in a state of unconsciousness, was tied in a blanket to a bamboo, and thus borne onward by the extra coolies that I had provided for just such an emergency, while twice I almost fell from my horse from the power of the blistering sun between the rains, but in answer to prayer received strength to mount again and proceed, myself leading the party; of our reaching the river again, and the coolies' joy at receiving their promised triple pay, and bounding off for the boat and home; of the smoke of the coming steamer at last appearing over the trees lining the river, after we had been waiting in that fever bed for a week; of it and another carrying us down two hundred miles of river, into open land and inhabited towns again; of our further journey southward, and all reaching home, two months later, restored, guarded, guided, and brought there in safety by the "I am with you always;" I must not now delay to write, for the tale so far has kept me fully long, and I must stop.

I have tried to give a vivid picture of the events of that pivotal day; but nothing can equal the vivid consciousness we had that day of the presence of the Master; nothing can equal the vividness of the certitude, that day, that God did intervene and save us.

Some who have not tested it may sneer and doubt, but we five know that God hears prayer.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Christian Statesman, writing a few weeks ago regarding certain religious meetings at Clifton Springs, New York, remarked as follows:—

"The religious meetings in the chapel in the large Sanitarium are deeply interesting. At the meeting on Wednesday evening the chaplain propounded the inquiry, 'Why do ministers so seldom preach upon the Being, the Work, and the Power of the Holy Spirit?' He had been chaplain in this institution for twenty years. A dozen bishops of the different churches and hundreds of ministers have preached in the Sanitarium during that time, and not one of them had preached on that subject. To his mind it was most astonishing that the work of the Holy Spirit was so left out of view, for of all the places in the world, the people here, with their nervous troubles and varied forms of diseases, needed the comforting, the soothing, the healing influence of the Spirit."

"After Many Days."

"Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days."—Ecc. xi. 1.

In the summer of 1861 I drove, accompanied by my eldest son, into the hotel yard at Walton-on-the-Nazs, in Essex. It was then much resorted to by summer visitors, and I had myself spent many pleasant days in pursuit of natural history on its shore and in the adjoining marshes. The face of the hostler who came to take my pony was familiar to me, but mine was more so to him, for he looked at me with an expression which spoke friendly recognition.

I inquired whether he knew me, to which he promptly replied in the affirmative, calling me by both names, adding "How long is it since your mother preached in Mrs. Hubbard's barn?" "I can tell you," was my reply, "for I was there, forty years this very month; it was in the summer of 1826."

"What was her text?" he asked. "That I cannot tell," I said. "I can tell you," he quickly responded: "it was 'Come unto Me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest,' etc. Ah!" said he, "that sermon was wonderfully blessed to me, and to my mother, and to many more, some of whom are yet living to praise Him for it; no sermon ever made such an impression upon the people here." I handed him a few tracts, for which he warmly thanked me, saying that he and his daughter distributed tracts to the people as they came out of chapel. I felt that I could salute him as a brother beloved, and when we parted it was in that "unity of spirit" which is indeed "the bond of peace."

It was a great pleasure to keep him supplied with these little messengers of love. His acknowledgments were touchingly beautiful. Once he wrote: I knelt down in my little harness-house, having locked the door, and thanked the Lord for his goodness in thus caring for us, and helping us to work for Him."

Years passed on, and circumstances hindered our holding much intercourse with poor Thomas James (for that was his name) until a few weeks ago, when my wife and I spent about ten days again at Walton. On inquiry, I found that he was yet alive, and able to do a little work. I sought him out, and words cannot describe his joy at meeting me; it was truly a joy to me too to receive his cordial greeting. It was quite as much as we could either of us bear. He is now 82, living all alone, but still doing what he can in the service of Him who called him at that meeting 65 years ago—who gave him grace, at 17 years of age, to accept the call, and who is with him still, enabling him "with prayer and thanksgiving to make his request known," and to enjoy the friendship of several other old people who were present at that meeting in the barn, and who received a like blessing with himself.

I conclude with a copy of his last letter, acknowledging a parcel of tracts, just adding, here was and is "fruit after many days." My dear mother "ceased from her labors" nearly 50 years ago, knowing nothing of this blessed fruit. May we not believe that her "works do follow her."

THOMAS JAMES'S LAST LETTER.

"WALTON, October 15, 1891.

"MR. GRUBB:—Thank you very much for the good packet of books you so kindly sent me, which I received in Tuesday morning's post. I felt it my duty to lock myself in my humble abode, and then I prayed to God, in my poor humble way, that He would send down his richest blessing on my kind friends, while they were spared to live in their new home. I prayed for every member of their family, that they might live and prosper. I prayed that God in his mercy would give to me his blessing in reading them books, to my soul's peace and safety. I prayed that I might embrace the opportunity of giving them to others, that they might have the same like blessing, and if I never see you again, Oh! that we may all meet around the throne of God, to part no more.

Your humble servant, T. J."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Encouragement to Faithfulness.

"If ye know these things happy are ye if ye do them." As we reflect upon the present unsettled condition of our Society in some places, we may observe some things which seem very discouraging. It is well to notice these things, it is true, but let us observe a little on the other hand also, and see whether there is not in many places an evidence that many who are following the same good Master are being drawn nearer and nearer one to another, and being prepared to labor in love and fellowship for the spreading of the good cause of truth and righteousness in the earth.

Now, if this is the case, it should encourage us to more individual faithfulness. May we not rejoice in believing, that the good Master is turning the hearts of the children of men in many places more and more unto himself? and if these are faithful, there may be judges raised up as at the first and counsellors as at the beginning, who will stand for the law and for the testimonies. Sons may be called from afar and daughters as from the ends of the earth.

Has not the time fully come for a returning to individual faithfulness and as the heart of one man in unity and fellowship to labor for the rebuilding of the walls which have been laid waste, and repairing the gates which were destroyed.

We read, that when the children of Israel began to plead for more liberties, and disregarded the laws of Moses, their leader, who led them out of Egypt, then their enemies prevailed over them; but when they returned to the Lord with the whole heart, again and again He had mercy on them and passed by their transgressions. And can we doubt that if we were to faithfully follow the law of the new covenant, now written in our hearts, that we too should be fed with food convenient for us and also be preserved on every side as they were under the old law.

And it would be well for us to remember how they were to gather manna for food every day, just what was needed and no more. So, we too should seek to be fed with spiritual food from heaven to preserve us alive day by day, not depending on what was gathered before or received in time passed.

And when they returned in those days to build again the temple which was destroyed by their enemies, many shouted aloud for joy. And perhaps there might be rejoicing even now among some of the ancient and honorable men and women of our day, if there was such a returning, with full purpose of heart to build on the alone sure foundation, Christ Jesus the rock of ages, and to observe more faithfully the new law written with his good Spirit in the temple of our hearts, as in the days of old and as in former years.

But, as it was said of old, as the mountains are around about Jerusalem, so the Lord is still around about his people, at the present day, and if all the praise and honor is given to Him He will prosper the work and make a way when there seems to be no way. He will be strength in weakness, riches in poverty, and a present helper in every needful time. And other professors seeing that our safety depends not on sacrificing our principles but in trusting the name of the Lord, which is a strong tower wherinto the righteous may flee and find safety, they may also come out of Babylon, being obliged to acknowledge more fully as Baal's true God, that the God of Elijah was the true God, saying, "the Lord He is God, the Lord He is God." Happy is that people who is in such a case, happy is that people whose God is the Lord.

And do we not see much to encourage us to leave all those hindering things which are behind, laying aside every weight and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and run with patience the race set before us, looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith, who said if thy brother trespass against thee not only seven times a day but seventy times seven, thou shalt forgive him. So, we see, all should have much charity, sympathy and forbearance for one another. "If ye know these things happy are ye if ye do them."

COAL CREEK, IOWA, Second Mo., 1, 1892.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

In "THE FRIEND" of First Month 9th, page 188, an account is given of a horse race being stopped by prayer, or in answer to prayer. This is nothing strange to people who pray in faith, believing.

In the Seventh Month, 1890, the writer paid a visit to Friends in southern California, and was kindly welcomed to a Friend's house as their guest during our stay in one of their towns. But here was a fine race-track about one hundred feet from the Friend's garden line, graded and rolled in the most perfect manner, and also an eight-foot fence had been built around it; but now was taken down, and still laying in piles along the track ready to be hauled away. The woman Friend (our hostess) gave us a short history of this new race-track. She brought it to the Lord and asked for its downfall, which speedily took place. The owner felt her influence against it, and called on her and tried to reason with her about it, saying that he would be a heavy loser by it, &c. But there was no let up until the fence came down (but did not apply to man about it). And then he went and leased it to a base ball club, who took possession the following First-day. But our Friend was equal to the emergency, and met them as the start, and asked for an interview with the officers of the club, which was politely granted when she reasoned with them on the degrading influence of their doings, especially on First-day commonly called the Sabbath.

But they had rented the ground and had come there to play a game of base ball, and were not to be beat off by the Quakeres' preaching. Therefore, as soon as she had gone into her house, the game commenced and was going on finely, when, lo! the Friend again appeared coming towards them carrying a large well worn Bible. This was too much for them. No doubt they thought now that she was about to read from the good book and then preach veritable sermon to them. But they did not wait—for in less time than it takes to write their heels were toward the base ball ground with ball and bats. Spectators and actors, the bled away toward their homes, and never after returned. And the Friend went to her home with her Bible—a victor by the power of the Lord.

In a late letter from the same Friend, she says that the base ball ground is now all planted into an orange orchard. Praise the Lord.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Pappi in Mummy Cases.—That indefatigable explorer, Petrie, has recently made a discovery which shows a remarkable similarity in the fate of ancient and modern books. Thousands of Egyptian mummies—it is safe to say hundreds of thousands—were encased in what is called a cartonnage. This is not unlike a heavy and strong pasteboard, manufactured in soft condition around the entire body. It dried and hardened into a casing almost impervious to a steel knife-blade. The material in most of these tombs were to be layers of cloth and cement. But Petrie has found that some of them are not unlike more modern pasteboard, made of layers of papyrus and cement. On these old scraps he has found interesting manuscript. From his examination of several mummies in one locality, there is reason to believe that the carton-maker was in the habit of buying out the waste paper (papyrus) from families or individuals, as in our day the second-hand book-dealer buys out the old books of a household. There is reason to hope for the future discovery of much ancient manuscript in these mummy-cases. The interesting fact, in connection with our present subject, is that, in old times as in modern, it was a waste of literature to fall into the possession of people who did not value it, and who sold it to be manufactured over again into other forms of art production.—W. C. Prime, in Journal of Commerce.

Saved Her Life Three Times.—A correspondent sends to the London Spectator the following anecdote: "The servant man of one of my friends took a kitten to a pond with the intention of drowning it. His master's dog was with him, and when the kitten was thrown into the water the dog sprang in and brought it back safely to land. The second time the man threw it in, and again the dog rescued it; and when a third time the man tried to drown it, the dog, as resolute to save the little helpless life as the cat was to destroy it, swam with it to the other side of the pool, ran all the way home with it, and safely deposited it before the kitchen fire, and ever thereafter they were inseparable, sharing even the mead."

A Tame Butterfly.—One summer I watched a larva of the swallow-tailed butterfly through their different stages, and reserved two chrysalises to develop into the perfect insect. In due time one of these fairy-like creatures came out, placed it in a small Indian cage, made of fine reeds of bamboo. A carpet of soft moss and vase of flowers in the centre made a pleasant home for my tiny "Psyche." I found that she greatly enjoyed a repast of honey; when some was placed on a leaf within her reach, she would uncoil her long proboscis and draw up the sweet food with great apparent enjoyment.

She was so tame that it became my habit, once or twice a day, to take her on my finger, and while I walked in the garden she would take short flights hither and thither, but was always content to mount upon my hand again. She would come on my finger of her own accord and, if the day was bright, would remain there as long as I had patience to carry her, with her wings outspread, basking in the sunbeams, which appeared to convey exquisite delight to the delicate little creature.

I never touched her beautiful wings. She never fluttered or showed any wish to escape, but lived three weeks of tranquil life in her tiny home, and then having, as I suppose, reached the limit of butterfly existence, she quietly ceased to live.—Wild Nature Won by Kindness.

Slaughter of Seals.—Some facts have recently been reported which show that Secretary Blaine's contention that the indiscriminate slaughter of seals is seriously affecting the future supply has an excellent basis to rest upon. It has been declared on the part of Great Britain that there is no danger that the number of seals will be diminished by the taking of them in open sea; but a recent examination of the seal rookeries on the Pribyloff Islands resulted in the discovery of not less than ten thousand dead seal pups. Starvation was the evident cause, the mother seals having been killed or captured and the little ones being left without nourishment.

A Fun-loving Seal.—The mother seal at the Zoo got rather gay one afternoon, while a big crowd of ladies, gentlemen, and children were standing around eagerly watching the baby seal. The mother seal would watch and see where the crowd was thickest, slide quietly under the water, come up close as possible to where the crowd was, and then, with seemingly pure fun, jump up and splash the water in such a way as to cover and wet those standing there. And it kept this sort of fun up all the afternoon. No matter on which side of the tank the crowd got, the seal would make a quiet swim under the water, and then, quick as lightning, show up near the crowd, and get in its funny business.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Insanity and Corrupt Imagination.—Maurice Thompson, in an article in The Independent, on the connection between mental health and a pure imagination, refers to the recent insanity of a French writer of licentious fictions, as an illustration of his assertions that "imagination can engender deadly physical trouble;" "madness lies in the direction of debauching one's imagination, just as consumption lies in the way of befouling one's lungs;" "foul air is not more hurtful to the lungs than foul thoughts to the brain;" "cleanliness of body is the best step toward bodily health; cleanliness of the imagination is an absolute pre-requisite to mental sanity."

A Parliament of Religions.—Among the schemes proposed in connection with the Columbian Exposition, the assembling together at Chicago in 1893 of representatives from all the leading religions of the world, Catholics, Protestants, Jews, Mohammedans, Buddhists, Brahmans, Parsees, Confucians, &c.—with the object of holding friendly intercourse, and consulting with each other on the moral and spiritual principles which interest all mankind. Many distinguished men have expressed their approval of such a convention being held.

Revision of the Chinese Bible.—At a Conference of Chinese missionaries held in 1890, it was resolved to endeavor to make a revised translation of the Bible into Chinese, which should be adapted to the different classes of the inhabitants of China. A board of revisers was selected, and these have organized and entered upon the work.

were two boys, who when they grew up chose a seafaring life, much to the surprise and grief of their parents. When at home once the mother inquired of the elder son, why he went to sea. He pointed to the picture of a ship which had always hung in a prominent place in the home, and said, "That sent me to sea, mother."

"No License" Gains in Massachusetts.—Last year the State of Massachusetts stood twenty for license and eight for no-license. This year no-license has gained four cities which went for license last year, Worcester, Fitchburg, New Bedford, and Haverhill; while every no-license city has been held. In these twenty-eight cities there was a total majority against license of 8,274. We congratulate the friends of temperance in Massachusetts upon this showing. Let them now concentrate their efforts upon the enforcement of the law. The policy of opponents everywhere is to prevent enforcement, and then declare the law a failure in order to secure its repeal.

Experience shows that a considerable majority is necessary to maintain public sentiment up to the standard of enforcement.

Louisiana Lottery and the Negroes.—The Independent of New York thinks that in the present divided state of public opinion in Louisiana, the decision of the question whether the Lottery shall be continued rests on the votes of the Negro citizens of the State. After stating that the Republican party is as much divided on the Lottery question as the Democratic, it says: "Here we have a condition of things which suggests that every possible influence should be brought to bear upon the Negroes of Louisiana to vote on the right side. There comes times when a race that has been put down and practically disfranchised finds its chance, and if its chance is well improved the helpful fruit it will last for many years. If the Negroes of Louisiana should now, when called to their help by the respectable white element in Louisiana, come out strongly for good morals and good order, it would be remembered to their credit, and their rights would be more respected in future."

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 27, 1892.

A Friend in England writes to us, "I have much appreciated from number to number [of THE FRIEND] the selections from Journal of William Evans; and have been led to exclaim, 'What excellent men there have been among you! What sons and daughters of the Lord's own teaching and anointing! May his good hand yet work on yielding and believing souls in this day also!'"

It is indeed the "good hand" of the Lord only, that can prepare sons and daughters for his work and service; and, surely, it may well be the prayer of all those who love his cause, that those on whom his hand works may prove to be "yielding and believing," so that they may not frustrate his gracious designs towards them. How inexpressible and is the condition of those to whom the visitations of Divine love have come in vain, and to whom the language is applicable—"Because I have called and ye refused, I have stretched out mine hand, and no man regarded, I also will laugh at your calamity, I will mock when your fear cometh." With what earnestness of feeling did David pray—"Take not thy Holy Spirit from me."

Nothing can bring true comfort and peace to the soul, bowed down under a sense of transgression, but a renewed extension of the grace of God.

Among the precious letters of Isaac Penington, there is one peculiarly sweet, in which he speaks of a state that has forfeited the sweet and tender visitations of the Most High, and is become dry, dead, barren, thick, earthy, and exclaims—"O, my God! let that soul feel the stirrings of the springs of life, and find some encouragements from thee, to hope in the free and large mercies of the Shepherd of Israel; who casteth not off his sheep because of their wanderings, because of their backslidings, because of their infirmities, because of their diseases, nay, not because of their hardness; but pursues them with his love, findeth them out, visiteth with his correcting hand according to their need, woundeth with his sword, and melteth in his fire, until He hath made them tender and pliable, and then He pours in the fresh oil of his salvation and sweetly healeth them."

We have received a circular from "The Indian Rights Association," calling attention to the danger that there is of a large reduction being made by the present Congress of the United States, in the amount appropriated for the education of the Indians.

Believing it to be of great importance to the Indians that they should be properly educated and prepared to take their places as members of the national family, we should greatly regret any such reduction being made; especially as the present Commissioner of Indian affairs seems to be actuated by an honest desire to promote the welfare of the people under his charge, and to administer the funds judiciously.

The advocates of economy can find a much larger and better field for their exertions, in endeavoring to retrench the enormous outlays for naval, military and pension purposes—compared with which the Indian appropriations are trifling in amount.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Congressmen, foreign Ministers accredited to the United States and forty of the leading members of the National Capital left on the 19th inst. on four special trains for Chicago to inspect the World's Fair site, and to see the progress made in the erection of the buildings. The party, numbering over 350, will be the guests of the citizens of Chicago for four days.

An American line steamer Indiana sailed from Washington Street wharf in this city, on the 22nd inst., for Libau, on the east shore of the Baltic Sea, laden to the limit of her capacity, with flour and other provisions for the famishing Russians. A great concourse of people assembled on the neighboring wharves, and many people on the New Jersey side opposite, to witness the departure of the steamer on her errand of love and mercy.

Inquiries made throughout the cotton belt by the St. Louis Globe-Democrat shows that planters will raise less cotton during 1892 than in 1891. It is said the planters realize the necessity for more diversified crops and are preparing land for corn, tobacco and vegetables. In North Carolina this change of crops is expected to amount to an "agricultural revolution."

The Salton Sea, which was comparatively low at the end of the dry season, has become nearly filled again, and is constantly rising.

Extensive deposits of bituminous coal are said to have been found in the Mesata Range, in Minnesota. A discovery of petroleum is also alleged to have been made.

Silver is reported to have been found on Batcher Mountain, Col., that runs 1,000,000 tons to the ton of ore. A fire broke out at 11 o'clock on the night of the 17th inst., in a dry goods store, corner of Canal and Bourbon streets, New Orleans, and soon spread to the adjacent buildings. Some of the largest retail dry goods stores in the city were burned, most of them newly erected and considered excellent risks. The store was estimated at $1,110,000, and insurance $750,000.

The number of deaths reported in this city last week was 537; being 12 more than the previous week, and 134 more than the corresponding week of 1891. Of the foregoing, 287 were males and 250 females; 63 died of consumption; 20 of pneumonia; 45 of diseases of the heart; 42 of diphtheria; 26 of old age; 22 of bronchitis; 20 of convulsions; 18 of apoplexy; 15 of typhoid fever; 15 of cancer; 13 of Bright's disease; 13 of influenza; 13 of inflammation of the brain and 11 of marasmus.

FOREIGN.—The first time a long-talked-of Irish loan for the establishment of a bank was introduced in the House of Commons by Balfour. It was received with silence by the Conservatives, and with jeers by the Liberals and Nationalists. The Press generally condemn it, and its defeat seems probable, with an early dissolution of Parliament.

Snow storms have prevailed in Great Britain last week and the whole of England is reported to be covered. A report from London dated the 21st, says: The snow storm in Ireland continued throughout Saturday night. All trains on the Waterford and Limerick system were blocked. Traffic was only partially restored to date. The Limerick and Kerry lines is completely blocked. The snow has caused heavy losses to live stock.

For the first time in many years the Isle of Wight is covered with snow, so that the roads are impassable.

The St. James' Gazette says that the negotiations between the British and Russian Governments in Russia, in regard to the expulsion by Russian officers in their Ninth month of Captain Younghusband from the Pamir, point to a settlement favorable to England. The Russian authorities have fully investigated the affair, and have concluded that the Russian officers acted precipitately, and the British have decided to demand reparation for the acts of her officers. It is expected, the St. James' Gazette adds, that an apology compatible with the dignity of both countries will be tendered to England by Russia.

A dispatch dated Paris, Second Month 18th, says: "All the members of the French Ministry have tendered their resignations to President Carnot. The cause of the resignation of the Ministry was the action of the Chamber of Deputies in connection with the bill dealing with associations. This afternoon M. Hubbard demanded urgency for the bill as a reply to the attitude of the French Bi-hous. M. de Cassagnac descended the tribune to demand a rigorous measure."

Premier de Freycinet denied that the measure was intended as an act of persecution of the Church, or that it need be regarded as a precursor of the separation of Church and State. He warmly commended the conciliatory spirit of the Pope, who, he said, often gave evidence of his assent to the demand for urgency. "We will doubtless be called upon some day to treat with the Vatican on the religious question. A portion of the clergy may possibly refuse to enter upon the path pointed out to them, but universal suffrage will judge between the two policies." In conclusion, M. de Freycinet said he would not give his assent to the demand for urgency, though he said that he would not give the measure the significance that M. Hubbard desired.

"An excited discussion ensued on M. Hubbard's motion. Finally M. de Freycinet again arose and demanded that an order of the day be moved, indicating the view of the Chamber of Deputies. It was moved that the President demand M. Boissier's motion that the Government be requested to continue the Republican policy. M. de Freycinet accepted the motion and intimated that he considered it a Cabinet question.

The vote of the Chamber being taken, M. Boissier's motion was rejected by 304 to 292. The Ministers, recognizing their defeat, immediately left the House in a body. The Chamber then rejected the urgency motion by a vote of 286 to 246."

The Ministers have offered their resignations, which have been accepted.

The imperial prohibition of the exportation of grain from Russia is about to be suspended in favor of the owners of 10,000,000 poods (about 158,700 tons) of oats, now lying at Baltic ports awaiting shipment.

Dispatches received in Yokohama from various places throughout Japan, during the past week, have been attended with disturbances in many places. In Ogi, where, in common with the whole Empire, political feeling ran very high, all the male inhabitants became involved in a general riot. The police were powerless to disperse the quarrelling fighting crowds, and, although they severely rebuked the rioters, they were quite time repulsed and several of them were quite severely injured.

A dispatch from Saga, capital of the Province of Fizen, on the island of Kioo Sioo, where serious election riots were reported yesterday, state that several persons were killed in the fight, and that the serious consequence of the serious aspect of affairs at Saga, the Government has ordered that the elections there be stopped.

It is reported that a mountain of onyx has been discovered in Mexico, about thirty miles from El Paso. It is said to be of a superior quality, and that the beautifully marked and well-calculated stacks of variegated colors blended across the face of the edge. The mineral, it is claimed, scales off in large slabs, making it possible to sell it as cheap as common stone.

ELIZABETH L. WALTON, Purchasing Agent, has removed her residence to No. 1849 Van Pelt St., Phila.

DEEN, near Marlton, Twelfth Month 26th 1891. EZRA E. DEEN, aged 72 years, of Henry C. and Emily C. Lippincott, aged twenty-three years and six months, an exemplary attendant of Cropwell Preparative Meeting. His unselfish and gentle disposition endeared him to a large circle of friends. During his last sickness, his suffering was intense. He had no fear of the future, for he knew that his Heavenly Father's hand upheld him, and that "He would not leave him nor forsake him."

—, at his residence in Monrovia, Morgan Co., Ind., DAVID H. MILLER, on the 16th of First Month, 1892, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. He was faithful in attendance of meetings, and was finally able to attend the meetings of the Friends held by Friends. We trust that he has found a peaceful reward. A member of West Union Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, at her residence near Tonganoxon, Kansas, First Mo. 24th, 1892, of pneumonia, resulting from an attack of LaGrippe, SARAH EMLEY, wife of J. M. Thistethed, aged 67 years, and six days. She was the daughter of C. Y. Y., the parents, JOSEPH W. and Sarah M. Ransome, removed to western New York when she was about one year old. She removed to Kansas with her husband and three children in 1879, and took a lively interest in making a new home, often expressing pleasure and thankfulness in her situation. Of a cheerful and sympathetic disposition, she was greatly endeared to her family, and had the affectionate regard of all who knew her.

—, on the morning of the 6th of Second Month 1892 LYDIA, daughter of the late William and Ann Blackburn, aged sixty-two years, a member of Middleton Monthly Meeting, Columbus Co., Ohio. The weighty expressions which frequently fell from her lips during her last illness, leave a well grounded hope that she has entered into rest. She at different times spoke of the necessity of a preparation for eternity, desiring that she might not be deceived; that it would be an awful thing to be deceived; she also alluded to several one of the last expressions of her beloved father, that "no counterfeit would be received in heaven."

—, on the 9th of Second Month, after a short illness (paralysis), CHARLES WALTON, in the seventy seventh year of his age—a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

1853.—Eleventh Month 24th. "At Bucks Quarterly Meeting. It is the inside of the cup and the platter that is first to be cleansed, and then the outside will be clean also. We may receive our principles by education; but some were asked what they knew of Christ sitting in their hearts as a refiner's fire, and as a fuller with soap, to purify them by his baptism of the Holy Ghost and fire, and to prepare them as temples for the Lord God by his Spirit, to dwell in. At the rise of Friends, many believed in the fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion, but were little acquainted with the work of regeneration; and Friends were sent forth to gather them to the Light and Grace with which Christ enlightens every man that cometh into the world; that they might experience this change of heart, wrought by it in them. This is what we need to be brought back unto. One of the principal men told George Fox, that if he had not been sent to preach this Light and Grace, the country would have run into rantism. I was led to show Friends the danger of being drawn away by anything, from this Divine guide and preserving power, as manifested in the heart; but by keeping faithful to it, the snares of the enemy, whatever they were, would be detected, and power given us over them all.

"Then the word of comfort for the secret travelling ones sprang in my heart, whom I was led to address in the language of sympathy, and assurance that the Lord would not suffer the principles and testimonies given Friends to bear, to fall to the ground; but they would yet spread from sea to sea, and from the rivers to the ends of the earth, until the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ; and from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same, praises as incense, would ascend from prepared, humbled hearts, before the throne of the Lord God and of the Lamb, for his mercy, and goodness to the children of men.

"Twelfth Month 6th. Went to Westtown, and attended the Quarterly Meeting of the committee held there.

"In the meeting of the committee on Fourth-day, after getting through with the business, Samuel Bettle, Sr., remarked, there was something of importance which money could not purchase. It was, that Friends should be preserved under a right exercise, that the institution may be conducted in such manner, as to support the primitive doctrines and testimonies of Friends, and educate the children in them. This was the original concern, and it had been blessed; and he believed, as Friends kept to this ground, a blessing would continue to rest upon the school. He spoke in a feeling manner; and being now in his eightieth year, it seemed like a legacy left to the younger members, who might survive him, to bear in mind in the future management of the seminary."

"21st. Having my mind drawn to the Western Meeting, which I had not attended for a long time, I believed it right to give up to go there. A solemn silence spread over the Meeting, under which we sat a considerable time, and the blessedness of having begotten in us a true hunger and thirst after the bread and water of life, came before me, attended with the conviction, that however strong our desires may be, Divine nourishment must be waited for. It is out of our power to command it. The Lord knows how long to keep us in this waiting state, and He alone can and will supply it in his time. No imaginary enjoyment, produced by creaturely excitement or activity, is to be compared with the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Spirit. This dependent state has been the ground on which the true disciple of Christ has stood; and whatever may be our gifts, experience or growth in the Truth, it will always remain to be the ground on which we must stand, to receive ability to worship God in spirit, partake of the supper of the Lord, and rightly to engage in promoting the kingdom of the Redeemer.

"Under the clothing of true charity, and the desire that we might be brought to a living experience of the substance, I was enabled to invite all to gather to Christ, in his inward appearance in the soul, not depending on any other; for the Lord will not give his glory to another, nor his praise to any given image. Also warning against expecting salvation without obeying Him, forsaking their sins, and confessing Him before men."

1854.—Second Month 14th. "I went to Quarterly Meeting at Concord. After several others had spoken, I was led to address some, who had departed from the law written in the heart, and yet at times were met with, as in a narrow place, under the convicting power of Truth; by which they were condemned, and brought to see that their ways do not please God, and that they needed a change of their course. These were pleaded with in the love of Christ, to yield to the heavenly vision; or the day may come, when in the prospect of eternity, they would mourn over their misspent time, and their slighted mercies, when it would be too late; and wish they could go back and recall those merciful visitations, for which they then would be willing to part with all they possessed; but it would be out of their power. Now, instead of selling all to purchase the pearl of great price, they were selling their time, the Lord's gifts, and his calls, to purchase the world and the riches and honors of it. The power of the Lord appeared to be present, to heal some, and to gather them, from the improper pursuit of the world, unto himself; and a deep solemnity spread over the meeting, tendering the hearts of not a few. It was the Lord's doings, and I trust that thanksgivings were secretly offered to Him for his mercy and condescending goodness to us, poor unworthy creatures.

"When the Queries and Answers respecting pernicious books were read, I felt an intimation to mention the great danger of reading novels, or any work designed to invalidate the Christian faith. I had been enabled to hold such works in detestation; but at one time, a package of goods sent to the store, where I was an apprentice, was wrapped in a printed sheet, containing poisonous sentiments, and having read a few lines, Satan beset me many times afterwards, with them, so that I had much difficulty to entirely discard their impression. I mentioned it as a warning to the young men, not to tamper with such books; for they knew not the dangerous consequences that may result from them; advising them to keep to the Holy Scriptures, the writings of Friends, and works conveying useful information."

"Fifth Month 25th. At Arch Street Monthly Meeting, I believed there were those living, who would see the day, though I was neither prophet nor prophet's son, when gifts will be given, to be occupied in the church; by which the Lord's name will be glorified amongst us. Those members who trample on our testimonies, and despise those who keep to them, will find it a heavy burden, when laid on a dead bed, but have turned any aside from the faithful acknowledgment of them."

"Sixth Month 27th. Many calculations of profit are made by the projectors of the railroad, running across New Jersey from Camden to Absecon. The enterprise of men furnishes many accommodations and facilities, to promote the purposes of all classes; which are highly useful to the great human family. But it is to be lamented that, in the midst of much usefulness to others, in a temporal point of view, so many appear to neglect the 'one thing needful,' a daily preparation of the soul for a blissful eternity, through waiting upon and serving God according to his blessed and holy will, revealed in the heart. This dedication to Him, would not interfere with right things, in the way of our lawful vocations, but it would enable men, under the power of the Holy Spirit, to keep the world under foot; holding everything pertaining to it, in a secondary place; and above all, laboring to exalt the name of our God, and the kingdom of his dear Son, the Lord Jesus Christ. In this state, there would be a harmonious walking with Him, and the true welfare of each other would be sought and promoted."

"Seventh Month 26th. Having had a pros-peet of visiting some meetings in Ohio, and attending the Yearly Meeting, if the way should open for it, I mentioned the concern to the Monthly Meeting, which made a minute of its unity, setting me at liberty to attend to the prospect, as Truth should direct."

"21st. My brother Charles, who had kindly offered to be my companion through Ohio, met me at the depot, and we left for Pittsburgh; and thence by the Cleveland cars for Salem."

"26th. We went to Springfield Monthly Meeting, at Damascusville. Here I was opened on the declaration of our Saviour, 'By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye love one another, and in the importance of knowing the love of God shed abroad in our hearts. The nearer we approach a better world, the more earnest we ought to feel, to be imbued therewith; that we may be prepared for the society of saints and angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect. In this world, this Divine clothing would put an end to all animosities, wars and fightings, and whether present or absent, we should be as epistles written in one another's hearts; not with ink and pen, but by the Spirit of the living God. It would draw the children to the parents, and the parents to the children, and they would unite in going up to the mountain of the Lord, the house of the God of Jacob, who would teach them his ways, and strengthen them to walk in his paths."

"30th. At Smithfield Meeting. Feeling a concern gathering over my mind, for some who had known better days, and on account of the great change that had taken place in the members, in part produced by the death of some substantial ministers, I was led to advert to it, and mentioned the language of Scripture, 'Your fathers, where are they; and the prophets, do they live forever?' Those were removed to their everlasting reward; and there was but one way by which any could be prepared to succeed them, in these stations in the church, and that was by submitting to the humbling, regenerating power of the grace of God. Some were called upon to recur to the kindness of their youth, the love of their spouses, how they followed the Lord in his leadings into the wilderness; and to examine whether the same love and devotedness to Him was now felt, which they then experienced. If not, there was nothing in the world that could make up for their loss; and if in his continued mercy, they were favored with renewed visitations of his love, and the calls of his Holy Spirit, it would be their highest interest to yield to them, that they might be favored with the enjoyment of the true peace and heavenly love they had once known."

"Ninth Month 14th. Attended Pennsville Monthly Meeting. Near the close, I was impressed with a concern to call Friends to a closer attention to their religious duties; that they might show forth the excellent fruits of the Spirit, by setting the candle on the candlestick, that all might see the light; not putting it under a bed of ease, or under a bushel, in the multitude of worldly pursuits. Christ told his disciples, they were the light of the world, and that they were to let their light shine, that others, seeing their good works, may glorify our Father, which is in heaven. I was also concerned to remind parents of the responsibility of their station, as shepherds and shepherdesses over the lambs committed to their trust; of the necessity of setting them a proper example, of restraining them from evil, and to bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Early Settlements in the Valley of Virginia.

Dr. Doddridge, in his notes on Virginia, says: The buffalo and elk have entirely disappeared from this section of the country. Of the bear and deer but very few remain. The wolves, formerly so numerous, and so destructive to the cattle, are now seldom heard of in our older settlements. It may seem strange that this ferocious and cunning animal so long the scourge of the mountainous districts of Europe, should have so suddenly disappeared from our infant country. The sagacity of the wolves bids defiance to the most consummate craft of the hunters, many of whom, throughout life, never obtained a single chance to shoot at one of them. Sometimes, indeed, they outwitted them by pitfalls and steel traps; but no great number were killed by either of these means, nor had the price set upon their scalps by the State legislatures any great effect in diminishing their number and depredations. By what means then did their destruction happen? On this subject I will hazard the opinion that a greater number of them were destroyed by hydrophobia than by all other means put together.

The buzzards or vultures, grey and bald eagles, ravens, or as they were generally called, corbies, were very numerous here in former times. It was no uncommon thing to see from fifty to one hundred of them perched on the trees over a single carcass of carrion. All these large carnivorous birds have nearly disappeared from our settlements.

The wild turkeys, which used to be so abundant as to supply no inconsiderable portion of provision for the first settlers, are now rarely seen.

The different kinds of woodpeckers still remain in the country, with the exception of the largest of that genus of birds, the wood-cock, which is now very scarce.

The black and grey squirrels still remain in the country. These beautiful but destructive little animals gave great annoyance to the first settlers of our country, by devouring large quantities of their corn in the fields, before it was fit for gathering. There is something singular in the history of the squirrels. Sometimes in the course of a few years they become so numerous as to threaten the destruction of whole crops, when, as if by common consent, they commence an emigration from west to east, crossing the river in countless numbers. At the commencement of their march they are very fat, and furnish an agreeable article of diet; but towards its conclusion they become sickly and poor, with large worms attached to their skins. After this emigration they are scarce for some years, they multiply, emigrate, and perish as before.

The honey-bees are not natives of this country, but they always kept a little in advance of the white population. We formerly had some professed bee-hunters, but the amount of honey obtained from the woods was never considerable, owing to the want of a sufficient quantity of flowers to furnish it.

Crows and black-birds have of late become very plenty. They were not natives of the wilderness.

Rats, which were not known here for several years after the settlement of the country, took possession of it in its whole extent, in one winter season. Children of twelve years old, and under, having never heard their name, were much surprised at finding a new kind of mice, as they called them with smooth tails.

Opossums were late comers into the country.

Fox-squirrels have but a very few years ago made their appearance on this side of the mountains.

Of the poisonous kinds of snakes we had but two, the rattlesnake and the copperhead, both of which were very numerous in every section of the country, but especially the rattlesnake. We had also different kinds of black snakes, with a number of lesser sorts, but these last are not poisonous. The bite of the rattlesnake was frequently mortal, always extremely painful that of the copperhead not much less so.

Let the reader imagine the situation of our first settlers, with regard to those poisonous reptiles, when informed that a harvest day seldom passed in which the laborers did not meet with more or less of them. The reaper busily employed with his sickle was suddenly alarmed by the whiz of a rattlesnake at his feet; he instantly retreated, got a club, and giving the snake a blow or two, finished his execution by striking the point of the sickle through its head and holding it up to the view of the company. It was then thrown aside by the root of a tree, or in a bunch of bushes, and then labor recommenced. This often happened a half dozen times in the course of a single day. This was not the worst. Owing to the heavy dews and growth of rank weeds among the small grain, it was requisite to let the grain lie in grips a day or more to dry before it was bound up. The rattlesnakes often hid themselves under these handles of grain, and hence it often happened that they were taken up in the arms of those who were employed in gathering and binding them.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

From the earliest times to the date at which we have now arrived (1844) unbroken harmony appears to have subsisted between Baltimore and Philadelphia Yearly Meetings, and nothing had occurred to interrupt the friendly interchange of mutual counsel, caution or encouragement between them. But there were causes then at work producing alienation of feeling among members of the Society of Friends in different places; and which, in the following year, led to a separation in New England Yearly Meeting.

The preaching of Elias Hicks and some of his followers, a few years before, had tended to impair a belief in the divinity of Jesus Christ, the Saviour of mankind, and in the atoning efficacy of the sacrifice on Calvary. In their zeal to avoid these errors, some were led to undervalue the great fundamental doctrine of his inward and spiritual appearance in the soul as the Leader into all truth, and the Guide to eternal salvation of all those who faithfully heed and obey it. The universality of the love of God, as manifested in bestowing on all mankind a measure of saving light, whether they had a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures or not, was called in question; and the Bible and a knowledge of it was exalted beyond the place which it claimed for itself; while little was said of the indispensable necessity of attention and childlike obedience to the measure of Divine Grace vouchsafed to all, as the primary rule of faith and practice.

The writings in which these views were put forth principally emanated from Great Britain; and both there and in this country many clear-sighted and faithful Friends were brought under much exercise on account of them. As early as 1835, the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia adopted the following Minute:

"The Yearly Meeting has been brought under much exercise on account of the circulation of books in different parts of the Society, which tend to invalidate a belief in the universality and efficacy of the Light of Christ in the heart, as an unerring guide, and the primary rule of faith and practice; and that it is the only medium through which we can truly and livingly attain to the knowledge of God, and the mysteries of his heavenly kingdom. It is our fervent concern to guard our members against all such speculative opinions, which would rob them of their faith in the inward and immediate manifestation of the Spirit of Christ, which has ever been a fundamental doctrine of our religious Society, and is the hope of the saints' glory."

The same year in an epistle it called the attention of English Friends to some works written by members there, which had given cause for exercise and concern to many Friends.

These and similar cautions issued by Philadelphia Yearly Meetings, and by individual Friends, were not acceptable to all; for some did not discern the gravity of the changes that were being introduced, and were disposed to charge others with contending about trifles and thus breaking the harmony of the Society. The disunity that had its root in these disputes led to a separation in New England Yearly Meeting in 1845. Both of the bodies there sent epistles and statements to other Yearly Meetings. Philadelphia Yearly Meeting allowed the question of recognition of either of these bodies to remain unsettled for two years, without replying to either, and in 1848 referred all the papers for examination to its Meeting for Sufferings, which in 1849 made an elaborate report, which was adopted by the Yearly Meeting and copies of it with an accompanying minute sent to both parties in New England.

Baltimore Yearly Meeting, in common with most of the others, appears to have thought that such an examination and comparison was not needed, but assumed that the larger Body was in the right; and in accordance with this assumption, in 1849 it entreated Philadelphia to resume its correspondence with New England Yearly Meeting—meaning thereby the larger Body—and thus taking for granted the question which its sister Yearly Meeting had been laboriously considering. In 1851 it mentions its approval of and forwards an address prepared by a Conference of Committees held at Baltimore (in which Philadelphia Yearly Meeting took no part), which address related to the separation in New England and advises Philadelphia and Ohio Yearly Meetings to give full recognition to the larger Body in New England.

This subject was again referred to in 1852 and in 1854. That year a separation growing out of the New England difficulty occurred in Ohio Yearly Meeting—where a portion of the members seceded on account of the presence of some Friends from the smaller Body in New England. Philadelphia Yearly Meeting regarded the whole proceeding as subversive of the order and Discipline of our Society and continued its correspondence with the larger Body in Ohio, as the legitimate Yearly Meeting. Baltimore elected to recognize the smaller Body in Ohio; and in 1855 informed Philadelphia that unless it changed its former conclusion, she could not continue her correspondence with it.

Thus ceased the epistolary intercourse between these Yearly Meetings, which had continued for so many years. It has never been renewed, but each of these bodies has since gone on its way, without direct help from the other.

When in Baltimore, at the time of the last Yearly Meeting held there, the late Francis T. King informed the writer, that the number of members some years ago had so far decreased, that there were but 550 left, who were scattered in small meetings in Virginia, the Western Shore of Maryland and the central parts of Pennsylvania. It seemed probable that the Yearly Meeting would die out, unless some remedy for this decline could be found. The more religiously exercised of their members were brought under much concern on this account, and used much effort to interest the younger members in the work of the church and to keep them from wandering away from the Society. Their labors were also extended to the spreading in the different communities where Friends resided, of a knowledge of our principles. The result of this movement has been a gradual increase in the number of members, which is now about 967. The additions have largely been made from the outside world—a number of those who had belonged to the Hicksite Friends had joined them.

In their efforts to enlist the young in active service, the restraints before laid upon them as to "plainness of speech, deportment and apparel," restraints which are often irksome to those who have not fully submitted to the work of grace, were removed. This was practically done, as F. T. King remarked, when the Discipline was revised in 1876, and the wording of the old Query was changed, so as to read, "that plainness and simplicity of life which the Gospel enjoins." They wanted the active help of the young people, and F. T. King said, these would not submit to the restraints which their fathers had borne, and which, we add, had been useful to them.

Baltimore Yearly Meeting in 1830, in common with the other American Yearly Meetings, declared—"The same Divine Spirit which led [early Friends] to lay aside everything unbecoming the followers of Christ, would still lead us in the same path; and notwithstanding many of their successors in religious belief, who have widely deviated from that exemplary simplicity in their language, their garb, and the furniture of their dwellings, may endeavor to persuade themselves, that these are merely outward and non-essential things, yet the love of them is a certain indication, that, whatever they may profess, they are not in possession of that life and power which was the substance of their forefathers' religion." In 1876 it receded from this ground.

PRECEPT—without example, is like a waterman, who looks one way and rows another. What avails the knowledge of good and evil, if we do what we ought to avoid, and avoid what we ought to do? A direction post may point out the right road, without being obliged to follow it, but human finger posts, especially teachers and preachers, have not the same privilege. When a man's life gives the lie to his tongue, we naturally believe the former, rather than the latter. Pharisaical professions are but as a tinkling cymbal, we cannot listen patiently to the voice of the hypocrite, charm he never so wisely, but there is a silent eloquence in the morality of a whole life, that is irresistible. Precept and example, like the blades of a pair of scissors, are admirably adapted to their end, when conjoined; separated they lose the greater portion of their utility.—The Tin Trumpet."

Reflections on the Teaching of Christ.

The reading of an article on the Death of Christ, led me to reflect upon the nature of Christ's teaching and the tendency thereof, when the language came forcibly into my mind—"I am the Lord, I change not, therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed."

God is good unto all and his tender mercies are over all his works. He visits with a measure of his grace all for their salvation, which, if obeyed, will redeem from the power and guilt of sin, and the repentant soul, turning unto Him knows the answer of peace thereby. And even where the outward knowledge of Christ is withheld, his saving power may be experienced. And such may come from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south, and sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom, when many that are reputed children shall be cast out.

The teaching of our Saviour is "not every one who saith Lord, Lord, shall enter the kingdom, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." It is thus the doing, not the saying, that betokens the heavenly nature.

God's ear is open to the penitent soul, which turns towards Him under conviction. The children of Israel were heard when they cried unto Him in their trouble, sorrow, and affliction, when the fruits of amendment were brought forth by them.

Christ taught his disciples the true nature of prayer by the spirit manifested in our approach unto Him, leading the mind as that of a child to its parent—Our Father which art in heaven, with the sense of hallowing his holy name, and desire for his kingdom to come and will to be done on earth as it is done in heaven; but, as if to prove the reality of our sincerity, we were to ask forgiveness even as we forgave. Did not the Blessed Master know how impossible such a condition and temper of mind was unto us apart from his Spirit having place in us so as to subdue, purify, and elevate our whole being out of our own earthly and unholy nature. He could say "Father forgive them, they know not what they do," and He would have us learn of Him that we may be like unto Him.

Such prayer in such a spirit is asking in Christ's name, which is something very different from the reiteration of the name of Christ that we may be heard.

On the journey to Emmaus, when Christ drew near the sorrow-stricken disciples, He expounded unto them the Scriptures concerning himself, showing how it behooved Christ thus to suffer and rise again the third day, thus bringing into view the merciful dealing and intention of the Almighty toward his creatures. Is it not wise on our part to accept the declaration from the lip of Truth, neither adding thereto or taking therefrom, by seeking to know the life of the Lamb of God in ourselves to take away our sins, and to renew in us his own image and likeness of purity, humility, and love.

"Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood ye have no life in you." There were those whose minds were so outward that they thought He meant his material body, to whom Christ administered the rebuke in the words following: "The words that I have spoken unto you they are spirit and they are life."

Is it not so still that the minds of the many are upon the outward body, but are unmindful of the secret life by which our regeneration is to be wrought out, if we are ever to come to the saving knowledge of Christ.

Again Christ says "I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth in me though he were dead yet shall he live." It is the quickening power of God and the faith that springs therefrom and works thereby through man's obedience by which is known the resurrection of life from the dead state of nature, by which an apostle was enabled to say "I live yet not I but Christ liveth in me, and the life that I now live I live by the faith of the Son of God," who he could say "loved him and gave himself for him." The like faith will lead and bring to the same happy experience, which stands not in the knowledge of letters or in the acknowledgment of literal truth, but the virtue of life, in its life-giving nature.

The thief upon the cross gave evidence of a wonderful change in spirit, for he reproved his unrighteous fellow sufferer and penitentially acknowledged "we receive the just reward of our sin, but this man hath done no wrong," adding the petition "Lord remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." The reality of whose penitence of soul drew from our Saviour the language "This day shalt thou be with me in paradise."

There is a true theory of Christian truth, but the reality of faith is proved by practice. The constant use of the language "the blood of Christ," apart from the life of Christ in the individual soul, does not tend to the glory of God, or the honor of our Redeemer, whose name is so frequently upon the lips of the many while in their lives He is denied.

Against this wordy faith the early Friends were a living protest, and they who are in the like spirit in the present day, are equally concerned so to live as to bear testimony to the saving power of Christ ever with them to keep them from the evil, so that the prayer may be answered lead us not into temptation but deliver us from all evil, being able to bear testimony that the kingdom, power, and glory is of God the Father, through Christ the Son, by the working of the one Spirit of the Father and the Son.

The true testimony of a living people is to the renewal of life to them by obedience and subjection. There is no keeping back part of the price, whatever that may be, or however called for. The secret of our dwarfed condition as a society arises from our unwillingness wholly to surrender all to the governing test of the light of Christ, in order to know the gathering power thereof unto the life of Christ, for the fruits of the Spirit are first seen before handed, even as evil must be first seen before it is shunned.

The natural growth might well instruct us in the nature of all true growth. Truly in wisdom hast thou, O Lord, made all things. And all thy works praise thee, O Lord. O that it might be said of us, and we bless thy holy name each and every one in all our works.

A GOOD ANSWER.—A great deal of needless discussion would be avoided if we would simply leave to our Father the solution of vexed theological questions, and go to work.

An old gentleman was distributing tracts to passengers in a car, and a gentleman who was an infidel, put to him the question: "What is to become of the heathen?" The kindly toned answer was: "Friend, if you get to heaven, you will either find the heathen there or a good reason for their absence."—Sunday Afternoon.

WINTER OF '91-'92.

When yonder crescent, dropping down the sky,
Shall cast her waning light upon the earth,
Almost our Winter will have drifted by,
And Spring's lad birth.

Oh! sad, sad Winter! thou hast 'graved thy name
In dark-lined letters on the scroll of years—
The pen that writes the record of thy fame
Is dipped in tears.

The winds that murmur thro' the pinest-needles,
Are fitting dirge and requiem for thee—
With wail and moan, with shadow and with blight,
Thy moments flee.

Thy spell has brooded o'er roof and dome,
And hearts have trembled nearer and afar,
Alike in palace and in lowliest home
Thy mourners are.

The land is heaving with the broken turf,
Where forms we loved are lying cold and still,
Their often places midst the wales of earth
No more to fill.

Thou hadst thy mission Winter stern and drear—
Thy voice of warning in affliction's sigh
Comes like a message to the inward ear
From the Most High.

He sent thee forth in ever-pitting love,
To rouse from slumber a reposing world,
His righteous banner, fresh inscribed above,
To bear unfurled.

And must thy ministry unheeded fall?
Will we not learn the lesson, and be wise?
With full submission yielding to his call,
In newness rise?

Go to thy rest in chambers of the past,
With the unchanging record of our lives,
The deathless part that the Archangel's blast
Alone survives.

MOTHERS.

One mother, once, when her encircling arm
Grew powerless to shield her child from harm,
Wove a fair basket of the trembling reed,
And, strengthening it with loving art, she laid
Him helpless thus, beside the river's brim
Trusting that God would keep and care for him.

Since then, all mothers taught by her have known
God's care is larger, better than their own.
They weave their trembling faith into an ark
And strengthen with their prayers the tiny bark.
And trust their growing children thus to Him
Who saved the lad beside the river's brim.

In first line, second stanza, "all mothers" seems a little more than can be said possibly. Of course all true mothers have done so.

BLESSINGS OF ADVERSITY.

The blessings of apparent adversity are prettily illustrated in the anecdote told of a distinguished botanist, who was exiled from his native land, and obtained employment as an under-gardener in the service of a nobleman. While he was in this situation, his master received a valuable plant, the nature and habits of which were unknown to him. It was given to the gardener to be taken care of, and he, fancying it to be a tropical production, put it into the hot-house (for it was winter), and dealt with it as with others under the glass. But it began to decay, when the strange under-gardener asked permission to examine it. As soon as he looked at it, he said—"This is an arctic plant, you are killing it by the tropical heat into which you have introduced it." So he took it outside and exposed it to the frost, and to the dismay of the upper-gardener, heaped pieces of ice around the flower-pot; but the result vindicated his wisdom, for the plant began to recover, and was soon as strong as ever.

It is so with Christian character. Ease is more dangerous to it than difficulty. There is a Divine power which can keep man spiritually alive in every situation in life, in which he is rightly placed; but this requires peculiar watchfulness and devotedness, when one is surrounded with luxury, and shielded from opposition and tribulation. Hence those afflictive dispensations which the all-wise Governor of the universe permits his children to experience, should be regarded as tokens of his love, by which He designs to strengthen their characters, and to lead them to draw closer to and depend more fully upon Him.

The effect upon man of different outward surroundings, has been illustrated by the comparison of a tree growing in the midst of a forest, surrounded on all sides by trees that shelter and shade it. It runs up tall and slender; and if its protectors are cut away, it is easily overturned by the storms. But the same kind of a tree, growing in the open field, where it is continually beaten upon by the tempests, grows up strong and well-rooted, so that it is able to endure much violence. In like manner, the man who is compelled to rely upon his own resources, acquires an independence of character, which he could not otherwise have obtained.

A writer in the New York Christian Advocate pleasantly illustrates the benefit derived from trials, by a reference to her household experiences. She says:

"Two years ago I had 'line upon line, and precept upon precept,' where once I would only have seen homely manual duties to be performed. My sister had just moved to the pleasant little city of Orange, and there being much to do to bring order out of chaos, I being with her, tried to 'lend a helping hand.' One day I thought to make myself useful by removing paint, plastering, and varnish from the glass doors of a closet in the pantry. They resisted soap and water, but yielded somewhat to the application of turpentine. Wishing my work to be thoroughly done, I next tried alcohol, and with the aid of a nail and cloth succeeded in getting the corners clean. While using them I thought of what severe remedies the Lord has to apply sometimes in order to remove blemishes from our characters. We are inclined to murmur under the painful ordeal instead of thanking Him that He loves us well enough to chisel us in seemingly a rough way, that He may thereby transform us into polished shafts for his temple.

"After my persistent efforts to clean those panes of glass, which seemed at last successful, with a feeling of satisfaction I swung the door out and let the sunlight fall upon it, when lo, I beheld numerous specks that were invisible in the subdued light in which I had been working; instantly I thought, that it is the way God looks at us; where we think there is perfection He beholds glaring defects, and in love and mercy He uses the sharp chisel of trials to remove them. In eternity we will praise Him for doing this, despite our sinful murmurings, while enduring wholesome discipline. 'We see through a glass darkly,' till we learn to look with as clear spiritual vision as is vouchsafed to our limited finite perceptions."

In Youth's Companion the following incident is related:

It was the day express train on one of the great trunk lines of railway in the Middle States, filled as usual with through passengers. They sat for the most part silent, each absorbed in his own thoughts. There were two great railway magnets, on their way to New York to consult about a "deal," there were commercial travelers with their canvas valises beside them; there were merchants, lawyers, farmers glancing over their note-books, reading the papers, dozing; there was a richly dressed, supercilious-looking woman, who, with her child and maid, sat a little apart from the rest; there were chattering, giddy school girls, an old negro "aunt," and asleep at the back of the car a bloated, shabby old man, smelling of whiskey. These people, gathered out of all classes, had no intercourse; they looked askance and indifferently at each other.

The train, with a shriek and a jar, came to a full stop in the midst of the mountains. For a few minutes the passengers sat undisturbed, with the calm faith of the American in the power of officials to set all things right. The train continued stationary, however, one man after another went out.

They returned with tidings that a bridge had given way, and that the train would be detained for twelve or fifteen hours.

There was a general outcry of annoyance and vexation. It was near noon, everyone wanted luncheon. Each man insisted that his business was urgent and could not be delayed. One little woman in the corner, with a baby in her arms, began to weep unnoticed. The other women complained more or less loudly. For a few minutes every face was clouded, and the car was filled with a babel of angry voices. Presently somebody noticed the mother crying over her child, and spoke to her.

"O, my baby!" she sobbed. "It is sick, and I hope to get home in an hour! I think it is dying!"

There was a startled silence. Then an elderly gentleman at the back of the car came forward. "I am a physician," he said. "Let me see the child."

It was dangerously ill, and in need of active treatment. The haughty woman who had hitherto held herself aloof was the first to speak; she had a box of mustard plasters in her satchel, and she tore up her fine handkerchiefs for bandages. The old negro woman quietly went out, kindled a fire on the roadside, and heated some water to give the child a hot bath.

One woman knelt and chafed its feet; another made a bed for it with shawls. The porter brought pillows; a Hebrew drummer produced from his bag a bottle of laudanum, for which the doctor expressed a wish, and even the poor drunkard at the back of the car urged his flask of brandy on the mother, as being "a first rate medicine, ma'am." He looked at the child for a minute and turned away. "I'm a poor loafer," he said, "but I kin feel for the baby as much as any of you."

In the course of three or four hours the child was relieved, and fell into a sweet sleep. But before that time the passengers in the car had all become its nurses and kindfolks. When it was out of danger, and lying calmly in its mother's arms, they went out to the grassy bank by the side of the river, and improvised a picnic.

Some of the men had found a farm-house a mile or two away, and brought bread and ham; a few of the other passengers opened their satchels and produced some dainty morsels. The Jew had potted chicken; a Presbyterian minister, oranges; a farmer passing had cheese. There was but a little of each article as it was handed around, but there was abundance of good-will.

When, late in the evening, the engine puffed and whistled, and the conductor shouted "All aboard!!" a company of friendly companions crowded into the car, and when they parted, a few hours later, it was with many hearty handshakes and a general exchange of good wishes.

"What good, kindly folks they all were!" said the grateful little mother. "But I believe if it had not been for my sick baby they would never have found each other!"

We are apt to forget that pain and sickness are keys to unlock the hearts of men toward each other. The happy, prosperous man rarely knows the depth of tenderness which lies in his brother's bosom, ready to meet his call of need. J. W.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Visit to an Iowa Monastery.

For months I had planned to make a visit to New Melleray abbey. At last the favorable opportunity came, and I boarded the train for Dubuque. It is the only one in Iowa, and with the exception of one in Kentucky, the only Trappist monastery within our wide borders.

I arrived in Dubuque at an early hour in the morning, and after a light breakfast started out in search of the object of my destination. I soon discovered, much to my surprise, that the monastery was situated thirteen miles from the city, in such a secluded, out-of-the-way place, that the services of a guide were necessary in order to be sure to reach it. A guide and carriage were procured, and away we sped on a graded road, winding along beautiful scenery, over limestone bluffs, winding creek-bottoms and oak covered hills; which various changes added diversity to the surrounding landscape. After a pleasant drive of two hours we saw in the distance an immense stone building, secluded and hidden behind the trees. There was a sort of fascination about the surroundings that made me forget everything else but the sight before me. It was perhaps not so much the building that impressed me as all that it called up in my memory—the many saints who had spent their lives in the monastery; had lived, worked and died unknown to the world.

As we approached nearer, a bell struck. I knew what it meant. It was the call to prayer. Even I bowed my head at the call, knowing that inside of those walls sixty inmates sent up prayers for all mankind. The old iron gate, with massive lock and rusty hinges, stood open, and we drove up to the door and I alighted in search of some one to admit us to the mysteries within. Everything was silent, and the surroundings seemed to appear in a statue-like repose. The massive steps leading to the entrance I had courage enough to ascend, and then, somewhat frightened, I knocked on the iron door; no one came. Again I rapped, rapped, but with the same result; yet another rap, rap and presently I heard footsteps in the hall; the door opened, and for the first time in my life I saw the monk in his cowl, white robe and scapulary. I told him my errand, and with a hearty hand-shake he bid me enter.

Inside everything was plain, substantial and exceedingly cleanly. The sub-prior, the only one allowed to speak, received me kindly, served refreshments and conversed freely about the secrets of their peculiar order. I asked him, "Why did you select such an out-of-the-way place as this?" He answered, "We love solitude; in order to prosper in our work we must shun the world with all its glittering and attractive temptations." "Why did you not settle nearer the sea-coast?" I asked. He replied, "God directed us to come here." From these questions we went over to others concerning the founding of the order, its present condition, of which I shall attempt to give a short summary.

These monks are called Trappists, from the monastery of La Trappe, in France, where the order first originated. The road leading to this monastery was through a narrow mountain pass like a trap door—hence the name. The founder of the order was a rich prodigal from Paris, by the name of de Ranée (1626-1700); he had taken orders in 1651, owned several benefices and was a man of the world. In 1660 a great change came over him as he was one day standing on the top of the mountain, looking down upon La Trappe, then a Cistercian monastery. He was tired of life, disgusted with man, and shuddered at the thought of a life worthless to himself and to others. A thought struck him this was the place for him, here perhaps he could yet live a life of usefulness. He gave all his property to the poor, renounced his benefices and retired to La Trappe, which at this time was filled with indolent and worthless monks, whom he drove away, introducing rules of severest asceticism.

Soon many pious persons came from all parts of France, so that in a short time the place was filled with a new class which were as saintly and thrifty as the former class had been indolent and dissipated. In a short time another monastery was founded on the borders of Normandy. As some of the founders had been compelled to flee to a hollow tree for refuge in their wanderings in search of a suitable place, and there had found honey with which to sweeten their bread, the new monastery was called Melleray, from the French verb mieller—to sweeten with honey. This soon became a famous resort, and in the beginning of this century had 2000 monks.

In Ireland, monasteries had been destroyed by the English kings; thus many of their inmates went abroad. Many of these people came to La Trappe and Melleray. By 1817 the French government restored much of the property which had been confiscated to the State during the Revolution and thus the two monasteries which had suffered much were reimbursed. When Louis Phillippi was seated on the throne by the Revolution of 1830, the monks sympathized with the Bourbons, although they showed no signs of enmity against the new king; still it was manifest that they favored the dethroned king, and that was enough; the order was suppressed and all the Irish monks were driven out of France. It is to this cause that Mount Melleray abbey, in Waterford County, Ireland, has its origin. These Irish monks, exiled from France, had no place to go, no vocation they could pursue, having so long lived away from the world. Through the kindness of friends, and by the liberality of the king, a suitable place was founded, and a new abbey was erected in 1832, near the ruins of the old ones, which had long since been destroyed. It was this place Bishop Louis, of Dubuque, Iowa, visited in 1840, where he spoke several times on the western continent and especially on Iowa, which had just been admitted into the sisterhood of States. He offered a large tract of land if they would come, and spoke of many advantages which were denied them at home. They heard from Melleray, France, which place was again given up to the order, that a body of French monks had been sent to Pigeon Hill, near Conway, Pa., as early as 1803, which two years later had been moved to Kentucky, and again in 1830 to Pracadie, Nova Scotia. This continual change showed plainly that an attempt to found a monastery in the midst of republican institutions had been unsuccessful, but numbers prevailed, and in the summer of 1848, about twenty-five strong, robust men set sail for the new world. The same summer the corner-stone was laid for the only monastery in Iowa, and it received the name "New Mel-lery" after the "old mother." Twenty-six hundred acres of land had been given by the diocese at Dubuque, so that from the first they were on a good financial basis. A little later the same year a French colony called New Gethsemane was founded in Kentucky.

At first the work was hard and the gain but small—the soil had to be plowed, the houses erected, and the material had to be hauled by wagon from Dubuque; but all helped, there were no drones among the members, so time passed and success came at last.

The present monastery, finished in 1878, is a massive stone structure, built in the form of a cross, three stories high, with slate roof and heated by steam. The grounds are well taken care of; the barns filled with horses, cattle and sheep, gives one the impression of prosperity and thrift.

Two burial grounds, one for the lay brothers, the other for the monks proper, are beautifully situated to the east of the monastery. A simple iron cross, with the name and a Latin inscription was all, but shrubbery was planted around the graves, so that even in the middle of winter it gave one all the appearances of spring. I inquired about the truth of the saying that "every Trappist monk dug his own grave." The sub-prior said this was the old rule retained in Europe, but in America it had not been observed. It is done this way: as soon as a brother dies he is carried before the altar, where they pray for twenty-four hours. The corpse is then carried out to the grave and buried. As soon as this ceremony is over, they all dig a new grave for the next corpse; so in reality every monk digs his own grave.

They dress in black and white, since they partake of the characteristics of two orders—the Dominican and Cistercian. First comes the white robe, much like a cloak, on top of that the scapular is worn—a black garment without sleeves, coming down to the hips and fastened by a leather belt strapped around the waist. On top of this comes the cowl, made of white, rough woolen, coming down to the ankles. This costume is worn summer and winter, day and night—a monk always sleeps in his clothes.

No laughter is permitted, and within those walls not a smile has passed over the faces of any of the inmates for half a century.

Perhaps the most severe vow is the one in regard to silence. No one is allowed to speak. I was not aware of this, so I asked one of the members a question. He answered by lifting his right hand and saying "memento mori," (remember death.) This is the only sentence they can speak, and this only when strangers meet them. Think of forty years of such a life. No one to speak to as you arise in the morning; no one to converse with as you partake of your scanty meal; no friendly greeting of father, mother, sister or brother, but silence, silence for life.

Another severe method they must undergo is this—that when a relative of the order dies, the superior announces that "one of ours has passed away, let us all pray for his soul." For several weeks all have to suffer until the sad news is finally broken to the unhappy one whose mother or father has been taken away.

The day is divided into three parts. From two o'clock in the morning until sunrise is given up to prayer; then a cup of coffee, an egg, and a slice of bread are taken for breakfast, when it is manual labor until twelve. From twelve to one, this hour is given up to rest, prayer or sleep; again work until five, when the second meal, consisting of vegetables, soup, bread, are taken; from six to eight is devoted to praying, mass or reading; eight is the hour to retire, and such every day is spent in the monastery. In summer a lunch is taken at noon—however, in France only one meal a day was allowed.

It would perhaps be well to show the difference between superior and abbot. The former is appointed by the "mother house." Ireland, while an abbot is elected by the members, and such election confirmed by the "mother-house." The abbot is crowned by the bishop, has a ring on his finger, receives the cross and the sacred benediction.

The powers of the two are the same. They act as supreme rulers, and all the others must swear obedience to their command.

From what I could discover the members are thrifty, industrious and try to live a life of Godliness. Although this is an age of science and free institutions, let us not judge of their ways too harshly. Things change and men with them. The age of seclusion is passed, the men of the Pascal type with leather belts, and pegs to torment the flesh, are no longer demanded; the condition which gave the monastery birth is gone. It is no longer the school, the hospital, the home of the afflicted. Other things have taken its place. The State looks after the school and the hospital, the church looks after the afflicted. While the work of the monk has passed into obscurity, and the mission of the monastery has ceased, let us not forget that we owe them gratitude for what they accomplished.

NORWAY, Iowa, Second Month 12th, '92.

FROM THE "CHRISTIAN WITNESS."

"Come This Way, Father."

During a short visit to the sea-shore of our State, some two years since, with a party of friends, it was proposed one bright afternoon that we should go down the harbor on a fishing excursion. We accordingly started, and after sailing about three miles, a young lady of the company declined going farther and requested us to land her on one of the small islands in the harbor, where she proposed to stay until our return. My little boy, then about four years old, preferred remaining with her. Accordingly we left them and proceeded some six miles farther. We remained out much longer than we intended, and as night approached a thick fog set in, entirely enshrouding us. Without compass, and not knowing the right direction to steer, we groped our way along for some hours, until finally we distinguished the breaking of the surf on the rocks of one of the islands, but were at a loss to know which one of them. I stood up in the stern of the boat, where I had been steering, and shouted with all my strength. I listened a moment and heard through the thick fog and above the breaking of the surf, the sweet voice of my boy calling, "Come this way, father!—steer straight for me—I'm here waiting for you." We steered by that sound and soon my little boy leaped into my arms with joy, saying, "I knew you would hear me, father," and nestled to sleep in my bosom. The child and the maiden are both sleeping now. They died within two short weeks after the period I have referred to, with hardly an interval of time between their deaths. Now tossed on the rough sea of life, enveloped in the fog and surrounded by rocks, I seem to hear the sound of that cherub voice calling from the bright shore, "Come this way, father!—steer straight for me!" When oppressed with sadness I take my way to our quiet cemetery, still, as I stand by one little mound, the same musical voice echoes from thence—"Come this way, father!—I'm waiting for thee!"

I remember a voice which once guided my way, When lost on the sea, fog-enshrouded I lay. 'Twas the voice of a child as he stood on the shore, It sounded out clear 'ere the dark billows roar—"Come this way, my father, I'm straight for me; Here safe on the shore I am waiting for thee!"

I remember my joy when I held to my breast The form of that dear one, and soothed it to rest; And the clear, single words yet ring in my ear, "I called you, dear father, and knew you would hear The voice of your darling as you toss on the sea? While safe on the shore I was waiting for thee!"

That voice is now hushed which then guided my way; The form I then pressed is now mingled with clay; But the tones of my child still sound in my ear—"I am calling you, father!—O, can you not hear The voice of your darling as you toss on the sea? For on a bright shore I am waiting for thee."

I remember that voice; in many a lone hour It speaks to my heart with fresh beauty and power, And still echoes far out over life's troubled wave, And sounds from loved lips that lie in the grave—"Come this way, my father! O steer straight for me; Here safely in Heaven, I am waiting for thee."

A Winter Walk.

When walking in the woods in the early part of the First Month, I came across a tree of the common Jersey Pine (Pinus inops) that had been cut down, and to which the leaves still clung, and the cones remained unopened. These cones clung so tightly to the branches on which they grew that I had to use my pocket-knife to cut them off, and I found that the wood fibres of the branches were continued up the centre or axis of the cones—so that they might be regarded as so many branchlets, modified for the special purpose of bearing seed.

It is an interesting botanical fact, that the leaves and other appendages of a branch are all convertible into each other, so that if we regard the leaf as the normal form of growth, all the others, the flowers with calyx and corolla, stamens and pistils, may be looked upon as merely modified leaves.

The cones were tightly closed and the ends of the scales which composed it were armed with short, sharp projections or spines. Taking some of the cones home with me, I laid them on a warm mantle in our dining-room. In the course of a few hours, the dryness of the situation affected the scales of the cones so that they parted from each other at the tips, spread out, and allowed the seeds which they bore to drop out. In this open condition the resemblance of the scales to leaves was quite apparent. Their spiny tips were evidently the prolongation of the central axis or midrib analogous to the tendrils which we see at the apex of the leaves of some of the pea family.

My Pine tree also furnished me with some of the young cones or buds, whose growth had been arrested by the destruction of the tree,

These were of course much smaller than the matured fruit, and the scales were spread apart. At the base of each scale is a growing plant or two germs exposed to the air. The catkins which produce the pollen are clustered at the base of the shoots of the same year. They are very numerous, and when mature throw out clouds of pollen, which falling into the spaces between the open scales comes in contact with the germs, and thus enables them to grow and form perfect seeds. These seeds, of which there are on each scale of the cone are furnished with thin membranous wings, which probably assist in their distribution when shaken from their snug home by the autumn winds.

The scales of the cones are quite hard and woody, and it is their elasticity when dry that makes them separate. On placing in a glass of water one of the cones which had opened out on the dry mantle, I found that it again closed up apparently as tight as when first found.

The cones of the Jersey Pine are from two to three inches long, but some of the species of Pine produce cones which are more larger. In the cones of the firs, the scales are not thickened at the ends, and are quite handsome.

There are about 200 species of the cone-bearing trees. Some of which, as the mammoth Sequoia of California, are the largest vegetable productions of our globe.

In passing through the woods on the afternoon of the 6th of Second Month, I observed numerous little balls hanging to the branches of some of the trees. These proved to be the fruit pods of the Sweet Gum (Liquidambar Stracyiflua) a large and beautiful tree, with leaves deeply from five to seven lobed. A characteristic feature of it is, that the branchlets are very apt to be ornamented with broad, corky ridges of bark, two or three times as wide as the thickness of the twig that supports them. The pods are globular, consisting of many pods grown together and each opening with two awl-shaped beaks, so that the whole must be carefully handled.

A pile of hickory nuts lying at the root of a tree, with one end gnawed off and the contents extracted, indicated that some of the squirrel family were not far off. On examining the tree, a well-worn hole about twenty feet from the ground pointed out the probable residence of the nut-eater. Although some curiosity was felt to see the pretty creature, yet motives of humanity prevailed and I passed on without disturbing his winter's nap.

A seed pod thick set with sharp spines adhering to the dead stalk of a plant was recognized as the fruit of a common weed, Janestown Weed or Thorn Apple (Datura Stramonium). It had partially opened at the top, showing a tendency to split into four valves. Inside were a multitude of small brown, wrinkled seeds, closely dotted over with small prominences like the surface of shagreen leather. This plant is a member of the Night Shade family, most of which are narcotic poisons, some of them very virulent. To it belong the Night Shade, Henbane, and Tobacco. It seems surprising that in this dangerous family of plants we are indebted for some of our most valuable vegetables, such as the Eggplant, Tomato and the White Potato. Yet even in these, as modified by cultivation there still remain traces of the venomous properties natural to the genus, and the foliage and other green parts would probably be dangerous to eat. These, however, are greedily consumed by the Colorado beetle, which has made its way from the mountains, its original habitat, to the waters of the Atlantic Ocean, finding abundant food in the members of this tribe of plants so commonly cultivated in our country.

On my return to the village, my path was along a lane, one side of which was lined with bushes and green briars. Hanging to these were several bags of brown silk, about an inch in diameter. On cutting one of these open, the interior was found to be filled with a loose floss of silk, among which were numerous minute spiders. This then was a case for its eggs, snugly built by the mother spider in the fall of the year, and left to the sun and weather, until the warmth of spring should hatch them and tempt the little animals abroad to enter upon the cares of life for themselves. A Sharp Encounter with a Catamount.—Louisa Boerner, a 12-year old German girl, living with her parents near one of Ole Bull's old settlements in the southern part of this county, had been working for a week or so in a family living a mile or so from her home, and when she quit their service one day last week, the farmer's wife made her a present of a pair of live geese. The girl started for home early in the morning, driving her geese. Midway between the farmer's where she had been working and her own home was another farmer's, and a coach dog or Dalmatian hound, belonged to the farmer, which had a reputation for being aggressively fierce. When Louisa Boerner and her geese came within sight of that farm, the girl saw the dog sitting by the roadside in front of the house.

"I wasn't afraid of the dog for myself," Louisa afterward said, "but I was afraid he would fly at my geese."

So when the girl saw the dog she hunted up a heavy club at the roadside, and resolved to defend her geese with it against the dog if he attacked them. On one side of the road a heavy piece of wood extends for a long distance. Louisa had driven her geese but a few yards, after picking up the club when she saw something spring from the woods close to the road, seize one of her geese and drag it toward the woods. The girl leaped forward to the aid of her loudly squawking goose, and dealt the animal that had seized it a heavy blow across the back with her club. The animal, which was a big wildcat, let go of the goose and sprang toward the girl. She struck it again with the club, and fell to the ground from the force of the blow. The wildcat jumped upon her and tore her dress nearly off her with one sweep of its long, sharp claws, and tore the flesh on her shoulder. The frightened goose, squawking loudly and hurt so that it could only flutter about in the road, then seemed to be more tempting to the wildcat than the girl was, and it sprang away and again seized the goose. Louisa hurriedly regained her feet, and, unmindful of her torn clothes and bleeding shoulder, grabbed her club and ran to the defense of her goose again. But her aid was not needed, for the first thing she saw was the dreaded coach dog coming up the road like a whirlwind, and before she realized the fact he had the wildcat by the neck, and with one crunch of his teeth and a shake of his head, he stretched the catamount dead at the roadside.

The girl picked up her goose, which had a broken wing, a torn leg, and a badly lacerated neck. The other goose had been so badly frightened by the attack of the wildcat that it had squatted in a fence corner. Louisa started it out, and, carrying the wounded fowl in her arms, drove its companion on before her. The dog trotted along at her side, and would not leave her until she was safely at home with her geese, when he trotted leisurely back home. The wildcat was a male, of unusual size, and its mate was killed a few hours later in the same locality, by a man who was pheasant hunting.—Carter's Camp, Pa., Eleventh Month.

Our Banner.—Longfellow tells of "The youth who bore, 'mid snow and ice,

A banner with the strange device,
Excelsior!"

But on the severely cold days of winter we send out a youth to bear through our icy streets a banner with the much better device—

"Please blanket your horses while stopping!"

When he finds in front of some great dry-goods store a coachman covered with furs, and his horses standing without blankets, he stops—plants the pole of his standard on the sidewalk—a crowd gathers—and the good lady never forgets thereafter to have her horses suitably protected.—Our Dumb Animals.

Charitable Bequests.—Mary McCrea, Stuart, the widow of the wealthy sugar refiner, Robert L. Stuart, has recently died, and by her will disposes of about $5,000,000 of property. She left no relatives except very distant ones, and among these she divides $350,000. Bequests are left to several other persons. Then follow a number of benevolent gifts to colleges, hospitals &c.—ranging from $75,000 down to $5,000 to each. There then remained about $5,000,000. This is divided into two equal parts—one-half is to be divided among the following institutions:

The American Bible Society, the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church, the Presbyterian Hospital, the Lenox Library, the Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church at Princeton, and the Board of Church Erection Fund of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. The other part is divided equally among twenty-six institutions, giving them each $90,000 or $70,000. They include other Presbyterian Boards, the American Sunday School Union, the Trustees of the Presbytery of New York (to be used and applied for Church extension in New York City), the New York Bible Society, the American Tract Society, the New York City Mission and Tract Society, the Young Men's Christian Association of New York, and a large number of hospitals and asylums.

She had left $50,000 each to two Museums in New York, but when their trustees concluded to open them to the public on the First-day of the week, she disapproved of their course and revoked the bequests.

She is said to have been very liberal during her lifetime and to have been in the way of distributing a large part of her income to benevolent objects.

Legal Responsibility of Liquor Sellers.—There is a statute in Pennsylvania which does not seem to be very wise. It is, however, one which could be made very effective in the hands of men determined to see it enforced. It is the law which provides that saloon keepers shall be held responsible in damages for injuries resulting from their sale of liquors to intoxicated persons. The Supreme Court of the State has lately made a decision which sustains the law as constitutional and equitable. A poor widow sued a liquor seller because he sold liquor to her husband until he was unable to guide his steps homeward, fell into a gutter, contracted pneumonia, and died. A jury gave the widow substantial damages, and upon appeal the Supreme Court sustained the verdict and the law. It brushed away without much ceremony the pleas made for the saloon keeper that pneumonia, and not liquor, was the immediate cause of death, and that the man took the liquor voluntarily. The Court replied to the last plea: "Every drunkard not only takes liquor voluntarily, but whenever he can get it, and because of his weakness the law makes the saloon keeper responsible for selling to such persons. He has not the will power to resist the temptation, and for this reason the sale to him is forbidden." A very good, brief temperance lecture delivered from the Supreme Bench.

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 5, 1892.

We have already mentioned that Friends in Great Britain had sent two of their number to investigate the condition of the Russian provinces which are suffering from famine, and that one or more Friends propose going (or perhaps ere this have gone) to that country to superintend the distribution of relief to the famished.

Believing that this proposal furnishes an unusually favorable opportunity of rendering assistance in a case that most forcibly appeals to the benevolence of the community, and that the channel thus opened is one in which confidence may be placed, a few Friends met, on the 18th of Second Month, in the Committee Room of Arch Street Meeting-house, and agreed that a Committee should be appointed to solicit and receive subscriptions from Friends and others for the help of the starving Russians.

The Mortgage Trust Company of Pennsylvania, No. 113 S. Fourth Street, will act as Treasurer to this fund, and donations may be sent to it; or handed to any of the members of the following Committee:

David Seull, Samuel Morris, Thomas Cope, Jas. Whitall, Dr. Jas. E. Rhoads, Joab. B. Garrett, John Walton, Charles Rhoads, Samuel R. Shipley, Jos. E. Carter, Dr. Henry Hartshur, Frank Taylor, Geo. Vaux, Henry Haines, Jno. W. Biddie, Wm. P. Townsend, Jesse Haines, Joseph L. Bailly, Thomas Scattergood, Wm. H. Haines.

As funds are received, it is proposed to remit by draft to Friends of London. No part of the expenses of administration will be taken from the fund.

An appeal to our members and others was purposely withheld for a few days, so as not to seem to interfere with the more public effort, which has been so generously responded to, of sending a shipload of provisions direct to the Baltic.

So widespread is the calamity, that the probability is great, that notwithstanding the efforts to relieve the distressed, there will be a great loss of life. But let us do what we can, and thus be found among those, on whom rest the blessings of those that are ready to perish.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On Second Month 29th, the treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, in regard to the Behring Sea seal fisheries, was signed at the State Department by Secretary Blaine, on behalf of this country, and Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British Minister. The treaty is now only subject to confirmation by the United States Senate and by Parliament. It is known that the Board of Arbitrators will consist of seven persons, two representing the United States, two representing Great Britain (one of whom is to be a Canadian), and one each representing the neutral Governments of France, Sweden and Italy.

The United States Supreme Court has decided the case brought by the Governments of Great Britain and Canada, known as the Sayward case, to test the right of the United States to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over the fishery of the Behring Sea. The decision is in favor of the United States, the application for a writ of prohibition against the Alaska Court being denied. The political aspects of the case were not directly decided, but the Court intimated that the judicial tribunals should not interfere with claims of territory sovereignty made by another department of Government.

Three cases in which the constitutionality of the McKinley Tariff act was attacked were decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, in an opinion by Justice Harlan on the 29th ult., in favor of the validity of the act. On the same day the Court, in an opinion by Justice Brewer, decided that the rule of the House of Representatives of the last Congress, permitting the Speaker to count a quorum from among members present but not voting, was valid. The question was raised in a suit brought by a firm of importers to test the validity of the Dingley worsted act. The conference of Labor, Alliance and other parties held in St. Louis last week, favorable to the formation of a third political party, adopted in their platform the following important demands: Free and unlimited coinage of silver; increase in the circulating medium to 550 per capita; a graduated income tax; ownership of the land, water, and minerals, and telegraphs, telegrams, and telephones; and that the Government issue enough paper money to pay the Union soldiers the difference between the price of depreciated value in which they were paid, and gold.

The Liquor License bill was put on its passage in the Senate of Iowa on the 24th ult., and failed. The vote was 25 Democratic yeas for and 23 Republican noes against the bill, but as two members were absent, and a majority of the full Senate was necessary, the bill did not pass.

An oxny mine of large dimensions is reported to have been discovered at Harrisonburg, Va.

The conference of the Third Month last week selected as a site for the institution the plot of ground bounded by Fourth, Fifth, Merchant and Ranstead Streets, now occupied by the Fifth Street Market and the Girard estate. The cost of the plot is $624,000, and, option on the properties having been secured, the Board of Directors has instructed the Real Estate Committee to consummate the purchase.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 505, which is 32 less than during the previous week, and 104 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing, 256 were males and 249 females; 69 died of pneumonia; 59 of influenza; 47 of diseases of the heart; 24 of diphtheria; 29 of typhoid fever; 18 of bronchitis; 17 of convulsions; 14 of apoplexy; 13 of marasmus; 12 of inflammation of the brain; 11 of old age; 11 of Bright's disease; 11 of cancer of the breast and 11 of uremia.

FOREIGN.—It is reported that an expedition is to be sent from England shortly to explore the coast of Patagonia for minerals.

In the British House of Lords on the 29th ult., Lord Knutsford, Secretary of State for the Colonies, stated the views of the colonial legislatures had been considering what taxation, if any, was necessary to make up the loss of revenue occasioned by the McKinley bill. The Legislative Council of Jamaica, he said, would probably concur in the views of the Governor that it would not be necessary to levy new taxation, as the revenue was prosperous. The Governments of Trinidad, St. Vincent and the Bahamas, Lord Knutsford continued, had approved some new taxes. Messrs for St. Lucia, the Leeward Islands and British Guiana were under consideration by the governments of those colonies.

On the 25th and 26th of last month, a great concourse of unemployed workmen led by Socialists, made a serious demonstration in the City of Berlin. Demands were made for bread, and butchers' and bakers' shops were looted by the mob. Encounters with the police occurred and many workmen were wounded and a number made prisoners.

The Berlin correspondent of The Times says: "The impression created in Germany by Emperor William's speech at the Brandenburger banquet is indescribable. It is felt that the gamut has been thrown down and that the struggle of the Government with the ever growing opposition will be fought to the bitter end. The Education, Liquor Traffic and other unpopular bills will be forced through the Legislature at all costs. The Emperor's words have solidified the Radical coalition. The Ministers are now in the presence of the united opposition of the National Liberals, Radicals and Socialists.

The Russian newspapers, with scarcely an exception, unfavorably criticize the speech of Emperor William at Brandenburger. They declare that the language used on that occasion is calculated to inspire doubt and anxiety as to the stability of Emperor William's pacific intentions.

The outlook for the recently discovered coal mines in the Argentine Republic is so favorable, according to Engineering, that the railway companies of that country have declined to renew their contracts with the British mines for fuel. Hitherto all the coal burned on the Argentine railroads has been imported, but it is believed that the newly-discovered mines will furnish a supply entirely sufficient for domestic consumption.

Chile has declined altogether to participate in the World's Fair at Chicago, on the plea that she cannot afford it.

According to telegrams received in Havana, the Minister of the Colonies persists in his scheme to lay out a tract of land, half to three million dollars upon the sugar industry.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

1854.—Ninth Month 16th. "We attended Chesterfield Monthly Meeting; wherein I was renewedly helped to preach the Gospel of life and salvation, to comfort the mourners in Zion, and to stir up the young and the middle-aged to greater faithfulness. If any good is done, it is from the Lord. We are unprofitable servants; He can work with or without us."

"18th. At Plymouth Monthly Meeting, I had service relating to the occupancy of gifts in the church, bestowed by our adorable Head, and Minister of the sanctuary, upon those whom He has prepared, by the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Spirit, to receive them. I believe there were those in that meeting whom, if they continue faithful, He would make judges and consellers, as they steadfastly followed his Divine leadings. The business was transacted with religious weight, and sweetness of spirit and manner towards one another."

"On sitting with the Friends of Providence, I felt for the little remnant who love the Truth and seek its prosperity. I was led to encourage this class, to labor to draw near to their Lord and Master; looking to Him for guidance in their religious duties, and for the renewal of their faith and strength to do his will. He joined himself to the two disciples, as they walked from Jerusalem to Emmaus and were sad, under the loss of their Master, as they supposed; and He opened to them the Scriptures, in the prophets and the Psalms, concerning himself; so that when He disappeared, after blessing and breaking the bread at the table, they knew it was He, and said, "Did not our hearts burn within us, while He talked with us by the way, and while He opened to us the Scriptures?" He is as near to his children, watching over them, at this day as ever; and He will keep and console them, as they hold fast their love and allegiance to Him. Some states of a different character were also spoken to."

"25th. At Sewickly, we found a pretty large company for that place; with whom we sat in silence for a considerable time, in a low place; the quickening power of Christ seeming to be much out of sight and feeling. At length I was enabled to labor among them, to show the spirit and element in which a true Christian lives; wherein he is enabled to worship God in spirit and in truth, out of meeting as well as in meeting, to the refreshment and strength of his own soul, and also for the help of others. A warning was also held up against the inordinate pursuit and love of lawful things; by which, even those who have known and loved the Truth, may lose ground, and become captivated with worldly pursuits. I felt drawn, though in weakness, to bend the knee, and to pray for those on whom the support of the ark of the testimonies chiefly rested, in that place; that their faith and devotion to the cause of Christ might be increased; and for those who are afar off, wasting their substance; that they might arise and come to the Father, and acknowledge they were unworthy to be called his sons, and ask that He would make them his hired servants; also for all now before the Lord; that He would keep us through the remaining tribulations of this life, and prepare us to mingle with the just of all generations, in praising and glorifying his great name, with the Lamb, world without end; Amen."

"26th. Being taken by our kind friend G. G. to a station on the Pennsylvania Railroad, in time to meet the train for Philadelphia; after taking leave, we started a little after eight o'clock, and got to our beloved homes, between one and two o'clock, next morning. I found my dear wife and children in usual good health, and felt thankful in being restored to them in safety, and in the peacefulness and true comfort, which the Lord bestows for the performance of his requirements."

"Eleventh Month 16th. We attended the Quarterly Meeting at Salem. In it I was engaged to revise the exhortation of the apostle, 'If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit'; and to enforce the importance of showing by our conduct and conversation, and the weightiness of our spirits, that we have been with the Lord, and that He is with us. It is the want of bringing forth the fruits of the Holy Spirit, that keeps the Society in weakness, and impairs its usefulness in the world, and greatly disables the members from aiding each other towards a growth in the Truth."

"Twelfth Month 10th. At our First-day Meeting, this morning, after long waiting, I was constrained to rise with the expressions used by one of our ancient Friends, 'There is a faith that overcomes the world, and there is a faith that is overcome by the world.' It is a great favor to be possessed of the knowledge of the doctrines of the everlasting Gospel, as recorded in the Holy Scriptures, and for which we are bound to be thankful; but the faith which gives us the victory over the world, the flesh and the devil, is produced by the operation of the Spirit of Christ in the heart. This Spirit reveals those things which it requires us to forsake, and gives us, at the same time, if we receive it, faith to believe that what is required is the Divine will; and as we are obedient, brings us out of our fallen condition, and gradually opens to us the Scriptures according to the Lord's will, and enables us availing to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and in the authority of the Holy Scriptures, and to profit by them. By the obedience of faith, we experience a growth in grace, and are made victorious over Satan and all his temptations; and participate in the promise of the Son of God, 'To him that overcometh, will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne.' The divinity, atonement, intercession and advocacy of our Lord Jesus Christ, who was crucified without the gates of Jerusalem, a propitiatory offering for the sin of the world, and is now glorified at the right hand of the Father, was also plainly testified to and held forth according to the Scriptures. These things were delivered in humility, as they were brought before me, I trust, by the good Remembrancer, and reached the hearts of some present, to their comfort and satisfaction. It is good to be faithful to the pointings of the Divine finger, in childlike simplicity, not knowing what is the Lord's design, and the consequences that may grow out of it."

1855.—Second Month 8th. "Went to Abington Quarterly Meeting. I was enabled to open the great importance of partaking of the Divine life, which Christ declared He came that his sheep might have, and more abundantly than under the preceding dispensation. Those who are united to Him as members of his body, are kept alive unto God by the life of Christ, that flows from Him into them; and as they submit to his humbling dispensations and baptisms, they are prepared to hear his voice, and to distinguish it from all other voices."

"In the second meeting, the beauty and excellency of our Discipline and order, were upheld; conforming as they do, to the doctrines of Christ and his apostles; and which all among us, who are alive in the Truth, will feel bound to support, as a trust and duty given to us, which is sacred."

"Third Month 20th. Went to the Northern District Meeting; where the necessity of the inward work of religion was opened; in which the axe is laid to the root of the trees, and every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is to be hewn down and cast into the fire. Sound doctrine, held in the head, and on the tongue, will avail but little. We must submit to Him who baptizes with the Holy Ghost and fire; who gathers the wheat into the garner and burns up the chaff with unquenchable fire. In this way only, shall we know the possibility of being made free from sin in this life, and true witnesses of the Lord's saving power, and of the truth of the doctrines of the everlasting Gospel. I expressed the belief, that our religious Society would not be permitted to be laid waste; but from among the pots, and as from the stones of the streets, the Lord would continue to raise up those whom He would make living ministers, and discerning elders in the church."

"Fifth Month 14th. Went to the Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders, at Concord.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 247.

A WORD IN SEASON.

We sat a long time in silence; and after the Queries were read and answered, and the business got through, I ventured to speak on the responsibility of the stations of ministers and elders. If I know anything of the nature of Gospel ministry, it is that only which is opened in the soul by the great Minister of the sanctuary, and which He authorizes to be given to the people, as it is given to us; and the design of it is to gather souls to Christ. Elders are to receive the gift of spiritual discernment, and to aid and counsel ministers, under the Lord's direction."

"Seventh Month 4th. This afternoon, I went to attend, from his late dwelling at Westfield, the burial of our friend Samuel Leeds, a minister. He is reported to have said little throughout his sickness, appearing to be abstracted from worldly things, and very much kept in a quiet frame of mind.

"The removal of the servants of Christ from among us, one after another, was very affecting to me, as I stood by the grave, and saw his remains lowered into the earth. The spirit that often had been baptized for the dead, and for the living, tribulated seed, was now gathered unto God, and to his Christ, among the blessed of all generations. Will not the Lord have compassion upon his church and people, and give evidence that He has not forgotten their desolate condition, by pouring out of his Spirit on sons and daughters, and giving gifts for the work of the ministry, and the edification of the body of Christ. Even so, O Lord! Amen."

"20th. There is no way by which the strength of the church can be restored, but by the members coming back to the first principle, of individually waiting upon the Lord, and seeking to receive from Him the spirit of prayer, that He would return to us, and show us our real condition; what He would have us to come out of, and the high and holy way He would have us to walk in. His mercies are the same from generation to generation; and when we are rightly humbled and brought back, He will condescend again to our low estate, and lift us up, and put songs of praise into our mouths; and the children will be enabled to join in thanksgiving and praise to his great and ever-adorable name."

"Ninth Month 13th. At Hadsonfield Quarterly Meeting, held at Medford, a sense that individual concern for their own salvation, was greatly wanting in a large number, was the prevailing feeling of my mind. After a time of silence, I believed it right to rise with the testimony, that religion is an internal work, between the soul and its Almighty Creator; and was led to open the doctrine, that in his mercy, He gives every one a sight of his condition in the fallen, transgressing nature, and if he receives the Lord Jesus in his appearance in the heart, He not only shows him his sins, but will give him power to forsake them, and grant repentance and forgiveness. He breaks down the kingdom of Satan, casts him out, and prepares the soul, by the baptism of the Holy Ghost and fire, to be a temple for him, by his Holy Spirit, to dwell in."

"To think ourselves more religious than our neighbors because our dress is less graceful, our manners less pleasing, and our minds more ignorant and unenlightened, is to shake the very foundation of revealed religion; its derivation from Him who gave us the sense of beauty we despise, the social instincts which we violate, and the love of knowledge which we condemn."

David Sands and his companion were riding along the road together on a certain occasion, when they came to a field which some cattle had broken into and were devouring some cabbage which were growing there. Upon seeing which, his companion remarked to David, it will not do for us to pass on, without informing the owner what is taking place, I will go to the house and let him know. No, said David, I will go myself and do it. Accordingly he rode up to the house and, dismounting, entered a room where he found the owner on his knees in prayer with his family. David immediately addressed him and said, "My friend, if thou dost not watch as well as pray, the cattle will eat up thy cabbages." The man took the practical hint thus given him in the manner David intended he should, and with feelings of thankfulness to him for informing him of the state of things, took immediate measures to prevent any further destruction of his property.

The language used by David Sands on this occasion, may be spiritually applied with profit. For without watchfulness, it is easy to lose the condition in which the Christian lives as in the immediate presence of his Heavenly Father; and thus the way may be opened for the springing up in his mind of evil tendencies which had before been kept in a good degree of subjection.

The following instances of a word in season, were furnished me by a Friend who has travelled considerably in the work of the ministry. He says:

"When the writer was on a visit to Iowa a few years ago, he was in a certain neighborhood where Friends resided and where the fast element predominated among them. Having a prospect of being at meeting there, he was feeling somewhat weighed down therewith. A friend with whom he was staying observing that he was somewhat cast down about it, and desiring to cheer him up, related an anecdote of Calvin Wasson, a minister who resided some years ago in Indiana, which is in substance as follows: A young minister came into the neighborhood with the prospect of being at meeting there, notice having been spread around of his intention. He came to Calvin Wasson's house and was feeling much cast down with the prospect before him; which Calvin observing and wishing to encourage him pleasantly remarked, 'John [his first name was John], don't get too low.' They attended the meeting and the young man was much favored therein in the ministry, and was enabled to relieve his mind of its burden in a satisfactory manner. After meeting, falling again in company with his host, the young minister was very lively and cheerful, and Calvin, perhaps fearing he was in danger of being elated, pleasantly remarked, 'Now John, don't get too high.'

The British Friend reprints from the Alliance News a thrilling story of the hair-breadth escape of a "Steeple-Jack" in Lancaster, England.

The man had been engaged in repairing the top of one of the tall chimneys which are common in the manufacturing districts of the north, and the repairs being completed, he proceeded to lower the scaffolding whereon he had been working. This he did, piece by piece, by means of a rope, he himself remaining on the dizzy summit of the chimney. At length the last plank had been lowered, and the steeple-jack himself was preparing to descend, when, to his horror, and equally to that of the spectators below, his rope became detached and fell to the ground.

The man's perilous position was at once evident. Resting on a narrow ledge a hundred feet above the ground, he had no apparent means of descent, nor was there any way of assisting from below. The excitement quickly spread throughout the town, and soon a large crowd had assembled.

How long could he retain his dangerous position in mid-air? Would he be overcome by vertigo, caused by fear, and fall headlong to the ground? Such were the thoughts passing through the minds of the excited crowd of on-lookers. Some one suggested that a kite should be flown with a cord attached to take up a rope, but no kite was available. The steeple-jack was gesticulating as if beseeching assistance that those below were anxious yet powerless to render.

A piteous shriek rent the air as a woman ran quickly into the crowd. "His mother!" was whispered from mouth to mouth. A deadly silence spread over the assembly, and all eyes were turned towards the woman, who, with a stony look of horror, was gazing upward at her son. Suddenly her voice again rang through the air, sharp and clear, amid the pervading silence. "Unravel that stockin'!" she cried out; "Tom, ma dear, unravel the stockin'!"

It was a flash of inspiration. Wise men had been vainly endeavoring to devise a means of rescue, but it was left for the poor woman who had knitted the stockings that her lad wore to find the way to save him. A hearty cheer burst from the crowd when this was recognized, and soon it was seen that the steeple-jack had taken off one of his stockings and was unpicking the stitches.

It was a long process, but at last it was finished, and another cheer burst forth as the woollen thread floated lightly to the ground. Thin twine was in readiness, and this was affixed to the woollen filament to be drawn up by the man above. Then a stout string was fastened to the twine; and this being drawn up too, a cord was fastened to the string, and, finally, a rope to the cord. The steeple-jack this time fixed the rope firmly on the chimney, and, to the joy of the multitude, they saw him descend in safety.

The idea that occurred to the mother, to tell her son to unravel his stocking, is spoken of as "a flash of inspiration." And so it may really have been. For I have no doubt that He, whose tender mercies are over all his works, does at times put into the mind of man the fitting thought, as well as the high resolve, in the needful time.

A young man, distinguished for his mathematical attainments was fond of challenging his fellow-students to a trial of their skill in solving difficult problems. One day a classmate came into his study, and laying a folded paper before him, said, "There is a problem I wish you would help me solve," and immediately left the room. The paper was eagerly unfolded, and there, instead of a question in mathematics, were traced the lines, "What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul, or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" With a gesture of impatience, he tore the paper to atoms, and turned again to his books. But in vain he tried to shake off the impressions of the solemn words he had read. The Holy Spirit pressed home his convictions of guilt and danger, so that he could find no peace till he found it by believing in Jesus. He subsequently became a minister of the Gospel he had once despised, and his first sermon was from the words, so eminently blessed to his soul, "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul."

A converted drunkard tells the following incident: "I had been all day in the public house, and at night when I came home, my wife was reading a chapter to the children, as usual. While she was so engaged, I went slipping in like a condemned criminal. The portion of Scripture read was the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew, in which these words occur, 'When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with Him, then shall He sit upon the throne of his glory; and before Him shall be gathered all nations; and He shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats; and He shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left.'

"Our youngest boy, then about four years old, was lying with his head on his mother's lap, and just when she had read those awful words, he looked up earnestly into her face, and asked, 'Will father be a goat then, mother?' This was too strong to be resisted. I spent a sleepless, awful night, wishing rather to die than to live such a life. I was now decided, and all the men on earth could not tempt me to drink again. This affecting incident became, by the blessing of God, the turning point in my life."

Dr. Stephen H. Tyng was speaking to his Sunday-school upon the idea that in the nature of every one there is some kind of animal that needs repression. He likened the liar to a serpent with its fangs, a frivolous boy to a monkey with its antics, the vain child to a peacock spreading itself to be admired, and the angry child to a tiger. After the talk was over he gave out a hymn. The children did not make ready promptly, and began to sing it in confusion. His face flushed. He rapped sharply on the desk, and gave vent to some exclamation of impatience. A little girl swept away into forgetfulness of self by the vehemence of the preacher, pointed her finger at him and called out in a childish voice, but loud enough to be heard all over the room, "Tiger!" Instantly a hush fell upon the room. Dr. Tyng walked down the aisle, took the little girl, shrinking and frightened, in his arms, quieted her fears with his benign smile, walked back to the platform, and, caressing her, said to the children, "Yes, she has told the truth. My enemy all my life has been the tiger in me. I have a hard battle to keep him caged. Every now and then he breaks loose in spite of me; and it is because I have had such a hard battle that I want you children to tame the tiger that is in you while you are young." J. W.

SAFETY is commonly promoted by a sense of danger. Not he who is sure that he will never fall or fail stands firmest in the hour of peril; but he who knows that he will surely be overthrown unless he is alert, and is persistently determined. He who feels that he is in no danger of being overcome by a love of drink if he is not a total abstainer, is by his very confidence in peculiar peril. If no one else is in danger of becoming a drunkard, he is.

For "THE FRIEND."

The "War Cry," with Some Observations after Reading a Copy.

This is a weekly of sixteen medium-sized pages containing more than double the matter of THE FRIEND, published in New York City, at five cents per copy, by Ballington Booth, son of General Booth—the latter commonly known as the "Commander-in-chief of the Salvation Army." The paper's circulation is stated to be 47,000 copies. The "soldiers" consider it part of their calling to push the sale of the paper; there being printed a "Soldiers' Competitive Drill," giving the lists of sales effected at various posts. There are to be seen, however, no notices of prizes, such as are sometimes met with in religious papers, while there is a refreshing absence of quack medicine advertisements, as also of alluring financial advertisements inviting investments of 7 to 12 per cent. A few notices at the bottom of the last page only, including information as to where to obtain the peculiar uniform of the Army, furnish evidence that the proprietors and publishers have deemed it well, as have those of THE FRIEND, to dispense with the usual line of advertising.

Having incidentally referred to the uniform, I note a paragraph of counsel found in one of the columns, enjoining faithfulness to the Army's singular attire upon the part of its members. It seems quite in line with the salutary recommendations frequently laid before our own members not to be ashamed of our religious Society's testimony concerning adherence to simplicity of apparel.

"Uniform shirkers should ask themselves the question if they are willing to wear uniform in heaven and be seen walking the golden streets of the New Jerusalem attired in white robes. If saints of this character would dare to be different from sinners on the Day of Judgment, why not dare to be different from them now and by their dress draw the line sharply between themselves and the world? Let them show by their dress that they are on the Lord's side."

It was with the object of impressively commending this testimony that Catharine Booth desired, as one of her last requests, to be laid in the coffin in her simple dress and bonnet.

One might naturally fear, as a consequence of the general use of the military titles, that the membership would gradually incline to take on a carnally aggressive or retaliatory spirit. This, however, does not appear in anything set forth in the paper before me. On the contrary, the evidences of a peace-loving disposition are decidedly manifest. The fact that the women equally with the men are recognized as the possessors and exponents of spiritual gifts, and are indifferently associated in their labors, has probably tended to preserve a healthy counterpoise—as we have found to be the case in our own Society. "I would not like to stand and face the crowds that you face night after night without a revolver or some other weapon," said one man; "you don't know what desperate characters you face." "But we prove," said the (New York) narrator, "the weapon of love is a great protection."

In the account of General Booth's visit to Australia, the present winter, he is reported as saying at Brisbane: "My mission is 'Peace on earth—peace in the minds, in the bosoms, in the families; peace between one man and another. I want to see real and lasting brotherhood—a brotherhood something more than a name, a reality.'"

The following incident (in Baltimore) betokening the possession of an unperturbed spirit such as seeks the highest good of the wrongdoers and persecutors, is suggestive of incidents common in early Friends' experiences:

"While holding a meeting near a saloon, the saloon-keeper came out with a broom and swept around our circle so that the dirt fell on our clothes, but we soon stepped into the clean place which he had swept. This caused him to use abusive language and plan another method of attack by turning a stream of water upon us from a slightly elevated position, but we did not mind, as he succeeded in attracting the crowds for us."

The repeated mobbing last month, at East-bourne, England, of members of the Salvation Army, whereat their defence was left to the police if they saw fit to protect them, but when they did not, meekly to submit without violent reprisal to the taunts, blows, stoning and other violent demonstrations of the rabble, were practical exemplifications of the non-resistant principle set forth in the Sermon on the Mount.

Of the army life of one who afterward became a saloon-keeper, and whose heart still later was graciously changed, the relator in the War Cry is moved to declare: "With all the romance and poetry men throw around war, it is a horrible thing—a great crime—and the authors of these wholesale scenes of carnage will have all their dreadful work brought home to them when God comes to judge the world for its wickedness."

The army officer above alluded to, Captain A—, after the close of the civil war opened a saloon in San Francisco, continuing in the business about twenty years. He was a good customer of his own bar, and eventually became a helpless drunkard, was frequently an inmate of the Home of the Inebriates, and several times had the delirium tremens. His drinking habits cost him his saloon, he was turned adrift, and for a short time cast in his lot with a theatrical company. Finally, the happily changed demeanor of one who had been a boon companion of his, but who had been led to give up his wretched life through the instrumentality of the Salvation Army, so wrought upon A—that he also was brought under the transforming power of Divine grace, gave up his liquor as well as the tobacco to which he had been addicted since he was twelve years of age, and, it is said, has been mercifully preserved to stand firm, bringing no reproach to the name of his Lord, or to the new Army with which he has associated.

In this city of Philadelphia the writer can recall at least five church properties which have been turned into places of amusement. This enumeration includes the site of that notorious "Carrousel," in which only recently five hundred people, the majority of them boys and girls, were arrested or detained by the officers of the law. In the War Cry we read: "We have opened our new barracks at Columbus, Ohio. It was formerly a theatre; but now, thank God! it is used to glorify his name."

Record is made of the first freehold property acquired in Italy, at Torre Pellice, in the northern part of the kingdom, where there is a Catholic seminary and Waldensian college. "The unheard-of union of a Waldensian pastor and a Catholic priest was formed" to keep them out; nevertheless, a Women's Training Home was opened, and a headquarters established.

In noticing the several references to the "swearing in" of new members or "recruits,"

I felt a hope that it would be given to some of the religiously-concerned ones in the "Army," to see, and to declare to their fellows, that the Captain of their salvation had said "Swear not at all," and that the Apostle James, "a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ," reviving the prohibition, reiterates with unmistakable clearness and under a sense of the exceeding importance of this counsel: "But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath: but let your yea be yea; and your nay, nay; lest ye fall into condemnation."

The ways of the "Salvationists," so called, are not, in various respects, accordant with those of Friends. Some of the diversities, however, are external, the differences more apparent than real. A short biography of George Fox, printed for circulation among themselves, has been one of their prized books in England. A free, Gospel ministry, including woman's right (if divinely called and qualified) equally with man's to preach, disunity with sacerdotalism, the requirement to observe temperance and peace, an unwearied purpose to carry the "glad tidings" to the poor and the outcast—these are some of the things which we may freely commend in connection with this earnest people, without necessarily committing ourselves to some of their peculiar methods. Believing that this purpose to magnify by their faithful following the Saviour's saying that "the poor have the Gospel preached to them," is actuated (very largely) by no promptings of mere selfishness, unworthy ambition or ecclesiastical aggrandizement, I feel sure that all Friends will desire their encouragement in whatsoever services the Lord of the vineyard may have really laid upon them, while we remember the caution given in the ninth chapter of Mark, regarding him, who, though "he followeth not us," was such as showed by signs which the Lord himself recognized, that it could be said of him he "is on our part." On the other hand, seeing not a few of our own members engrossed with the perishing things of time, we may very properly desire that there may be witnessed among us an increase of care for our eternal interests, and of zeal for the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom in the earth.

JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

As showing how Christ's name is woven into the English language, the remarkable fact is stated that in the new part of Dr. Murray's Dictionary of the English Language, the words having Christ for their first syllable occupy ten columns. This will show the influence of the Nazarene upon the most widely-spoken language of the earth. In order to understand the whole case as regards this matter, it might be well for the reader to test, by comparison, the position which Christ occupies, by the side of other founders of religion. Take Buddha, or Brahma, or Confucius, or Mahomet, and it will be seen at once that, so far as the English language is concerned, these names sink into insignificance in comparison with the name of Christ.—Ep. Recorder.

PRAYER WHEELS—At Shang nearly every house had on the end of a pole, stuck on the roof, a couple of small prayer wheels kept in motion by the wind, which was caught by a simple arrangement of wooden cups fixed on the ends of horizontal sticks and looking like our anemometers.—The Land of the Linnas.

SERVICE.

BY LILIAN GREY.

The Master said to his servants:
"The fields are golden and fair,
Go forth with your reaper sickles
And gather the harvest with care."
And they went—the army of reapers,
Stalwart and eager and strong,
Up through the brightening morning,
A noble and willing throng.

And one stood watching them sadly,
Frail and discolored he lay,
Half envious of their mission,
And burning with loyalty;
And the Master said to him kindly:
"Be not so disconsolate;
There may be some easier work for thee,
But they also serve Me who wait."

The day grew older and older,
And no work to the watcher came;
And he said: "I will follow the reapers
Although I am feeble and lame;
I am willing to be a gleaner
Of the scattering grains they leave;
I will do my best, and the Master will
In pity my work receive."

He went; but soon by the way-side
Strengthless and faint he sank;
But a little spring in the grass he found,
Of which he eagerly drank;
And he fashioned a rustic chalice,
And offered it filled to all
Who passed that way through the heated day
And heeded his kindly call.

And up through the dusky gloaming
Came the reapers one by one,
Bearing their sheaves with gladness,
For the harvest time was done;
And the reapers were faint and weary,
And the water so pure and cold,
They bailed with joy, and gladly drank,
And blessed him a hundred fold.

And then to the gate of the palace
They carried their burdens up;
And just at the last the cripple came,
Bearing his humble cup;
And high with the sheaves it was lifted!
And the payment was the same,
To the reapers and him who the water gave
To the thirsty—in his name!

LITTLE BY LITTLE.

BY SUSAN COOLIDGE.

How does the spring come? With many mischances.
Now the Frost pricketh sore, then the sun glances;
Now the rain beaeth down, then the snow falleth,
Nothing the cherry, brave Spring-time, appalleth.
Bravely she smiles through the sombre chill weather,
Smiles on the blight and the promise together;
And at the end of the long-suffering
All the world over is ruled by the Spring.

How does the tide come? Not all in one rising,
Daunting the land and the heavens surprising;
Here a wave, there a wave, rising and falling,
Billow to billow still beckoning and calling,
Hearing, receding, now lower, now higher,
Now it is lower, now it is higher;
Now it seems spent and tired; then, with insistence,
Gaily and strongly it comes from the distance;
Till, at the end of the plunge and the roar,
It is full tide, and the sea rules the shore.

How does the soul grow? Not all in a minute:
Now it may lose ground, and now it may win it;
Now it resolves, and again the will falleth;
Now it rejoiceth, and now it bewaileth;
Now its hopes fructify, then they are blighted;
Now it walks sunnily, now grows benighted;
Fed by discouragements, taught by disaster,
So goes it forward, now slower, now faster,
Till, all the pain past, and failures made whole,
It is full grown, and the Lord rules the soul.

ON THE THRESHOLD OF THE YEAR.

BY SARAH DOUDNEY.

On the threshold of the year,
Ere the snow-wreaths disappear,
Half in hope and half in fear,
 Waits the heart;
When the coming days are sweet,
And the buds blow round our feet,
In the pathway, who will meet?
 Who will part?

When the daffodils expand,
And the sun is on the land,
Some will travel hand in hand,
 Calm and blest;
When the meadows wear their gold,
And the lily-bells unfold,
Underneath the daisied mould
 Some will rest.

On the threshold of the year,
See, the Lord is standing near,
And the heart forgets its fear
 In his smile;
Trembling soul, He speaks to thee,
"I myself, thy guide will be—
All the way is known to Me,
 Mile by mile;

"On the threshold of the year,
If the path looks dim and drear,
Then My love shall make it clear
 To thine eyes;
Only trust thy changeless Friend,
If thou wilt on Me depend,
What awaits thee at the end?
 Paradise!"

Some of the early settlers took the precaution to come over the mountains in the spring, leaving their families behind to raise a crop of corn, and then return and bring them out in the fall. This I should think was the better way. Others, especially those whose families were small, brought them with them in the spring. My father took the latter course. His family was but small and he brought them all with him. The Indian meal which he brought over the mountain was expended six weeks too soon, so that for that length of time we had to live without bread. The lean venison and the breast of the wild turkey, we were taught to call bread. The flesh of the bear was denominated meat. This artifice did not succeed very well, after living in this way for some time we became sickly, the stomach seemed to be always empty, and tormented with a sense of hunger. I remember how narrowly the children watched the growth of the potatoe tops, pumpkin and squash vines, hoping from day to day to get something to answer in the place of bread. How delicious was the taste of the young potatoes when we got them! What a jubilee when we were permitted to pull the young corn for roasting ears. Still more so when it had acquired sufficient hardness to be made into johnny cakes by the aid of a tin grater. We then became healthy, vigorous and contented with our situation, poor as it was.

I will recollect the first time I ever saw a teacup and saucer, and tasted coffee. My mother died when I was about six or seven years of age. My father then sent me to Maryland with a brother of my grandfather, Alexander Wells, to school. At Colonel Brown's, in the mountains, at Stony Creek glades, I for the first time saw tame geese, and by bantering a pet gander I got a severe biting by his bill, and beating by his wings. I wondered very much that birds so large and strong should be so much tender than the wild turkeys. At this place, however, all was right, excepting the large birds which they called geese. The cabin and its furniture were such as I had been accustomed to see in the backwoods, as my country was then called. At Bedford everything was changed. The tavern at which my uncle put up, was a stone house, and to make the charge still more complete it was plastered in the inside, both as to the walls and ceiling. On going into the dining-room I was struck with astonishment at the appearance of the house. I had no idea that there was any house in the world which was not built of logs; but here I looked around the house and could see no logs, and above I could see no joists; whether such a thing had been made by the hands of man, or had grown so of itself, I could not conjecture. I had not the courage to enquire anything about it. When supper came on, my confusion was worse confounded. A little cup stood in a bigger one with some brownish looking stuff in it, which was neither milk, hominy, nor broth; what to do with these little cups and the little spoon belonging to them, I could not tell; and I was afraid to ask anything concerning the use of them.

It was in the time of the war, and the company were giving accounts of catching, whipping and hanging the Tories. The word jail frequently occurred; this word I had never heard before; but I soon discovered, and was much terrified at its meaning, and supposed that we were in much danger of the fate of the Tories; for I thought, as we had come from the backwoods, it was altogether likely that we must be Tories too. For fear of being discovered I durst not utter a single word. I therefore watched attentively to see what the big folks would do with their little cups and spoons. I imitated them, and found the taste of the coffee nauseous beyond anything I ever had tasted in my life. I continued to drink as the rest of the company did, with the tears streaming from my eyes, but when it was to end I was at a loss to know, as the little cups were filled immediately after being emptied. This circumstance distressed me very much, as I durst not say I had enough. Looking attentively at the grown persons, I saw one man turn his little cup bottom upwards and put his little spoon across it. I observed that after this his cup was not filled again; I followed his example, and to my great satisfaction, the result as to my cup was the same.

On the death of my mother, my father sent me, under the care of a relation, to Maryland for the purpose of being sent to school.

When I arrived there, I was in a new world. I had left the backwoods behind me. I had exchanged its rough manners and poor living for the buildings, plenty and polish of civilized life. Everything I saw and heard confounded me. I learnt, after some time, that there were rich and poor masters, slaves and convicts, and I discovered that the poor servants and convicts were under entire subordination to their masters. I saw that the slaves and convicts lived in filthy hovels called kitchens, and that they were poor, ragged and dirty, and kept at hard labor; while their masters and family lived in large houses, were well clothed and fed and did as they pleased. The reason of this difference in the condition of men and women of the same race of beings, I could not comprehend. Having no idea of crime, I thought it could be no otherwise than unjust, that some should have so little and others so much, and that one should work so hard and others perform no labor.

Some time ago, I made inquiry of a gentleman who had recently removed from the neighborhood in which I had lived in Maryland, to this country, concerning the present state of the families of my former acquaintance in Maryland; he informed me that of the whole number of those families, only three or four of their descendants remain possessors of the estates of their forefathers; of the others, their sons had become dissipated, sold their lands, and had either perished in consequence of intemperance, or left the country, so that the places which once knew those families as princes of the land, now know them no more. Thus it is that in moral and physical respects at least "the sins of the fathers are visited upon the children, to the third and fourth generation."

Criticisms on Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

A letter from a valued member of Ohio Yearly Meeting to a member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and a pamphlet recently published by one who withdrew from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1860, contained criticisms on the changes in the Discipline of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting adopted at the session of 1887.

Considering the diverse nature of the human mind in different individuals, and the various standpoints and environments which affect their opinions, it would be expecting too much to suppose that important actions of the Yearly Meeting would be likely to escape criticism.

There are probably many under our name within our own Yearly Meeting and elsewhere, who are unfamiliar with the exact text and meaning of the changes made in 1887, to whom a statement and explanation of their intent will be acceptable and of interest. The first paragraph is as follows:

"Monthly Meetings are at liberty to receive certificates from, or send certificates to Monthly Meetings belonging to any bodies under our name, whose right to be regarded as co-ordinate branches of the Society of Friends has not been adversely determined by the Yearly Meeting—Provided there is no obstruction on other grounds."

It is charged that this paragraph acknowledges to be co-ordinate, and their members entitled to rights of membership in the Society of Friends, certain Yearly Meetings which continue in recorded fellowship with the Binus Separatists in Ohio; which meeting Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has disowned and testified against; in addition to which the said Yearly Meetings or most of them, encourage, connive at and approve many practices totally at variance with the doctrines and principles of Friends.

A hostile view of the actions of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting may construe a technical inference of co-ordinacy of the meetings alluded to, but a fairer and more practical view will consider rather what the paragraph really says, than what it does not say. It does not say that these bodies are considered co-ordinate, but the language is—"whose right to be regarded as co-ordinate branches of the Society has not been adversely determined by the Yearly Meeting."

To impartial-thinking minds the natural suggestion of such language is, that there was a question pending on this point not then determined.

It is true that most of the meetings alluded to "encourage, connive at and approve" many practices wholly at variance with the principles of Friends. While this is the case, Philadelphia Yearly Meeting cannot unite in holding an annual correspondence with them on the basis of true church fellowship, nor has it done so for many years.

That every individual member of these defective meetings is favorable to or in harmony with the defections which have appeared in them will hardly be maintained by any intelligent Friend.

It is a fundamental principle in human affairs, and one with which Divine counsel may be supposed to be in harmony, that "the heir shall not be disinherited except by language, the contrary of which cannot be inferred."

Rights of membership and privileges may be as valuable inheritances or possessions as those of property and estate, and the paragraph, so far as it goes, is thus in harmony with accepted principles of civilization, and it would be ill indeed if the Discipline should fall below the level of general morality in the community.

It is a true principle of the Society that when a member violates its order and testimonies and does not unite with its doctrines, he separates himself from the Society, but it is also true that he remains a member of record until an official declaration is made to the contrary.

Those who object to the foregoing paragraph of Discipline because of its supposed undue acknowledgment of the rights of members of other Yearly Meetings, seem to overlook the immediate context covering obstructions on other grounds, to-wit:

"When any of our Monthly Meetings have reliable information that the sanction of a Monthly Meeting out of our Limits is given to teachings and practices seriously at variance with our profession, they are instructed to consider such defection as a sufficient obstruction to sending or receiving certificates of removal to or from such meetings until the cause of obstruction is removed."

This being a positive instruction, the Yearly Meeting cannot be charged with a failure to direct what shall be done in such cases in general.

But the paragraph just quoted would work hardship to a consistent Friend recorded as a member of a meeting sanctioning defections who wished to become a member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

To remedy this the ensuing paragraph reads:

"If, however, a certificate of removal coming from such a meeting shall recommend as members, persons whose life and conversation appear to be consistent with our religious profession, Monthly Meetings are at liberty to receive such persons, if on solid consideration the defection of the Monthly Meeting granting the certificate shall appear to be the only obstruction."

A Discipline which accepts all who have been preserved as living members, sound in principles and teachings, and exemplary in life and conversation, notwithstanding defections around them, can scarcely be objectionable to any one who reflects what would be his or her individual and reasonable desires if involuntarily placed in a location so painful, and the right time for removing therefrom appearing to have come.

Cases might exist or arise not provided for in the changes so far quoted but the next paragraph reads:

"In the case of persons coming among us and desiring to be joined to us in membership, who have not been able to procure certificate of removal because the Yearly Meeting to which they belonged was not in correspondence with Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, Monthly Meetings are at liberty to receive such who may apply for admission, on the ground of conviction of our principles. Such cases to be treated in the same manner as of those who are not members of the Society of Friends.'

Were the Society in a united condition upon the True Foundation, one Monthly Meeting would not be at liberty to ignore the judgment of another Monthly Meeting by receiving in to membership one to whom his own meeting had refused a certificate of removal.

Whatever co-ordinacy of Bodies may be inferred elsewhere in the Discipline, it is practically denied in cases of this nature.

By these changes of the Discipline, Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has endeavored to provide for the relief of consistent and faithful members whose surroundings have been hostile to the cause of Truth and religion, as understood by the Society of Friends, and in thus relieving individuals a testimony is borne against the defective meeting.

The Friends who withdrew from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1860 did so, according to the statement of one of them, because the Yearly Meeting would do nothing to prevent the joining of its members to Yearly Meetings which were fully identified with the "Bins" Separatists in Ohio, and, it is added, it was with mingled feelings of love and sadness they felt required to leave.

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting may have moved too slowly in the decision of many painful and important questions brought before it, but it would be beyond the scope of this writing to rehearse the accounts of all the occurrences bearing upon the position of the Yearly Meeting. A brief narrative can be had at the book store, No. 304 Arch Street, containing much information on the subject. And the accounts of the various sittings of the Yearly Meetings published in THE FRIEND from year to year, add many details.

Many evil consequences follow from separations in religious bodies, and probably all would admit they should never be resorted to unless relieving from greater evils.

It is not likely that any Friends of the same religious experience and standing as John Wilbur and his friends, would have been contented to have been thrust out from the Society as he was, and not have gathered themselves into a body with their associates as a branch of the Society, whose doctrines and testimonies they believed in; and it is greatly to the credit of those members of the larger Body in New England who, as stated in the editorial of THE FRIEND of Tenth Month 31, 1891, now condemn the proceedings which resulted in the first separation in New England.

Again, it would be unreasonable to ask that a believer in the doctrines and views of worship of Friends should join in methods of worship contrary to those doctrines and testimonies.

It is said that in places in the west a number of members thus situated were remaining at their homes rather than expose their families to methods of worship in their meeting-house, such as the Society withdrew from at its rise.

To say that Friends thus situated should not associate themselves together as a religious Society of Friends, worshipping as Friends believe is the only true method for them to observe, and maintaining the doctrines and testimonies proclaimed by Friends—would indicate a feeling regarding separations rather of a morbid nature than a sound one. The reason alleged for the withdrawal of the Friends in 1860 cannot be classed under cases as strong as these.

Our Monthly Meetings have no alternative but to disown all members, who through neglect, or of their own election, refuse to attend our religious meetings for Divine worship, but they would gladly have retained and would again receive all convinced Friends who in the leading of the Spirit may be drawn to join in membership with us and to labor in the work assigned to our religious Society, as an exponent of the truths of the Gospel to the world, and for its preservation from the many defections apparent.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"The Proud He Knoweth Afar Off."

In an article for THE FRIEND, of Second Month 20th, a subject is introduced, which for many months has pressed heavily upon my mind. It says:—"We are becoming a refined people, and some of our neighbors who may be less so, less educated, less affluent, and withal, perhaps, less religious—should their minds be turned toward us, whether by ministry or otherwise, they are held back by the feeling that they would be slighted in our company."

I am grieved to say I have seen evidences of this slighting, and have good reason to believe there are those under the name of Friends who do not desire to have uneducated and unrefined people belong to our Society. We do pride ourselves upon these things, and perhaps they have been well earned laurels; but I contend there is no place for pride. We have received it all from whom? Our Father, without whose care and help we are able for nothing that is really good.

Let us examine the life our blessed Lord and Saviour led upon earth. Who were his called and chosen disciples? A few poor fishermen, a despised receiver of customs; the poor and unlearned came closest to his heart, not because they were unlearned and poor, but because there was more room with them for love, faith and humility; and He never turned away from the poorest and most despised. Shall we then be so exclusive that any with heart touched by Divine love shall not find a heart-home, and a kindly hand of help with the "Society of Friends?" And if we dwell very close to the Master, He will enlighten our understanding, so that we shall perceive whether it is a real love for Him or an ulterior motive that induces a request for membership. But if we draw away from those whom the Master has drawn toward us, because they are poor and uneducated, or of another nation or color, forgetting what the Lord said to Peter—"What God has cleansed call thou not common or unclean,"—a blessing cannot rest upon us, and our meetings will dwindle.

And is not another reason why there is not more fruit apparent among us, that we have become too carping and criticising, owing largely, no doubt, to the fight we have for half a century been obliged to maintain, to keep our doctrines and practices pure, so we have become too much of judges, instead of letting the Word preached, as the Word of the Lord, sink deep into our hearts upon mellow ground, watered with our tears, that it might spring up and bear rich fruit to the glory of the "Great Husbandman," who does intend us a blessing, and who is able to keep all that is fully intrusted to Him.

I am hardly ready to say, "Friends have so largely fulfilled their mission in the line of making proselytes," for I believe, if we fulfil the conditions laid down in the New Testament, putting pride out of our hearts, and opening them wide to the Divine love which draws our brother, willing to be used as the Master bids, without fear of man, there will yet be a flocking to us, "as doves to the window."

I would like to see on every meeting-house, a notice that it is a Friends' Meeting, and the hour for meeting; and in every meeting-house a worshipping assembly, gathered under the power of God, each one looking unto the Master, and not to man, yet a willingness felt to do his will, whatever that may be, that it may be said as of old, "They had glorious meetings."

We see in the daily press, and hear constantly, how those who once seemed so far from us are gradually acknowledging the very truths we, as a people, have so long contended for; it is, then, no time for us to let our hands hang down in weakness, but boldly uphold and unfurl the banner of Truth, given us as a people to raise and carry, so that all may see and come, through the drawing power of our God, to enlist under it, no matter of what tongue, nation, color or people they are.

"Hearken, my beloved brethren, hath not God chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith and heirs of the Kingdom, which He hath promised to them that love Him." (James ii, 5.)

Natural History, Science, etc.

The Hairy-wood Spurge (Euphorbia pilosa).—Grant Allen states that this plant, which is a Southern European and Western Asiatic plant, is found in only one locality in England—on Claverton Down. Its existence there is supposed to be a survival from an ancient geologic period when the western border of the European Continent included within its limits the British Islands.

There are many similar instances—indeed, it is quite a common occurrence to find a plant extend all through Europe, from the Caucasus to the Pyrenees, then stop suddenly short, and turn up again in Devon, Cornwall or Kerry. As illustrations of this G. Allen mentions the Wild Peony, which originates in England to the rocky clefts of the steep Holme; in Devon grows a small purplish Lobelia, which is found nowhere else in Britain; the common blue Monk's Hood is found wild in South Wales and the Cornish district only; the yellow Druha is confined to old walls about Pennard Castle, Swansea, &c.

British Plants Nearly Extinct.—There is a lovely orchid, the Lady's Slipper (Cypripedium) common in Siberia and Russia, but now found with us only in one Yorkshire station, where, like the Perthshire heath, it is rapidly verging to complete local extinction. The tufted Saxifrage has now been driven to the summits of Ben Avis and Ben Nevis; the drooping Saxifrage is extinct everywhere in Britain, save on the cloudy top of Ben Lamers; and the Alpine Saxifrage has died out of all Ireland, save on the bold peak of Ben Bulbin in Sligo.

I could add to these instances many more.—Grant Allen.

Oysters on Trees.—Travellers and tourists who have been for a summer's outing among the islands which skirt the coast of Honduras tell marvellous stories of the oyster groves of that country, and the rare delicacy of the bivalves "which grow on the trees." The facts in this "tree-oyster" case are these: The mangrove trees grow in either fresh or salt water swamps, and even in water five or six feet deep. The limbs of the mangrove are drooping, like those of the weeping willow. In case they do not reach the water, the attraction of the moisture below causes shoots to put out which often extend far beneath the surface; thus a thicket of mangroves is a matted mass of limbs, trunks, shoots and roots. On these limbs and shoots, deep down under the surface of the water, large bunches of oysters cling, thus forming the famed "Oyster Groves of the Honduras."—St. Louis Republic.

Mastodon Remains.—An Indiana correspondent writes to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat: A farmer digging a well near his house at Darlington has discovered that his dwelling was built over the remains of a huge mastodon. He has discovered about ten feet of the tusk, but has stopped excavating in the sandstone for fear of endangering his house. Scientists who have visited Darlington to investigate the discovery estimate that the tusk must be about sixteen feet long, and the whole skeleton thirty feet long, and eighteen to twenty feet high. A small chip from the tusk was sent to a New York scientist, who pronounced it the purest ivory.

Clever Horses and Cattle.—That cattle and horses can communicate intelligence to each other, and are endowed with a certain amount of reasoning faculty, the following facts are pretty conclusive proof: I once purchased a station on which a large number of horses and cattle had gone wild. To get cattle in, I fenced the permanent water (a distance of twenty miles) leaving traps at intervals. At first this answered all right, but soon the cattle became exceedingly cautious about entering the traps, waiting outside for two or three nights before going in, and if they could smell a man or his tracks, not going in at all. At last they adopted a plan which beat me. A mob would come to the trap-gate, and one would go in and drink and come out; and then another would do the same, and so on, till all had watered. They had evidently arrived at the conclusion that I would not catch one and frighten all the others away.

To get in wild horses, 600 of which were running on a large plain, (about 20,000 acres), I erected a large stock-yard, with a gradually widening lane, in a hollow where it could not be easily seen, and by stationing horsemen at intervals on the plain, galloped the wild horses in. My first hunt (which lasted some days) was successful, the wild horses heading toward the mouth of the lane without much difficulty; out, of course, some escaped by charging back at the stock-yard gate, and in other ways. My second hunt, about a month later, was a failure; every mob of horses on the plain seemed to know where the yard was, and would not head that way. This seemed to show that the horses had escaped from the first hunt but all the others where the stock-yard was.—Spectator.

Heroism of Women.

On the 2d of Eleventh Mo. last there passed over the Andaman Islands, the East Indian penal settlement, a cyclone, which caused immense damage to property and great loss of life. One of the places which suffered extensively from the gale was Port Blair, the principal port of the islands. Lying off the port on that day was the steamer Enterprise, belonging to the East India marine, and used principally for conveying prisoners and provisions and supplies to the islands.

The Enterprise was caught by the cyclone with her anchors down and no steam up. At the height of the storm she began to drag, and in a short time she was dashed broadside upon the rocks, immediately opposite the female convict prison. A tremendously high sea was running, and soon the Enterprise began to go to pieces. She had a crew of eighty-three men, and one by one they were swept by the rushing seas from the places they had sought for safety, and found their death in the wild waters about them.

There were no life-saving appliances at Port Blair, and though the wreck was seen by the officials and a number of the convicts, it was seemingly impossible for any effort to be made to save the unfortunates from the wreck. Among those who were watching the wreck were a number of female convicts, who had huddled under the lee of their prison walls to escape the full fury of the gale, which was blowing with such violence that it was impossible for a human being to stand against it.

While the men stood silently by watching the struggles of the drowning men, one of the women proposed to some of her fellow-convicts that they try to rescue some of the shipwrecked seamen. Her proposition was that the convicts should get to the shore, and there form a human life line from the beach out into the sea. Leaving their places of shelter, they crept on their hands and knees, holding to whatever offered itself to their grasp, and in this manner they succeeded in reaching the shore in the very teeth of the gale.

The inpouring seas were thundering upon the rocky shore with a violence that seemed to shake the very earth. The spray from the rollers was caught up by the wind and carried inland, making it impossible to see but a short distance, and bitterly stinging the faces of every one exposed to it. Nothing daunted, the female convicts, once they reached the shore, linked hands, and their leader, followed by her equally brave sisters, plunged into the sea to save a man who could be seen struggling helplessly in the water. The women were dashed from their feet at the first attempt, and hurled violently upon the shore. Again they clasped each others' hands, and again they sprang undauntedly into the raging waters. This time they were more successful, and the leader grasped the drowning man. Then they turned, and the almost dead sailor was carried safely to the shore.

Again and again did the heroic women enter the water, and each time they returned with a man, who had it not been for their almost superhuman efforts, would either have been drowned or dashed to death on the rocks. Six men were thus rescued and these six were the only persons of the eighty-three on the Enterprise who reached the shore alive.

The officials at Port Blair made a report of the affair to the Indian Government, and recommended that the authorities take such steps as they deem proper to show their appreciation of the women's heroism.

The Government looked into the matter, and, as a result, it was announced to-day, that the leader of the gallant band would be released from imprisonment, and that the terms for which the others had been sentenced would be very materially shortened.

The Independent Catholic Church of India.—The descendants in India and Ceylon of the converts made in India by the Portuguese in former years, have never been very passive under the authority of the Pope. Being dissatisfied with some recent decrees of the Vatican, they obtained church officers from the ancient Church of Antioch, and have organized independently of the Church of Rome, with about 16,000 members. Her priests inculcate the privilege and duty of reading the Holy Scriptures, the necessity of conversion to God, and the living of godly and sober lives.

Investigation of Charitable Institutions.—The Chicago correspondent of The Presbyterian writes: A large number of the so-called and prominent charitable institutions of Chicago are agitated from centenary circumstances by the reports of visits made to them, very recently, by E. S. Dreyer, a prominent banker of Chicago and a liberal contributor to their respective treasuries, who, in the disguise of a poor but needy applicant, called upon them for temporary relief. While he was courteously received and treated by a few of these associations, he was so rudely received and treated by nearly all of them that he pitied the poor and worthy person who applies to them for assistance. He names these organizations and announces that they will get no more of his money, and ought not to receive any more from other people, until their officers are changed or made to treat applicants for relief with a decent degree of courtesy. He was once or twice offered what was designated as a meal for about three hours' work in sawing wood. Tramp as he was, he declined the offer.

The result will probably be an examination of the books of many of these institutions, for the purpose of discovering what proportion of their receipts goes to the relief of the poor and what is absorbed in salaries paid to employees and canvassing agents. Among these will probably be found our Relief and Aid Society, whose existence and work dates from the burning of Chicago in '71. A change in the methods of dispensing relief to the worthy and needy poor of Chicago by its organizations for that purpose is not improbable—if the matter is not too soon forgotten.

A Greek Congregation.—The Independent, of New York, says: "A new Greek church was opened in this city January 10th. The services were attended by about 500 persons and were conducted by the priest, T. Ferendinos, who has the rank of Archimandrite, and is in full charge of the church, having been appointed by the Metropolitan of the Greek Church in Athens. The place of worship is in the basement room of the German-Swiss Evangelical Church, No. 340 West 33d Street, which has been refitted for this special need. The services, after the rites of the orthodox Greek Church, were conducted entirely in the Greek language. Among those present were the Consul-Generals of Greece, Russia and Turkey and two of the well-known merchant firms of the city. Services will be held there regularly."

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 12, 1892.

A pamphlet with the title "Is there not a Cause?" issued by Joseph E. Maule, a prominent member among those who separated from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1860, confirms the view we had long held, that the ground for that separation was the refusal of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to cut off all intercourse with those bodies of Friends who had affiliated with the Binn's party in Ohio. J. E. M., on page 8 of this pamphlet, distinctly states their reason for separating to be, that "Philadelphia Yearly Meeting would do nothing to prevent the joining of its members to Yearly Meetings which were fully identified with the Binns' Separatists in Ohio."

For many of those who left Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1860 we entertain a sincere respect, believing them to be attached to the doctrines ever held by our religious Society. They were in unity with the Yearly Meeting in its efforts to defend and promulgate those doctrines, and joined with their brethren in the rejection of that party in Ohio Yearly Meeting which separated from it in 1854; and in the acknowledgment as brethren of those who adhered to the old organization, with Benjamin Hoyle as Clerk. We believe it was as satisfactory to them as to those whom they afterwards left, that our Yearly Meeting notified its sister Yearly Meetings in this country and in Europe of the position it had taken in this matter.

But we do not admit the correctness of the position taken by J. E. M., that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, while testifying against the course pursued by the Binns' body, and against those departures and doctrines which were the remote foundation causes of the separation there, rendered itself responsible for those evils, because it did not instruct its Monthly Meetings to decline sending or receiving certificates of removal to all the Bodies affiliating with the separated Body.

For a fuller consideration of the question, and particularly of the changes made in the Discipline of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1857, we refer to a communication, received from a correspondent, the publication of which is commenced in this number.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement shows that the interest and non-interest bearing debt decreased $1,705,403.50 during the Second Month. Total amount of the Treasury, $740,521,174.17.

At a meeting of the House of Representatives Committee on Appropriations, held on the 2d inst., a number of prominent Philadelphians were introduced, who came to urge that an appropriation be made for the erection of a Mint building at Philadelphia. The last Congress made $1,000,000 for the erection of a new Mint building in Philadelphia, but after Congress adjourned it was ascertained that it had authorized the erection of a new Mint building, but had failed to make the necessary appropriation. The delegation urged that this omission be corrected.

The draft of a treaty of commerce between the United States and France has been prepared at the State Department, and mailed to Paris for the action of the French authorities. If approved by France, it will be submitted to the Senate for action. It is practically the same as the treaty recently concluded with Great Britain.

The joint English and United States Commission on the Behring Sea Fisheries practically concluded their deliberations in Washington on the 3d inst. The members are pledged to secrecy, but it is believed they entirely failed to reach a satisfactory agreement as to the best method of conducting the seal fishery.

A Louisville dispatch says that Attorney General Hendrick will direct that quo warranto proceedings be instituted against all lottery operators in the State. "This step is in accordance with a recent resolution in the Legislature for the enforcement of the Constitutional provision. It is believed this is the beginning of the end of lotteries in Kentucky."

A remonstrance against the increase in the number of liquor licenses was adopted on the 7th inst. by the Methodist Episcopal preachers, the Presbyterian Ministerial Association and the Conference of Baptist ministers in this city.

An angle measuring over nine feet from tip to tip of outstretched wings was killed last week near Mechanicsburg, Ohio, while in the act of carrying of a lamb.

It is reported that a two-foot vein of ore, worth $100 per ton, has just been uncovered six miles from Fairplay, Colorado.

The population of New York City, exclusive of inmates of State institutions, is 1,800,891, according to the State census just completed. The enumeration is believed to have been swelled for political purposes.

Deaths reported in this city last week numbered 514, which is 9 more than the previous week, and 136 more than the corresponding period of last year. Of the females, 203 were males; and 231 females; 78 died of pneumonia; 66 of consumption; 38 of diseases of the heart; 24 of bronchitis; 24 of old age; 19 of scarlet fever; 19 of convulsions; 16 of apoplexy; 15 of marasmus; 14 of typhoid fever; 13 of Bright's disease; 13 of inflammation of the brain and 10 of congestion of the brain.

HOGS.—Chicago, 7½ a 7½ cts.; other Western, 7 a 7½ cts.; State, 6½ a 6½ cts.

FOREIGN.—The New York Herald's Liverpool correspondent says: Cotton men are at their wits' end. Cotton has reached the lowest price on record, and in the last three weeks the members of the Liverpool Cotton Exchange were compelled to find a million and a half pounds to settle the difference on the wrong side.

The cotton trade has been completely demoralized by the heavy fall in prices of raw material. Many large Lancashire mills have incurred serious losses as the result of their operations during the past three months. In the case of the Star Mill, for example, the deficit was $4,006, while that of the Woodstock, 73,508 spindles, was $698.

A French officer has submitted to the War Ministry a rifle that will project a stream of vitriol for a distance of seven metres. He proposes that this weapon be used only against savages to prevent their making frenzied rushes.

On the 3d inst. the German Reichstag began the discussion on the bill empowering the Government to proclaim a state of siege in Alsace-Lorraine in the event of war or serious danger. Several speeches were made in which it was pointed out that Alsace-Lorraine is in a perfectly tranquil condition, and is rejoiced to be a member of the German Empire.

The proposed law, it was said, would be a source of fresh mortification to the Alsaitians, and disturb France.

The Government urged that there were momentous reasons in favor of the measure. It was finally referred to a committee of twenty-one members.

A special agent of Reuter's Telegram Company, who is inquiring into the distress in Vienna, paints a terrible picture of the destitution that prevails in that city. There are many houses, he says, whose splendid exteriors belie the condition of their miserable interiors. Cellars in such houses, he affirms, are found crowded with starving persons who are out of work and others who are earning only a mere pittance. Hundreds are unable to pay rent, and exist in deadly fear of eviction. But, in spite of all this misery, there is a total absence of crime among the sufferers.

During the past three months, 620,000 poor persons in Vienna have received relief. On the 5th inst. an extensive distribution of food to the destitute was made. Twelve thousand loaves of bread were distributed from four different stations, along with a quantity of clothing among the sufferers, who were told to see the procession of applicants in which there were hundreds of children from the age of three upwards, many clothed only so far as to have a handkerchief about their loins and another about their neck. With bony fingers they seized on the food, and showed their gratitude in their eyes. After a weary wait in the snow twenty-seven women fainted in the crowd. Twenty young men initiated and carried out the work of distribution. They keep order by kind words and looks alone. They depend solely upon money sent from the papers, mainly the New Free Press, the Mayor's fund being held for more systematic relief.

The Queensland Government has decided, in consequence of the large number of unemployed workmen in the colony, to prohibit immigration for the present.

A remarkable piece of engineering work is the tunnel of the Parana Oroya Railroad through an Andean mountain peak at Galera, Peru. It is at an elevation of 600 feet above the perpetual snow line, and is to be 3,847 feet long. It is the highest railroad tunnel in the world and is located in the highest inhabited region in the world. The town of Galera is 15,635 feet above the sea level, and is 3,500 feet higher than the hotel on the top of Pike's Peak.

The New York Herald has a dispatch from Panama, stating that the River Cauca, which rises in the Andes near Paramo de Guanacos and flows into the Magdalena at Tacna, has overflowed, and its valley, one of the most fertile and populous in South America, is inundated.

Crops have been destroyed all along its banks and many houses carried away. Deaths from drowning have been numerous. There is at present no way of estimating the loss of life and damage to property, but it is feared that they are very large.

It is rumored in the City of Mexico that war between Guatemala and San Salvador has commenced. Guatemalan dispatches say that it is officially denied that such is the state of affairs, but Salvadorian specials declare that war is imminent and unavoidable.

DEED. Tenth Month 27th, 1891, REBECCA GRIFITHS wife of Jacob Griffith, aged seventy six years, for ten months and eight days, a beloved member of Saleo Monthly Meeting of Friends, Iowa, an elder for many years, the duties of which station she was faithful to fulfil to the best of her ability. Her consistent deportment, and a meek and loving disposition, endeared her to her many friends. She was diligent in the attendance of meeting, often saying she believed it a duty, when health would permit; and was faithful in upholding the ancient doctrines and testimonies of the Society. She bore a lingering illness, enduring great suffering, with christian patience, but rejoices when told it was thought she was about to be released "Happy are the dead who die in the Lord."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

1855.—Eleventh Month 4th. "At our meeting this morning (First-day), I was constrained again to warn some, that there were but twelve hours in the day, in which men may work, and then the night cometh wherein no man can work. That their day was passing away, and it was evident they were neglecting the business of salvation, in the pursuit and love of the things of the world. None knew when their day would expire; it may come to a close unexpectedly, and if laid on a death bed, with the work unaccomplished, awful must be the prospect of a never-ending eternity. Many have been landed in that condition, when they would have given everything for a little time, to do this all-important work. Some were pleaded with in the love of the Gospel, to give up all that the Lord's controversy was with, and submit to the terms of salvation, while the day lasted. My dear wife knelt and supplicated, that if any had been drawn to this meeting, and were made sensible that the shades of the evening had come upon them, and the great work of salvation was not done, they might yield to the convicting power of the Holy Spirit, and before it was too late, show forth the goodness and mercy of God, in plucking them as brands from the burning; by walking in his fear, and drawing others to glorify God, on their behalf. It was a solemn, impressive time, and I hoped some were reached."

"Twelfth Month 7th. At Arch Street Week-day Meeting, the circumstance of Christ calling his disciples, sheep, and on commissioning them to go forth, telling them, 'Behold, I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves; be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves,' was brought before me. I felt fearful of speaking, lest I might act without his authority, and thus injure the good cause; so that I seemed likely to come away without breaking the silence. But finally the fear of putting by a right impression, induced me to stand up with those words, and to show that the true disciples, who keep in the Spirit of their Divine Master, in times of suffering and persecution, were like sheep in the midst of wolves; and they were to be wise as, but not in the serpent's wisdom, but in that which cometh from Him, who is the wisdom of God, and the power of God; and to be clothed with the harmlessness of the dove; showing the nature of Him who is the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world. Though not exposed to outward persecution at this day, yet there is much suffering to be endured; and when the cup that is to be partaken of, for the body's sake, which is the church, is presented, we are to drink it with resignation to Him, and it will contribute to our humiliation and preservation in Christ. When suffering is withdrawn, how liable are we to take our ease in the comforts with which we are surrounded. The nearer we draw to the close of our journey, the more need there is to be clad with the holy, harmless and undefiled nature and spirit of Christ. When the disciples returned from the accomplishment of their mission, and told their Lord that even the devils were subject to them, through his name; He said, 'Rejoice not that the spirits are subject unto you, but rather rejoice because your names are written in heaven.' This is the all-important object of our lives, to be prepared, by his power giving us the victory over all the power of the enemy, to have our names recorded in the Lamb's book of life. Nothing is worthy of competition with this. No name or fame among men; all that our companions may say in our favor, are nothing. We must individually stand before the tribunal of Jesus Christ, and receive a reward according to our deeds; we can have none of them to plead our cause here."

1856.—First Month 8th. "The great importance of being preserved from the power of the tempter, came over me with much weight this morning, before I rose; and I was brought to put up fervent, mental cries to the God of all our sure mercies, that He would not suffer me to fall into temptation; that in unmerited mercy, He would forgive and blot out my sins, and remember them no more; and that whatever He saw meet, to humble and keep me on the watch, He would, in his tender compassion, administer, for my preservation from evil. I remembered some who had been highly favored, and had afterwards slid from the foundation. I thought of our beloved friend Thomas Kite, how he had been taken away before he reached my age, in peace and brightness; and it was to me more desirable to be removed from this scene, before anything should dim the character, which through grace, we may have been favored to attain, than to be continued here to old age, and lose the life and virtue of religion, which had been our experience to possess. He who, of his own good pleasure, begins the work of regeneration, and carries it on to its perfection, can alone keep us from falling, and in the end present us faultless before the throne of his glory, with exceeding joy. May it be my experience, though unworthy of the least of all his favors."

"On First-day morning, the 17th, I was again engaged to preach the everlasting Gospel, both concerning the coming of the Son of God in the flesh; his propitiatory death for the sins of the whole world; his glorious advocacy at the right hand of the Father, and as being the Source of all saving knowledge of God, by the immediate revelation of his Holy Spirit in the heart. It is the grace that comes by Jesus Christ alone, that can impart the saving knowledge that is life eternal. The heart must receive Christ in his spiritual appearance, submit to his will, forsake all and follow Him, in order to receive this knowledge of God, and hold communion with Him, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Many are willing to believe the doctrines of the New Testament, but refuse to deny themselves, forsake sin, and follow the Lamb of God whithersoever He leads; and thus they fail to become partakers of the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ. Oh, the want of the pure and undefiled life of Christ Jesus, ruling in the professors of his name!"

"Third Month 18th. I went to the North Meeting, under some trial of faith. It was a large collection, many school children being there. The circumstance of parents being rebuked by some, for bringing their children to the Saviour, that He might lay his hand on them and bless them, was presented to my mind; and after waiting, and trying the fleece wet and dry, the subject was opened; and the danger alluded to, of persons placing stumbling-blocks in the way of the children, whose minds are brought under Divine conviction; and thereby turning them aside from their Saviour. The mercy and goodness of our Heavenly Father, in watching over and warning young people of the temptations of Satan, and the enticements of wicked persons; of which I could testify from experience, when an apprentice boy, and the Lord's defence, vouchsafed by the horror suddenly brought over me, were referred to; and all pleaded with to mind the visitations and requirements of the Most High extended to them. Ability was graciously granted to preach the Gospel, under the quickening power of the Holy Spirit, which reached and tendered the hearts of some, and I came home thankful for the unmerited favor."

"Seventh Month 9th. This morning we were favored with the cheering and strengthening presence of the Lord, at our Fourth-day Meeting at Orange Street. I was impressed with the belief that the Lord is at work in the hearts of many, to prepare them for service in his church, as they dedicate themselves unto Him. What is wanting, is for every one to look into his own heart; not to be looking out to see what others are to do. When Moses was told that Eldad and Medad prophesied in the camp, Joshua said, 'My Lord Moses forbid them.' But Moses said unto him, 'Enviest thou for my sake? Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them!' Though it is not to be expected that every one will be made a vocal minister of the Gospel, yet every submissive soul would be favored with a measure of the spirit of discernment, and under the Divine influence, would be qualified, at times, to speak of what the Lord had done for it, to the instruction and comfort of other seeking ones; and I believe more ministers would be raised up to preach the everlasting Gospel, as the visible church was more generally gathered into obedience to the blessed and adorable Head.

"Eighth Month 24th. My wife and myself rode to Bancocas, and attended the Week-day Meeting. Many of the meetings within our Yearly Meeting, have no minister; and though the life and growth of true religion are not dependent on ministers; yet were the members living daily under the subjecting power of Christ, we may believe that more gifts would be given, both for the ministry and the eldership. To the primitive church they were dispensed for the building of it up; for the instruction and feeding of the children, the lambs of the flock; and they would be continued to be given for the praise and glory of the Great Head, and for the promotion of his cause, were the members prepared to receive them. But the things of this fading world, the love of ease and creaturely enjoyments, absorb the thoughts and affections of many, whose hearts are not open to let the King of glory come in, and set up his kingdom there. Thus the all-important work of sanctification is obstructed; and such remain unfit to receive gifts, and therefore cannot occupy them; and the glory which would rest upon us as a religious body, were we faithful to the Lord, does not appear among us as it has in days past."

1857.—Second Month 24. "We had an uncommonly large Quarterly Meeting, which was held in great stillness to the close. In that for Discipline, our aged friend S. Betle, Sr., advocated some of the testimonies borne by Friends, and counselled the young people against attending certain lectures, now become numerous, and which, in his opinion, were likely to draw the mind from the retirement and religious exercise, necessary for a growth in the Divine life. I added the expression of my unity with what he said; and that I believed every one who had submitted to the power of Divine grace, if they looked back at their first espousals to Christ, would see they were then brought under conscientious scruples, to do nothing that would bring a blemish on their religious profession; and as they kept to this, they were preserved out of many temptations they had not foreseen."

"Third Month 8th. Many of the sins of my youth have been brought into remembrance this day, producing the question, whether they have been forgiven; under which, a degree of humiliation was felt, and desires raised before the Lord, that his mercy may be extended, so that they may be blotted out and cast behind his back. I remembered that Job was made to possess the sins of his youth, after the testimony had been pronounced, that he was a perfect, and an upright man; and doubtless to show him his nothingness, and that he had no ground to rest upon, but the mercies and forgiveness of God. When he was thoroughly humbled, in the end of this severe dispensation, he said, 'I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee; wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes;' and 'The Lord turned his captivity, and gave him twice as much as he had before.'" May I know again and again the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, and thereby be enabled to confess my sins unto God, and receive his forgiveness and pardon, through the blood of his adorable Son, our Redeemer and Saviour, Jesus Christ."

"Eighth Month 13th. Feeling an intimation to attend the Quarterly Meeting of Salem, I went to Woodbury this morning. We sat an hour in silence, when it seemed to be my business, to set forth the inward work of religion upon the heart; and that where it is submitted to, it leads into retirement before the Lord; in which the spirit of prayer is at times given, to ask forgiveness for past sins, and for strength to resist the enemy and his temptations. The people of the world are looking out for the faults of others, and feeding upon them; but the Lord's visited and faithful children are concerned to have their own hearts searched, that everything contrary to his will may be done away, and they made to bring forth the fruits of his Spirit, to the praise of his great Name. Their language is, 'Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting.'" The tribulated seed were encouraged to trust in the Lord, and to look to Him daily, for the arising of his power to help them in their trials, and to gather the children. The latter were persuaded to obey the offers of Divine grace and mercy, which are of more value than anything in this world. These are the days of the Son of Man to their souls, which we have no power to command, and if rejected, know not that they will ever be renewed. I thought the tendering power of Christ was felt by many among them, for which we have cause to be thankful to the great Lord of the harvest."

FROM THE "BRITISH FRIEND."

A Seventeenth Century Dungeon.

There has comparatively recently been unearthed at Warwick a dungeon in which prisoners used to be confined at night, which serves to mark the improvement which has taken place in prison discipline since John Howard, in the middle of the 18th century, first called public attention to the inhuman way in which prisoners not only in England, but also in all Europe, were being treated.

This dungeon has been covered over and almost forgotten by the present generation, as it does not appear to have been used since 1797. The following is Howard's description of it when he visited it in the middle of the 18th century:

"The night room of the felons is an octagon dungeon, about 21 feet in diameter, down 31 steps, damp and offensive. The gaoler on going down took a preservative. The justices have taken the gaol and bridewell into consideration. May it not be hoped that gentlemen so considerate will not continue this damp and offensive place, which has only one aperture level with the court, three feet in diameter."

The representations of Howard respecting the condition of our prisons stirred the whole country, and we find a further report of this dungeon made by Basil Montague, in 1815, one of a committee of gentlemen interested in the treatment of prisoners, in which he says:—

"This dungeon is 8 feet 10 inches underground. In the middle is a cesspool for the necessities of nature; from the side issues a stream for the prisoners to slake their thirst. There is a large heavy chain now in the dungeon that passed through a link of the chain of each of the felons, which was carried up the steps and secured outside the vault. Seventeen prisoners are said to have slept there every night. The turnkey said that in the morning when he unlocked the door he was so affected by the putrid steam, that it was enough to strike him down. The prisoners were shut in this horrible place from quarter-past four to daylight, in winter. The diameter of the dungeon was 20½ feet, which, as it was an octagon, would give an area of about 60 feet in circumference; and the governor told me that they had not infrequently had 42 prisoners confined there all night, and on one occasion he had counted 45. This, Basil Montague calculated by measurement, could only have been accomplished by chaining the prisoners close together with their feet towards the centre, some on their backs, and some on their sides!

It is a striking instance of the cruelty and callousness of the time, that in 1659 three members of the Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, viz: Thos. Palmer, William Manns, and Richard Mills, of the neighbourhood of Warwick, were summoned by John Dyke, the Incumbent of Warwick, (who, for his vicious life had been formerly ejected) for the payment of tithes, value 14s., which he said were due to him, and they appeared accordingly, but, refusing to swear to their answer, were imprisoned for contempt, in this dungeon, where Palmer lay ten months, and Manns nine months. In the same year also Humphrey Beckland, Richard Woodward, and John Tombs, were imprisoned in this dungeon for attending a religious meeting at Alester, and were placed in irons and shut up with the common felons.

The writer was permitted to see this dungeon recently, and it remains pretty much in the condition described by Basil Montague. The steps descending to it are very narrow, permitting of the passage of only one person at a time, and evidently worn by the feet of the thousands of prisoners whom an unfeeling age had condemned to incarceration within its damp walls. The old oak door, which was secured by many a bolt, was rotting and taken from its position and placed against the wall. When standing upon the floor, and looking up some 20 feet through the grating, which was hardly three feet square, and was the only means of light and ventilation, it was easy to understand the accuracy of Howard's report of it, that it was damp and offensive. Surely it is one of the signs of the "gentler age" in which we live, and the moulding influences of Christianity, that such places and such prison discipline are now looked upon as a relic of a barbarous age. M. Makepeace, the custodian of the law courts, has got photographs taken of this remarkable place which convey a fair idea of its unwholesomeness.

J. LATCHMORE.

TRUE godliness is supernatural, and so above the reach of Adam's offspring, who, whilst they continue in the fall, are servants to sin; we must be reduced to a god like nature before we can bring forth a godly conversation; grapes cannot be expected from thorns, nor figs of thistles, the tree must be good before the fruit can be good, a righteous life is the natural effect of a right spirit; our lights cannot shine forth before men, until we are enlightened with the light of Christ; without a true conversion, there can be no true conversation; for all men in the nature of fallen Adam, being ungodlike, until we are raised by Christ the second Adam, we cannot live godlike.—Hugh Turford.

It may be also added that William Dewsbury, who made Warwick his home for many years, spent nineteen years of his life in prisons, sixteen years of which were spent in Warwick prison, and four of those years were in this very dungeon at night, chained among the common felons.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

History shows, that nations which have become relieved from a common enemy have often been torn by internal dissensions or the wiles of ambitious leaders. Political parties, when largely in the majority, have generally more bitter contentions between their own factions than with those of their political opponents, and corporations are destroyed through personal dissensions. The same features of human nature have appeared in many religious denominations, and a historian of many events connected with separations among Friends admits, that individual weaknesses in Bodies which should have been harmonious, have been painfully disturbing.

While, therefore, it can only be disastrous to assimilate with defections, it cannot be said that isolation of itself ensures exemption from the weakness of human nature, for the Truth remains good, that a man's enemies are those of his own household.

In that sublime and awfully solemn prayer, "I pray not that thou shouldst take them from the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil one;" and, "Neither for these only do I pray, but for them also that believe on me through their word;" we may perceive not only the source which alone could preserve the Disciples from the evil, but that those whom their word should bring to the Father were those that were with them in the world.

Whether those who would be disciples in the present day, can best show forth on whose side they are and effect the saving of their brethren, by withdrawing from among them, and making an impassable barrier between the disciples and their field of labor, or whether their duty lies in a patient labor in the field where they find themselves providentially placed, is a question which, when decided, should give evidence that it was solved in the wisdom of Him who uttered that memorable prayer.

Complaint is made that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting allows of ministers of other Yearly Meetings, which have partaken of the defections alluded to, to travel amongst us.

Respecting those appearing as ministers, whose services give occasion of uneasiness, the Discipline of the dates of 1699 and 1834, is as follows:

"If any of our ministers, or those who may come from other parts on a visit among Friends, gives occasion of uneasiness in his or her religious communications, by misapplying or drawing unsound inferences from the text, or shall propagate any doctrines or principles which are not according to the testimony of the Holy Scriptures, and inconsistent with those which our religious Society have always held and most surely believed, let them be immediately treated with by faithful elders or ministers where such occasion of concern has been given; and if such minister prove refractory and do not acknowledge his or her fault, then the said elders or ministers should give information thereof, and of the care extended, to the elders of the Monthly Meeting where such minister belongs, or report the case to their own respective Monthly Meeting, in order that if it should be judged requisite, an explicit communication from this latter Monthly Meeting to the one of which the individual is a member, may be seasonably made, further endeavors for his or her help thence be used, and our testimony to the principles and doctrines of the Gospel of Christ duly maintained."

It has long been the custom in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting for the faithful elders and ministers to treat with persons coming amongst us, whose speaking in our meetings are occasions of uneasiness.

It is not customary now to report their cases to the respective Monthly Meetings. It would be manifestly useless to report them to meetings as defective as the persons complained of, and a greater acknowledgment of the conduct and position of such meetings than Philadelphia Yearly Meeting warrants.

The labors of faithful elders and ministers and members are sometimes sufficient to discourage unsatisfactory offerings. Where the persons prove refractory, their offences are a disregard of the labor bestowed upon them.

The temporary coming of unsatisfactory persons as ministers to the meetings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, is thus amply provided for, whatever may be the disregard of the said provisions on the part of those thus intruding upon us.

For the prevention of the acquirement of any permanent standing of any unsatisfactory ministers, the Discipline of 1857 has afforded a peremptory protection by the following clause:

"When a certificate of removal is received for a person in the station of minister from a meeting outside of our Yearly Meeting, such person should be received as a member only, and is not to be considered a member of the Meeting of Ministers and Elders until his or her gift has been acknowledged among us in the manner laid down by our Discipline."

The exclusion of ministers from Ohio Yearly Meeting may justly be criticised as an over-caution, but the circumstances producing this over-caution are generally understood by those immediately concerned as members of Ohio Yearly Meeting; and there is no disciplinary provision against recording an acknowledgment of any gifts bestowed by the Head of the Church upon any person coming from any meeting, nor should there be unreasonable delay in so doing.

In the pamphlet alluded to, after stating that "Ministers and Elders of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting have been liberated and certificates granted them, and some without have attended several of the Yearly Meetings, who have acknowledged the Yearly Meeting which Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has testified against, it is intimated that if in so attending these Yearly Meetings our members have heard epistles from the Yearly Meetings we have discarded, and the replies to those epistles, they have countenanced those separatists from the religious Society of Friends, with the apparent approbation of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting."

Considering the position of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, it undoubtedly behoves all its members to be cautious how far they assimilate with the Yearly Meetings which approve of matters that we cannot sanction. Ministers should weigh well what certificate they ask for, and monthly meetings consider seriously whom they accredit and how they frame the certificates they grant. It is undesirable for members to accept of hospitalities and services in their religious travels, when it would give offence not to reciprocate when asked in return, or bring distress in their own meeting, if returned in kind; and the call should be alone from the Head of the Church for visits of this kind, and his guidance closely followed in completing them.

There may be exceptions, but certificates granted for such service are generally carefully worded, and indicate more the service in view, which is approved by the meeting, than an epistle to any defective meetings which may be visited.

A worthy Friend, many years ago, declared in allusion to a certain branch of the Society which had allowed, through unfaithfulness, much trouble to be come upon us, that "he believed there was a seed of God" among them.

Doubtless this was the case, although the official course of that branch had been so much to be lamented, and doubtless the same is as true in many defective sections at this time; and it is in the wisdom only of the Head of the Church, whether to water the seed in such places, that his messengers shall be sent. It is, however, too narrow a view and too superficial a reasoning, to conclude that the attendance of a meeting and hearing of matters which are not approved by the individual, are an endorsement or countenance of all that transpires or is recorded.

Our Discipline cautions particularly against attending the worship of those who are not in communion with us, at funerals, seeing that in so doing there is danger "either of balking their testimony for the Truth, to the wounding of their own minds, or giving unnecessary offence to their sober neighbors." This is an admirable advice, but it does not follow that where, from relationship or other ties of association, a Friend may feel it right to attend, that he endorses all that his sober neighbors may perform, or that he approves of services which may be acceptable to them.

Friends' meetings are sometimes held in the meeting-houses of other denominations (a proceeding which should be seriously considered, in view of the necessity of explaining why a similar request in return would be refused), but it does not follow that a Friend who holds such meetings, countenances the views of those among whom he feels that he is sent.

It is an untenable view, that one approves or endorses all that may be done in his presence, or that mingling with persons who have separated from the Society, endorses the action of those separatists, provided the actions on such occasions do not constitute such an assimilation and endorsement.

The changes of Discipline which have been considered, have been characterized by one of our critics as "an abomination in the sight of God." The other has asked us to remember the denunciations of the Revelations against those who suffered "that woman Jezebel, who calleth herself a Prophetess, to teach and seduce my servants," and it has been intimated and probably believed, that the language is applicable to us, "They have healed also the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly, saying, Peace, Peace, when there is no Peace." Serious charges and strong language for mortals to use against their brethren who are striving for the prosperity of the church, but we have no harsh expressions for response.

Much preaching hath made many good talkers; but it is grace in the heart and truth in our inward parts, that makes goodly lives; and to a fullness of this heavenly treasure no man can attain, but by denying such notions as the eternal light of righteousness in our inward parts, shows us to be unjust and dishonest; for in denying the evil, we choose the good; and as the growth of sin stands in our ill-doing, so the growth of grace stands in our well-doing.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Since reading the article of I. H., in a recent number of the THE FRIEND, some reflections have been awakened, in connection with the subject referred to, which I trust may not be out of place at this time.

The Scripture admonition seems applicable, "Say not thou, what is the cause that the former days were better than these. Thou dost not inquire wisely concerning this."

While we are sensible that there is much cause for humiliation, and none for boasting, yet it may be profitable for us to remember, that He who raised our forefathers to be a people, sustained them amid the storms of persecution, and enabled them to testify by his all-sufficient Power, is able now, and I believe, does qualify others to stand in defence of the same precious cause, and to proclaim the doctrines of the Gospel in all their fullness.

"His arm is not shortened that it cannot save, nor his ear grown heavy that it cannot hear." He is able to "bring sons from afar and daughters from the ends of the earth," even those who have been far off in a spiritual sense.

While we cannot but be sensible that deficiencies abound, instead of looking at these defects, saying, "Friends are not what they once were," and concluding it is not worth while to try to live up to the standard of practical righteousness which early Friends upheld, I would that we might each endeavor to build over against his own house, and by applying to the great Physician of value, might know Him to be the Healer of breaches, and the Restorer of paths to dwell in. Then would He condescend to raise up judges, as at the first, and counsellors as at the beginning.

I believe that the world needs our peculiar doctrines, and the testimonies growing out of them, as much now as it did in the early days, and unless we prove disloyal to our trust, that we are yet called upon, as a people, to hold up the light of advanced spiritual truth, and of practical righteousness in the earth.

In our daily lives and conversation, may we endeavor to fulfil the Scripture injunction, "Let your lights so shine before men that others, seeing your good works, may glorify our Father who is in heaven."

While many who profess the name of Friends have departed far from the ancient standard, may we not believe that for those who are faithfully adhering to the doctrines and testimonies, and they are not a few, a brighter day has dawned. That, notwithstanding many weaknesses and shortcomings, the "shout of a King is still heard in their camp."

It was said concerning the church formerly, "For Zion's sake I will not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, till the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth."

Behold the mercy and condescension of the Most High toward a rebellious people, and may we not humbly trust, that as we endeavor to "Cleave to the Rock whence we were hewn," that this gracious promise will be fulfilled, toward the militant church, wherever situated.

S. A. H.

THERE is not a man born into the world, if he have lived to commit sin, but hath felt and known in himself rebukes for sin; and these rebukes are the appearances of grace, and called in Scripture, light, and true light, for that it manifests every work of darkness; it shows us both when and wherein we have done amiss: and this it hath been in all ages.

DANIEL WHEELER'S FAMILY.

"They grew in beauty, side by side,
They filled one home with glee."
F. HEMANS.

"I believe that bitterness and anguish of soul is not offensive when not accompanied with repining at the will and pleasure of my gracious and compassionate Lord, who, when passing through the straits and difficulties of humanity, went in love divine at the tomb of Lazarus. His compassions fail not, neither is the greatness of his faithfulness to a poor frail mortal one particle diminished, who in the depth of affliction and anguish still endeavors to breathe in humble resignation and sincerity the language of—"Thy will be done."—Extract from Daniel Wheeler's Journal.

An English home! what thoughts of bliss
In that dear word abide,
With earth's most sinless happiness
How is its sound allied,
Of all her promised scenes of rest
The happiest and the holiest.

The parents' love, the children's mirth,
Young voices, music sweet;—
Young feet that gladly tread the earth,
And as the swift years fleet,
So many strength and woman's grace
Deck that lithe form and this fair face.

Such was that home, that Christian home,
Where gathered round his knee
Sweet children in their ripening bloom,
And by his side was she,
The crown of all, the crown of life,
The tender mother, faithful wife.

Was not his heart at times opprest
With fears of what might be?
For barks that shared one haven's rest
Part far and wide at sea,
And flowers that filled one garden bed
In distant scenes their leaves have shed.

Some strand must be the first to break
In every cable bound;
Some tree must be the first to shake
Its foliage to the ground.
So first the mother's lonely grave
They made hard by the Neva's wave.

To stand that dying one beside
Not to his love was given—
Soon will the children too divide,
Some for earth, some for heaven,
While eyes with parting tears are dim,
"Some go to her—some stay with him."

Meanwhile his way by day and night
Is o'er the Southern Sea,
To bear to other souls the light
That lit his own, to bring wide,
Where coral reef each side enrings,
A messenger of heavenly things.

Not of home's solace all bereft,
While ever by his side,
One cherished hand and voice are left
To share those wanderings wide,
To the old familiar name
That childhood's lips so early frame.

But sorrow followed in his wake,
And track'd him o'er the wave—
Beside the Neva's banks they make
Again an English grave—
Haste, maiden, to thy mother's breast,
What cold can chill that place of rest?

Ere this another tale of woe
Is borne upon the breeze;
And the heart sinketh very low,
Amid those distant seas—
His first-born son (thus far 'twas blest)
'Neath English earth is laid to rest.

Summer and winter went and came
And still he journeyed on,
Beneath the Southern Cross of flame,
While yet—Thy will be done
Was murmured by the patient heart,
Shuddering beneath each fresh wound's smart.

Summer and winter came and went,
Nor yet his journeyings cease,
Till to the waiting soul was sent
"The order of release!"
And he may seek his native land,
His stripped and broken household band!

The blue French skies are smiling o'er
An English dying bed;
With weary spirit aching sore
Beats o'er it that gray head—
Yet; though the chills whom storms had spared
Is summoned from the path he shared,

Father, rejoice! not sin's strong hand
Doth are him from thy side,
O'er Death hath unloos'd the band
That Life had fondly tied;
One word still doubts and questioning dim,
One thought—the Lord hath need of him.

But with the sackcloth garb, alas!
Around the spirit cast,
The head anointed, washed the face,
Unseen of men to fast,
Across the sea he takes his way,
His Master's message to convey.

Still freshly yearning for his dead
The path might well seem rough;
But God is pitiful—He said,
"Said soon—It is enough."
And where the Neva's World rivers sweep
He gave to his beloved—Sleep.

The broad Atlantic rolleth wide
To part those kindred graves—
Mother and daughter rest beside
The Neva's frozen waves;
And only alien footsteps tread
About their cold, snow-curtained bed.

The living English turf is green
O'er the brother's breast;
The lonely father sleeps serene,
Apart from all the rest;
But where no farewell tears may be
They meet—where there is no more sea.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"I am afraid you will laugh at this, but I should like to be just a wee bit pretty." So wrote a dear Christian girl, on whom the daily trials of life were pressing rather heavily, and who felt that she was not as happy as her heritage as a Christian should make her. And though the lack implied is a very small thing compared with at least one trial that shadows her life, yet her words won my sympathy, for they recalled the vain longings of my early years for a pretty and attractive face, which, I fancied, would win me more love. They recalled, also, these lines committed to memory before that wish was outgrown:

Seek for beauty if thou wilt,
But mark the quality; not that which shines
From human face, and gains applause
From gaping stares; that which fools admire,
And seek no other. But that higher kind,
Which earth not only appropriates, but heaven;
Pure, bright, celestial beauty of the soul;
Beauty of holiness!

Personal beauty, unless united to a modest and lovely character, is perhaps, more apt to excite envy than to win love, and has often proved a snare to its possessor; but the beauty of the soul we may long for, ever so ardently, and know that our wishes are in accord with our God's, for we are told, "So shall the King greatly desire thy beauty." (Psalms xlv: 11). Only as we consecrate ourselves heartily to God, submit to the operations of his Spirit, trustfully relying on the sacrifice of Christ for us, and continually seeking his grace to enable us to follow Him, will our King see in us the beauty He greatly desires. The thirteenth verse of the same Psalm says, "The King's daughter is all glorious within." How far more desirable to be beautiful within than outwardly. And even the plainest face is made more attractive by "the outward shining of an inward light."

Then, while content, if so our Father wills it, without the perishing attraction of form or feature, let us seek earnestly for the beauty which He loves to see, and which will be a witness for Him to those about us. And Oh! the joy, if some who know Him not, might be led by this means to seek Him.

And we may ask trustingly; for what our God desires for us, and we too, desire—who shall hinder? "For this is the will of God, even your sanctification." (1 Thess. iv: 3.)

"Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us." (Psalms xc: 17.)

The afternoon of the 16th of the Second Mo. was so mild and beautiful, that I was induced to visit a piece of woodland about four miles distant, from which numerous logs had been hauled past our residence, showing that the wood-choppers had been at work there.

One of the first objects that arrested my attention, as I walked along the road towards it, was a large Pin-oak (Quercus Palustris), with numerous spreading branches, and a multitude of branchlets, as is the habit of growth of this tree when growing in open grounds. The twigs were thickly set with gray, woody nutgalls of an inch or more in diameter—the result of the injury to the twig caused by its being pierced by the gall-fly, which lays its eggs in the growing wood, trusting that they will be securely housed by the abnormal growth which soon envelops them, and at the same time find nourishment in the sap of the tree. Why these galls should be more abundant on the Pin Oak than on other species, may perhaps be partially accounted for on the fact, that this species throws out more small branches and twigs suitable for the purposes of the fly.

In these galls the eggs are hatched, pass through the changes of insect life, and finally the matured fly eats its way out into the open air. There are many species of gall-fly, and each one selects a different kind of plant in which to deposit its eggs. Indeed, I had not gone far from the Pin-oak, before I came to another species of oak (I believe a White Oak), on the twigs of which were clusters of several small, smooth galls about the size of bullets. Noticing that no holes were visible in these, I cut one of them open and found the cavity filled with a white maggot. The dryness of the galls indicated that there was no longer a flow of sap to provide food, so that the insect had probably attained its full growth, and was quietly going through the transformations which would change it from a grub into a winged fly, in its snug home, secured from most sources of danger. Harris states that this kind eats its way into the open air in the Sixth or Seventh Month, so that it has learned to abide with patience, until the conditions are favorable for its exit, and the Oak twigs are in a state suitable for the reception of a new crop of eggs.

The brown leaves with which the ground was covered in places were interesting objects of study. Leaves, when freshly formed consist of a frame-work of woolly fibres, the stalk and its branches or veins; and a green cellular tissue, in which the light acts, and which performs important functions, analogous to those of the lungs in animals. The green had now all disappeared and the cells which contained it had shrivelled, so that the ribs or veins were made more prominent. Their ramifications were beautiful. In the leaves of the Pin-oak the ribs reached to the extreme points of the divisions of the leaves, and extended beyond them as fine bristles or hairs.

In the leaves of the White Oak, and some other species, there was no such projection of the ribs beyond the border of the leaf. After entering the woods, I found many leaves so nearly resembling those of the Chestnut Tree, that there might easily be raised a question as to what tree they belonged. But a comparison with the Chestnut leaves lying around soon showed decided points of difference. The Chestnut oak leaves were broader than those of the Chestnut, and the ribs ended at the border of the leaf, while in the Chestnut itself, they projected as in the Pin-oak.

On the ground were numerous acorns, about an inch in length, which had sprouted and sent down a root into the ground; and were only waiting for the warmth of spring to send up a shoot with green leaves, and thus start a new crop of trees. The thick, fleshy portion of the acorn consists of two parts, lying side by side, which, as the plant develops, readily separate from each other. The material stored up in these nourishes the young shoot that arises from them, and enables it to grow while the root as yet is too little developed to absorb food from the earth. The process of growth in the acorn may be interestingly observed by suspending some acorns in a jar of water, and watching from day to day the gradual protrusion of the root and the stem from the top of the acorn, where the germs are situated. In many plants, the two parts, into which many seeds split in growing, are themselves lifted up from the ground, become green, and partly perform the uses of leaves. They are then called seed-leaves, and are generally very different in shape and appearance from the leaves which will succeed them.

There is a very large division of plants in which the seed remains undivided, as is the case with Indian corn, wheat and many other seeds. On this difference botanists found the distinction between the monocotyledons—those plants which have a single seed-leaf—and dicotyledons, those which have two seed-leaves. It is worth noticing that there are certain other characters which invariably accompany this difference in the seed-leaves. We have already remarked the beautiful subdivisions and branching of the central stem of the leaf in the oak leaves we picked up during our walk. If we take a leaf of a monocotyledonous plant, such as Indian corn, we will find that there is in it no such interlacing of the ribs or branches, but that they run side by side from the base to the point. These are called parallel-veined leaves, while the others are termed netted-veined.

If we examine the trunk or stems of the plants, we shall find equally well-marked differences between those whose seeds have two, and those whose seeds have but one seed-leaf (cotyledon).

The woodland had been clearing a portion of the woodland, where the acorns were abundant, so that I had plenty of opportunities of seeing the construction of the wood of the oaks, hickories, &c., which had stood there. The wood in the stumps was arranged in concentric layers, one being deposited immediately under the bark in every year. Thus, as the tree advances in age it increases in diameter.

But if we examine the structure of a corn-stalk or other monocotyledonous plant, we shall find that the woody fibre is not disposed in layers, but consists of separate bundles or threads of fibre, running through the cellular tissues. These stems have no manifest distinction into bark, pith and wood. To this division belongs the great tropical family of palms. Although they increase in diameter as they grow older, it is done, not by depositing fresh layers on the outside as the oak grows, but by a stretching of the rind, which gives space for the new bundles of woody fibres that develop as the plant grows.

On the freshly cut end of a hickory log that lay on the ground, I observed the sap oozing out of the new wood just within the bark. It was sweet to the taste, and reminded me that the season was near at hand when the sap of the sugar maple is collected in some sections of our country, and boiled down to make the delicious maple sugar and syrup.

At one place in the fence corners by the roadside, some dark green oval leaves betrayed the presence of the trailing arbutus (Epigaea repens). The leaves are the production of the previous year and remain through the winter. The flower buds, which were formed in the previous autumn, were partially developed and gave promise of opening when assisted by a few weeks of warm sun in the approaching spring weather.

The curious burs which form the seed vessels of the Cocklebur (Xanthium Strumarium) attracted my notice. They are nearly one inch in length and contain two long seeds, in separate cells. The outside is thickly covered with spiny projections, whose sharp tips are recurved, so that they readily adhere to the hairs or clothing of passing animals. J. W.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

As regards our declining state as a people, I am of the belief that unfaithfulness in the support of the precious doctrines we were raised up as a people to maintain before the world, will account for it all. Many have gone out from us because they were never of us; others have been allured by some who would smooth the way to the kingdom, regardless of the declaration "this is not the place of your rest." Thomas Evans, in a testimony to our ancient doctrines, embracing that of self-denial and the daily cross, delivered in great authority in one of the sittings of the Yearly Meeting, said, "Some in this day are seeking to go to heaven in golden slippers."

When our Saviour was teaching on a certain occasion, many of his disciples said, "This is a hard saying, who can bear it." But as He continued his teaching He did not make the way any easier for them, and "from that time many of his disciples went back and walked no more with Him. And when He was betrayed and seized they all forsook Him and fled."

About seventy years ago our friend, W. Evans, wrote as follows: "Several days ago I had some instructive conversation with my beloved father respecting the ministry and the present very depressed state of our religious Society. He remarked that the degeneracy was not greater than among the Jews, and yet the prophets, by faithfulness to their Heavenly Leader, were enabled to stand their ground, and boldly declare against the corruptions of that day."

So we see that no new thing has happened unto the Christian church. The apostacy and the diminution of numbers in our Society, in many places, I freely admit. Job Scott said "the apostacy of millions will be no help to thee or any excuse for thee in the day of account." I have faith to believe that this dispensation of shaking and being sifted as from sieve to sieve, will be succeeded by a brighter day. I trust there are yet very many that can say, "To whom shall we go. Thou hast the words of eternal life."

One of our prophetic friends that has passed to his reward, seemed to see that there would be a gathering in the next century; and our friend, W. E., in one of his powerful communications, said, "The declaration is very positive, 'the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters do the sea.'"

May it not still be said of many as individuals, and of us as a people, "Ye are they that have continued with me in my temptations, and I appoint unto you a kingdom even as my Father hath appointed unto me."

Let none conclude the Society of Friends has had its day and that the precious doctrines and testimonies unfolded to our predecessors, may now be laid aside for something more easy to the fleshly will. This is not the way of our blessed Lord when He walked among men; if his doctrine did not suit the people, He did not relax it, but said, "What and if ye shall see the son of man ascend up where he was before," thus leaving them altogether. It is not to be expected that there will be any other dispensation to mankind than this glorious Gospel one; or any other way to the kingdom but by Christ, the door.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 248.

The following interesting narrative is taken from The British Friend, which had copied it from some source not indicated:

THE PRAYING BANKRUPT.

A number of years ago, in a New England town of some maritime importance, there resided a deacon who engaged in lucrative business. Although of prudent habits, his benevolence led him to become security to a large amount for one who had won his confidence as a Christian brother, but afterwards proved to be a designing knave. This issued in the good deacon's failure, when, with scrupulous integrity, everything that could be claimed by his creditors was given up. A winter of great severity and of general business depression followed. His wife and young children looked to him for subsistence which he knew not how to furnish, as his most diligent efforts for employment were unsuccessful. A debt incurred with no prospect of payment was, in his estimation, a sin; and he sadly saw the little stock of provisions they possessed rapidly diminishing with no way to obtain more. He was a man of prayer as well as action, and carried the case to Him who feedeth the ravens. Yet long weary weeks passed, and no success came. At length the morning dawned when the last stick of wood was on the fire, and little Hatty told her father that the candles were all gone; "and how," asked she, "shall we take care of dear mamma to-night?"

The question went to the father's heart with dagger-like poignancy. The vision of his suffering wife, gasping her life away in the last fearful stages of consumption, her comfortless sick room unwarmed, unlighted, and the thick darkness which he knew would enshroud her when made aware of the extent of their destitution, would have driven him to distraction were it not that he yet had hope in One mighty to save. He fled to his closet, and there in agony of prayer besought the Lord for help; and, forgetting all other wants, pleaded and pleaded again for the two articles now specially needed, specifying them with reiterated earnestness. He arose from his knees in full assurance of faith and with heavenly tranquillity, and went forth expecting deliverance, looking for it, however, in but one way—through his own earnings. But after a fruitless day of seeking employment, gloomily he returned home.

He entered his gate, and was startled to see before him a generous pile of wood. Little Johnny opened the door, clapping his hands, and exclaiming—

"Oh, pa! we've got some wood and some candles!"

"Where did you get them? Are you sure they were not left here by mistake?"

"Oh, no, pa!" interrupted Hatty, "they were not left by mistake. A man knocked at the door with his whip, and when I opened it, he asked if you lived here. I told him you did. Then he said, 'Here are some candles and a load of wood for him.'"

"I asked him if you sent them, and he said, 'I rather guess your pa don't know anything about it.'"

"Who did send them, then?" said I.

"Oh," said he, "I musn't tell; but you may say to your father they are a present."

But to what instrumentality they were indebted for the relief was a mystery. And what particularly interested Deacon P. was the character of the anonymous presents; that the very things so much needed, and no others, should be sent, and he was sure he had mentioned his want of them to no human ear.

He questioned the children anew. They described the man who knocked at the door, and the horse and truck he drove. A new thought struck him. "Why," said he, "that team belongs to my old enemy, Graff. Can it be possible that he is the donor. If so, surely the finger of God has touched his heart." Deacon P. was, however, so convinced that he was their benefactor, that he resolved on an immediate call on that gentleman.

But who was Graff?

Some years before the rest of the First-day of the week was openly violated by a brisk trade in fish. The hundreds of boatmen, sailors, and their friends engaged in this traffic were so potent in influence that nobody thought of risking interference. Deacon P., though a man of peace, was also a man of moral courage. He determined to put a stop to the iniquity. His friends warned him that his life would be endangered; but, at first alone, and then afterwards with a brother deacon, he would take a walk along the wharves of a Sunday morning to ascertain who broke the law by traffic on that day. Men swore at him like fiends, fired his dwelling at several different times, and at last bound themselves with an oath "to kill him. Yet they feared his presence, and at his approach stores would be deserted of customers and closed with great celerity. This species of Sabbath-breaking was at last given up, after various hairbreadth escapes on the part of Deacon P. and his compatriots, the authorities being shamed into action by their fearless zeal.

The brutal drunkenness of the sailors, and the degradation and suffering of their families with which Deacon P. was, in this enterprise, brought into contact, opened his eyes to the evils of the liquor traffic; and, turning over his Sabbath reform to the legal authorities, he became known as a temperance advocate. This, also, brought him enemies, sometimes even changing friends into foes. Distiller Graff was among the latter, from a warm friend becoming bitterly alienated. In vain did the grieved deacon strive to conciliate by explanation and personal kindness.

Deacon P. entered the distillery of his old friend. For the first time for years its proprietor looked up with a nod and smile of recognition. It was evident something unusual had softened his heart.

"I have called," said the deacon, "to ask if you can tell me who sent some wood and candles to my house to-day?"

"Yes, sir; I sent them."

"You are very kind; but, pray tell how you came to do so."

"But first let me inquire if you really needed them?"

"Oh, I cannot express to you how much!"

"Well, then, I suppose I must explain," said Graff. "It's all very singular and sometimes seems very foolish. This morning, about ten o'clock, as I was busy at my work, suddenly a voice seemed to say to me, 'Send some wood to Deacon P. he is in want!'" I was astonished.

I could not believe you needed it, and I could not send it to you of all others. I tried to banish the thought, and went to work again more earnestly. But the voice—it seemed within me—said again with painful distinctness, 'Send some wood to Deacon P. he is in want!' I scouted the idea as weak and silly—a mere phantasy of the brain, but it was of no use; I had to succumb. The more I ridiculed and fought it, the more vivid and irresistible was the impression, until, to purchase peace, and in some awe, I confess, I bade John load his team with wood and leave it at your door.

"For a moment I was at rest; but only for a moment. The imperative whisper came, 'Send some candles!' Said I to myself, 'This is too absurd. I will not gratify this whim; but again I was so beset with the mandate, and so distressed and baffled in repelling it, that, as a cheap way to get out of torment, I handed John a package of candles also.

"This matter has been in my mind ever since. Sometimes I have thought it almost a freak of insanity, and then, again, such was the strange character of the impression, so unexpected, so solemn and powerful, and such the singular peace following compliance with its dictates, that I almost believe it to be supernatural."

"It is indeed the doings of Him who is wonderful in working," replied Deacon P. "It was about ten o'clock, I well remember, that I pleaded with God for the very articles you sent me, in an agony of wrestling I never knew before. It was then, too, that my soul was filled with the conviction that my prayer was heard and that relief would come."

Since hearing a generated relative relate this incident in his own life, we have often wondered how the sceptic can dispose of such occurrences. While it would be presumption for the believer, in ordinary circumstances, to expect to live by prayer alone, or to be fed without his own co-operation, yet are there not events happening all along the history of the Church, in the experiences of individual members, to be accounted for only on the ground of a special Providence, regardless of the emergencies of the believing, uffering people of God? Surely "light is shown to the righteous," and to them.

"The deepest dark reveals the starriest hope."

How He Got His Place.

The boy who does just as little as possible for an employer sometimes wonders why he is not given a higher position in the business house in which he is employed, when a less brilliant companion who works for another establishment is advanced very rapidly. The reason probably is that the less brilliant companion is more faithful, and works conscientiously, always seeking to do more than enough barely to secure his salary. Somebody sees and appreciates his work, and when the opportunity comes a better place is given him, which he fills with equal faithfulness. An illustration of this may be found in the following true incident:

A boy about sixteen years of age had been seeking employment in one of our large cities. He looked vainly for two weeks, and was well nigh hopeless of getting any work to do, when, one afternoon, he entered a store kept by a gentleman whom we will call Mr. Stone.

The lad asked the usual question, "Can you give me any thing to do?"

Mr. Stone, to whom he appealed, answered, "No; full now." Then, happening to notice an expression of despondency on the youth's face said, "If you want to work half an hour or so do down stairs and pile up that kindling wood. Do it well and I'll give you twenty-five cents."

"All right, thank you, sir," answered the young man, and he went below. As the store was about closing for the afternoon he came up stairs and went to Mr. Stone.

"Ah, yes," said that gentleman, somewhat hastily. "Piled the wood? Well, here's your money."

"No, sir; I'm not quite through, and I should like to come and finish in the morning," said the young fellow, refusing the silver piece.

"All right," said Mr. Stone, and thought no more of the affair till the next morning, when he chanced to be in the basement, and recollecting the wood pile, glanced into the coal and wood room. The wood was arranged in orderly tiers, the room was cleanly swept, and the young man was at the moment engaged in repairing the coal bin.

"Hallo!" said Mr. Stone, "I didn't engage you to do any thing but pile up that wood."

"Yes, sir, I know it," answered the lad; "but I saw this needed to be done, and I had rather work than not. But I don't expect any pay out my quarter."

"Humph!" muttered Mr. Stone, and went up to his office without further comment. Half an hour later the young man presented himself, clean and well brushed, for his pay.

Mr. Stone passed him his quarter.

"Thank you," said the youth, and turned away. "Stop a minute," said Mr. Stone. "Have you a place in view where you can find work?"

"No, sir."

"Well, I want you to work for me. Here," writing something on a slip of paper, "take this to that gentleman standing by the counter there; we'll tell you what to do. I'll give you six dollars a week to begin with. Do your work as well as you did that down stairs, and—that's all," and Mr. Stone turned away before the young fellow recovered from his surprise sufficiently to speak.

This happened fifteen years ago. Mr. Stone's store is more than twice as large as it was then, and its superintendent is the young man who began by piling kindling-wood for twenty-five cents. Faithfulness has been his motto. By it he has been advanced, step by step, and has not yet by any means reached the topmost rod of success. He is sure to become a partner some day, either with his employer or in some other business house.—Selected.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Birds in Forests.—It is commonly supposed that there is but little bird life in the forest, because so few birds are seen or heard. But this is not the fact. A large number of families are represented, though not many songsters waste their sweetness in the solitude. The forest is so dense and the undergrowth so thick, that the smaller birds easily hide themselves from sight, and if they utter a beguiling note or two you will look for them in vain. To study them one must choose proper localities and wait patiently for opportunities. One class of birds will be found in the thickets, another in the clearings, another in the evergreens and hard wood, near streams and on and about lakes.—Forest and Stream.

Hibernating Bears.—This story of a capture of hibernating bears comes from the State of Washington. It is related by two citizens of Skiplanon, who saw the beasts in captivity. Their owner said that in cutting down one of the giant spruce trees common to that region he discovered that one part of it was hollow, and, looking into the cavity, he made out three slumbering bears. Thereupon he made "slabs" of wood across the hole, and sawed off from the main trunk the section of tree in which the bears were housed. This he started down the mountain side in the usual fashion, and the novel cage and its contents arrived safely at the bottom. The bears, which are in a state of semi-torpor, are now on exhibition.

Egyptian Plants.—George Henslow, a famous botanist of the Old World, has recently made a critical examination of the desert flora of Egypt, and finds many points of general interest. The prevailing tints of blue-gray color is a feature similar to what we find on American desert, with the same adaptation by deep-rooting to sustain the vegetation during the long-continued heat and drought—the surface sand often indicating a temperature of 140°. There is not a drop of rain during ten months. Also, as in our deserts, spinescent plants, and plants with curiously knobby roots prevail. A felt-like hair clothed many leaves, and the cuticles of all are thickened. Calcium chloride, a powerful absorbent, is found in many of the species. Usually the flowers are not showy, and many species are self-fertilizing. Chickweed, which abounds in England and the longest settled portions of America, abounds in Egypt, but has there learned to do without the little white flower which it bears with us, he probably meaning that it is apetalous. Professor Henslow says that the "mummy wheat" is a fraud in which the Egyptians are adept. They can manage by sleight of hand to take it out of the mummy before your eyes. No mummy wheat that is genuine, says the Professor, can possibly grow. As for "mummy peas," the Professor declares that the Egyptians were in utter ignorance of any form of pea when the mummies were prepared.

Testing Coins.—As fine as a hair," could well be the praise accorded to the wonderfully delicate weight-tester for coins at the mint. As the coins run down into it through the long spout, the tester needs to balance them but for an instant, immediately shooting them that are not found wanting into the expectant and open-mouthed sack at the end of a lower spout. If too light, they are tossed out through another spout, and if too heavy, through a third one. Not long ago an astonishingly large number of coins were tossed into the "too heavy" spout. Surprised at this unusual rejection of so great a load of the silver pieces, investigation was instituted; when lo! it was found that a single tiny hair, caught in the scales, had made overweight for every coin passed through.

Platinum.—The demand for platinum for use in science has raised its value to three-quarters that of gold. Three years ago it was worth $80 a pound. It now costs $180, or eleven times more than silver. It is found in small quantities in Peru, Columbia, Brazil, the Ural Mountains, California, Oregon and Borneo. The yearly output has never been more than four tons and is now three.

Iron Plates.—An active competition has for a long time past been carried on among the English iron-masters as to the degree of thinness to which cold iron could be rolled. In one case the sheets have been rolled to an average thickness or thinness of the eighteen-hundredth part of an inch—in other words, eighteen hundred sheets of this iron, piled one upon the other, would measure only one inch in thickness. And this marvellous fineness of work may be more readily understood when the fact is borne in mind that the great number of 1200 sheets of the thinnest tissue paper measures a slight fraction over an inch. It also appears that these wonderful iron sheets were perfectly smooth and easy to write upon, notwithstanding the fact of their being porous when held up in a strong light.—The Age of Steel.

Fluorine.—The beautiful fluor-spar of Derbyshire has long been known to contain the metal calcium in union with an element which was named fluorine, yet the utmost efforts of a score of chemists failed to isolate the latter, either from fluor-spar or from any other substance containing it. Sir Henry Roscoe in 1871 wrote:

"Judging from the results of these interesting experiments, it appears improbable that, for the present, at least, fluorine can be isolated."

Only ten years after this cry of despair, the chemical world was startled by the announcement that M. Moissan of Paris had succeeded in obtaining free-fluorine. He found that if he passed a strong current of electricity through liquid hydrogen fluoride, kept at a temperature of ten degrees below zero (Fahrenheit), fluorine was evolved as a gas of a pale yellow color. The properties of the new gas proved to be of the most interesting character. If a lump of sulphur be placed in the stream of fluorine as it issues from the apparatus, it is immediately set on fire; a piece of ordinary wood charcoal is instantly raised to a white heat; sand, one of the most inert bodies known, will burn with the greatest brilliancy; while hydrogen and fluorine, if brought together in the dark, unite with a violent explosion. The most recently isolated of the elements, fluorine is unequalled for the intensity of its energy, for the fierceness of its attack.

Bull-fights.—Sweet Charity, how many sins are committed in thy name! Charity balls, lottery schemes, and latest of devices for ministering to pleasure in the name of Charity, the revival of bull-fighting in the City of Mexico, a committee of ladies, with Mrs. President Diaz at the head. Nine bulls of Belcher's breed were killed, the banderillos that had been stuck into the bulls being sold at extravagant prices, and twelve thousand people were debased by witnessing the brutal fight; but then $25,000 were taken in for the relief of the flood sufferers.

A Native Meeting in India.—A young Scotchman, who a year or two since made acquaintance and had some intercourse with Friends about Philadelphia, and who had removed to the East Indies, in writing from Bombay to a Friend of Philadelphia, says:

"I have twice been at a meeting of Parsees, Mahometans and Hindoos of various castes. Here was a thing which is generally looked upon as impossible—for these people to meet and be at peace one with another in matters religious. Yet here they were; and when one of the number present, a Parsee, got up and read a paper, and gave some comments on the same, one could see that there was a great deal more union among them—by the assent given to the statements made—than will sometimes be found even in a Friends' Meeting. On the other hand, I don't think the most orthodox of us would dissent much from any thing done or said.

"The substance of the paper and comments were, showing how man became carnally minded, crucified, dull and deaf to the Creator by disobeying the voice within his soul; and how, if he is to gain that which is lost, he must come to that light which enlighteneth every man, and delivers him from the power of his senses.

"The fact is, to those who have eyes to see, God is working now, as ever, for the redemption of mankind."

An Armenian Congregation in Massachusetts.—There was recently organized, in the vicinity of Plymouth Congregational Church, Worcester, Massachusetts, what is supposed to be the first Armenian Congregational Church in America. Five were received by letter, three on certificates from missionary churches in Turkey, and eleven upon confession of faith, and others have applied; so that the total membership, it is expected, will be not far from forty.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 8th inst. the Cabinet meeting was devoted to the Behring Sea question. The opinion was unanimous that the position assumed by the British Government was untenable and not justified on the condition of the sealing industry. It was decided to insist on a modus vivendi somewhat similar to that of last year, having for its object the protection of the seal fisheries by the joint action of Great Britain and the United States pending the settlement of the questions at issue by arbitration.

There is no change in the Behring Sea controversy, and the communication to the Secretary of State, Lord Salisbury in response to the President's note of the 8th inst., insisting on a renewal of the modus vivendi.

A reciprocity treaty between the United States and Nicaragua has been arranged, and President Harrison has issued a proclamation setting forth that fact and giving a list of articles which Nicaragua will admit free of duty.

During the past four months more than $7,000,000 in gold has been brought to this country from Australia.

After an existence of ten years, in which it has developed one of the greatest monopolies of the world, and created several colossal fortunes, the Standard Oil Trust, "in deference to the popular outcry against trusts," and in consequence of a recent decision of the Supreme Court of Ohio, which struck at the legality of the organization, proposes to dissolve without re-organization.

All the officers and leading employes of the Louisiana State Lottery were arraigned on the 7th inst., before the United States Court at New Orleans, charged with violating the anti-lottery postal law under an indictment returned in Trenton, New Jersey. This makes the fourteenth indictment which they have been called on to answer in as many different States from Massachusetts to Dakota and from Minnesota to Texas.

A dispatch from Minneapolis estimates, from reports received from sixty different points in Minnesota and the Dakotas, that the average amount of wheat unsold is 21.2 per cent. of the crop of 1891.

On the 9th inst. a blizzard passed over Minnesota, the Dakotas and other States, which was the most severe experienced for many years. The wind blew at the rate of sixty miles an hour, followed by a fall in the temperature to from six to fifteen degrees below zero, and the snow was so heavy that railroad and telegraphic communication was badly crippled. Much damage to property by the wind and snow is also reported from various points.

Thousands of acres of winter wheat in Kansas and other States are reported to have been ruined by the storm, and it is calculated that the corn and the peach buds were seriously damaged by the storm.

It is said that the Queen, in preparation for her trip to the South of France, has already signed a blank proclamation dispensing with the services of her faithful Commons, which the date to be filled in when the occasion arises for it.

More interesting than politics even, to the English people, is the great strike of the coal miners. Already 400,000 miners are out of work, and it threatens to render 200,000 other workmen idle on account of subsequent strikes.

The foot and mouth disease is spreading alarmingly. Outbreaks are reported in Essex, Sussex, Yorkshire, Lancashire, Renfrewshire and Kent. The Board of Agriculture is alive to the momentous crisis in the cattle trade, which the epidemic threatens, and is taking the most prompt measures to control it. Great distress prevails among the working classes in Lisbon, and the situation grows worse daily. Many are reduced to absolute penury, and every day bread is distributed to great numbers who are starving. The Government is about to start public works to afford employment to the poor.

An accident occurred on the 11th inst., in a colliery near Charleroi, which it is feared will result in a great loss of life. Two hundred miners were employed in the coal-pit when there was a terrific explosion of fire-damp. The pit mouth was rendered unavailable for rescuing the miners. The explosion was at the Anderluis Colliery. The total of the death roll so far is 215. Of this number it is estimated that 170 were burned alive by a fire that broke

The London Freemantle's St. Petersburg correspondent says: "The typhus epidemics are causing terrible mortality in all the famine districts. A lack of doctors, nurses and medicines is complained of. The daughter of General Radetsky, the defender of Shipka Pass, has died of typhus fever, contracted while nursing sick peasants.

The Star is incensed at the incompetence of the Ministers to deal with the famine. The greatest disaster prevails throughout the Empire and is daily increasing. This fact is regarded as evidence of the impossibility of governing from St. Petersburg."

Further measures against the religious sect known as the Sunnists have been taken by the Government. The punishment of offenders against the orthodox faith has been increased, and Sunnists have been forbidden to occupy public posts.

The Governor-General of Canada issued a proclamation on the 12th inst., for the enfranchisement of the Indians of British Columbia.

DIED, at her residence, near Winona, Columbiana Co., Ohio, on the 19th of Second Month, 1892, DOROTHY HOYLE, wife of John Hoyle, in the seventy-ninth year of her age. This dear Friend was firmly attached to the doctrines and testimonies of the Society of Friends, and was concerned to faithfully maintain them in her daily walk amongst men. She often mourned over the departures from the primitive simplicity and purity of our profession. Throughout the course of a lengthy life, she was a diligent attendant of our regular meetings, when health permitted. For several months past she manifested an increased tenderness toward her family—frequently spoke of the uncertainty of life, and it is believed was engaged to have her lamp trimmed and burning. We humbly trust that through redeeming love and mercy, she has been permitted to enter one of those many mansions prepared for the righteous.

—, at her home in Chesterfield, Morgan Co., Ohio on the 20th of Second Month, 1892, ELIZA BRANSON, wife of Dr. Smith Branson, in the sixty-ninth year of her age. She was a member of Chesterfield Monthly and Particular Meetings of Friends, and a diligent attendant when health permitted. She endured a painful illness with much patience and resignation, being from the first impressed with the belief that she would not recover, and her oft-repeated allusions to the change she felt was approaching, have left to her bereaved family and friends the comforting assurance that they may rest as those without hope; but that through adorable mercy, her redeemed spirit has entered into rest.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

1857.—Ninth Month 29th. "I went this morning to the Northern District Meeting; and was led to entreat the young people to give up to the Lord in the day of their visitation, and they would gradually know a worship in the Truth. Joseph who was hated of his brethren, was through faithfulness to his God, prepared to be as a saviour to his father's house, and governor of Egypt; having suffered persecution and imprisonment for standing firm to the Divine will. He could not foresee that which was afar off, respecting himself, but by obedience he was kept in purity, and grew in wisdom; so that his father, on his death-bed, compared him to 'A fruitful bough by a well, whose branches run over the wall: the archers have sorely grieved him, and shot at him, and hated him; but his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong, by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob.' While a lad, he was cruelly treated by his brethren, some of whom would have destroyed him. But he was preserved in the fear of the Lord, and the Lord watched over him; and in process of time, made use of him, when way was to be made to keep the people alive in famine. He became the instrument in the Divine hand, of keeping his father's family in the great dearth which spread over the country. Many young people in finding the guidance of their Saviour, have steadily advanced in religious growth, until, as they grew in years, they have become pillars in the Lord's house, and instruments in his hand to rebuke transgressors, and to draw souls to Christ."

"Tenth Month 15th. At Arch Street Meeting, this morning, the nature and efficacy of true faith were brought before me, and after a time of inward waiting, the impression was felt to rise with the testimony of the 'apostle, that 'By grace are ye saved, through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God; ' also the declaration of the wonderful power of faith, exemplified in the experiences of the holy ancients, who through it, wrought righteousness, stopped the mouths of lions, &c. This faith in God remains to be the same, and it is dispensed to his children by the Captain of their salvation, and becomes their victory, as they follow Him in the regeneration. Mere belief in the truths of the Holy Scriptures, though of inestimable value, is not sufficient, without coming to Christ and receiving life and power from Him. Some were invited to examine themselves, whether anything had drawn them away from the devotion and faithfulness to Christ, which they had known in years past; whether their worldly pursuits had suppressed the love and allegiance they once bore to Him. The obedient ones were encouraged to keep fast hold of the shield of faith, and to put their trust in the Lord, who is as near to his children to preserve and defend them, as He ever was, though they may not perceive it; but in his time, He will manifest himself to their joy and consolation. I trust the power of Truth was felt to be in good measure over the meeting, and I came away in peace.

"Eleventh Month 22d. fervent desires have been almost unremitting, that the Lord would not let me be overcome by any temptation which the evil one may present. I feel the necessity of watching over my thoughts and words, as well as actions, wherever I go; in the street, in the market-house, at the store, at home and in company, lest anything should slip from me that would injure another, or wound my own soul."

"Twelfth Month 8th. My wife and I went to Westtown, and met Friends on the committee.

"9th. In the course of its deliberation, the disposition manifested by some of the scholars, to bring and wear clothing at the school, which is not suitable, as regards plainness, engaged our consideration. It was manifest, that an unabated concern pervaded the committee, to maintain the testimonies of the Society, in conducting this seminary, according to their original standard. The unity and solemnity that spread over us, were comforting and strengthening. It has generally been the case that Friends have been bound together in sweet fellowship, in conducting the affairs of this institution, and in their interest for the best welfare of the children."

"20th. Very unexpectedly, this morning, I felt a pointing to go and sit with the few Friends composing Newton Meeting. It was mournful to see the reduced state of the meeting, and I was brought into sympathy with some, upon whom the weight of holding it mainly rested. The conviction came over me, that some were, at times, clearly convinced of the emptiness and insufficiency of worldly possessions, to give substantial peace; and also of the calls of the Lord to come away from such enjoyments, and give themselves up to serve the Lord, who alone can grant peace, and make them fit to do his will; and as lights in the world, to glorify Him in their day. They were spoken to in the persuasive spirit of the Gospel, to deny themselves, take up the cross and follow their dear Redeemer. The burden-bearers were encouraged to hold on their way faithfully in the discharge of their religious duties. Supplication was made to the Lord to renew his visitations to the rebellious and negligent, and to comfort and strengthen those who are often cast down and afflicted."

1858.—Second Month 1st. "We had a large Quarterly Meeting; many of our young members, and some Friends from the country being at it. Great stillness spread over us. In the second meeting, I felt drawn to call the attention of the young people to the daily reading of the Holy Scriptures, in a serious manner, with their hearts lifted up to their Heavenly Father, to open and apply them to their conditions, by his Spirit in their hearts. The more we are obedient to this Spirit, by which the Lord's will is made known, and by which strength is given to perform it, the more we shall love to read the Scriptures; which were given by inspiration of God, and are able to make wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus. The Holy Spirit will bind us to make use of the means which the Lord has provided for our help in the way and work of salvation; requiring the attendance of our meetings for worship and Discipline, and the support of all our testimonies."

"Third Month 28th. In meeting, this morning, I felt an affectionate draft towards the young people; that they might not give way to the temptation to abandon the path of obedience to their Lord, in the time of close trial. David's testimony was brought to my remembrance: 'The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; He leadeth me beside the still waters; He restoreth my soul. He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake.' 'Surely mercy and goodness shall follow me all the days of my life; and I shall dwell in the house of the Lord forever;' which I was led to revive for their comfort and strength. This has been the experience of the Lord's children in all ages; and as they persevered in following their Shepherd, and the Bishop of their souls, faithfully and in humility, they grew from stature to stature in the Truth; were blessed from youth to old age, and made useful in his church and household; and when the end came, they died in peace and hope of everlasting blessedness."

"Seventh Month 28th. I am convinced, that the vast business into which some enter, is a great departure from the humility and self-denial which become a Christian; and the disposition to overlook this departure, and frame excuses for it, is an evidence that the conscientious obligation, which Friends in the beginning, felt and acted up to, has been much lost among many business men. But I trust the Lord will preserve faithful Friends, and raise up among the young people, those who will be brought, by the convicting power of the Holy Spirit, to keep in moderation, in their trade or business; and therein show the excellency of the religion of the Lord Jesus, and that their eyes are directed to a heavenly inheritance, above everything in this state of being. How has the desire after riches drawn hundreds away from the work of salvation, and a steady walking with God. In this way the glory has departed from many, and the strength and ancient dignity of our religious Society become greatly eclipsed."

"10th. In the Quarterly Meeting held at Concord, this morning, I felt much for the young people, who had given up to serve the Lord, yet were buffeted by the temptations of Satan, and the floods of discouragement which the dragon was casting out of his mouth, if possible to destroy the true seed; and I was led to counsel them to gather inward to the Lord, and He would lift up a standard against the enemy, defend and deliver them. It is through tribulation the righteous enter the kingdom in this life, and in the world to come. The Lord on high is mightier than the noise of many waters; and we have a High Priest touched with a feeling of our infirmities, who knoweth that without Him we can do nothing. He constantly watches over his devoted children; and though at times He hideth his face from them, yet with everlasting kindness and compassion will He have mercy upon them. There is no new way to the kingdom, nor any new doctrine to be preached. It is the same strait gate and narrow way which our fathers entered and walked in; who have been gathered among the spirits of the just made perfect. As we are faithful in a little, we shall be made rulers over more, and by the baptism of the Holy Ghost and fire, be prepared like the wheat, to be gathered into the garner, where none can hurt or annoy us."

"Twelfth Month 12th. In our First-day morning meeting, my mind was clothed with strong desire, that the true spiritual nature and power of the Gospel dispensation, might be more generally and deeply felt among us; bringing all into a fervent travail of soul, to experience the work of regeneration, and more intimate communion with the Father of spirits, than is known by the professors of the Christian name generally. It is said, 'Jesus stood and cried, If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink;' and on another occasion, He said, 'Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst;' that is, for any other; 'But the water that I shall give him, shall be in him a well of water, springing up into everlasting life;' and out of the believer in Him, He declared, 'Shall flow rivers of living water.' He spoke of the Spirit, which they that believe in Him, should receive, after his glorification. And the same disciple that recorded these sayings of his Divine Master, further testifies in the Revelations made to him, 'And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth, say, Come. And let him that is athirst, come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.' I was drawn to show that we are not dependent on man, to obtain the life and spirit, which alone can nourish the soul unto everlasting life; but that it is through the mercy and goodness of the Saviour, the Mediator between our Heavenly Father and our immortal souls, that a measure of his Holy Spirit is granted unto us; by obedience to which, the work of regeneration is effected in us, and the soul thereby renewed up into the image of God, which Adam lost by transgression. Thus we are truly brought into the Gospel dispensation; which is a dispensation of life, and spirit and power; for Christ came, that his 'Sheep might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly.' Hereby we are made members of his mystical body, the church; and as we keep our places, will be ministers of righteousness and of the Spirit. It appeared to me very important that all should thus become worshippers of the Father in spirit and in truth; and though it might be in silence, we would, at times, experience mental prayer and praise, like a cloud of incense, to rise from our assemblies before the throne, which would find acceptance with Him."

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 249.

The history of the reform in the manner of treating insane patients, instituted by Dr. Pinel in Paris and William Tuke in England, furnishes an interesting illustration of the influence that can be exerted by intelligent perseverance in a good cause. The following narrative is extracted from the life of Dorothea L. Dix, herself an untiring laborer in the cause of humanity:

Dr. Philippe Pinel, on receiving in 1792, the appointment of superintendent of the Bicêtre, the asylum for incurable insane males, exclaimed—"Off with these chains! away with these iron cages and brutal keepers! They make a hundred madmen where they cure one. There is another and a better way. The insane man is not an inexplicable monster. He is but one of ourselves, only a little more so. Underneath his wildest paroxysms there is a germ, at least, of rationality and of personal accountability. To believe in this, to seek for it, stimulate it, build it up—here lies the only way of delivering him out of the fatal bondage in which he is held!"

With unflinching persistency did Pinel urge these humane convictions on the Commune, and seek to get authority to try the effect of his scheme on at least one-fourth of his patients. The idea seemed to those he argued with as wildly visionary as a deliberate proposal to go out to the Jardin des Plantes and fling wide the gratings to the jaguars and tigers confined there. At last, however, he persuaded the ferocious Couthon to go with him to the Bicêtre, and consider the problem on the spot. "They were greeted in the gloomy prison by the yells and execrations of three hundred maniacs, mingling the clanking of their chains with the uproar of their voices."

Already had Couthon had long and familiar experience in dealing with the most savage elements of society. But before the proposition now made him he utterly quailed. After looking over the patients, he said to Pinel, "Ah, çà, citoyen, est-tu toi-même de vouloir déchaîner de pareils animaux? (Citizen are you crazy yourself, that you would unchain such beasts?)" Permission, however, to try the mad experiment was finally given, some of the first results of which will be found recorded in the following abridgment of a portion of a memoir, read by the son of Pinel before the Royal Academy of Arts and Sciences:

"Near the close of the year 1792, M. Pinel, having repeatedly importuned the government to issue a decree permitting him to unchain the maniacs at the Bicêtre, went in person to solicit what had been refused to his written representations. With courage and resolution he urged the removal of this cruel abuse. At length, M. Couthon, member of the Commune, yielded to the impudent arguments of Pinel, and consented to meet him at the hospital, to witness these first experiments, as well as to assure himself that this was not a stratagem to give liberty to political offenders.

"Couthon proceeded, himself, to question the patients, but received only abuse and execrations, accompanied by terrible cries and the clanking of chains. Retreating from the damp and filthy cells, he exclaimed to Pinel, 'Do as you will; but you will be sacrificed to this false sentiment of mercy.' Pinel delayed no longer, he selected fifty who he believed might be released from their chains without danger to others. The fetters were removed, first, from twelve, using the precaution of having prepared strong jackets, closing behind, with long sleeves, which could be used if necessary.

"The experiments commenced with an English captain whose history was unknown; he had been in chains forty years! As he was thought to be one of the most dangerous, having killed, at one time, an attendant with a blow from his manacles, the keepers approached him with caution; but first Pinel entered his cell unattended. 'Ah, well, captain, I will cause your chains to be taken off; you shall have liberty to walk in the court if you will promise to behave like a gentleman, and offer no assault to those you will meet.' 'I would promise,' said the maniac, 'but you deride me, you are amusing yourself at my expense; you all fear me, once free.' 'I have six men,' replied Pinel, 'ready to obey my orders; believe me, therefore, I will set you free from this durance, if you will put on this jacket.' The captain assented; the chains were removed, and the jacket laced, the keepers withdrew, without closing the door. He raised himself, but fell; this effort was repeated again and again; the use of his limbs, so long constrained, nearly failed; at length, trembling, and with tottering steps, he emerged from his dark dungeon. His first look was at the sky! 'Ah,' cried he, 'how beautiful!' The remainder of the day he was constantly moving to and fro, uttering continually exclamations of pleasure; he heeded no one: the flowers, the trees, above all, the sky, engrossed him. At night he voluntarily returned to his cell, which had been cleansed and furnished with a better bed; his sleep was tranquil and profound. For the two remaining years which he spent in the hospital he had no recurrence of violent paroxysms, and often rendered good service to the keepers in conducting the affairs of the establishment.

"The patient released next after the captain was Chevinge, a soldier of the French Guards, who had been chained ten years and had been peculiarly difficult of control. Pinel, entering his cell, announced that if he would obey his injunctions he should be chained no longer. He promised, and, following every movement of his liberator, executed his directions with alacrity and address. Never in the history of human mind, was exhibited a more sudden and complete revolution; he executed every order with exactness; and this patient, whose best years had been sacrificed in a gloomy cell, in chains and misery, soon showed himself capable of being one of the most useful persons about the establishment. He repeatedly, during the horrors of the Revolution, saved the life of his benefactor. On one occasion he encountered a band of "sans culottes," who were bearing Pinel to the Lanterne, owing to his having been an elector in 1789. "With bold and determined purpose he rescued his beloved master, and caused that life to be spared which had been so great a blessing to the insane in France.

"In the third cell were three Prussian soldiers, who had been for many years in chains, but how or for what they had been committed, none knew; they were not dangerous, and seemed capable of enjoying the indulgence of living together. They were terrified at the preparations for their release, fearing new se-verities awaited them. Sunk into dementia, they were indifferent to the freedom offered.

"An aged priest came next; he fancied himself to be the Messiah. Taunted once with the exclamation, that if in truth he was Christ he could break his chains, he answered with solemnity, 'Frustra tentas Dominum tuum.' Religious excitement had characterized his life. On foot he had made pilgrimages to Rome and Cologne; he had had a voyage to the Western world to convert savage tribes. This ruling idea passed into mania, and returning to France, he declared that he was Christ, the Saviour. He was arrested on the charge of blasphemy, and taken before the Archbishop of Paris, by whose decree he was consigned to the Bicêtre, as either a blasphemer or a madman. Loaded with heavy chains, he for twelve years bore patiently, sarcasm and cruel sufferings. Pinel had the happiness to witness his recovery in less than a year, and to discharge him from the hospital, cured."

"In the short period of a few days, Pinel released from their chains more than fifty maniacs, men of various ranks and conditions—merchants, lawyers, priests, soldiers, laborers—thus rendering the furious tractable, and creating peace and contentment, to a wonderful degree, where long the most hideous scenes of tumult and disorder had reigned."

It was in 1796, only four years after Pinel's first experiment in the Bicêtre, and entirely independently of any knowledge of his work, that a precisely similar reform was inaugurated in England—this time not by a physician, but by a member of the Society of Friends, William Tuke, a merchant of ample fortune and great benevolence and force of character. In building with his own means "The Retreat," at York, and retaining the absolute control of its policy in his own hands, he prepared a suitable place for a fair trial of the new method he proposed.

It was by no mere chance, as men call chance, that this great reform in England sprang from the mind and heart of a member of the Society of Friends. The leading tenet of the Quakers, was one that logically led to just such an experiment as this, as likewise to invincible faith in its success. No other religious sect in Christendom had accumulated, and transmitted through inheritance to their children, so great a mass of testimony as to the power of gentleness, patience, and inward self-control to evolve rational order out of the chaos of warring human passions. William Tuke had the moral greatness to see with perfect clearness, and to pursue with heroic persistence, one luminous conviction, namely, that precisely the same moral and physical regimen which has proved itself the only power adapted to quicken, mature, and firmly establish the elements of reason and self-government in ourselves and our children, is the sole regimen that can be trusted to do the like for the feeble and more sorely beset elements of the same essential reason in these poor afflicted ones.

"His feeling that something should be done had been strengthened by a visit he had paid to St. Luke's Hospital, where he saw the patients lying on straw and in chains. He was distressed by the scene, and could not help believing that there was a more excellent way. . . . One day, in the family circle, conversation turned on the name that should be given to the proposed institution. 'The Retreat,' quickly replied the good wife. 'What's in a name? Everything at times. It was at once seen that feminine instinct had solved the question, and the name was adopted, to convey the idea of what such an institution should be, namely, a place in which the unhappy might obtain a refuge; a quiet haven in which the shattered bark might find the means of reparation or of safety."*

"In person," writes a contemporary of William Tuke, "he hardly reached the middle size, but was erect, portly, and of a fine step. He had a noble forehead, an eagle eye, and a commanding voice, and his mien was dignified and patriarchal." Like all pioneers in the struggle of human progress, he had to encounter his full share of ridicule, obloquy, and opposition. In the end, however, he triumphed, and "The Retreat at York" became a beacon light of the world, shining through the dark night of one of the gloomiest chapters of human history.

Philippé Pinel and William Tuke: these, then, were the two original minds that inaugurated a new epoch in the history of the treatment of insanity, an epoch as revolutionary in character within this special realm as that of the Copernican system in the realm of astronomy. It implied an absolute reversal of all previous conceptions; the substitution in the place of restraint and force, of the largest possible degree of liberty; the abandonment of the whole previous idea of brute subjection for that of the emancipation of the reason and the enhancement of the sense of personal responsibility. Each one of these remarkable men achieved his task uninformed of the action of the other.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Criticisms on Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

THE FRIEND of Fourth Month 7, 1860, contains the following in its editorial columns:

"The time has come when those who are mourning as in secret places, should come forth and show upon whose side they are, bearing an unflinching testimony for the truth, and against this modern heresy, and plainly proclaiming to the world that those who embrace or countenance it are not Friends, but apostates from the faith of the Society."

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting on many occasions in the last thirty years has lifted up a standard for the Truth on subjects bearing upon the defections of the day, and these changes of the Discipline may be classed among them. It would be a satisfaction thus to rest with a statement of the faithful efforts of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, in opposing the defections which have developed in the last fifty years, but it would be as misleading to convey the impression that all the members of it were in harmony and consistent with its sound official actions and advices, as that all the members of defective meetings are in unison with them. And an acknowledgment of the existence of causes of possible decline cannot in candor be omitted.

Our Society has never known a period when there was not cause of suffering because of unfaithfulness, and the present age is no exceptional period on this account; for, great as have been the labors and exercises of faithful Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to preserve the flock from destruction, and often as they have spoken with no uncertain sound, there are many evidences of weakness amongst us which need not the pens of others to bring to our notice.

No doubt acknowledgments of weaknesses might be made in all bodies claiming the name of Friends; but we need not take satisfaction in this for whatever declining tendencies are prevailing amongst ourselves.

Perhaps in doctrines and principles we have succeeded in maintaining our ground in a good degree, throughout the past forty or fifty years, which is cause for thankfulness, although views are said to be published amongst us without apparent restriction, much in accordance with the new views of other Yearly Meetings.

Again, we are told that "Philadelphia Yearly Meeting now has some associations established within its limits, which were almost unknown thirty-two years ago, but which tend to draw individuals into much creatively activity, without waiting for the leadings of the Lord's Holy Spirit, as Friends ought to do in all their religious performances." The associations alluded to were not established by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, nor have they any official connection with it.

Useful services may be engaged in without invoking too high a claim for the service; also our reason, and our humanity, and citizenship, might be too lightly esteemed, and incumbent duties be neglected; for, as a beloved Friend and minister once observed, "We are not to expect a revelation to tell us to eat our dinner and thus become Ranters," but on the other hand, there is cause to fear that religious services are undertaken without the preparatory experience and the call from the spirit, which Friends believe are essential for a furtherance of the Master's cause and work in the earth.

There is some ground for believing, that the same regard which the last generation held for the provisions of our Book of Discipline, does not obtain at the present time, for although many of our members are convinced that his advices and regulations are in harmony with the doctrines and principles we profess, there is, nevertheless, a growing feeling that it contemplates a plane of religious life and conduct, which cannot be generally maintained and need not be attempted in the present age.

It is true, that the spirit of the Discipline is not in keeping with the age, or rather the age is not in keeping with the spirit of the Discipline. It contemplates a maintenance of principles, support of testimonies, circumspection in daily life and conversation, and even caution in trade and business unacceptable to the spirit of the age, notwithstanding the many acknowledgments which are made as the years go by, of the sufferings and lapses which would have been avoided if the advices had been more closely studied and followed.

Probably every one sees clearly how others should support everything in the Discipline which he or she approves of, and yet considers that there are points in it which he or she cannot unite sincerely with, to support; and probably every one has seen some occasion in their lives when they felt easy to disregard some requirement of it, and yet the point to which exception has been felt has no doubt greatly varied in different individuals.

As a result of this chafing of the spirit of the age, there is an increasing desire for changes in some of the provisions and regulations of the Discipline; but whether changing the Discipline in the direction of less circumspect conformity to our professions, will be of advantage to the church, or whether new regulations would be more faithfully maintained, when inconvenient to observe, are matters for which there are reasonable grounds for doubt.

Touching the subject of marriage, it is generally conceded among all religious denominations that marriages of their members with those of other denominations are adverse to the welfare of that society, and to the religious growth of the individuals themselves.

In many sections of our Society mixed marriages have long been allowed without resulting in such general advantages as to commend the liberty granted, but there is reason to fear that in our own Yearly Meeting the disposition to discourage such marriages as decidedly as our present Discipline enjoins, is weakening.

With our profession of religion there is apparently too often an association of worldliness, and a distaste for the plain and simple ways of our profession, and whether we are always consistent in discouraging among our own members what we have condemned in strangers coming amongst us, is worthy of quiet and impartial consideration.

The occupancy of important stations, and the participation in the work of Meetings for Discipline, and the engaging in religious service, was in former years more confined to persons who lived consistently with our Profession and were more imbued with the religious weight contemplated in the advices of Discipline, than it is to be feared prevails at the present time.

Many among us have too much love for our religious Society and its associations, to forsake them, but have too much love for the pleasures and attractions outside of them, to be consistent members of the Society, and thus, through lukewarmness, independence, or indifference, the church loses the aid and support of many who might have been a source of strength to those who labor in the harvest-field, and the individuals might, through faithfulness and obedience to conviction, have attained a far greater spiritual experience themselves.

From our own circles we learn that we are not clear of the encouragement of music amongst us, but that musical instruments are in many houses, and parents are having their children instructed in the use of them, and that some members have attended at concerts, and there is reason to fear there has even been participation in the performances.

A love of music is an infatuation of the age, cultured though its nature may be, which is seriously injuring the community, and, in gaining the hold it has amongst us, may result in effects not fully appreciated by those who lend themselves to its influence.

Preposterous as is the thought, that with the doctrines of Friends as to what spiritual worship is acceptable to the Father in Heaven, we should present as worship mechanical results of instruments, or the trained modulations of the human voice; the step from family entertainment to the offering of music and singing in family devotion or so-called family worship, is a very short one, and its extension from family to meeting-houses in other places has often been quickly accomplished.

Whether this will ever come to the Society of Friends in Philadelphia will depend on the faithfulness of the members and their ability to withstand the insidious lullings of this mental intoxicant.

Other subjects of concern and anxiety might be enumerated, but it is not an agreeable research to probe our weaknesses. All may know in their quiet moments how far they are in harmony with the standard of the Society, if they desire truthfully to inquire in the secret of their hearts.

The faithful members can only maintain the work committed to them while the strength of their day shall last, and as they continue faithful to the cause of their Master. Those who do not co-operate, will, in measure, frustrate or mar the work and perhaps bring sorrow upon themselves.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"
RAIN-BOUND.

BY MARY ALLEN STEVENSON.

Yes, we've read our Whittier's "Snow-Bound,"

Amidst his native hills;
And, still later, beauteous "Ice-Bound,"
By our dear Ohio's rills.

And these lays, so full of merit,
Still we hear in magic strains;
And I wish they viewed our "Rain-Bound,"
On the southern Kansas plains.

Though such talents are denied us,
As "The Thousand Poets" wield;
Yet with humbler ones we enter,
With our Rain-Bound, on the field.

Now the rain has fallen, fallen,
Two long days and nights as well;
And our prairies all are spotted
With small lakes that wider swell.

While the lovely, calm Spring River,
Has become a torrent grand;
Rushing o'er its rocky pathway,
Overflowing banks and land.

Here it joins another river,
In its south and westward flight;
And they madly foaming, boiling,
Hide the glittering falls from sight.

But our Rain-Bound is forgotten,
For the river knows no stay;
And we turn our faces homeward,
This dark, dismal, dripping day.

And, as thence we take our journey,
We at last our theme desist;
By the roadside, wet and Rain-Bound,
A poor, abject group we spy.

Through the storm, half-starved and frozen,
They have plodded, till at length,
Their lean ponies (weak though willing),
Falter now, for lack of strength.

But the poor man, looking forward,
Longs to reach that promised land
Now so near his sight—but torments
Bid him halt, with stern command.

Blighted hopes and expectations,
These sad faces now portray;
For they're sick, and weak and hungry;
Starring, Rain-Bound on their way.

Women peering from the wagon,
Where is heard an infant's wail;
Looking more fit for bed or coffin,
Than in such a storm to quail.

Scanty fire from one small log,
Lights their tiny stove, for heat;
While oft sentient fare and raiment,
Show their want from head to feet.

Oft we see these fortune seekers,
With their herds of many a head;
While with few their only "Bessie"
Labors in a pony's stead.

Think not this a mind-drawn picture;
'Tis but one of hundreds more;
Who thus traverse o'er our prairies,
Western homesteads to secure.

Some "Dame Fortune" treats most kindly,
To repay their bitter lot;
While with others, disappointment
Mocks them ere they reach the spot.

And they turn away despondent,
From "the poor man's" only hope;
To retrace their dismal journey,
Though less fit with ills to cope.

Never to know home-born comforts,
Thus their dreary lives are past.

In their search for "land of promise"
May they gain a home at last.

Now, when "Snow" or "Ice" or Rain-Bound,
Our warm fires and homes invite;
Let us think of those less favored,
Who are Rain-Bound thus to-night.

SELECTED.

WHEN TO SAY "NO."

"No" is a very little word;
In one short breath we say it—
Sometimes 'tis wrong, but often right;
So let me justly weigh it.
"No" I must say when asked to swear,
And "No" when asked to gamble;
"No" when strong drink I'm urged to share;
"No" to a Sunday ramble!

"No," though I'm tempted sore to lie
Or steal, and then conceal it;
And "No" to sin when darkness hides,
And I alone should feel it.
Whenever sinners would entice
My feet from paths of duty.
"No," I unhesitatingly cry—
"No, not for price or booty."

God watches how this little word
By every one is spoken,
And knows those children as his own,
By this one simple token.
Who promptly utter "No" to wrong,
Says "Yes" to right, as surely—
That child has entered wisdom's ways,
And trends her path securely.

—Golden Hours.

A Little Story.

Four stalwart men sat around the fire in the old homestead in Connecticut. They had come home for a family reunion, bringing their wives with them. They were all on the bright side of thirty-five, and altogether a "very likely" set—honest, upright, industrious, Christian. Their mother, a vigorous woman for her years, welcomed them, and could not do enough for them to make their home-coming pleasant. Their father had been many years dead.

One of the daughters-in-law, in moving around the room, paused at the window to look out on the landscape. It was snowing heavily, but there was no wind. Across the road that ran past the house she saw a big wood-pile, and at the wood-pile was a woman using the axe. She looked more closely; it could not be her husband's mother! She looked again through the blinding flakes. Yes, certainly it was the mother of these four stalwart men.

She crossed the room to where her husband was sitting, led him to the window, pointed toward the wood-pile, only saying:
"John, look at your mother!"

John quickly got his hat and went to his mother's aid, while his wife pondered on what had made her wonder through many years. John was kind, true, a "good provider," a just man; but he allowed his wife, unless she protested against it, to bring in the wood, to split the kindling, to wade through the snow in hanging out her clothes, to do any kind of hard, rough work she saw her do, while he sat quietly by the fire and saw her do it.

She had trained him, in a measure, to do his part of the chores and relieve her, and when she saw his old mother splitting wood in the snow-storm, rather than call on her sons to do it, she understood how her troubles had come about. The mother had not brought up her boys to be considerate and helpful, and to do their part in the general work of the household.

One of The Impossible Things.

By WILLIAM C. WILKINSON.

To secure obedience from your children or your pupils to another than yourself. "Not transferable" is the brand of Nature on every kind of personal influence or authority. There are some impossible things, however, which it is well to attempt. But it is not well for a father to attempt transferring the authority by which he succeeds in getting himself obeyed to any other person whatever, not even to the mother. It is not well for a principal teacher to attempt to make his assistant obeyed by his scholars. It is not simply impossible because it is so difficult; rather, it is impossible because it is contrary to nature. It had better not even be attempted.

True, it is exceedingly important that mothers should be obeyed by their children. And it is exceedingly important that assistant teachers should be obeyed by their pupils. But the faculty of authority, the capacity to command, is an original gift. It cannot be imparted. It cannot be simulated. There is an infallible instinct by which those who are to be governed recognize those who are to govern them. It is instinctive to obey when the right person bids. If the mother has the natural gift of authority she will be obeyed by her children. If not, not. No intervention of the father will avail on her behalf if that natural gift be wanting. If the father be present he may, to be sure, enforce the mother's requirement; but it is then not the mother but the father that the child obeys. Watch if, in the father's absence, the child is at all more obedient on the next occasion to the mother. The father's interference to attempt making the mother's authority respected will serve only to render her infirmity more painfully evident to the child. It will surely in the end diminish instead of increasing, the child's disposition to obey. The same thing holds true of the several relations between principal and assistant teachers and their pupils.

Hardly any person can be imagined more irritating to children than to be subjected to the management of persons disposed to demand but incapable of commanding obedience. Mothers that are not endowed with the original gift of authority would do more wisely not to attempt to exercise authority. It only exasperates without subduing. A better way is to win influence with the woman's and the mother's beautiful arts of affectionate persuasion. Influence may be more or less effectual. It may grow from less to more. But authority is completely effectual or it is worthless. It seldom changes in amount except to become less and less.

At all events it is an axiom—a first principle never to be brought into question—that one person cannot cause a second person to be obeyed by a third.—The Independent.

In our present age, light within, a law within, spirit within, Christ within, is the scoffing of some, and little regarded by many; but whether they know it or not, I must tell them, they scoff and slight the chiefest treasure that ever the soul of any man was possessed of; they slight the talent that God hath given to every man to improve, in order to our rising from our fall, and returning to our native country, to live under the government of the eternal spirit; whosoever is without spirit and light within, is without God in the world. Take away this treasure, and we shall have nothing in us that is good, we shall be left quite graceless.—Hugh Turford.

Oriental Lesson-Lights.

"Come Ye to the Waters."—Who that has ever sat under the ragged shelter of bamboo and matting, that feebly attempts to afford a screen from the sun's rays in an Eastern bazaar, remembers not the sonorous and ceaseless cry of the water-bearer, as he perambulates the narrow streets? "Ho! every one that is athirst, come, drink water; come, drink sherbet, the price is naught, the water is good. Praise be Allah! the sherbet is good. In the name of the prophet, come, buy and drink!" Thus, with Oriental dignity in his gait, the water-bearer steps along, a goat-skin bottle of water slung on his left shoulder, with the neck or mouth hanging down in front, and often a jar or keg of sherbet strapped on his right side, and a drinking-vessel in his hand. For the smallest of Turkish coins,—for a para,—he pours forth his refreshing draught, which no good Moslem quaffs without giving praise to Allah. To such a purveyor the prophet here compares himself. He stands in some conspicuous spot in the great thoroughfare of life, and calls on the passers-by, wearied and worn with the heat of the way. He invites their attention to the refreshment they so much need, of which he assures them there is a goodly supply at hand, so that they may, if they will, "Taste, be thankful, and pass on." But he bids them drink freely, unlike the sherbet-seller, without money and without price. The wine and milk, in the days of Isaiah, would take the place of the sherbet, the sweet-flavored and slightly acid non-intoxicating drink of the modern Moslem.

"Wherefore Do Ye Spend [Hebrew, "weigh"] Money for that which is Not Bread?"—Here again we are reminded of Oriental customs. Money was not counted; it was weighed. In fact, it could not be counted; for the ancients had no coins, in our sense of the word, before the time of the Persian monarchy. Darius Hystaspes (B. C. 521) is the first monarch who is known to have issued a coinage; and his "darics," as they are called, both gold and silver, are well known. They are only stamped on one side, and bear a figure of the king kneeling, and bending a bow. Before this, the nearest approach to our idea of coinage were the stamped weights used in Babylonia and Egypt. These are found in the very earliest period of Egyptian and Babylonian civilization. The shekel was the recognized weight, and pieces of silver—it might be bars, as in China, ingots, or, as in Africa, rings of metal—were weighed in the balance. The custom of weighing the purchase-money in any transaction has come down to our own times. So varied and confused is the coinage in the East, and so clipped and mutilated are even the best coins (for the filling off of small portions of each piece is a habitual practice with dishonest traders), that it is impossible to ascertain the true value unless by weight.—H. B. Tristram, in the S. S. Times.

RESTRAINT is one of the essentials of the right training of others, as well as the right training of one's self. But no one is ever incited to good action by simple self-restraint, or by having restrictions imposed upon him by some one else. It is often said that children brought up very strictly are sure to burst their bonds in time and quickly go astray. And it is true that nothing is more dispiriting to a child than the consciousness that his parents make no other effort to help him to do right than hindering him from doing wrong. Many a parent acts as if his duty to his child were completed in the use of the word "don't;" and many a child is thereby left to dodge blindly about among the innumerable negations or prohibitions without being furnished with any positive principle to guide him out through the maze toward the open road of righteousness. Let any parent who has erred in this matter of incessant "don't-ing," or nagging, try the experiment of saying "don't" to himself before he says "don't" to his child. Then let him try the experiment of sympathetically helping the child onward toward the right, instead of exclusively restricting him from the wrong. It is pretty certain that he will find that he and the child will come closer together, and that together they will move onward and upward.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

British Canadian Travel.

The average first-class traveller across the British American possessions west of Canada finds his experiences closely narrowed to the strip of country traversed by the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railroad.

This huge artery of travel has as yet sent out few branches into the vast adjacent territory, and for hundreds of miles passes through an uninhabited wilderness of plain and mountain, possessing nothing to tempt or feed the tourist's curiosity beyond the range of an observation car. A narrative of one's experiences in this trans-continental journey rarely shifts the scene more than a mile north or south of the railroad, and I can think of no better way to introduce and acquaint you with the subject in this paper than by making copious extracts from my diary and note-book.

My British Canadian journey may be said to have begun when I took the Puget Sound steamer Olympian, for Victoria, B. C. About an hour before sunset on the 20th of Eighth Month, 1891, the Olympian left her wharf at Seattle, and, seated on the upper deck, I bade my first adieu to the States across the rose-tinted waters of the Sound.

Seattle, the five-year wonder of the West, is, like Tacoma, built in a sheltered, hilly arm of the bay, surrounded on all sides by splendid snow and firland mountain ranges, of which you get grand views from the lofty parts of the city.

Everything seemed to contribute in making my adieu to the United States a pleasant and inspiring one; the sun, the full moon, the sky, clouds, snow peaks, hills and shores made the most memorable sunset picture I ever saw. It is impossible to exaggerate the magnificent color effects of Puget Sound sunsets. I watched the boat drive through till midnight, then went to bed on the floor, with satchel as my pillow, but slept little. Got to Victoria about 3:30 A. M. So quiet a place of its size we have not in America. It has 15,000 inhabitants, but I wandered about its dark, deserted streets after a four o'clock breakfast, till five, seeing no man. Then a stray Chinaman with half-grown pig slung on a pole, tottered along a cross street.

Victoria is the sleepest place of a morning one can imagine possible, so near Seattle. The people here sit up very late, which perhaps accounts for it. The town was very lively indeed when I came down Main Street to board the Yosemite for Vancouver, at 1 A. M.

While not decidedly so, Victoria is more English-like than Vancouver; one-half of its population are unmistakably Britishers. Canadian and United States money here are on a par. When I paid for my breakfast I got a Canadian quarter or "two-bit" piece, a United States nickel and dime, and a Canada ten-cent piece in exchange for a Bland dollar. The soil around Victoria is much of it very good, but stony, and the general appearance of the country and vegetation similar to the best parts of New England. English writers say it resembles many parts of the motherland, not only in this respect, but that the climate during the year is almost identical with the English, without its terrible fogs. There is some farming and gardening done in the surrounding country, and the grazing of sheep and cattle is considerable, but for some unaccountable reason Victoria largely depends on California for her supplies of fruit and vegetables. The live people of the city are Yankees and Chinamen, whose enterprise, curbed by the soberness, slowness and solidity of the English, makes it a safer average place for investment or settlement than other of the Pacific coast cities at the present time. On the 21st took boat Yosemite about midnight for Vancouver; got a good berth on a cushion seat in the cabin, waking at 5 A. M., just as the sun burst up across St. George's Bay. Went outside and writ foregoing, in view of the quiet spread of the waters, blue, snow-tipped mountains and azure sky. But for those high white flashes of snow, the low foam-wake of the steamer and the dim sierra of confronting mountains, we would seem not floating here but to glide through an ethereal medium.

The breakfast gong puts a momentary stop to such thoughts; but now, as we round a picturesque point of rocks and drive into the reluctant fog, it is intensified. At twenty minutes of eight we plunge into a destructive-looking fog bank—seem to be driving on rocks—turn to right by a beautiful promontory, and over the tree tops see the spires of Vancouver.

A tea-shop is unloading in the land-locked harbor. But we have had no breakfast, and leaving the crowded wharves with their medley of Japs, Chinamen, fish crows, gulls and indians I seek a restaurant. I am surprised to see no solicitation on the part of hackmen. They have a beseeching look, that's all. The English observe more propriety in public than Americans. Like Victoria, Vancouver is a very quiet place, big, overgrown city that it is, and terminal too of the great trans-continental route between Asia and Europe. It boasts 15,000 people, many of whom are absent. In 1886 the site of Vancouver was occupied by a dense forest. At present it contains squares of splendid buildings, which, owing to the present depression of values in the northwest, are practically tenantless. You may look down some streets for squares and possibly see there one wagon and a half-dozen of men. This is all the more noticeable from the size and number of the business houses towering along the streets.

Either these English do very little business, or they have a sly, quiet way of doing it, totally unlike the bluster and din of the Yankee merchant.

There are plenty of typical Englishwomen in Vancouver. We have nothing in the States in the line of robust, springing, energetic womanhood, that compares favorably with John Bull's daughters, except, as I have always said, in Frisco, where live the statelyest, healthfullest, handomest lot of women in the world.

I am writing this on False Creek bridge, which connects the island (for such it is), on which the city stands, with the main-land. A pair of loving young Indians are staring at me as they pass by. Fish crows wheel about my suspicious head and clamorously light on the mussel-flats by the bridge, and a cool, salt air from across the snowy mountains and intervening bay blows full in the face its joyous exhilaration. They are burning the woods on the other side. That's the way to clear land where, despite myriad saw-mills and charcoal burners, timber is a burden to the real estate man and speculator, and the bane of northwest agriculture. It is here, as at Tacoma and Seattle, an ever-rising smoke among the tree-laden suburbs and ever-rising houses in the denuded town lots. Not a tree of the splendid spruce, hemlock and pine forest dare they leave standing alone, for so shallow-rooted are these stately evergreens, the first gale sends them to earth when they have lost the shelter and support of their comrades. So rare is it to find native deciduous trees in this country, the people seem to forget to plant them, and these new-born cities of the West present in consequence a most bare, unlovely look to an Eastern man. The cost of completely clearing a piece of timber land for gardening or building purposes, often exceeds $250 per acre. The finest logs from this may be worth $50 per acre; but unless near the water they are worthless, and are burnt. The stumps, often twelve feet high, and as many in diameter, are blown to pieces with dynamite. Fir logs 300 feet long and averaging six feet in diameter throughout are frequently found. Before the late reaction in business and the South American revolutions, the saw-mills here did an immense business, six or eight vessels often loading at once for foreign and domestic ports.

Eighth Month 22d. After breakfast, wishing to post a letter, I am suddenly reminded as I stick the United States stamp to it, that I am in a foreign country; so I go to the post-office, ask the clerk for a stamp large enough to carry a message over the border, and give her a dime. She says it is three cents, gives me a three-cent stamp with the Jubilee Queen on it, two one-cent stamps, ditto, and a nickel. Now, such a thing as a penny or cent is not so much as named among the people in the "boom" country, from Texas all around the southern and western border to Winnipeg. If the small boy of these regions wants a stick of candy he begs a nickel and gets five. Penny newspapers are out of the question, and buying a postal card means getting a block of five, or two two-cent stamps, by way of change. They have copper nines out there but no coppers. I received, as special token of regard, a Canadian penny from a gentleman at Banff, who said he had carried it for years.

This afternoon walked out through Stanley Park to a rustic-seated promontory of English Bay and look back on the track to Victoria. The far-away mountains and more distant flocks of snow that shroud Mount Baker, present a dark, undulating margin between the water and the sky. A real Song-Sparrow gives a mid-air somersault and song-burst among the bushes, and a bona fide fish Hawk sails along shore in querulous anxiety for her young. The first reminds me of native land, the second of home, third of America. I turn; at my back stands the dark forest, revealing those unmistakable characters which are found alone on the American shores of the Pacific Ocean.

The famous forests of the Cascades, seen superficially, appear stunted by the immensity of their expanse and surroundings, but enter them and be undecieved.

The taller firs range from 200 to 300 feet in height, and in a primeval forest untouched by axe or fire there are few below 250 feet. Owing to the thick shade, perennial dampness and general climate of this region, the virgin forests present a scene of lavish, superabundant growth strongly reminding one of the tropics.

2:20 P. M. Train of the Canadian Pacific Railroad is just moving out, and for the first time since Third Month 26th, I set face eastward and homeward. It is nearly 3,000 miles to Montreal, and the longest railway line in the world lies between this spot and home.

The Canadian Pacific was begun in 1868 by the Canadian Government. Owing to the rugged, unexplored nature of much of the country and the political corruption finally creeping into the management and giving of contracts the Government, in 1881, handed over the concern to a company of capitalists. Several hundred miles of railway had long been in operation in Eastern Canada. The continuation of this had been carried on by the Government to Lake Winnipeg, and another section of 213 miles built from Vancouver eastward to Kamloops, in British Columbia. The new Company undertook to build the remaining two thousand miles, receiving from the Government a number of privileges and immunities, with twenty-five million dollars in money and twenty-five million acres of agricultural land.

The last rail of the completed line was laid at Eagle Pass, in the Gold Range of British Columbia, in Eleventh Month, 1883, the Company then controlling 4,300 miles of track. The earnings of the road in 1889 were sixteen millions of dollars, with profits of six millions.

The Lost Boy.

From a letter of Samuel Baker, at Hoshangabad we gather the following:—Little Lal lived at Itarsi, a town in Central India. When he was quite a little boy he was out playing near his mother. He had not much clothing on; but his mother was proud of her boy, and had put some jewellery on his hands, legs and neck, so that he might look well. A fakir happened to come that way, and seeing the ornaments, thought "Here is a prize for me!" So poor little Lal was carried off by this religious beggar, and together they wandered about the country till at last they were far away from Itarsi. Sometimes people would come to the little lad and ask him his name and where he lived. At first he would tell them as much as he could, but as he grew bigger he thought it was best to say nothing about it, and when people asked him who his father was, he pretended not to know. So at last the fakir thought he had forgotten all about his home and his friends, and as he wanted to go a long way by train, he thought it would be safe to take Lal, who had now grown to be quite a big boy, with him past Itarsi, the station for Lal's home. When they got to the station from which they were to start, Lal asked a porter what places they were passing on the way to Cawnpore, and finding that Itarsi, where his own home was, would be one, he made up his mind to get free if he could when they got there. On the way he kept asking the passengers when they would come to Itarsi, and at last they got there. They had to wait here, so Lal and the fakir got out and went together a little beyond the station. "Now," said the boy, "this is my home. My father's name is La-j-i-Mal, and I mean to go and find him." The fakir got frightened, and began to talk sharply to the boy, so that people passing by stopped to watch, and there was soon a little crowd. And then one and another recognized Lal, though he had grown bigger, and he knew some of them. The police came along and said that both the fakir and Lal would have to go to the police-station. The fakir said that the boy belonged to him, while Lal declared that he had been stolen away when he was a little boy, and now he had got back to his own home. Some of his old playmates were brought, and he was able to tell their names. But when his mother came, Lal had grown so big, and his hair was so long, just as the fakirs wear it, that she did not feel sure. But she knew that her boy had two marks, one on his body, and the other on his head, and if Lal had these marks, then he was her Lal. They found the marks, and the mother owned her son. Then said the boy, "Follow me, and I will lead you to my home." So a great crowd set out from the police-station, Lal leading the way, police following, and keeping back the people. He soon brought them to the old house, and then, sitting down as if to claim it as his own, he told them all about his having been stolen, and showed them the well where he was playing when the fakir came and took him away. Lal's father was so joyful that he said he would not punish the fakir. He had feared he would never see his boy again, and it was so glad that the fakir did not kill poor little Lal for the sake of the jewellery, as often happens. In his great love for his son he forgot the wrong done to him by the fakir, and his heart had no room except for joy and thankfulness that his long-lost boy was found. He felt poor like the father who said "This my son was dead and is alive again; he was lost, and is found."—The London Friend.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

On the Wrong Side.

Many years ago a meeting was held at a certain town in Scotland, to consider what ought to be done to check the drunkenness of the place, at which a very eminent and godly minister of one of the churches in the locality occupied the chair and addressed the meeting as follows:

"We are met in very solemn circumstances. You know how very drunken the population of his place has become, and we must do something to arrest the tide that is coming in so wofully and strong. Now, I do not believe in extreme measures, or in those who can take drink moderately sacrificing their moderate use of it, but still we are met together to consult in such a way, that while we reserve all our rights, we may yet stay the evil that is setting in."

"That's right," said a drunken man in the meeting, "you are on our side, minister." The good man stood up with a face as white as paper, and, looking at the drunkard, said, "Well, if I am on your side, I am on the wrong side, and I am a total abstainer from this hour."

Poisonous Secretions of Toads.—That Shakespeare was correct in saying that the toad swears venom is claimed by some correspondents of the Lancet who states that the toad does secrete a venom of a tolerably powerful character. Instead of this secretion taking place, as in the case of snakes, entirely through the salivary glands, it is actually secreted by the skin, so that the word "sweated" is most accurately descriptive. This secretion, Dr. Guthrie states, also occurs in the toad through the parotid glands, the venom being a thick, milky fluid, like the juice of dandelion stalks in taste and appearance. When injected under the skin, it kills small birds in six minutes, and dogs and guinea-pigs in half an hour to an hour and a half. The symptoms in birds are loss of co-ordination followed by death: In guinea-pigs convulsions; and in the dog depression, vomiting and intoxication. Dr. Guthrie kept a small toad in a cage with some lizards, and one of them, having bitten the toad, became convulsed and died in less than two minutes. His dog having seized a toad was attacked by instantaneous and profuse salivation, violent vomiting, and collapse. He also noticed that the venom has a most powerful local action on the skin, so that after carrying a toad in his hand it tingled and felt numb, with slight swelling and dryness of the skin, which lasted for several hours.

The Discoloration of Water.—One of the most remarkable instances of discoloration of sea water is reported from Port Jackson, the harbor of Sydney, N.S.W. Suddenly the water presented in places the color of blood. This was found to be due to the invasion or rapid development of a microscopic Glenodinium, which in the course of a few days destroyed half of the shore animals. Nearly all the bivalves in the place which it affected died—the oyster beds being seriously injured, mainly, it is believed, owing to the molluscs having swallowed it in that uncritical fashion in which a graping shell-fish take in what is good, bad and indifferent, though the sea, fortunately, seldom contains anything noxious to the life it nourishes. This observation may explain the sudden disappearance of oysters from localities where they formerly abounded.—Public Opinion.

A Chinese Hospital.—There is in Brooklyn, No. 45 Hicks Street, a Chinese hospital with a Chinese resident physician, Chinese Christian nurses, but projected and cared for by American Christians. It is hard to get a Chinaman into an ordinary hospital, and the Chinamen themselves have a prejudice against these institutions. This hospital, however, though only thirteen months old, has had sixty-two patients, and has made such an impression upon the Chinamen themselves that the Chinese merchants in New York have voluntarily given $1,330 of the $2,900 expended for its support. The resident physician is the first Chinese graduate of an American medical school. The hospital is non-sectarian, and deserves to be appreciated.

Testimony of J. G. Whittier.—The British Friend prints the following letter, addressed to its new editor, William E. Turner, by our friend J. G. Whittier:

"MY DEAR FRIEND:—I have been an attentive and interested reader of the British Friend; and I have reason to believe that in thy hands it will continue to be the principles and testimonies of the Society of Friends, especially the doctrine of the Divine Immanence, the inward Word and Teacher, the root doctrine of Quakerism, without which the Society has no right to exist as a distinct body.

"There are unmistakable indications, at the present time, that many professing with us are abandoning, or holding loosely this vital doctrine, and it seems important that a Friend's journal should speak with no uncertain voice in regard to it.

"The life-long mission of George Fox was to proclaim this great truth; and as he pointed to the witness of it in the hearts of his hearers, multitudes were led to embrace it; and I cannot doubt, that if as faithfully maintained in this day, it would find a response in the spiritual yearnings of many, not only within our own pale, but in other denominations, who in this time of unrest and enquiry, are turning to this doctrine as the Stronghold of Christianity.

"I am, very sincerely, thy friend,

"JOHN G. WHITTIER."

Elements of Success.—Mark Holmes was not a young man of brilliant parts. He was an indefatigable worker, and his ideals as to quality of work in what he did were of the highest. He wrote a perfectly legible, clear and rapid hand. His shorthand writing was like engraving, his typewriting was faultless. The drawings he made in the first year of his scientific course he presented, by request of the professor, to the college in which he was a student, as models for other students to emulate. His recitations were invariably prepared with care, and his department was beyond criticism.

Yet when he saw young men in his classes with talents so much more showy and brilliant than his, he was inclined to despond as to his success in life. He was rather slow of speech, and found his pleasure in literary companionship with authors in their books rather than with the young men about him. He was not a "jolly good fellow." He did not smoke cigars, or carry a cane, or take a drink, or sing a comic song, or go on a lark. There was no fun in these things to him.

Fortunately he had a friend some years older than himself with whom he discussed his future with perfect frankness. At the conclusion of one of their talks this friend said to him:

"You need have no misgivings as to your future. With your character will be as large a factor in your success as education, family, or general ability. What the world needs is men who can be trusted, who can be depended on, whose integrity is firm, whose honesty is incorruptible, whose escutcheon is spotless. I am glad you are not brilliant. Many a young man has been wrecked by the possession of shining abilities, unbalanced by sterling virtue and established principle. You have only to go on as you are now doing, and the way will open before you; positions will seek you, and you will perhaps slowly but surely rise to the level you are capable of reaching by the simple force of your character and your manhood."—Christian Advocate.

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 26, 1892.

We have been much encouraged by the responses received to the appeal on behalf of the sufferers from famine in Russia, published in our issue of Third Month Fifth. In addition to several subscriptions from members of his own Monthly Meeting, which have been placed in the hands of the Editor, he has received contributions from Chester, Greene and Westmoreland Counties, Pa., Pittsburgh; Salem, Flushing and Cincinnati, Ohio; and Mooresville, Indiana—in all amounting to about $300.

One of these contributors, in the letter accompanying his donation, says, that when he first started in business about twenty years ago, he had nothing in the way of property, and he covenanted with his Heavenly Father, that whatever of worldly goods was entrusted to his care, he would try and employ it in doing good, as he had opportunity. The notice in "THE FRIEND," he thought, furnished him with an opportunity of doing a little "through those with whom I am in unity by conviction, yet remote from any Meeting of Friends, with whom I can meet or have outward membership, yet one in spirit. I feel that they are the circumstance which worship God in the spirit and rejoice in Christ Jesus and have no confidence in the flesh."

The London Friend of 4th of Third Month, gives some information of the movements of the deputation sent to Russia by English Friends. It says that a letter received from E. W. Brooks and dated the 22d of last month, speaks of the warm welcome accorded to himself and his companion by Count Heiden and his friends on their arrival at Petersburg on the 19th of that month, and states that they were in good health and had accomplished their journey without undue fatigue.

After interviews with Pastor Francis, they granted him sums of money for two villages in the Orenburg district, in terrible distress from hunger and cold. A sum was also granted to a pastor from the government of Samara, who had travelled to the capital to try and raise a fund for the distressed peasantry of his district.

Our friends intend to proceed with the least possible delay to the governments of Saratof, Samara, Kazan, and Orenburg, which are four of the "worst and most heavily-afflicted districts." They forward a letter addressed to them by a lady who is working in the government of Samara, in which she states that as the monthly allowance of food granted by the Zemstvos is usually consumed by the middle of the month at latest, the peasantry suffer terrible privations during the days that ensue before the next allowance is received. Speaking of some of these, she enquires: "What becomes of them during the last ten days of the month?" and in answer cites the case of a man who was accustomed to walk several versts daily to the local distributor for a miserable pittance of bread for himself and his children, consisting of about a quarter of a pound for each. He was at last found lying exhausted by the roadside, and was taken to the village priest, who tried to revive him, but he had no sooner partaken of food than he was seized with cramps and died. A young mother walking home in the rain, cold weather after coming for help, returned her infant to her, to warm it with the heat of her body, its clothing being insufficient, but by the time she regained her home the little one was beyond the reach of suffering. Many of the people are obliged to go barefoot, and in other ways are very insufficiently clad, having for the last three years, owing to their extreme poverty, been unable to purchase any underclothing.

In conclusion, our friend speaks of the need of further prompt help, and of the apprehension of "what must happen at the break up of the frost, when all the land transit of food will become impossible for at least a month," adding, "if the heart of the great city of London could be moved so as to induce large donations from city bankers and merchants, they should then feel liberated to give with a freer hand, and thousands of lives might be saved which I fear will now be lost."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President has issued an executive order continuing in force, with certain modifications, the existing rules and regulations regarding the sale of intoxicating liquors in Alaska with a view to a more strict enforcement of the act of Congress passed in 1890 for the sale of intoxicating liquors in that Territory, except for medicinal, mechanical or scientific purposes.

On the 15th inst. President Harrison issued proclamations to Colombia, Hayti and Venezuela, declaring the duties set forth in Section 3 of the Tariff act of 1890 in force as to sugar, molasses, coffee and hides.

A dispatch from Washington dated the 20th inst., says that Representative Andrew, of Boston, has completed the report upon the tariff. To exclude political influence in the employment of workers under the authority of the United States, "he will submit a bill to the House to-morrow. The second comet was discovered by W. F. Dennington, an amateur astronomer, of Bristol, England. It is described as faint, with a northwesterly motion of nearly 100 miles an hour.

The asteriod is of the twelfth magnitude, and was discovered by Dr. Wolf, of Heidelberg. It is No. 325.

FOREIGN.—In the British House of Commons on the 21st inst., Balfour, the Government leader, moved the expulsion of George Woodvay Hastings (Liberal), member for the Eastern Division of Worcestershire, who, on the 11th inst., was convicted, on his plea of "guilt," of appropriating to his own use certain moneys and securities which he had received in his capacity as trustee under the will of John Brown, and who was sentenced to five years' penal servitude.

Gladsstone said he thought Balfour had arrived at the right conclusion as to the action the House should take in this matter.

The motion, adopted in silence, and Hastings ceased to be a member of Parliament.

The cattle market in Glasgow, which was closed because of the prevalence of the foot and mouth disease, was re-opened on the 16th inst. There was a slight fall in prices. Values of American cattle declined 1/2 to 1 cts.

A committee of the French Chamber of Deputies has unanimously adopted a bill making it a capital offence to blow up houses with dynamite.

The Banque Generale Chemin de Fer et Industrie, of Paris, suspended on the 19th inst. One of the directors has been arrested. Two have absconded in French, Spanish and Russian securities. The liabilities amount to 24,000,000 francs, and the assets to 5,000,000. The failure had no effect on the bourse.

The authorities were about to institute legal proceedings against the directors on the charge of fraudulent bankruptcy and of obtaining money under false pretences.

Rumors were afloat last week that Chancellor Von Caprivi, of Germany, had offered his resignation to the Emperor. A dispatch from Berlin of the 21st inst., says: "Further inquiries in an official quarter as to the rumor that Chancellor Von Caprivi had resigned from the Prussian ministry, elicited the response that the newspapers indulging in such a surmise had not the slightest support of any well-informed authority."

The Kreis Zeitung says: "Chancellor Von Caprivi's prolonged retention in office is impossible. Once the crisis is over he must resign, as he has lost the confidence of Parliament and the Emperor."

A dispatch from Liban says: "The American steamer Indiana, Captain Sargent, which brought to this port the gifts of flour and provisions sent by Americans for the relief of the Russian famine sufferers, has since her discharge been lying some distance off shore. Last night she was towed into the harbor by the steamers Concordia and Vorwaerts. When the Indiana passed the jetty she was greeted with enthusiastic cheers by the assembled crowd."

A cable dispatch from Salvador, received at San Francisco, says that the Congress of that country has refused to ratify the reciprocity treaty with the United States.

A dispatch from Rio Janeiro, of the 18th inst., states that during the last fortnight there were 775 deaths from yellow fever there. The crews of twenty-three steamers had been attacked by the disease.

A dispatch from Summerside, Quebec, says thousands of seals have appeared at Cape North, and that the entire population is engaged in capturing them. It is said to be eighty years since seals appeared in that vicinity.

DIED. In Dartmouth, Mass., on the 25th of Twelfth Month, 1891, ELIZABETH MITCHELL, widow of the late John Mitchell, in the seventy-ninth year of her age. A valued member of Dartmouth Monthly Meeting of Friends.

She was born on the 19th of Second Month, 1822. MARY E. MARSHALL, daughter of James Haines, of Moncy, and wife of the late Edward Marshall. She was a valued member and Elder of Twelfth Street Monthly Meeting of Friends in Philadelphia. From childhood her faith and hope were in the Lord Jesus Christ, and it was her earnest endeavor to follow Him in simple trust. Near the peaceful close of her earthly life she said, "My only hope is in the Lord Jesus Christ Jesus Christ." Strong common sense, clear judgment, and general intelligence, combined with a cheerful, amiable disposition and a large measure of Christian charity, won and kept the love and esteem of those who were her friends. While her absence is keenly felt in the circle of her friends, they have the consolation of believing that, having kept the faith and finished her course, she has received the crown of righteousness.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

1858.—Twelfth Month 17th. "In our Meeting for Sufferings held to-day, after a beloved Friend had expressed a desire, that Friends might become a more united body, supporting our principles and testimonies, and keeping in their tents like Israel of old; where, it was said, no divination or enchantment can prevail against them; I felt constrained to add my desire, that we might, individually, more fully experience a participation of the Divine, inward life, for which our Saviour came, that his sheep might abundantly partake of it. In this, we should know the unity of the Spirit, in the bond of peace, and resist all attempted innovations upon our doctrines and testimonies. Our ancient Friends were raised up to call the people to the inward participation of the life and power of godliness; but it is to be feared, that many among us have fallen short of this; which is the reason they have let those testimonies fall from their hands.

"By a letter received from a Friend in Ireland, I understand there is a probability of London Yearly Meeting so altering its Discipline, as to allow of members marrying those not in membership; and doing away the Query respecting plainness of speech, behavior and apparel. The prospect for our Society, should these changes take place, looks gloomy and discouraging; yet I hope there will be many, who will be stirred up and strengthened to stand firmly, in the meekness and constancy of true wisdom, in the defence and maintenance of all our testimonies, as required of our forefathers, to hold up to the world."

1859.—Second Month 16th. "I attended Salem Quarterly Meeting. At the reading of the answers to the Queries, the awfulness of a parent, at the approach of death, seeing that he had neglected the religious care and restraint of his children, and by his own example, led them into the world, instead of bringing them to Christ, came over me in so serious a manner, that I was led to open and proffer the consideration of it upon some present. The preservation and right training of children often greatly depend on the religious example of their parents; and not only their benefit, but the clearness of the parents from condemnation, at that awful hour, and the belief they had done what they could, must be of unspeakable importance."

"Third Month 27th. True ministers of the Gospel have nothing in view, but to comply with the Lord's will, that they may be found clear in the day of account. The spirit of opposition to such is felt at times in meetings, and may be permitted to close up the way for Gospel service; but they who indulge it will bring flatness over themselves, and have to suffer for their wrong opposition to the Lord's children and servants. How different is the state of meetings, where brethren and sisters draw near to one another in heart and spirit, like holding up each other's hands, travelling together for the arising of Divine life, and rejoicing when the Lord opens the way for the current of true baptizing ministry to flow freely. Elders are appointed to watch over the ministry, to guard and counsel ministers, when needed; if they have left the gift, or said anything not according to sound doctrine; but this is not all their duty. They have as much need as any others, to watch over themselves, that they may know what spirit rules and actuates them; and they are to give themselves up to sympathize with the ministers, and to share in bearing the burdens which they are brought under; by which they may be preserved from judging in their own will and temper, and may be made instrumental to help them, and by a harmonious labor and travail of soul, assist in bringing to the birth the concerns which ministers are brought under. Hereby they are fellow-helpers in the Lord; and when ministers are raised up by their Divine Master in his authority, then a harmonious exercise is again known in the preaching of the Gospel, the great Name is exalted, and the baptizing power goes over the meeting. Ministers and elders thus fulfil their respective services, and contribute to each other's growth and establishment in the blessed Truth. The one preaching what the Holy Spirit opens to them, and the other keeping close to them in spirit, to aid and steady them in their work, that they may not give out, nor deviate from the line of service appointed them by the Great Minister of the Sanctuary."

"Fifth Month 18th. I am afraid there is a disposition in some, to speak highly of a belief in the sufferings of our blessed Saviour, without inculcating submission to his crucifying power inwardly revealed; the baptism of the Holy Ghost and fire. It is by the latter, that the chaff is burnt up, every defilement is removed, and we are prepared to receive the fulness of the blessings of the Gospel of Christ, and the benefits of his sufferings and death. The gift of grace comes by Him, by which we are made new creatures; for if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are done away, and all things are become new, and all things of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ."

"Sixth Month 23d. A war having broken out in Europe, between the French and Austrians, occasioning great destruction of life; it produces mournful feelings, on account of the slaughter of human beings, having immortal souls to be saved or lost; and for the unenlightened condition of those engaged in it. To me it is inconceivable, how man can be so lost to the common feelings of humanity, and the awfulness of rushing souls into eternity, as to destroy wantonly, without any fear of Divine vengeance, his fellow man; especially, when we remember the declaration of the apostle, "Ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him." What an unchristian spirit must he have, who can urge men under his command, to fire into an army, probably striking down thousands, or placing his army in the position of being destroyed in the same way by their opponents. What account can such commanders, and their military subordinates, give to the Almighty Creator of us all, for the dreadful carnage, by which suddenly and barbarously, thousands of their fellow-creatures are deprived of life; over whose existence they have no right of control. How needful for Christians to walk humbly before the Lord, asking of Him, strength and wisdom to do his will, and to show forth to those around them, the fruits of his Holy Spirit, that the kingdom of Christ, the Prince of Peace, may be spread in the earth, by their obedience to Him."

"Ninth Month 15th. We had little business to occupy our attention at our Meeting for Sufferings to-day. When it was finished, the clerk made some observations upon the necessity of every one coming more under a travail of spirit for his own sake, and for the cause of Christ. Much had been rightly said, about doctrines, but he believed that more of the life was needed; and it was only as Friends are brought individually to partake of it, that the Society would be restored to its former condition. S. C. spoke after him, expressing that the design of our Society being raised up, was to promote the Gospel of the grace of God; and its work in the hearts of the people; corresponding with what had been already expressed.

"I adverted to the coming of Friends from England to Pennsylvania and New Jersey, in the early settlement of this country, with the view of settling where they could hold and spread their religious principles and testimonies, out of the way of persecution; and that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting had always supported those principles and testimonies. I desired that we should firmly hold to our ancient doctrines and testimonies, under the guidance of the Head of the church, whatever efforts others might make to introduce changes. As we keep to our individual exercise, to know the life of the great Head to prevail, we shall be more and more united to one another, and still be examples for others to look to and follow. We sat for a time, under feelings of solemnity and tender fellowship; when David Cope said, he believed he would not be easy to leave the meeting, without saying, he united with what had been said, and added the expression of some similar sentiments.

"Friends parted under feelings of unity; one remarking to me, before he left his seat, that he had not known what the meeting would find to do, but he loved to have such feelings as he then experienced; and many others spoke of it as a good meeting."

"Tenth Month 5th. This day completes my seventy-second year. Seldom since the work of religion was begun in me, have I experienced more humbling dispensations than for several weeks past. My soul has been, as it were, poured out before the Lord, day and night, beseeching Him that He would defend me against temptation, and bring me down into low places; that every impurity may be removed, and every chaffy thing in me may be burned up with unquenchable fire. My secret cries have been unto Him, that whatever He may see necessary, may be administered, to keep me from falling, or bringing any reproach upon the blessed cause of truth and righteousness, of which I have made profession, and testified before many witnesses. I have thought there was evidence that the Lord's watchful care and mercy were over me; and hope and trust have been at times felt, that his everlasting arm, though invisible, is underneath; supporting and defending a poor creature, who is unworthy of the least of all his favors; that I shall be preserved again to behold the light of his glorious countenance, and be authorized to declare to others of what He has done and will do for those who call upon Him in sincerity and truth, and wait for the renewing of that life which is hid with Christ in God."

1860.—Second Month 15th. "Feeling an affectionate and sympathetic draft to the Friends of Salem Quarterly Meeting, I went to Woodbury, this morning. In their little Select Meeting, the spirit of tender feeling went forth for the consolation of the few tribulated companions of their Lord and Master.

"In the meeting for worship, preceding that for business, I felt impressed to revive the language of our Saviour, 'I am the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by me'; also, 'No man knoweth the Son but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him.' Showing that it is by the revelation of Christ by His Spirit in the heart of man, that the saving knowledge of God and of his beloved Son, is communicated and received. There it is He shows man his condition; that the Divine will concerning him is; and as He is received, He gives power to come out of all evil, and to do his will, in following Him in all his requirements. In this way Christ becomes man's Saviour and Sanctifier, and leads him along, step by step, in the way of salvation; opening to him those things that belong to his peace, building him up, and establishing him as a member of his church, upon the immutable foundation, which is himself. Thus he is made a partaker of the mercy of God, and the faith of which Christ is the Author."

(To be concluded.)

"WALK IN THE SPIRIT," said Paul, "and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh;" that is the only remedy, that is the soul-healing salve; and what is this walking in the spirit, but following the leadings of grace in our own hearts? For grace as it comes to have the rule over us, brings down all exalted thoughts, abaseth pride, shuts out covetousness, gives no place unto wrath, reduceth us to a cool, quiet frame of spirit, in which frame we can bear and suffer.

"DUKE'S BEST" HAVE KILLED ME."

Late in the autumn of 1890, the cigarette manufacturing firm of Duke & Co., of New York City, and of Durham, N.C., made flagrant use of the United States mails to invade many thousands of the homes of Philadelphia, and presumably of other cities, with the advertisements of their dangerously drugged production. An indecent photograph accompanied every circular. Many parents sorely felt the indignity and scandal of having these unsolicited invitations to a bad habit and to impurity in thought thrust into the hands of their children of tender years, to whom in many cases they were addressed. Complaint was made to the United States District Attorney and to the postal authorities, but there appeared to be no redress, inasmuch as the circulars were not mailed in Philadelphia. The further opinion, officially given, was, that "while it is true that the receiver is equally guilty [with the sender] it would be absolutely necessary to show that he knew the exact nature of the contents of the envelope before he caused the same to be taken from the mails."

It thus appears (if the above view be correct) that under our present statutes, a whole city, in fact all the homes in the whole country, lay open to the infliction of a gross outrage, such as the foregoing, with the exception of those in the place whence the offensive matter may be mailed. It would seem as though there were protective provisions in the anti-lottery law which might be beneficially engrained upon the present insufficient statute.

What amount of moral and physical damage were inflicted through the unnumbered postal distribution of Duke & Co., upward of a year ago, we may never fathom. What their beneficial productions are capable of the following item from a recent morning paper may serve to illustrate: "William Homan, nineteen years old, who was employed in a shoe factory, died on Thursday morning at his boarding house, 818 South Sixth Street, Camden, it is stated, from the excessive use of cigarettes. Shortly before dying he said: 'Tell all my friends 'Duke's Best' have killed me, and beg of them never to smoke another.'"

It is probable that the conscience of Duke & Co. would fail to respond to this death-bed arraignment. They have no concern with the slain of their deadly cigarettes. Neither matters it to them how many ten thousands, or hundreds of thousands, as the case may be, have had their souls darkly stained with the impurely suggestive pictures that they have sent out with intent to increase their tobaccosales. Nevertheless, the sure word of Scripture declares: "God shall bring every work into judgment."

Pertinent to the subject now considered, the writer lately contributed to an educational journal an article (under the title "A Second Century of Dishonor and Retribution Accompanying It"), which was intended to show how the crime of the stimulated production of opium in India during the past hundred years, and its forcible introduction into China, has been fearfully returned upon the Angle-Saxon. These words of those two Hindu students who came over from England a few months ago, bearers of a pitiful appeal concerning the opium scourge, are quoted:

"Only fifty years ago our grandfathers did not dream that opium would bring ruin upon us, and now from the statistical reports of the government, and from the history of the opium curse itself, we can prophesy with absolute certainty that this opium traffic will bring the like calamities, if not worse ones, to the other nations of the world, if it is allowed to continue longer."

Following, are the concluding sentences of the essay referred to above, indicative of the nature of one of the retributive calamities which the product of the fateful poppy is visiting upon us:

"But the pervading curse of the drug, to be found in every city, town and hamlet in the land is referable to its fateful presence in the cigarette. A quarter of a century ago this form of manufacture of the weed was unknown. Lads essaying to smoke the cigar, having suffered the penalty of a bad attack of nausea, would in very many cases make no further trial, or would defer resuming the attempt until fuller grown. Now, however, the weed having been dosed with the captivating drug, even lads too young to be sent to school become victims of the habit, and earnestly declare that they 'can't break it off.' Almost every teacher can bear testimony to the rapid speed of this seductive and dangerous habit. Some of the readers of this may recall the circumstance of a Philadelphia police officer causing the arrest of a tobacco-dealer, several months ago, on the charge of selling cigarettes to school boys, his own son being among the number. It was stated in evidence that the teachers of the school complained daily of the injurious effect that the cigarettes had upon the children. The policeman testified that 'his son was nearly crazy from the use of cigarettes, and was unable to study or do anything at all after smoking them.' In West Chester last month, upon complaint of the superintendent of public schools, another dealer was arraigned for the like misdemeanor, but his case was discontinued upon payment of the costs. Meanwhile, every few days the daily papers acquaint us with instances of dementia and death to boys and young men, and to some that are more advanced in years, by reason of indulgence in the cigarette-smoking habit. One of the latest noted instances, occurring a month or two ago was that of John P. Richardson, the most extensive cotton-planter in Louisiana, and (so said) in the world."

I will only add that as the periodical returns of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue show that there is an annual increase of hundreds of millions of cigarettes manufactured, the bondage of our people to this enslaving habit is growing constantly greater. Will not some who may read these lines, who unhappily are held down by the habit, give it up for the children's sake, for their own sakes, for the sake of the Lord Jesus Christ, who bids us bear his cross if we would make clear the claim that we are his self-denying disciples?

THERE is not one Prayer-Meeting in a hundred among our churches, where a silence of a minute in length is not regarded either as a wicked and unprofitable "waste of time," or at least as a great embarrassment, to both the leader and the people. How often do we hear the contentious exhortations of the pastor, "Now don't waste the time, brethren!" Be prompt brethren, and fill up the time," etc. Does it never occur to God's people that in the moments in which silence is preserved and the heart withdrawn from men and things and lifted up to God, is the opportunity for the Holy Spirit to breathe upon them and stir up in their hearts the "thoughts of God."—New York Independent

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 250.

The way in which Dorothea L. Dix first became interested in the care of the insane, which proved to be the main work of her life, is an interesting illustration of the manner in which our Heavenly Father is at times pleased to lead his children in a way they know not, and to open before them fields of service of which they had before no knowledge.

Dr. Nichols relates, that "while a member of the theological school in Cambridge, I was one of a body of students who took the East Cambridge House of Correction in charge for Sunday-school instruction. All the women, twenty in number, were assigned to me. I was at once convinced that, not a young man, but a woman should be their teacher. Consulting my mother, I was directed by her to Miss Dix for further counsel. On hearing my account, Miss Dix said, after some deliberation, 'I will take them myself!' I protested her physical incapacity, as she was in feeble health. 'I shall be there next Sunday,' was her answer.

"After the school was over, Miss Dix went into the jail. She found among the prisoners a few insane persons, with whom she talked. She noticed there was no stove in their room, and no means of proper warmth. The jailer said that a fire for them was not needed, and would not be safe. Her repeated solicitations were without success. At that time the court was in session at East Cambridge, and she caused the case to be brought before it. Her request was granted. The cold rooms were warmed. Thus was her great work commenced. Of course I claim not a particle of credit. I was simply the instrument of the Good Providence to open the door for this Angel of Mercy to come in."

Was the state of things in the East Cambridge jail an exception, or did it simply exemplify the jail throughout the whole Commonwealth? This was the painful question now raised in the mind of D. L. Dix, to an unmistakable answer to which she resolutely devoted the next two years. Note-book in hand, she started out on her voyage of exploration, visiting every jail and almshouse from Berkshire on the west to Cape Cod on the east. Steadily accumulating her statistics of outrage and misery, she at last got together a mass of eye-witness testimony appalling in extent and detail. With this she now determined to memorialize the Legislature of Massachusetts.

As this was the first Memorial addressed by her to a State legislature—long as was the series of the like that to follow—full extracts from it are needful, alike to reveal the patience, energy, and spirit of humanity with which she addressed herself to her work, as well as the actual character of the evils she was now in arms against:

"Gentlemen. . . . About two years since, leisure afforded me opportunity to visit several prisons and almshouses in the vicinity of this metropolis. . . . Every investigation has given depth to the conviction that it is only by decided, prompt and vigorous legislation that the evils to which I refer, and which I shall proceed more fully to illustrate, can be remedied. I shall be obliged to speak with great plainness, and to reveal many things revolting to the taste, and from which my woman's nature shrinks with peculiar sensitiveness. But truth is the highest consideration. I tell what I have seen, painful and shocking as the details often are, that from them you may feel more deeply the imperative obligation which lies upon you to prevent the possibility of a repetition or continuance of such outrages upon humanity. . . . If my pictures are displeasing, coarse and severe, my subjects, it must be recollected, offer no tranquil, refining or composing features. The condition of human beings reduced to the extreme state of degradation and misery cannot be exhibited in softened language, or adorned with a polished page.

"I proceed, gentlemen, briefly to call your attention to the present state of insane persons confined within this Commonwealth, in cages, closets, cellars, stalls, pens; chained, naked, beaten with rods, and lashed into obedience!"

Page after page, the Memorial then goes on to recite the details of a long catalogue of horrors.

"It may be doubted whether any instance has ever occurred in the history of the race, where the vital principle has adhered so tenaciously to the human body under such a load and complication of sufferings and tortures as in the case of Abram Simmons, an insane man, who has been confined for several years in a dungeon in the town of Little Compton, in this State.

"The writer accidentally met a gentleman this morning from that town, who recounted the following facts, with leave to publish them, and there can be no doubt that they are correct.

"He stated that he visited the cell of Abram Simmons during the past winter. His prison was from six to eight feet square, built entirely of stone—sides, roof and floor—and entered through two iron doors, excluding both light and fresh air, and entirely without accommodation of any description for warming and ventilating. At that time the internal surface of the walls was covered with a thick crust, adhering to the stone in some places to the thickness of half an inch, as ascertained by actual measurement. The only bed was a small sacking stuffed with straw, lying on a narrow iron bedstead, with two comfortable for a cover. The bed itself was wet, and the outside comfortable was completely saturated with the drippings from the walls, and stiffly frozen. Thus, in utter darkness, enosed on every side by walls of frost, his garments constantly more or less wet, with only wet straw to lie upon, and a sheet of ice for his covering, has this most dreadfully abused man existed through the past inclement winter. . . . His teeth must have been worn out by constant and violent chattering for such a length of time, night or day,

"Poor Tom's a-cold!"

"Should any persons in this philanthropic age be disposed, from motives of curiosity, to visit the place, they may rest assured that travelling is considered quite safe in that part of the country, however improbable it may seem. The people of that region profess the Christian religion, and it is even said that they have adopted some forms and ceremonies which they call worship. It is not probable, however, that they address themselves to poor Simmon's God. Their worship, mingling with the prayers of agony which he shrieks forth from his dreary abode, would make strange discord in the ear of that Almighty Being, in whose keeping sleeps the vengeance due to all his wrongs."

The more humble, lowly, meek and merciful any man is, the more he resembles his maker; the more patient, peaceable, just, upright and faithful any man be found, the more conformable he is to the life and nature of Christ.

First Impressions of a Friends' Meeting.

The entrance to the Bull Street Meeting-house must be known to most Birmingham people, but comparatively few have ever passed the portal. For my own part, although during the past twenty years I have seen the exterior of the building many thousand times, yet the interior remained a terra incognita, and I felt a little nervous and as though walking on forbidden ground when on a recent "First-day" morning I for the first time sailed through the entrance straits to the portico adjoining the building. An external janitor swung open the meeting-house door, and an internal brother led me to bench number seven. There was a large congregation sitting in perfect silence, and exhibiting an aspect of profound meditation and sincere devotion, such as I have never before seen in a Protestant place of worship. English worshippers often seem ashamed of their religion. They say their prayers with an apologetic air, and are careful to sing praises without detracting from their own dignity. The Quakers are as devout as the Roman Catholics. The atmosphere was permeated with solemnity. You might have heard a pin drop. There was a silence that might be felt. Even the ladies seem absorbed, and two little boys near me are doing some heavy thinking. It occurs to me that a religion which requires its members to think, can never be popular with the mob. Nor do the profane vulgar love quiet, and repose. To them silence is torture, and meditation an impossibility. For them there is no pleasure without noise. They must have pealing organs, clanging bells, choral singing, brass bands street pianos, and declamatory preachers, all sound and fury.

At some unseen signal the people rise as one, and a beautiful female voice, sweet and solemn and slow, breaks the silence. She is praying. I cannot see her; I do not try to see her; I do not need to see her. For her gentle accents come from the heart, and speak to the heart. Her voice is soft and low, "an excellent thing in woman," but though so soft, yet wonderfully clear and distinct. Her words convey the idea of culture, modesty, simplicity, fervor, devotion, patience, meekness, and humility. Her supplication is very short—too short, I think—and the Friends, who stand up during prayer, like the old Presbyterians, subside and re-commence their thinking. Presently a brother prays, and the Friends stand as before. We sit down again; and I begin to wonder why women have not been allowed, nay, even urged to preach during the long centuries of Christianity. Saviourarola and Martin Luther, and John Knox, and John Wesley were good for their work; but was there no room for the gentle persuasiveness of pure and holy women? If we allow them to persuade us in every other matter, why forbid them to press the most important? As if in response to my thoughts, lo! I hear another sister's voice. Not a prayer, but a preachment. Shortly and sweetly she offers a few observations and reflections on the text: "He careth for you." Like the praying sister, she is good to hear, and I could have listened longer. Another period of cogitation and a well-known Friend—an ex-mayor—holds forth on the passage: "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not Love, I am but as a sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal." This also was an excellent and practical sermonette, and I mentally congratulated the speaker on his substitution of the true translation—to wit, Love instead of Charity: the modern sense of the lat-

British Canadian Travel.

By the Canadian Pacific Railroad the route across America, from China or Japan to England, is shorter than any other by a thousand miles, rendering possible the swift trans-continental passage of eastern and western foreign mail, recorded a few months ago as one of the greatest triumphs of the century.

Let us return to the journal. The Canadian Pacific cars are painted or stained light brown, are of American make and are run on the United States system. Our train consists of an ordinary passenger engine, burning Vancouver Island coal, one postal car, one baggage car, one Colonists' sleeper, one first-class day coach, one observation car and a Pullman sleeper.

Port Moody, once used as the western terminus of the road, is now passing. We leave here the eastermost inlet of the Pacific, and through the deep forests pass Hammond, New Westminster, and emerge upon the banks of Frazer River. New Westminster, in the doorway of the wilderness (for so it seems already), will answer well as the type of many towns twixt here and the cities of the plain. Immense forests and tremendous stumps loom above and crowd around with overpowering presence. The observation car is a pretty good place, but when we plunge into a longer stretch of forest darkness, and coal and tobacco smoke, pelting cinders and a perfect storm of fire weed down, drive the ladies back into the sleeper, life seems rather precarious. But now we enter a far different scene; crossing the Frazer, with its stretches of splendid meadow untouched by man or beast, and reaching away up into the mountains and down to the sea. Between Westminster and Harrison the train curvets along the mountainous borders of the Frazer, which slope westward through a narrow valley, occasionally opening into strips of fertile meadow and hill country, where the railroad stations are located.

At Great Harrison Lake, railroad and river turn abruptly northward, and not until 150 miles from the United States boundary, at Penny's, do we again permanently set our faces toward the rising sun. At Penny's the river turns east by Kamloops Lake to the junction of the Thompson, where the railroad crosses and quits the Frazer, and penetrates the passes of the Gold Range into the region of the Shuswap Lake country, where I have decided to stop off over First-day.

After leaving Harrison Lake there is a noticeable change in vegetation—willows, birches, heeches, asters, golden rod and cat-tails suggest the hop-fed country toward which we are now speeding at a fearful rate.

6 p. m. So narrow and deep grows the Frazer Valley, in our approach to Zale, that it often gets suddenly dark, as at the entrance of a tunnel, and then emerging from the mountain shadow it flashes bright again across the tortuous cañon. The steep mountain sides are often clothed from head to foot in the loveliest soft veil of spruces, an effect heightened by contrast with desolate intervening steeps bristling with rocks, fire swept and gashed with avalanches.

Leaving Zale in its rocky, mountain niche, and wondering why men live there and where the apples grow which the Indian girls sell us, the train assaults a succession of short tunnels, crawls along the cliffs awfully and storms up the grand cañon of the Frazer—"dark, deep and terrible," as the guide-books would say. Here ter word meaning anything but love. The worthy alderman was succeeded—after an interval of silence—by a brother who went back to "He careth for you," and submitted the statement under another, but yet harmonious, aspect. After a few minutes to digest the last speaker's views, a third sister, who was very earnest, but also very nervous, offered a few remarks, which I confess I did not bear. This was my misfortune, but not my fault. Five minutes more of silent thought, and a Friend referred briefly to the "Everlasting arms," after which the audience again engaged in mute assimilation for a short space, and then, suddenly rising all together, left the place, the brethren assuming their headgear before getting outside.

The roomy portico was now a scene of bustle and conversation. Friends who had not seen each other for days, grasped each other by the hand, and eagerly inquired concerning each other's health. The scene was pleasing and rather affecting, and would have increased my respect for the Friends, had such increase been possible. I am not now surprised at the power and influence wielded by this comparatively small body. Their speakers are Christians by conviction and not by profession, and they hold their peace until they have something to say. They realize that while speech is silver, silence is golden. Their habits of silent thought develop prudence, foresight, wisdom. Their youthful intellect is not addled, nor their brain softened by compulsory hearing of curates, and machine-made sermons. And herein I submit the Friends are to be felicitated, as well as upon the labors of Fox in England, Barclay in Scotland, and Penn in America; whose precepts carried into practice have made the ancient nick-name of Quaker a name of sweet odor, a name of honor, a name which, truly borne, is of more mere worldly value to its bearer than wagon-loads of illuminated addresses or tons of testimonials.—Birmingham Weekly Mercury.

SELECTED.

THE SINGLE HEAD OF WHEAT.

All my daily tasks were ended,
And the hush of night had come,
Bringing rest to weary spirits,
Calling many wanderers home.

"He that goeth forth and weepeth,
Bearing golden grains of wheat,
Shall return again rejoicing,
Laden with the harvest sweet."

This I read, and deeply pondered,
What of seed my hand had sown;
What of harvest I was reaping,
To be laid before the Throne.

While my thoughts were swiftly glancing
O'er the path my feet have trod,
Sleep sealed up my weary eyelids,
And a vision came from God.

In the world's great field of labor
All the reapers' tasks were done;
And each hastened to the Master
With the harvest he had won.

Some, with sheaves both poor and scanty,
Sadly told the number o'er;
Others staggered 'neath the burden
Of the golden grain they bore.

Gladly, then, the peary greetings
Opened wide to let them in,
And they sought their Master's presence
With their burdens, rich and thin.

Slowly, sadly, with the reapers
Who had labored long and late,
Came I, at the Master's bidding,
And was latest at the gate.

There, apart from all the others,

Weeping bitterly, I stood alone;

I had toiled from early morning,

Working for the others' good.

When a friend had fallen, fainting,

By his sheaves of golden grain,
With a glass of cooling water,
I revived his strength again.And another, worn and weary,
I had aided for a while.Till, her failing strength returning,
She went forward with a smile.Thus, too, others I had aided
While the golden moments fled,
Till the day was sped, and evening
On the earth her tear-drops shed;And I, to the Master's presence,
Came with weary, toil-worn feet,
Bearing—as my gathered harvest—
But a single head of wheat.So, with tearful eyes, I watched them
As, with faces glad and bright,
One by one they laid their burdens
Down before the Throne of Light.Ah, how sweetly, then, the blessings Sounded to my listening ear!"Nobly done, my faithful servants:
Rest now, in your mansions, here."Then I thought, with keenest sorrow,
"Words like these are not for me:
Only those with heavy burdens
Heavenly rest and blessing see.""Yet I love the Master truly,
And I've labored hard since dawn;
But I have no heavy burden—
Will He bid me to be gone?"While I questioned thus, in sadness,
Christ, the Master, called for me;
And I knelt before Him, saying:—
I have only this for Thee!""I have labored hard, O Master—
I have toiled from morn till night;
But I sought to aid my neighbors,
And to make their labors light."So the day has passed unnoticed;
And to-night, with shame, I come,
Bringing—as my gathered harvest—
But a single wheat-head home."Then I laid it down, with weeping,
At his pierce and unshesed feet;
And he smiled upon my trembling:
Ah! his smile was passing sweet."Child—it is enough," He answered:
"All I asked for, thou hast brought;
And, among the band of reapers,
Truly, bravely, hast thou wrought.""While was thine appointed mission—
Well hast thou performed thy task:
Have no fear that I shall chide thee—
This is all that I could ask."-Then I woke, but long the vision
In my heart I pondered o'er,
While I tried to see what meaning
Hidden in its depths it bore.And, at length, the lesson slowly
Dawned upon my wondering mind:
"Never mind what others gather—
Do what'er thy hands can find.""If it be thy lot and mission
Thus to serve the reaper band;
And the evening find thee weary,
With an empty, sheafless hand;"Let thy heart remain untrodden;
Faithfully fulfil thy task;
Have no fear that Christ will chide thee—
Heavy sheaves He will not ask."

the broad, placid river narrows, deepens and rushes furiously below the iron tracks, over the salmon leaps, past the spearing platforms of the Indians and on to the placid washings of the Chinese, and golden sands of Texas and Emory Bar. Numberless tributaries of pale green water leap and fall under the bridges, to lose their beauty in the gray muddy torrent of the Frazer.

Suspended over the edge of the steeper rapids we may yet discern the frail pole platforms, where the Indians net and spear the struggling salmon, and suspend the brilliant slices to dry on the overhanging branches, or smoke them by the camp-fire for the winter's store.

I've been in the observation car again, and can soulfully say the wonders of the upper Frazer cannot be outnumbered or overestimated. It seems like sheer animal recklessness to travel on this line—the rolling of a stone, breaking of a bolt, rail or axle, or swing of a curve—and vanity of vanities! It is said to have cost three million dollars to make the preliminary survey of this section. We stop about forty minutes at North Bend in the evening for supper, long enough even for an Englishman, and ten minutes grace. The Canadian Pacific Railroad management have provided that forty-five minutes for meals is as consistent with ordinary timetable rates as with good digestion. Americans will please copy. Prices invariably 75 cents per meal at the Company's hotel, but cut rates are well advertised and patronized by economical tourists. I find it more satisfactory to be independent of both, and buy a couple of lunches before starting on a train journey. One can of potted ham or tongue, half a dozen bread rolls, with cakes and fruit, not only save you from one to two dollars per day but provide for a convenient void of offence.

Having changed engines here, we go on in the darkness through wondrous scenery which no east-bound passenger may see save by moonlight. And by moonlight I shall see it; nay, even by starlight the view is memorable—Jupiter hanging at the mountain's edge and Sirius climbing through the passes of the East! The train just creeps along at an eight-mile gait; short tunnels, creaking trestle-work, and buttressed curves under the precipices multiply and in the still, dark cañon the foam and rush of waters appears more terrible than it is.

Camp-fires of whites and Indians make dancing reflections in the car windows, and their canvas tents and wigwags along the railroad bank flare out in the blaze of our head-light as we pass them by. Leaning out from the now deserted observation car and looking up the nearest curve, another light appears as if suspended in mid-air. It is the swinging lantern of the lone track-walker awaiting us at some place of danger—bridge or tunnel mouth. A life to think about not with envy but with awe and kindness, is this of the solitary track-walker. As we glide by him over the bridge and into the cliff, I think of the lives dependent on his faithfulness at this moment.

Between Spence's Bridge and Penny's, and the hours of ten and twelve p. m., the climax of the upper Frazer scenery is reached. Crossing the main stream at Lytton, the railroad proceeds along the south bank of the Thompson River, and in the full moonlight all that we have heretofore seen of beauty, awe and grandeur receives a final touch that is indescribable. Somewhere west of Penny's I fell asleep. At the station I was roused at midnight by the brakeman, who said the observation car would be taken off there; so I went into the day coach, curled up on a seat and slept, waking hourly to inspect the country. My nap in the observation car, despite our elevation of 2,000 feet at a latitude of 51°, and the fact that I was very lightly dressed, was most delightful, owing to the dryness of the air of this part of the country and the prevalence of the warm Chinook winds from the northwest coast.

The country from Ashcroft to Kamloops is a rolling plain, covered with "bunch" or Buffalo grass and devoted exclusively to grazing, being too arid in summer for growing crops without irrigation. Saving on the higher mountain slopes and stream banks the country is very bare of trees.

The Canadian Pacific Railroad runs along the deep waters of the Kamloops Lake for thirty miles ere it reaches the city of that name. Kamloops is an Indian name, meaning river confluence, for here unite the north and south forks of the Thompson. It is the oldest town in the province next to Victoria, and a divisional point of the railroad.

Eight Month 23d. The sun has fully risen before we resume the journey through the semi-arid regions west of Shuswap Lake, where irrigation is more extensively carried on than elsewhere in British America. The general appearance of the country strongly reminds one of the narrower valleys of Arizona and southern California. Both evergreens and deciduous trees are abundantly interspersed, and cattle and horses graze about, making a picture strongly similar to what one sees on our southern border.

Near the upper waters of Great Shuswap Lake, and before crossing it, we come to Sicamous—a station, store, hotel and two log cabins. Here I get off, being advised to do so if I want to see some big game. Mountain Sheep and Goats, Caribou, Bears, Panthers and occasional Elk and Moose are to be found in the vicinity. The season for these opens on the 15th of this month, but as yet the Siwash Indian and French Canadian guides and hunters are not obtainable, so I must defer the sight of these noble animals for another journey.

Sitting now in a boat on the Shuswap, I am strongly reminded of home by the birds that fly and sing about me. Kingbirds, Vireos, Kingfishers, Robins and Chickadees for the first time in many months sound their familiar notes. Sheldrakes and Mallards swim along the water's edge, and the peet weat of sandpipers sounds peculiarly sweet and familiar. But other sounds remind me of the thousands of miles between fancy and reality.

A pair of Golden Eagles scream and banter each other among the dead fir tops on the mountain, a family of ravens croak and gobble like parrots over a dead salmon along shore, and the hesitating notes of the varied Thrush are whispered in a dark grove across the lake.

As all evil motions that lead unto sin, all baits, snares and lures that we meet with in the course of our lives, are the strugglings and strivings of the evil seed; so all calls that we find in ourselves for justice, equity, honesty, truth and faithfulness, with all inward checks, rebukes and convictions, are the strugglings and strivings of the good seed: for if these things are hearkened unto, obeyed, followed after, and lived in, it keeps down the growth of vice; so that though we have a root of sin in us, it remains powerless, it doth not rise and come to reign over us.

Natural History, Science, etc.

A Tame Spider.—A man living in Bermuda is said to have tamed a spider of the species "Mygale" and made it live upon his bed-curtain and rid him of the flies and mosquitoes which disturbed his nightly rest. He thus describes this remarkable pet: "I fed him with flies for a few days, until he began to find himself in very comfortable quarters, and thought of spinning a nest and making his home. This he did by winding himself round and round, combing out the silk from the spinnets at the end of his body till he had made a nest as large as a wine glass, in which he sat motionless until he saw a fly get inside our gauzy tent; then I could fancy

I saw his eyes twinkle as his victim buzzed about, till, when it was within a yard or so of him, he took one spring and the fly was in his forceps, and another leap took him back to his den, where he soon finished the savory morsel. Sometimes he would bound from side to side of the bed and seize a mosquito at every spring, resting only a moment on the net to swallow it. In another corner of the room was the nest of a female Mygale of the same species. She spun some beautiful little silk bags, larger than a thimble, of tough yellow silk, in each of which she laid more than a dozen eggs. When these hatched the young spiders used to live on her back until they were old enough to hunt for themselves. I kept my useful friend on my bed for more than a year and a half, when, unfortunately, a new house-maid spied his pretty brown house, pulled it down, and crushed under her black feet my poor companion."—Will Nature Turn You by Kindness.

A Tame Wombat.—The Wombat is a squat, thick, fat, slow, awkward-looking creature, with a broad, flat body, more the shape of a beetle than anything else I can think of, only just a little larger, as a Wombat often weighs forty or fifty pounds. It has a broadish kind of snout, very small eyes, short ears, short tail, and very short legs, on which it shuffles along at no very rapid rate, you may suppose. Its extremely thick skin is covered with long, coarse, grey hair, and its whiskers are long, stiff bristles—altogether not the sort of a thing you would pick out of a menagerie for a household pet; and yet we were very fond of our poor "Dumpy," as we named the one we had for about two years. We had him when quite young, and when we were little too, and the good-tempered, harmless beastie used to play with us in its gentle, cumbersome way, and follow us about the house and garden like an old dog.

We gave him a broad box, in a corner of a covered shed, to sleep in, with a large piece of a blanket for a bed. He knew his room quite well, and it was very dull to see him clamber up and turn himself round in the blanket, and if part of it had fallen over the side, he would pull it up closely round him with his hands (for all these creatures use their fore-paws very much in the same way that monkeys do), just as cleverly as you cuddle the clothes about you on a cold night. But although this was a warmer bed than he could find outside in his native state, he soon began to covet one more luxurious, and if he could get into a bed-room without being seen, and find anything to clamber up by, one or other of us would find Dumpy curled up between our blankets when we went to bed. The servants objected to this trick of his much more strongly than we children did; indeed we liked the fun of having him, but Dumpy was not popular in the kitchen. Once or twice he was missing for a day, or day and night, and then reappeared, seeming quite knocked up, and slept for an unusually long time. We heard afterwards that he had been purposely taken away into the bush to be lost, but had found his way back to us from a long distance. I heard once of a tame Wombat being taken in a boat across a large river to be got rid of, having become troublesome by the same habits; but in some extraordinary way the poor thing travelled back to the house it had lived in, and, after such a touching proof of fidelity, was not sent away any more.—Tasmanian Friends and Foes.

Game in Tibet.—The country was everywhere literally alive with game; yak and wild asses were particularly plentiful, but antelopes, wild goats, bears, wolves, hares, ducks, geese, sheldrakes, sand-grouse, and partridges also were met in vast numbers.

Wild-ass-shooting proved a difficult sport, these handsome animals having wonderfully acute sight and hearing, and when at all frightened running at tremendous speed for great distances, and generally up the mountain sides. They were so numerous, however, between the mouth of the Alang gol and Lake Alang, that without much fatigue I got some good shooting; but, when not very badly wounded, they usually managed to get away, one, whose front leg I had broken, giving me a chase even of several miles before I could get another shot at it. Each band of ten or twelve is led by a stallion; and when in motion, on they go in single file, with heads erect and tails outstretched. These asses but rarely bray, and the few times I heard their voice it resembled more a bark than what their tame congeners treat us to; it was neither as powerful nor as prolonged as theirs. At night they herd close together, and in a circle with heads towards the centre, their heels ready for any wolf or other enemy that may venture to attack them.—The Land of the Lamas.

K'ang or Stove Bed of Tibet.—One end of every room is raised about two feet from the ground and covered with a thick coating of mud or tiles. In the interior is an empty space, at one end of which is built a chimney on the outer wall of the house; at the other is a hole through which fuel is put into this structure. When the fire is lit this hole is closed, and the fuel smoulders until entirely consumed, imparting such a high degree of temperature to the whole k'ang that hardly any bed-covering is necessary even in the coldest nights of winter. But this is precisely what makes a heated k'ang so uncomfortable to one not used to it; roasting on the side next to the k'ang and freezing on the side away from it, there is no position in which one can get comfortable all over.—The Land of the Lamas.

Bas-reliefs of Butter in Tibet.—When it had grown dark, I again walked to the gold-roofed temple, for the great sight of the festival, the butter bas-reliefs.

Outside the southern wall of the temple, were the two principal bas-reliefs under a high scaffolding, from which hung innumerable banners painted with images of gods and saints, while here and there were gaudy Chinese lanterns with pictured sides. The bas-reliefs were about twenty feet long and ten feet high, supported by a frame-work, and lit up by rows of little butter-lamps. The subjects were religious, representing in the usual lamaist style, gods, scenes in the various heavenly abodes, or the different hells. The central figure in each was about three feet high, and in the background were long processions, battles, &c., each figure—and there were hundreds—not over eight inches in height. Every detail was most carefully worked out in these great slabs of butter, and painted in the florid but painstaking style of lamaist illumination. Around these tableaux had been wrought elaborate frameworks of flowers, birds, Buddhist emblems, from amidst which a squirrel was peeping, or about which a dragon was twisting its long, scaly body. Along the walk which led around the temple were seven smaller bas-reliefs, about eight feet long and four feet high, representing scenes similar to those in the larger ones.—The Land of the Lamas.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

In a memoir of Mary Capper, of Birmingham, England, a valued minister of the Society of Friends, is contained the following remarks, made by James Backhouse, in writing of a call made on her, soon after his return from his labors abroad. He says:

"In the course of conversation, she informed me that she had adopted the principles of total abstinence as regards intoxicating liquors; that though on the first mention of the subject she had doubted its propriety, yet, on reflecting upon it, and considering the numbers led away into inebriety, and that all these began their course of drunkenness by taking intoxicating liquors in what had been thought to be moderation, she determined that no one should be able to plead her example for taking them at all. At the time she left them off, she was upwards of eighty years of age, and in the practice of taking a single glass of wine daily with her dinner; and having been for many years unable to take animal food, this glass of wine had been thought almost essential to her existence, especially as she had been accustomed to it from an early period of her life. She told me that she expected to have something to suffer in making this change, and that she might probably have to endure a greater sense of feebleness during the remainder of her days; but the welfare of those by whom she was surrounded, and on whom her example might have some influence, she considered to be of much greater importance. On making the trial, she was, however, agreeably disappointed; for though she felt some languor for a few days, she soon became sensible of an increase of strength, and was more vigorous without the wine than she had been with it; so that she had cause to commemorate the goodness by which she had been enabled to make this sacrifice, and I believe that her example in this respect, as well as her Christian practice exhibited in a great variety of other points, had a beneficial influence on many."

It may be added that she lived to the age of ninety, and her biographer says, "Seldom has there been a more encouraging or animating example of old age." "She was preserved in such sweetness and liveliness of spirit, and though feeble, was generally comfortable."

GAMBLING.—When Judge William Buder was presiding over this judicial district, probably about 1872, he delivered to a Grand Jury a charge in regard to what constitutes gambling, remarkable for its terse and comprehensive meaning. It made a considerable impression on the community at the time, as well as on the inquest, so much so that the writer, who was then serving in that capacity, made a note of it as being worthy of preservation. It was in substance as follows: "Gentlemen of the Grand Jury, you are charged with a high and important trust. It will be your duty to examine the bills of indictment as presented by the District Attorney, and after acting on them it is also your duty to inquire into the causes of crime in our community. From facts which have come to the knowledge of the Court we have reason to fear that there are secret infringements of the law in many particulars, and it is your province to search them out, and if you perform your parts in ferreting out the secret places where crime of every nature is carried on we will see to it that they are properly punished, but if you do not present we cannot punish. You stand at the very portals of justice. We shall send before you for examination the police officers, whom you must interrogate as to their knowledge where liquor is sold contrary to law; houses of bad repute, where gambling in any form is carried on—and I mean by gambling any and everything where the result is obtained by chance, all such things as are called gift enterprises, lotteries of every kind, whether carried on in churches for professedly religious purposes or not; they are all wrong, and those who institute and conduct them are but deceiving themselves and injuring the morality of the community by such proceedings. We therefore call your attention to all such sources of crime and ask you to assist in ferreting them out and bringing them to public notice, and after making inquiry of the police and others who may be sent before you it is your duty to inquire of each other as to your individual knowledge of any resort where crime is carried on," &c.

The writer would particularly call attention to the language, "and they are all wrong and those who institute and conduct them are but deceiving themselves and injuring the morality of the community." What was true in 1872 remains to be true in 1891, and it is very sad indeed to have such scenes revived among us, feeling well assured that all such enterprises are steps in a wrong direction. We have here a large, well-lighted and inviting reading room, where our young men can profitably spend their evenings and where those who have families can procure interesting volumes to carry home and read aloud in the domestic circle, and how much more peaceful will be the mind when the head is laid upon the pillow for a night's repose to have been thus employed than in sitting around the card table or engaged in other exciting games of chance. The awful summons, "Steward, give an account of thy stewardship, for thou mayest be no longer steward," will sooner or later be sounded in the ears of all. Then, oh, then, how very desirable it will be to be able to surrender up an account with joy and not with grief.—W. P. T.

EXTRACT from a letter from Matthew Franklin, whilst on a religious visit to New England, dated Eighth Month, 1812:—

"We called to see Comfort Collins, aged one hundred and eleven years and eight months. A more instructive and precious opportunity I have no remembrance of. All her faculties are in a measure, fled, save her religious. She has no kind of a recollection (though she has been twice married) that she ever had a husband or children, houses or lands; nor could she recollect her nearest friends when named; yet her sense of Divine good and the religious fervor of her mind appear unabated. We stayed about an hour, the whole of which time she was engaged in praising her Maker: in exhorting us to love the Lord and to lay up treasure in heaven, several times saying, 'One hour in his presence is better than a thousand elsewhere. I know it, friends; I know it from experience.' And then her voice would seem to settle away, with that kind of melody which dear old Mary Griffin used to make. And after being still a minute or two, she would again lift up her voice, with angelic sweetness, in praising the Lord, and advising us to love and fear Him, and would look around upon us and say: "I love you, dear friends, though you are strangers to me; but I love them that love the Lord—blessed be his name." She held another Friend and myself by the hand, nearly all the time. The whole company were in tears while we stayed. The remembrance of the opportunity is not off my mind, and I hope never will be whilst memory remains."

Reflections.

Mariners on life's sea would restrain the ever flowing tide of human events when fraught with evil, but, while deploring, fail in restoring, when treasures are removed beyond the reach of mortals. Man, powerless in himself to command a blessing, only as sought for in accord with the Divine will, finds that in accordance with that Supreme will the tide of evil is restrained when man's real needs are met.

The Apostle James said, "Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts." In this way disappointment ensues when it is proved that what connects itself to a carnal appetite. "True prayer is the heart's sincere desire uttered or unexpressed." Inspired of God, the hour of tribulation is a sweet hour. Speech is full of meaning, when in language understood it speaks, "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away. Blessed be the name of the Lord" "God is Love." He prepares the heart in humble thanksgiving to confess,

"Good when Thou gives—supremely good;

Nor less when Thou deniest."

Crosses and exercises in thy sovereign hand

Are blessings in disguise."

Foot-binding in China.—The Roman Catholics observe the custom and furnish medicines to be applied to the foot so as to render the operation more successful, and at Chungking it is said that they had the reputation of being able to compress the foot more than the natives could. At a recent conference of missionaries there the question came up, and one of the leading members who had been up to pray earnestly over the matter with his wife, had decided not to bind the feet of his daughters, sprung to his feet, and laid before the company his decision. He was so earnest in his presentation of the matter, that the whole body pledged themselves individually hereafter to oppose foot-binding. This settles the question for the mission in that district.

Superstition.—We have mentioned how one of the wealthiest corporations in the city engaged in business secures money by giving a minute medal to those who pay twenty-five cents for membership, and that among the virtues of the medal it is stated that if it is put in water drunk by animals will protect them from disease. This method of making money by playing on the superstitions of the ignorant is individually hereafter to be suppressed. The following is sent out to the simplified:

Bee-culturists' Contribution to the Sacred Heart.—We wish to bring to the knowledge of our people that there has been formed a bee-culturists' association for the purpose of erecting in honor of the Sacred Heart a column, called the Column of the Bee-culturists, in the Church of Montmartre. Each associate is asked to offer for this purpose two cents for each of his hives. This offering will afford a protection against the diseases which attack the hives, and a suitable gift for calling down the benediction of the Sacred Heart on the bees of those associated.—The Independent.

Taxing Evils.—A bill proposing to lay a heavy tax on lotteries has been introduced into the Senate of the United States. The purpose of the bill is supposed to be the destruction of the Louisiana Lottery, and that no lottery company could continue long to exist and pay to the Government seventy-five per cent. of the face of every ticket drawn. The New York Sun opposes the scheme in a forcible editorial. One sentence expresses the whole question: "Either the existence of that concern is against good morals and public policy, or it is not. In the former case the police agents of the Federal and State Governments should be used for every constitutional way against it. In the latter case the Government has no justification for discriminating against it." Will not this argument apply with equal force to the liquor traffic? If the liquor business is against good morals and public policy, there is but one right course for Federal and State Governments to pursue with reference to it. They must abolish it. It is not a generalizing and damaging business, it is not just to discriminate against it by laying a tax on it in the shape of license or any other form. This is the end of the argument, and but for the influence of liquor in politics all good citizens could see it, and all secular papers except those devoted to demoralizing uses would advocate suppression.

Our African Missionaries Not Tobacco Dealers.—An Advent paper stated in one of its numbers for First Month that nearly all Missionary stations in Africa are trafficking in tobacco with the natives, and adds that the Bishop Taylor forbids it, but compels the traffic in all stations under his control. We sent to the Rev. Ross Taylor for information on this point, with this result: "Tobacco is the small currency of Liberia, but in no other part of Africa where we have Missions. Hundreds of natives will take nothing else." For more than three years we fought against it, and then consented to send a shipment to New York. A brother prayed that it might be lost and it was shipwrecked. The part recovered was totally worthless. We sent no more of any kind. For small currency for Liberia we have sent out four tons of Colgate's soap, and a large supply of hatchets, mattocks, fish-hooks, and so forth. Our missionaries nowhere now trade in tobacco in any form.—Christian Advocate.

Presumptuous Superstition.—A curious custom of the Greek Church was illustrated at the funeral the other day of a young Grand Duchess Paul of Russia. Before the coffin was closed the Metropolitan laid a written paper in the right hand of the corpse, which read: "We, by the grace of God, prelate of the Holy Russian Church, write this to our master and friend, St. Peter, the gate-keeper of the Lord Almighty. We announce to you that the servant of the Lord, Her Imperial Highness, the Grand Duchess Paul, has finished her life on earth, and we order you to admit her into the kingdom of heaven without delay, for we have absolved all her sins and granted her salvation. You will obey our order on sight of this document which we put into her hand."—Paris Letter to Chicago Herald.

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 2, 1892.

Very beautifully does the Psalmist describe the situation of the man that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High and abideth under the shadow of the Almighty. "He shall cover thee with his feathers and under his wings shalt thou trust." "Because thou hast made the Lord thy habitation, there shall no evil befall thee." "Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him."

May we not say that he "abideth under the shadow of the Almighty, who habitually lives in a sense of the presence of God, and with reverence, godly fear and filial love, endeavors to be found doing his will, and rendering to the Author of all our mercies the constantly arising tribute of thanksgiving and praise."

Such, we believe, was the experience of our late dearly beloved friend, Joseph Stratton, of Winona, Ohio. An intimate friendship of many years had impressed on my mind the conviction that above all other things, he desired to be found living in harmony with the Divine will, and promoting the spiritual welfare of mankind. He had given much of his time to waiting upon those who were travelling in the work of the ministry; and had often accompanied such in their visits to meetings in the section of the State in which he resided. One such Friend, who had been in his house, said since his death that he seemed to be a man "full of the Holy Ghost," the main bent of his thoughts being towards Heaven and heavenly things.

Some months before his death, he had an impression made on his mind, that he should not live long—and only a few days before he was taken sick, on returning home, after attending the funeral of a member of the meeting to which he belonged, he told his wife, that it had been said to him as distinctly as if an audible voice had uttered the words, "Thy days will be few. But thy name is written in the Lamb's book of life." Thrice was this message given to him.

In a few days he was prostrated with pneumonia. He lingered for eleven days before the change came, but with little suffering. He several times replied to the queries of his family, as to how he felt, "Comfortable in mind and body."

The physician who attended him told me, that he regarded it as a privilege to wait upon him, everything was so quiet and peaceable. His mind continued clear until the period came when the death of the body gave the Spirit entrance into the joys of immortality.

For further particulars the reader is referred to the obituary notice in another column.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Lord Salisbury's reply to our Government's request that the modus vivendi of last year, for the protection of seal life in Behring Sea, has been received, and sent to the Senate with the opinion of the President, that it is very satisfactory. It is in effect that Great Britain is willing when the treaty has been ratified, to agree to an arrangement similar to that of last year, if the United States will consent that the arbitrators should, in the event of a decision adverse to the United States, assess the damage which the prohibition of sealing shall have inflicted on British sealers during the pendency of the arbitration, and, in the event of a decision adverse to Great Britain, should assess the damages which the limitation of slaughter shall, during the pendency of arbitration, have inflicted on the United States or its lessees.

The Cincinnati Commercial Gazette says: "If cigarette smoking were sold, it is almost exclusively imported about it—it is a monstrous evil. In thirteen years the manufacture of the little rolls of bad-smelling tobacco has increased from 238,276,817 to 2,877,999,400. Fully two-thirds, perhaps, of this enormous number of cigarettes annually made and sold are smoked by boys. The first thought of many when their attention is called to this subject is that a monstrous evil should be suppressed by law. It is much more easy to make that statement than to carry it into effect. The reformation should begin at home, at the home of parents." It is reported at the Custom House in Boston that a large amount of Persian opium is now being imported from India. The opium is also extensively used for smoking purposes, and is often used in the manufacture of cigarettes.

On the 24th ult. the Silver Bill was discussed in the House of Representatives, and Representative Bland demanded the previous question. Representative Burrows, a Republican, moved to lay the bill on the table. This motion was defeated by a tie vote, brought about by the casting vote of the Speaker. The result was a surprise to the silver men, and the bill is remanded to the calendar. It is believed that this mischievous proposition is indefinitely postponed.

There are now more than half a million almonds trees actually bearing in the United States; there are hundreds of thousands of bearing coconut trees; there are more than a quarter of a million olive trees producing fruit equal to the best Mediterranean varieties; there are more than half a million bearing banana plants, 200,000 bearing lemon trees, 4,000,000 orange trees and 21,000,000 pine-apples, and the value of tropical and semi-tropical fruits grown under the American flag is nearly $30,000,000. Senator Cameron has introduced a bill appropriating $1,000,000 to erect a mint in Philadelphia. A similar bill appropriating $800,000 has been introduced in the House by Representative Bingham.

On the 23d ult. the House Committee on Territories decided to report favorably the bill to give local government to Utah.

Roger Q. Mills has been elected U. S. Senator from Texas, by a practically unanimous vote.

The bill substituting county option for prohibition in Iowa, was, on the 22d ult., indefinitely postponed in the Iowa House. The vote was a strictly partisan Republican majority favoring postponement and the Democrats opposing.

The lower house of the Iowa Legislature, on the 26th of last month, adopted a bill to make silver dollars legal tender in Iowa, "heading off loan and trusts companies from requiring payments to be made in gold."

The Washburne-Crosby Co., of Minneapolis, last week, sent out 175 cars, containing 22,000 barrels of flour, consigned to the Russian Relief Committee of Philadelphia. The train was started in eight sections, but the cars will be run into Philadelphia in one section, if possible, for sanitary motives.

Dr. D. Hayes Agnew, of this city, an eminent surgeon and author, died on the 22d of Third month, in his seventy-fourth year. He was a man of excellent character.

Ario Pardee, millionaire and philanthropist, of Hazleton, Pa., died on the 29th ult., at Rock Lodge, Florida, aged eighty-one years.

On the 24th of last month the bodies of twenty-five miners who were entombed in the Hill Farm Mine, at Dunbar, Pa., on Sixth Month 16th, 1890, were recovered.

Deaths reported in this city last week were 493, which is 11 less than last week, and 11 less than the corresponding week last year. Of the foregoing, 269 were males and 224 females; 72 died of consumption; 62 of pneumonia; 35 of diseases of the heart; 25 of convulsions; 18 of old age; 18 of diphtheria; 17 of scarlet fever; 17 of erysipelas; 17 of bronchitis; 14 of inflammation of the stomach; and 10 each of typhoid fever; 11 of Bright's disease; 11 of apoplexy and 10 of cancer.

FOREIGN.—The Durham miners in England have voted to continue the strike. The police in the strike districts have been reinforced.

The new extradition treaty between France and the United States was signed on the 25th ult.

There was a terrific explosion of dynamite on the evening of the 27th ult., at 39 Rue Clichy, the home of Bonlot, the public prosecutor of Paris. The attempt was against his life, which has been threatened repeatedly lately by anarchists. The police say that at least eight pounds of dynamite must have been used. Houses for some distance were rocked as if by an earthquake. Seven persons were injured.

On the 25th the Chamber of Deputies, without debate, passed the bill relative to inflicting the death penalty on any person or persons convicted of having destroyed property by means of explosives. A clause was added to the bill extending from the punishment provided by the measure persons who have information whereby the guilty parties were brought to justice, even though the informers were accessories before the fact, provided that they informed the authorities before the crime was committed.

The same day the Spanish Government drafted a stringent decree for the punishment of anarchist outrages. More dynamite cartridges have been found in a street in Barcelona. A man was injured by the explosion of one of them.

On the 22d ult., the Minister of Colonies stated that the prosperity of Cuba has so increased that that colony could now support an annual expenditure of $30,000,000, although her actual expenditure did not exceed $21,000,000.

The correspondent of the New York Tribune, in relation to the resignation of Count von Caprivi resigns as Prime Minister of Prussia, retaining his post as Imperial Chancellor, and becoming, or remaining, Prussian Foreign Minister. This was suggested last week as a possible way out of the difficulty, but it is doubtful whether it does not create more embarrassing complications. Prince Bismarck tried it, and pronounced the separation of the Prussian and Imperial Premieriisms unworkable. What Prince Bismarck could not manage, Count Von Caprivi will hardly carry through; even with Count Von Eulerberg as Prussian Prime Minister to help him, who is able and has administrative experience. There seems to be no prospect of Count Von Caprivi resigning the Chancellorship also, and retire from political life. The Emperor refused to allow him to go; yet the general impression is that Count Von Caprivi is so much weakened that his final withdrawal is only a question of time.

The Imperial bill at this rate is dead; or all those clerical features of it which made it hateful to every man who values religious freedom. It was the Emperor's surrender on a question he had declared vital which made everybody believe his health was giving way. The wisdom of his surrender only makes it the more surprising. He has discovered that public opinion is stronger than he, and that Imperial infallibility has its limits. The immediate future of Germany is the brighter for this unexpected clear-sightedness of her ruler.

A dispatch dated Third Month 23d, from Berlin, states that a conflagration was raging at Immenhausen, a town about 10 miles inland, in Hesse-Nassau. Ninety houses and a number of stables had been burned. The decree prohibiting the export of wheat meal from the ports of the Azof and Black Seas has been repealed, but it is provided that the same quantity of wheat must be imported as wheat meal is exported.

An act excluding the Russian Jewish refugees was made public in Breslau on the 25th ult. It absolutely forbids Jewish immigration. Even Jews with money and Jews whom the Frontier Committee guarantee to support on their journey, and those who have both money and ocean tickets are turned back as long as the act is in force. The Jews have already been shot in attempting to evade the law. The estimate of the number of Jews now seeking to leave Russia is 400,000. A great majority of these have been forcibly removed by Russia from their homes and sent to what is known as the Pale on the borders of Austria, and here they are crowded together and starved to death. "The agricultural Jews of the Son," says the Governor of the Pale in a recent official dispatch to the Minister of the Interior, "are in a terrible plight, and but for the unostentatious charity of Lord Rothschild and his co-religionists in England the death-roll would have been enormous."

NOTICES.

FRIENDS' INSTITUTE.—The Board of Managers propose to inaugurate Botanical and Geological excursions under well qualified leaders, for members of the Friends' Institute, on Seventh-day afternoons in the spring and early summer. Those members who would like to go on these excursions, will please send their names and addresses to the Friends' Institute, 1305 Arch Street, in order that they may be notified as to the time, of dates and other necessary information regarding the excursions.

ELIZABETH N. WOOLMAN, Sec'y.

DIED, at her residence near Springville, Luzerne Co., Iowa, on the 22d of Tenth Month 1891, ELIZABETH C. PATEY, wife of William Patey, in the thirty-second year of her age. She was a much beloved member of Springville Monthly Meeting of Friends. This dear Friend, who was taken from our midst in the bloom of life, gave evidence to those around her, by her patient suffering, of her submission and confidence in the mercy which fell from her lips that she, through faith in the mercy of her Saviour, was favored with a well-grounded hope, that a mansion awaited her.

—, on First Month 10th, 1892, at her late residence near Chester, Delaware Co., Pa., HANNAH L. SHARPLESS, wife of George Sharpless, in the eighty-third year of her age. A member of Chester Monthly and Particular Meetings of Friends.

—, First Month 27th, 1892, at Sapporo, Japan, TOMAS NTOBE, son of Inazo and Mary P. E. Ntobe, aged eight days.

—, at his residence in Cheltenham, Montgomery Co., Pa., Second Month 25th, 1892, JOSEPH JONES, in the seventy-fifth year of his age. A member of Frankford Monthly Meeting of Friends. "Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me."

—, at his residence near Winona, Columbia Co., Ohio, on the 5th of Third Month 1892, JOSEPH STRATTON, in the sixty-seventh year of his age. A member and minister of New Garden Monthly Meeting. During his illness his mind was preserved entirely clear, and he uttered many weighty and comfortable expressions, expressing entire resignation to the Divine will. At the same time he was enabled to arrive at that state where he could say, "Come He or come death, the will of the Lord be done." To a friend who came to visit him he said, "I 'thout hast come to see a poor creature. I never did want to claim much for myself," and added, "His mercies are very great. If it were not for mercy, what would we do. At one time he remarked, "I love a quiet habitation; I will rest in it forever." At another, "The effectual, fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much;" soon after, "I trust in the Lord; his paths are paths of peace." His work, so far as concerned himself, seemed to be done, but his mind, during his illness, was brought under religious exercise on account of others, and he was enabled to impart suitable counsel to some who visited him. On the First-day previous to his close, during the usual meeting hour, he requested those who were about the house to gather into his room, that they might have a solemn sitting together with his voice, which has been feeble for some days, was raised, and he was strengthened to address those about him. Toward the close he supplicated that he might be preserved to the end. At one time exclaimed "Oh! for patience;" at another, "I long to be at rest with Israel!"

FOR "THE FRIEND."

1860.—Third Month 15th. "Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, held this morning, was, I think, unusually large, many young people attending and sitting in a solid manner. I felt drawn to speak of the different periods of life—youth and old age—and the unspeakable comfort and peace of being able to look to the close, with humble trust of being admitted into the everlasting kingdom of the Redeemer. To be thus favored, it is important to lay the foundation in early life; and the visitations of the Holy Spirit are extended to young people, even when they have few opportunities of receiving instruction from mingling with religious friends. The Lord condescends to commune with them, and to show them his blessed will, in relation to those things which are wrong, and his controversy is with. If they obey, He gives power to resist temptations, and turn the back upon them, and thus prepares them to perform his will.

"It seemed to me, the Lord was regarding our present low state, and would visit sons and daughters, and bring them out, to exalt and honor his name and cause; and raise us up as but of the miry clay, and make his glory to shine among us, as in days of old, as in former generations."

"Fourth Month 8th. The anticipation of our approaching Yearly Meeting, has been, at times, attended with feelings of much concern. There has been a great stripping of members of enlarged experience, and understanding in the management of the affairs of the church, under the direction of the great Head. There is a spirit seeking to lay waste Friends, who cannot mix with new principles and practices, or a livid, scattering disposition. Yet I believe the Lord has not forgotten to be gracious, but as we are brought low, and keep sensible that we can do nothing without Him, He helps us, and gives a little renewal of our faith."

"14th. In the Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders, we were favored with holy help; under which I was enabled to set forth the qualification and authority of a minister of Christ. Unsound doctrine could not be Gospel ministry, nor could sentiments, sound in themselves, but declared without Divine authority, have a baptizing effect upon the audience, and be received as the preaching of the Gospel of Christ. While it is needful to guard against creaturely activity, it is also necessary to be aware of the suggestions of Satan, who would induce the timid, cautious ones, to hold back from their duty; and thereby lose their strength, and the meeting be deprived of what the Head of the church designed for its comfort and help."

"Seventh Month 22d. In our meeting at Orange Street, after sitting a long time; the constraining power of Christ led me to break the silence on behalf of those who at times are brought to long for a knowledge of the right way of the Lord, and to obtain reconciliation with Him, and a sense of his Divine approbation. It is He who begets these hungerings after righteousness; and He alone can satisfy them; and as He is obeyed in all his requirements, He will meet the penitent, humbled soul, with the reward of sweet peace."

"Eleventh Month 18th. The different reports of the men sent by Moses to search the land of Canaan, are descriptive of the different voices there are in christendom, on the subject of religion; producing their respective effects upon the people. Those who made false reports were not permitted to enter the promised land; by whom the people were discouraged, and though entreated by Caleb and Joshua, would not go up and take possession of it; but, refusing to obey the will of the Lord, they were turned into the wilderness, as many now are, in a spiritual sense. When they found what awaited them for their disobedience, they determined to go up in their own wills; but having taken the government into their own hands, many were slain by their enemies, who met and destroyed them; and the rest were turned back, to perish in their wilderness abode. So it seems to me, that such as disregard the voice of the Holy Spirit in their hearts, and refuse to obey the Lord's will, are left in a bewildered condition, and fail to find the state of rest and peace which those do who go forward at the Lord's bidding. They are left in a way to be destroyed, if they continue unwilling to receive the Saviour, when He shall again visit their souls with the offers of his mercy and saving light."

"Twelfth Month 2d. This has been a day of deep proving, and fears. In the afternoon meeting, a warning was held forth to those who are at ease; neglecting their day's work, and the calls of Divine grace in the heart. Our Saviour said, 'That many shall come from the east and the west, and shall sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven; but the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness; those who have had many invitations of the Grace of God, but after having these favors, have put off a compliance with the Divine call, to a period at which they may think it will suit their convenience; while they know not at what hour the Son of Man may come to call them to judgment. Some comfort was handed to the suffering seed, who are bearing heavy burdens; who are let down into low places; and under a sense of their nothingness, and the dangers that surround them, are crying to the Lord for protection against the assaults of the evil one."

1861.—Fifth Month 28th. "I went to the Northern District, where I was exercised on the importance of learning and practising patience and resignation to the Divine Will. That as we quietly bore the afflictions and sufferings that come upon us, the Lord would sanctify them to us, and finally turn Satan backward; releasing us from his buffetings and temptations; and causing his own peace and love to flow into our hearts. This would keep out all enmity towards others. And as we were drawing nearer every day to the judgment seat of Christ, we should strive to have our hearts sweetened by his love; and herein the unity of the Spirit would increase among us. We shall never become the Society we were in the beginning, unless all ill-will is cast out, and we show forth the fruits of the Spirit of the Lamb, as Friends did then, under contumely, reproach and persecution, which had a powerful effect to convince others of the truth of their principles; and draw many to join them."

"Sixth Month 10th. We are sometimes in danger of overvaluing ourselves and our attainments, and of being over-estimated by our kind-hearted friends; all of which have their dangerous effects, if not prevented by the daily watch, in the fear of the Lord. This morning, I was particularly abased, under a review of some of the sins of my youth, and the feeling that what I had done in the persuasion of religious duty, when the candle of the Lord shone about me, and opened the way to perform what He required of me, was of but little avail. I felt very much bereft of evidence of Divine regard, so that it was difficult to believe I was an object of the Lord's continued mercy and approbation. But as I have often recommended the essential necessity of experiencing the baptisms of the Holy Ghost and fire, in order to consume thoroughly every impurity, I desired to abide under the present humiliating feelings, and secretly breathed that the Lord would not forsake me; but would cut short the thread of my life, rather than permit Satan to bring reproach by me, upon the blessed truth, as professed by our Society."

"13th. Feeling my mind drawn to the Arch Street Meeting, I went, and through the condescending goodness of the blessed Shepherd of the sheep, I was enabled to hold forth the language of encouragement to those who love the Lord Jesus; of whom I believed there were many preserved. The testimony of the apostle was revived; that 'Tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience, hope; and hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts, by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us.' Whatever may be our tribulations, as this love abides in us, we shall not only love God above everything else, but be brought to love all men; so as to desire their salvation. This path, as we keep the faith and patience of the saints, is a glorious path, and will shine more and more unto the perfect day; in which we shall be made victorious over all the temptations of Satan; and be kept to the end, through the intercession of Christ, who bore the cross for our sakes, and is set down at the right hand of the Father, making intercession for us poor unworthy creatures."

"Eleventh Month. In contemplating the trials and overturnings to which our religious Society has been subjected for many years in this country, I was made to believe a few days since, that the gracious Shepherd was still near to us, and that the time was not very far off, when He would go through his flock, and renew the visitations of his love to the younger members. That He would bestow gifts upon them, to be occupied in his church; and prepare and send forth servants to proclaim and spread the doctrines of the Gospel, and his blessed cause, from sea to sea; and from the rivers to the ends of the earth. Hebry the beauty, and strength, and influence of our Society, in this Yearly Meeting, and in this city, will be restored; and a body of solid and deeply experienced men and women, it appeared to me, would be again raised up as standard bearers, and watchmen upon the walls of Zion. May the Lord hasten it in his time and way; and enable us to continue to bear patiently the sufferings that remain for us to endure; for our own sakes, and for one another, whatever they may be.

"4th. Our Quarterly Meeting for Discipline, was a season of favor. The spring of Gospel ministry was afresh opened; in which several were made partakers; and the open service was closed with prayer, that He, who in mercy had visited us in early days, and been with us all our life, unto this day, would continue to watch over us, warn us of surrounding dangers, and deliver us from them; and that He would visit the young people, and raise up instruments in his blessed cause; to join in spreading the kingdom of his dear Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, from sea to sea, and from the rivers to the ends of the earth."

[It was not long after this, especially as soon occurred the sudden and unexpected termination of the life of his beloved wife, who had long been, as he records, "a most faithful companion, and cheerful, experienced counsellor and comforter," that the labors of our honored friend's remarkably dedicated Christian life seemed to point to their close. The last time he got out to meeting, was in the afternoon of First-day the 30th of Twelfth Month, 1866—being a little over seventy-nine years of age.]

"During his long confinement," wrote his dear and valued brother and biographer, Dr. Charles Evans, "he continued to maintain a lively interest in the welfare of our religious Society; manifesting on different occasions, the earnest travail of his soul, that Friends might be drawn more nearly together in the fellowship of the Gospel, and be willing faithfully to support the doctrines and testimonies, which he believed the great Head of the Church had raised up the Society to exemplify to the world. He was frequently visited by many of his beloved fellow members, ministers and others, and many precious opportunities were thus afforded for retirement before the Lord; and not unfrequently he was clothed with ability to minister to those present; as were others to speak in the language of comfort and encouragement to him. On more than one occasion he expressed his earnest desire that nothing might be said by way of commendation;

nor, unless they felt Divinely authorized, should any speak as though his salvation was secured; for he felt that the watch and the warfare must be continued to the end, if the crown immortal was, through mercy, obtained. Notwithstanding these humble views of himself, and the care he manifested not to presume on any past experiences, he on more than one occasion intimated that his gracious Master had given him the assurance, that when done with time, he should be admitted into everlasting rest."

"During the last few days of his life, he conversed but little; not only because the oppression made it difficult for him to speak, but his mind appeared to be fixed in the contemplation of the change that awaited him, and in being fervently engaged to be found ready when the summons came.

"His decease took place on the morning of the 12th of the Fifth Month, 1867, in the 81st year of his age. 'Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, from henceforth; yea saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them.'"

FOR "THE FRIEND."

WHERE are the watchmen who formerly were found standing on the walls of our Zion? They have passed away, and how are we left? The great vineyard of the Lord has become barren in places, or grown up with noxious weeds, that have choked up every plant that the Lord God had planted therein, leaving an unprofitable waste, thus causing the passer-by to cry out: Where is the God of Israel, who planted this great vineyard, and placed watchmen over it to labor in it and keep it? Have they not turned their faces from the great Lord of the vineyard and gone the way of Baal?

Why wander from our Heavenly Father? There is no place of safety but in his holy enclosure. Let us seek to enter therein, and there remain until the dark clouds that gather around us at times and seasons, have passed away, and the light of his countenance shines in upon us as a Society. Let us keep pace with knowledge as revealed within our own hearts, being obedient to the teaching of our Lord and Saviour; then shall we be found worthy to stand as watchmen upon the walls of our Zion, and be helpful in gathering others to the great Shepherd.

Our Saviour oft retired to some desert place to hold communion with his Father. Let us who are so far isolated from Society, follow his example in retiring often, to wait and know the will of God. Thus shall we be ready to obey Him with a willing and cheerful heart, and be enabled to put on the whole armor of God, whereby we may escape the wounds of sin. Thus, with faith, love and hope in our hearts, we shall be sustained and cheered on our way Zionward. We shall be able to walk and not be weary; run, and not faint by the way.

It is not those that settle down at ease in an outward form of worship, but those that experience the inward work of the Spirit, who will receive the blessed assurance of "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

Come listen to the call of the Lord, ye sons and daughters of Israel. Come taste and see that the Lord is good, then there will be no more wavering in your minds—no more falling away, but a gathering into the great Shepherd's fold. Here is safety for the humble, waiting soul.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 251.

In one of her public documents, Dorothea L. Dix narrates her first visit to Little Compton. As it throws light alike on the courageous mercy with which she went about her work, and on the character of the persons in whose charge such poor wretches were placed, it seems useful to give it.

After investigating carefully the condition of two or three miserable beings confined there and being warned not to go into the cell of Simmons, as he would surely kill her, she proceeds as follows with her narrative:

"Your other patient, where is he?" "You shall see, but stay outside till I get a lantern." Accustomed to exploring cells and dungeons in the basements and cellars of poor-houses and prisons, I concluded that the insane man spoken of was confined in some such dark, damp retreat. Weary and oppressed, I leaned against an iron door which closed the sole entrance to a singular stone structure, much resembling a tomb, yet its use in the courtyard of the poor-house was not apparent. Soon, low, smothered moans and groans reached me, as if from the buried alive. At this moment the mistress advanced, with keys and a lantern. "He's here," said she, unlocking the strong, solid door. A step down, and short turn through a narrow passage to the right, brought us, after a few steps, to a second iron door parallel to the first and equally solid. In like manner, this was unlocked and opened; but so terribly noxious was the poisonous air that immediately pervaded the passage, that considerable time elapsed before I was able to return and remain long enough to investigate the horrible den. Language is too weak to convey an idea of the scene presented.

The candle was remote from the scene, and the flickering rays partly illuminated a spectacle never to be forgotten. The place, when closed, had no source of light or of ventilation. It was about seven feet by seven, and six and a half high. All, even the roof, was of stone. An iron frame interlaced with rope, was the sole furniture. The place was filthy, damp and noisome; and the inmate, the crazy man, the helpless and dependent creature, cast by the will of Providence on the cares and sympathies of his fellow-man—there he stood, near the door, motionless and silent; his tangled hair fell about his shoulders; his bare feet pressed the filthy, wet stone floor; he was emaciated to a shadow, etiolated, and more resembled a disinterred corpse than any living creature. Never have I looked upon an object so pitiable, so woestruck, so imaging despair. I took his hands and endeavored to warm them by gentle friction. I spoke to him of release, of liberty, of care and kindness. Notwithstanding the assertions of the mistress that he would kill me, I persevered. A tear stole over the hollow cheek, but no word answered to my importunities; no other movement indicated consciousness of perception or sensibility.

In moving a little forward I struck against something which returned a sharp metallic sound; it was a length of ox-chain, connected to an iron ring which encircled a leg of the insane man. At one extremity it was joined to what is termed a solid chain—namely, bars of eighteen inches or two feet long, linked together and at one end connected by a staple to the rock overhead.

"My husband," said the mistress, "in winter rakes out sometimes, of a morning, half a bushel of frost, and yet he never freezes;" referring to the oppressed and life-stricken maniac before us. "Sometimes he screams dreadfully," she added, "and that is the reason we had the double wall, and two doors in place of one; his cries disturbed us in the house."

"How long has he been here?"

"Oh, above three years; but then he was kept a long while in a cage first; but once he broke his chains and the bars, and escaped; so we had this built, where he can't get off. Get off! No, indeed; as it might the buried dead break through the sealed gates of the tomb!"

What was the first practicable step toward providing fit accommodation and care for the miserable creatures she had found all over the State of Rhode Island? There already existed a small asylum in the city of Providence, conducted on wise and humane principles. But it was totally inadequate to the demands made on it. Still it furnished a good foundation, and an appeal to the wealthy and humane for means towards its immediate enlargement seemed the wisest present course.

In this juncture was it that the extraordinary power of D. L. Dix to reach the heart and purse of those whom everyone else failed to move showed its first proof. Among the list of persons to whom she resolved to make appeal was Cyrus Butler, a man of large business capacity, who ultimately left an estate of four million dollars, but who, like so many men absorbed in the pursuit of wealth, had contracted a passion for accumulation that rendered it well-nigh impossible to persuade him to give a dollar away. People smiled significantly when D. L. Dix announced her intention of calling upon him, and expressed the usual sentiment about getting "milk out of a stone."

"But none of these things moved her." Her faith in human nature, if only strongly and wisely enough appealed to, was invincible.

Accompanied, therefore, to the house of Butler by Edward B. Hall, D. D., of Providence, who left her at the door, she made the momentous visit. It was a singular visit. For some time, through sheer force of lifelong habit, Butler sought to put her off by diverting the conversation to the familiar but rather unprofitable topic of the weather. So great is the variety of weather in Rhode Island as well as in her sister State of Massachusetts, that whole days might thus have been spent without exhausting the subject. Preserving her temper and self-control, D. L. Dix pleasantly adjusted herself to the humor of the scene, until finally, feeling that the thing had gone far enough, she arose with commanding dignity, and said: "Mr. Butler, I wish you to hear what I have to say, I want to bring before you certain facts, involving terrible suffering to your fellow-creatures all around you—suffering you can relieve. My duty will end when I have done this, and with you will then rest all further responsibility." Then, quietly, clearly, and with suppressed emotion, she told the pathetic story of what she had seen with her own eyes. She told it as though, there in that parlor, were standing for judgment two accountable beings before the tribunal of poor Simmons' avenging God. Cyrus Butler listened, spellbound, till she was through, and then abruptly said, "Miss Dix, what do you want me to do?"

"Sir, I want you to give fifty thousand dollars toward the enlargement of the insane hospital in this city!"

"Madam, I'll do it!" was his answer.

No one who has ever visited the Hospital for the Insane of the Army and Navy, at Washington, D. C., could have set foot within its grounds without exclaiming, "This is the ideal site for an asylum!" Situated at the junction of two broad and noble rivers, the Potomac and the East Branch; commanding a superb view by land and water; gently sloping on all sides from its highest elevation, so as to secure perfect drainage; and embracing within its bounds the most varied charm of wood and pasture, it seems to unite every conceivable advantage. Now at the date of the passage by Congress, in 1852, of an appropriation for founding an asylum for the insane of the army and navy, this beautiful domain was the private property of Thomas Blagden, and, in carefully examining the whole country surrounding Washington, Dr. John H. Nichols, who had labored indefatigably toward the passage of the bill, had made up his mind that there was no other site at all compared with it. Blagden, however, turned a deaf ear to every proposition on the part of Dr. Nichols to buy it. The estate had become endeared to him through the exceptional beauty of its situation, and was, moreover, the especial pride of his wife and daughters. Besides, the full amount appropriated by Congress for the purchase of a site was but twenty-five thousand dollars, and on no consideration, Blagden insisted, would he part with the property at less than forty thousand dollars.

One day, after having exhausted every personal effort, and thoroughly depressed in spirits, Dr. Nichols went in to see D. L. Dix. "There is nothing more to be done!" he exclaimed; "we shall have to give the matter up; and it is the finest site for a hospital in the world!"

D. L. Dix listened without excitement, and then replied in her usual quiet tone, "We must try what can be done!" Seeking a personal interview with T. Blagden, so earnestly and movingly did she reason with him to surrender, for the future good of thousands of his suffering fellow-creatures, what was so precious, indeed, to him and his family, but to one household only, that the appeal proved irresistible, and he gave her his promise of the estate at the amount appropriated by Congress. None the less the parting with it cost him a fearful wrench; for on Dr. Nichols' calling on him the next day, with the requisite papers to sign, Blagden was found walking the room to and fro, weeping and wringing his hands in a half hysteric condition. "I don't want to part with it!" he kept reiterating. "It is dear to me and dear to my family. But I won't break my promise to Miss Dix, I won't break my word! I told her she should have it, and she shall have it."

Such scenes as this do honor to human nature. Indeed, it would be hard to instance a more beautiful tribute to the power of consecrated womanhood than is found in the following letter, so simple, hushed and awestruck in its tone, sent to D. L. Dix by T. Blagden, the evening of the day on which she had thus closed in, in Jacob's angel wrestle, with his deepest nature:

"WASHINGTON, November 13, 1852.

"DEAR MADAM—Since seeing you, to-day, I have had no other opinion (and Mrs. B. also) but that I must not stand between you and the beloved farm, regarding you, as I do, as the instrument in the hands of God to secure this very spot for the unfortunates whose best earthly friend you are, and believing sincerely that the Almighty's blessing will not rest on, nor abide with, those who may place obstacles in your way.

"With Mrs. Blagden's and my own most friendly regards,

"Very respectfully,

"Your obedient servant,

"THOMAS BLAGDEN."

"PREPARE YE THE WAY."—As every Eastern traveller has learned, roads, in our sense of the term, are unknown. True, we have the phrase corresponding to the English "the Queen's highway" (ed-derb sultani), "the sultan's road," but it is a mere track. The feet of camels and horses are the only road-makers in the East; and generation after generation walks round the same boulder, makes a circuit round the same hollow, no man ever dreaming of cutting, leveling, banking up, or draining a road, although the remains of the paved and leveled highways of those master engineers, the Romans, may be seen at every turn. But let a sultan or a shah propose a royal progress, and then all is changed. Pioneers hurriedly sent forward along the whole route, the neighboring population is at once impressed, and compelled to work without pay, the stones are gathered out, the dry watercourses are filled in, the rocks are scarped, the sides of the hills are cut, and the track leveled and guarded. No obstacle delays the monarch's advance. I myself have seen exactly this preparation made, and the road cut and leveled from Jaffa to Jerusalem, to receive the visit of the Prince Imperial of Austria. But it lasts not long. The first rain washes all this loose earth away, and the old rocks and watercourses reappear. Then, when the highway is completed, the heralds are sent forth, proclaiming with trumpet and clarion the advent of the great man. For a royal personage there are three sets of heralds: the first, on the day before his arrival; the second, on the morning of the day; the third, which we should call outsiders, immediately in front.

"WARFARE  ACCOMPLISHED."—This phrase conveys a very special meaning to dwellers in these lands to-day. The "time of service" appointed for every Muslem youth is regarded with dread. Those who have returned speak of the hardships of their military service, and their worn frames only too often afford cogent corroboration of their tales. The joy of return to home and friends, free, can be easily imagined. When the young men are taken away, they are led forth bound and manacled, guarded by soldiers with loaded rifles, followed by troops of weeping friends, who hardly hope to see them again. When the day of release comes round, again the troops of friends go forth, with fife, drum, and cymbal, with singing and dancing, and every demonstration of joy, to welcome them home again. I often watch them coming in from the north, along the seashore, dressed in holiday attire, their music and singing waking the echoes in the old ruins behind us, the returning ones walking in the midst of the process, with a great contentment mirrored in their faces. Their warfare is accomplished.—S. S. Times.

DISCOVERY.—Sir Anthony Ashley, who first planted trees in this country, has a cabbage sculptured at his feet upon his monument; a much more honorable trophy than all the herald's mummery, or the emblems of military prowess. A potato plant would have afforded the noblest crest for Sir Walter Raleigh, were it not deemed more honorable to destroy our fellow-creatures in war, than to minister to their gratification and support in peace.—The Tin Trumpet.

FOR "THE FRIEND."
WINTER WINDS.

Ye winter winds that howling blow,
And whirl the fine and drifting snow,
Against my window pane;
Tell, in what far-off clime of earth
Had your fierce blasts, their pristine birth,
Where will your fury wane?

Methinks I hear you moaning, say,
We come from arctic fields away;
Far in the frozen north;
Where sunlight pales for half the year,
All nature, desolate and drear,
Tis thence we rally forth.

Where Mount Elias' glaucous cone
Is lifted high through cloudy zone,
Wrapt in perpetual snow;
From thence—and from those lonely plains
Through which—released from icy chains
The mighty Yukon flows.

With blizzard breath we swept those fields
Where earth her richest harvest yields,
To feed a hungry world;
And thence, across the "unsalted seas,"
Impetuous swept our chilling breeze,
And icy billows curled.

Careering on our destined way,
We see afar the billows play,
The rocky shores among;
And out o'er ocean's swelling tides,
A summer river gently glides,
The watery wastes along.

'Tis here our chilling blast subsides,
The climes, this gentle stream divides,
We meet with balmy air;
Soft breezes laden with the heat
Of Indian isles with us compete,
And we their mildness share.

In this our course, o'er sea and land,
We but perform what nature planned,
Her purpose to fulfil;
To purify the atmosphere,
From harmful taint the air to clear
Twas shielding life from ill.

These arctic winds and summer gales,
That course our hills and fertile dales,
Alternate reign supreme;
Seed-time and harvest, cold and heat,
Successive rule, in order meet,
Perfecting nature's scheme.

The autumn wealth of golden grains,
That deck our fields and fertile plains
Is labor's just reward;
In sweat of brow our land is tilled,
In sweat of brow our barns are filled;
All things in just accord.

Here art displays her dainty skill,
Makes things of use more pleasing still,
When fashioned by her hand;
And science from her ample store,
Delighted turns her treasures o'er
To meet each new demand.

GOD'S WORK GOES ON.

BY JOSEPHINE POLLARD.

God's work goes on in spite of war and famine,
The dreadful pestilence, or baneful blight,
In spite of all the selfish greed of man,
That toils amid the shadows of the night;
In spite of evil hearts and hands essaying
To crush the temple that we build upon,
The law and order so divine obeying,
Unmoved by man's device—God's work goes on.

Not always in a radiance of splendor,
The brilliant dazzling of the noontide sun,
But in an atmosphere serene and tender
His mightiest miracles are daily done;
And though short-sighted and dull-witted mortals
Themselves against his majestic array,
Nor give Him entrance through the heart's closed portals,
God's work goes on, and will not make delay.

No human power can interrupt its mission:
As well attempt the planets to remove,
Or change a single star from the position
It holds amid the galaxy above;
And so when all our plans prove unavailing,
When busy hands and throbbing hearts are stilled,
Doubt not, but rest assured that still unfailing
God's work goes on—his plans are all fulfilled.

FOR "THE FRIEND."
THE SLEET STORM OF FIRST MO., 1892.

Never did I see such beauty
Clothe the wintry earth before;
Never saw such robes of splendor
Wrought from Nature's richest store.

Day reveals ten thousand sparkles
From the robes of crystal white,
Like the starry host of heaven
In the diadem of night.

And the moon, from skies unclouded,
Weaves in tree-tops many a wreath,
For admiring eyes to feast on;
Stars above and stars beneath.

Did the sunlight, moonlight, starlight,
Ever see on earth before
Rainbow'd robes of regal beauty,
Such as these the landscape o'er?

How I wish that all the dear ones
Dwelling nigh affliction's rod
Might behold the matchless beauty
In this handwork of God;

That the dwellers in the cities
Might these crystal wonders see,
Clothing all the fields with beauty,
Gilding every shrub and tree.

As I've seen the starry beauties
In each icy, sun-bathed crown,
It has seemed a glimpse of heaven,
To the earth sent gently down.

And, with heart too full for utterance
For these beauties to us given,
I have thought, if these be earth-born,
What the glories up in heaven?

In that city with foundations
Set with gems of purest ray,
And whose pearly gates are open,
Open through eternal day.*

Where the sun is never needed,
Moon or stars in splendor bright;
For 'tis God himself enlightens
And the Lamb thereof is light.
Where "ten thousand times ten thousand"
Shining angels round the throne
Sing the songs of praise triumphant
Due the "Lamb and God alone."†

May such scenes of earthly beauty
Gently draw our thoughts above
Came our hearts to seek the haven
Of the Father's perfect love.

MANY who gave proof that they were the visited children of the Lord our God, who had covenanted with Him, and for a time evidently confirmed the same by sacrifice; but for want of continuing to walk wisdom daily, to go in and out before the Lord with acceptance, (for I find if we are favored to possess it we must daily ask wisdom of Him who still fails not to grant liberally); and by giving the things of this world the preference—riches and greatness—they have been suffered to obtain their heart's desire, but it has been evident that which they thus coveted did not come alone, but attended with its never-failing companions—leanness of soul and unfruitfulness toward God.—Thomas Shillito.

24th. Took train at 8 A. M. for Glacier House. We pass through vast burnt forests of "cedar" and fir, and among dense groves of aspens by the river's side, ever higher among the mountains and lakes of the Gold Range, past Craigellaebic and Summit Lake, 2,000 feet above the sea and 500 above the Columbia River, only eight miles distant. Shooting down the slope we quickly emerge upon the banks of the far-famed Columbia, which we cross upon a bridge half a mile long, and enter the station of Revelstoke upon the left bank.

Before reaching Revelstoke the Columbia has travelled three hundred miles from its source in the Rockies, around the Selkirk Range a hundred miles farther north, past Bolden (where we will cross it again), to the 52d parallel, and then southward to this point. Revelstoke is at the head of navigation, and steamers of the tug and hind-wheel pattern ply between this point and Colville, just south of the United States boundary. The river here, like all large streams of the region, is a deep boiling flood of swift, putty-colored water and, independently of its surroundings, has no beauty.

Around Revelstoke the mountains are snow-laden and we take on the observation car again. The crowd which take possession of it indicate the kind of scenery we are likely to find. This is to be the finest day's journey on the line, from a scenic stand-point. All the Revelstoke Mountains are fire-swept and desolate looking. Indeed this has so far been the rule all along the road.

Below Revelstoke the first track-sheds appear along the steep bluffs, some to shunt snow and others falling boulders, from the track.

A lot of "personally-conducted" excursionists are on board the train, and most of them are here in the observation car. All of them know each other, and there is much of a social nature sandwiched between views. Most of them are United States people, but one, if I mistake not, is a Britisher, namely, the man who dropped his cane and waited for his wife to pick it up. The way I looked at him has made him suspicious of me ever since, and now he leaves the car. There is a girl, with interrogating little finger, who spends a full hour talking to a young man and eating huckleberries from a potted-tongue can. Two Kodak ladies are always hesitating whether that's the best view till too late, then snapping at it out of range, and sorry ever after when a better view presents itself. The train stops for a five-minute view of Albert Cañon, hardly worth the trouble of dismounting. The Twin Buttes, however, here present their best front, and in consequence the camerists must be dragged, half-fainting, onto the moving train before they take it in.

Again we pass through interminable lengths of shedding, these happening, of course, just as the view transforms from sublime to appalling, and though we were fain to shut our eyes that very moment, it don't suit to have it done that way.

Thus every dark passage draws reproachful remarks from the ladies—"how aggravating;" "it's too rude"—"as if something was going on that wouldn't bear daylight.

With heavy engines fore and aft we now begin to climb the Loop to the Glacier House.

Without doubt this Loop, in beauty and variety of surroundings, surpasses those of the Southern Pacific Railroad, through the Shasta and Siskiyou Mountain ranges of California and Oregon, but it is on a far smaller scale. The Selkirk Loop is not more than four miles long below Glacier Station, and rises above the Illecillewaet only a few hundred feet, while that at Siskiyou, above Ashland, is fifteen or twenty miles long, and where it passes through the mountain top emerges at an elevation of 4,000 feet above the wooded slopes that fringe the broad fertile valley of Rogue River.

We reached Glacier House, the beautifully-situated Canadian Pacific hotel, about one o'clock p. m. The Great Selkirk Glacier reaches down from Mount Donald to within a mile of the railroad, and can be seen stretching up and away among the crowding peaks while you stand on the porch and feel the driving spray and hear the roar of the Illecillewaet bounding by. Having registered, and partaken one of the best of dinners, I struck out for the Glacier.

Coming to a rustic seat, I stop to pen the following:—Tremendous and varied scenery is here crowded and heaped together. Nature was in an extravagant mood when she fashioned this amphitheatre for the sportive elements. The rustic bridge, where I stand now, is in the midst, and everything about me seems to converge here to a focus: the bridge timbers tremble with the violence of the icy torrent, and are drenched with its bounding spray. A chill rush of air pushes you against the railing with mysterious power as you cross. A ring of glacier and fir-capt summits hem the view on every side, seeming less to rise above than crowd in upon the scene, and the very trees lean out and gaze into the deep arena like interested spectators on some dark tragedy. The air's a little rare and the sun hot, so after a short scramble I'm on a log again in the shade of slim columnar firs. A pair of dainty Golden-crown Kinglets overhead tell me how near winter it is here, and the quick heart-beats and gasping breath, of my increasing altitude above the sea. For a minute all is desolation; the path leading over the wreck of a tremendous avalanche—boulders, rocks and sand half hid in a terrible network of logs, trees, stumps and brushwood over acres of ground. Close upon this grow fairest spruces, their roots bedded in mosses, fern and trillium vines. Having crossed the rocky level space between the glacier foot and the terminal moraine, which marks the retreat of the glacier during the summer, crossing with difficulty several turbulent streams coming from other sources, I sit down facing the glacier, with the sun at my back.

Direct sunshine laughs in Winter's face, but Jack Frost grins in his shadow, and while the thermometer registers 100° between my shoulders, face and hands are bathed in a temperature of 33°—a state of affairs too startlingly like that experienced by an unfortunate in Dante's Inferno, to be comfortable. By slowly revolving around your backbone once in five minutes this situation may be compromised, not only with safety but with a fair conception of the grandeur and beauty of your surroundings. With one foot on the sharp edge of the glacier and the other treading a stone that has just freed itself from the ice-grip, I stand and look along, at an angle of 20°, over the swelling plateau to where it rises abruptly in white fantastic nusses a mile beyond and loses itself on the opposite slope of the mountain. The water drips and tunnels out under the ice foot, and, gathering volume, leaps across the stony levels of the moraine into the clustering aspens, which seem crowding up the slope to receive it. Just here the water is not clear, but white with the sediment of grinding quartz and limestone rocks, but further to the left the main torrent issues pure and crystalline from beneath the ice. There a sudden sense of gladness seems to take possession of the century-prisoned waters. As they roar and gallop down the steep the effect is a most inspiring one. The terminal moraine reminds one of the rounded debris of a limestone quarry piled up in a semicircular form around the base of the glacier, like the shattered ruins of a huge fortress. The lateral moraines, three in number, are far larger and more extensive, being forced up against the mountain sides, in long precipitous ridges, by the tremendous weight and wedging power of the glacier.

At this season the base of the glacier is solid ice, and no snow is found till you get 1,000 feet higher, there being no precipitation in the summer months below that level, except as rain. Owing to the mixture of earthy matter in its surface, the face of the glacier presents a gray appearance. In the crevasses this changes to a pale sea-green color, which exhibits in changing lights an astonishing play of opalescent and iridescent hues. The very water-drops in these weird chasms assume the same evanescent tints as we stoop to drink them. Wonders have just begun. At my first turn a great rock, fast-rooted in the mountain, disputes the ice king and has cleft a deep wound in his side, where I may stand, in a crystal palace older than history, stranger than fiction, and fairer than the art of all the Russias.

How this climbing gives a fine edge to feeling, a tension to the nerves, and makes one courageous, skilful. I've just passed a most dangerous piece of perpendicular climbing by pressing hands and knees against a narrow flume, and ascending like a chimney sweeper over the wall of rocks. Over this obstruction I reach the top of a great moraine. The shift of scene to this vantage point belittles and shames me. What I had taken to be the main body of the glacier proves to be the instep. All my leaping and crawling in the past two hours has just brought me on a level with the monster's great toe. This precious member has dashed itself against a stone and split into terrible fragments, some lying heaped on the side of the moraine, others rising in fantastic, fan-like shapes like the frozen waves of a storm-driven sea. Three hundred feet above, another glacier-born torrent from invisible regions beyond, leaps out of a vast wall of rock, falls a hundred feet, rushes down the stony grade past me with a roar, and over the brink of another precipice into deep unconsciousness.

It is six o'clock. Now I descend, and so does the sun, behind opposing mountains. Everything seems descending.

(To be concluded.)

"In the Tenth Month, 1803, I met with a very close trial. Going with some relatives to visit a friend's family in a social way, when we arrived, their dog flew at me and bit me; but they seemed to make light of it; which tried my temper very much. Oh! my brittleness and proneness to anger! Shall I ever get away from it? The night following I got but little sleep! Oh! the need of great watchfulness to guard against this weakness. It is like the dead flies in the apothecary's ointment; and that hurts me worse than the bite of the cross dog!"—John Hunt.

Faith.

"This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent." (John vi: 29.)

"Jesus [is] the author and finisher of our faith." (Heb. xii: 2.)

"For by grace are ye saved, through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God." (Eph. ii: 8.)

Grace is the outstretched hand of mercy; faith the power and will begotten of God in man, to lay hold of the same. As "the grace of God, that bringeth salvation, hath appeared to all men," (Tit. ii: 11), so "God hath dealt to every man a measure of faith," (Rom. xii: 3).

The Apostles' prayer to their Lord was, "Increase our faith," (Luke xvii: 5). And as to degrees of faith, Jesus gently rebuked his disciples with, "O ye of little faith," and of the Roman centurion he said, "I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." (Luke vii: 9).

As men may "do despite to the spirit of grace," (Heb. x: 29), may turn a deaf ear to its warnings and warnings, and thus place themselves outside the pale of grace, so also "the sons and daughters of God" may, through unwatchfulness, forget the rock that begat them, and "become children in whom is no faith," (see Deut. xxxii: 18, 20), yet even then, as Jesus wept over Jerusalem, so doth God wait to be gracious so long as their day of visitation lasteth.

The condition of man as fallen from his state of innocence in the creation is graphically depicted by the inspired writer in these words: "God * * * saw that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." (Gen. vi: 5). In this fallen, earthly state, "there is no man that sinneth not," (1 Kings, viii: 46). Is it not, then, evident that this evil, bitter rock, could never bear such a heavenly fruit as faith? But as "where sin abounded, grace did much more abound," (Rom. v: 20), so the dawn of faith, which dawn is the belief that there is a God, "and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him," (Heb. xi: 6), is made so plain to every man's conscience by the light of the Gospel, that it becomes to man a self-evident truth, the denial of which marks a sad state of moral corruption. God is the Creator, Preserver and Saviour of all men, (Isaiah xliii: 3, 11). His love, pity and mercy followed man in that state of darkness and death, into which sin had plunged him, and the Lord devised a way, a highway, whereby man thus separated by sin from purity, bliss, and the enjoyment of God's presence, might again be restored to the same; but to do this it becomes absolutely necessary that man should be separated from sin, which caused the offence. This way is Christ and the faith which is by Him. He who is "the light of the world," the life of God in the soul of man, comes with life and power to redeem those for whom He hath paid the ransom. He quickens the soul, and openeth the eye of the understanding, that man may see his transgressions; but this is not to make men more miserable, for Christ is the power of God, to salvation, and his light manifesteth his presence and He brings with Him life and power to obey, that man may overcome sin, cease to do evil and learn to do righteousness.

And no man need despair of God's mercy, or that his day of visitation hath expired, whilst he feels any reproofs for sin or any earnest desires for life and to do good; otherwise they are past feeling and alienated from the life of God (see Eph. iv: 19.) * Whilst ye have light, believe in the light, that ye may be the children of light." (John xii: 36).

The Holy Scriptures bear abundant testimony as to how man comes into possession of this saving faith. The Apostle Paul declares, "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." (Rom. x: 17.) Again, the Apostle writing to the Colossians says, "the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature which is under heaven; and this is the Gospel of which the Apostle said, 'I am made a minister.'" (Col. i: 23.) Let, then, no man take away from the blessed fullness, life and power of this glorious gospel of Jesus Christ, nor deny to others that to which he himself as yet may be blind; but humbly acknowledging his blindness come to Him "who maketh the deaf [to] hear the words of the book, and the eyes of the blind [to] see out of obscurity and out of darkness." (Isaiah xxxix: 18.)

This word of faith, of which Moses wrote and the Apostles preached, is the foundation of the saints in all ages. It is the revelation of God and of his will towards us by his Holy Spirit, which is the promise of the Father, and comes in the name and power of Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God. God thus revealed the saving knowledge of himself, and the promise of the Saviour to Eve, to Enoch, to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and many such revelations are recorded in Scripture. But Christ, not then having come in the flesh, the Lord descended, by the ministry of angels, to confirm that faith.

As "God is light," and his Son "is the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world," this light is then the Spirit of Christ, the same which was in the prophets and testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and which now seals the same to our understanding, making us partakers with them and heirs of the same faith. Job by faith testified, "I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth," (Job xix: 25), and this he knew by the teaching of the Light, Grace or Spirit of God, and so came into possession of the faith of Christ, and patience of the saints.

John the Baptist knew Jesus to be "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world," by the revelation of God's Spirit, (see John i: 33), and our Saviour declared to Peter on his confession of Him to be the Son of God "Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in Heaven," (Matt. xvi: 17). This same Holy Spirit of promise which is by the coming and preaching of Jesus, more abundantly poured out on all nations, is to "reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment," (John xvi: 8.) "He shall show you things to come," (John xvi: 13.) "He shall testify of me," (John xv: 26.) "He will guide you into all truth." He shall teach you all things.

Jesus said, "Verily, verily * * He that receiveth whomsoever I send, receiveth me; and he that receiveth me receiveth Him that sent me." (John xiii: 20.) Therefore he that receiveth the Spirit of Truth, "whom," said Jesus, "I will send unto you from the Father," receiveth Christ, and receiving Christ, he receiveth God who sent him. To receive is to believe in and obey, and as Christ through the Spirit obeyed the Father and kept his commandments, and so abode in his love, so shall we if we obey the Spirit, keep the commandments of Jesus and abide in his love; and Christ's sure promise is to such "and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with Him." (John xiv: 23.)

To those who hear and obey, Christ is as truly present as ever He was with his disciples "in the days of his flesh." He is to the true believer a present Saviour, delivering us from the power of our souls' enemies, and cleansing us from the guilt and power of sin.

All men are either in the way to life or the way to death, and as the tree falls so it lies. We all have sinned and come short of the glory of God, therefore are all in need of that love and mercy of God in Christ Jesus, which our Heavenly Father hath extended to every man. Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, came from the Father's bosom, to restore that which was lost, and he hath opened up a new and living way through faith in his blood, whereby we are created anew in Christ Jesus, and receive the adoption of sons. Having died for all men, He visits all men by his Holy Spirit, and there is no sinner but what has at times, received some reproof for sin. God taketh from them his peace, and setteth before them the end of their course unless they return and repent at his reproof.

To such as "do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil * * but glory, honor and peace to every man that worketh good." (Rom. i: 9, 10.) So all are left without excuse, for to all souls comes this true witness for God. These reproofs of wisdom, if obeyed, are the way of life. As we turn to this light, it is none other than He, who of himself said, "I am the light of the world," the same of whom David wrote, "The Lord is my light and my salvation," (Psalms xxvii: 1.) If we diligently give heed to his reproofs, and walk in obedience thereto, the Divine promise will be verified. "I will pour out my spirit unto you, I will make known my words unto you," (Prov. i: 23). Having thus been turned from unrighteousness to righteousness, from darkness to light, we come to walk in the light. To the Corinthians, who had so done, the Apostle Paul wrote, and the same is applicable to all true believers, "but ye are washed, ye are sanctified, but ye are justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the Spirit of our God," (1 Cor. vi: 2.)

This divine preacher, whose word is heard by every creature under heaven, brings with him to those who incline the ear and hear, the word of faith with power, and the word of reconciliation, for "as God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself," so are we, as we come to walk in the light, reconciled to God. Oh, the precious gifts in store for the obedient ones, pardon and remission of sins through Christ's atoning blood, a new heart, a new spirit, new and holy desires, wisdom, knowledge, sanctification, justification, restoration, redemption and eternal glory. This is the saving faith of Jesus.

W. W. B.

AND as we walk in the light, we shall grow in grace, and add to our faith virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly-kindness and charity; "by which [as Peter said] an entrance will be ministered unto us abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of Christ." A right spirit will come to be exalted in us, and to have the alone rule and government over us; and under the government of a right spirit, we shall bring forth a right conversation, acceptable in the sight of God.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Operating on a Tiger.—Dr. Houghton, the curator of the Dublin Zoological Society, discovered that one of the tigers was lame. Upon examining its paws through the bars of the cage, he found that a claw was growing inward into the ball of the foot, causing the poor brute great agony whenever it tried to walk. The doctor determined to cut out the claw.

Five keepers assisted him, three in front of the cage and two behind. The tiger was lassoed and, much against his will, tied down, the five keepers firmly holding the rope. The doctor then raised the bars, entered the cage and began operating.

But he had forgotten to guard himself against the tigris in the cage adjoining. She managed to reach him with one paw and knocked off his hat. The keepers, seeing this, took fright, let go the rope and fled, leaving the doctor at the mercy of his patient. The tiger jumped up and prepared to spring, but the doctor jumped through the raised bars and pulled them down. Against them the tiger dashed, gnashing and foaming with fury.

The doctor called the keepers together and reprimanded them for their cowardice. Then he locked the doors, put the keys in his pocket, and said:

"I intend to perform this operation, whatever happens. You will fix the lasso again, and if you let go the rope this time I can escape, and you will be left with the tiger."

The men behaved bravely, the troublesome claw was successfully removed and was afterward worn by the doctor as a scarf-pin.

From that time, whenever the tiger heard its friend's footstep, it would throw itself on its back, purr, roll about to attract his attention, and would never be satisfied till he approached and recognized it.—Youth's Companion.

Cunning Gulls.—An example of the cunning of gulls was observed at Tacoma, when several alighted on a bunch of logs that had been in the water for a long time, with the submerged sides thick with barnacles. One was a big gray fellow, who seemed to be the captain. He walked to a particular log, stood on one side of it, close to the water, and then uttered peculiar cries. The other gulls came and perched on the same side of the log, which, with their combined weight, rolled over several inches. The gulls, step by step, kept the log rolling until the barnacles showed above the water. The birds picked eagerly at this food, and the log was not abandoned until every barnacle had been picked.

Deterioration of Soils.—The annual report of the Pennsylvania State College, located in Centre Co., contains an instructive table, showing the market value of the fertilizers needed to replace $10 worth of various farm products at average prices. According to this table, the farmer who sells $10 worth of wheat sells with it about $2.58 of the nitrogen, phosphoric acid and potash, on which the fertility of the soil depends. This $2.58 may be regarded as so much taken from his capital—the stored-up fertility of his soil. Hence the need of manuring to replace this waste.

The loss of the fertilizing materials in selling hay varies from about $5 to $9 in every $10 worth of hay. This increased loss is probably due to the fact that hay commands a smaller price per pound than grain, so that larger amounts of it must be sold to obtain the same sum of money. The waste in dairy and meat products is much less in proportion.

Codfish off Alaska.—Large Fishing Banks Where a Great Industry may be Developed.—Fish is one of the most abundant products of Alaska, and the fact that it is procured so easily insures the most thriffllest with an easy means of subsistence. Perhaps it is not known generally that the codfishing banks along the eastern part of the Aleutian chain and in Behring Sea may supply this country with most of the codfish it consumes. Two San Francisco firms are in the Alaskan codfish business at the Shumakin Islands, south of the Alaska peninsula and in Behring Sea. Their catch in 1890 amounted to 1,138,000 fish, valued at $569,000. The business is increasing in importance, and no one knows yet of what development it is capable. In fact nothing was known of the extent and value of the banks until systematic investigations were made a while ago by the United States Fish Commission. A bulletin recording the results of these explorations in 1888 on the Albatross was issued a year ago. The report contained a full account of the fishing banks discovered, and recorded the belief that the entire submerged plateau from off Unalaska Island to Fairweather is one immense fishing bank.

Governor Lyman E. Knapp, of Alaska, in his latest annual report, enumerates a number of these banks that were discovered during the Albatross's voyage. There is a bank called Polatch, extending northeasterly from the eastern end of Kadiak Island about 115 miles. Shumakin bank, from ten to forty miles south of the Shumakin Islands, has an area of about 4,400 square miles. Albatross bank, off the southeastern side of Kadiak, has an area of 3,700 square miles. Davidson bank, southeast of Unimak Island, has an area of 1,600 square miles. The Sannak bank, southeast of Sannak, has about 1,300 square miles. In Behring Sea the finest cod are taken, but the boundaries of the banks are not defined. It is known that codfish abound off the coast west of Bristol Bay for more than 100 miles, and about twenty miles north of Unimak Pass eastward to Bristol Bay. Fairweather ground also gives evidence of the presence of these fish in large numbers. In several localities off the shore in southeastern Alaska cod are caught for local use, but no careful investigation has been made of the grounds with reference to a determination of the extent and value of the banks.—New York Sun.

The Spectroscope in Astronomy.—Sir Robert Ball, in his interesting article on the new astronomy in "The Fortnightly," waxes justifiably enthusiastic on the triumphs of spectroscopic photography in extending our knowledge of the heavens. The movements of the stars in a direct line to or from us, which were not noticeable on merely telescopic examination, are now measured with wonderful exactness. Stars at such a distance that, if they were brought ten times nearer is would still be too far away for measurement by the ordinary processes of the observatory, are now their diameter gauged. It is surely, says Sir Robert Ball, a noteworthy epoch in the history of astronomy when, for the first time, we are able to apply the celestial calipers to gauge the diameter of a star. * * * Who would have predicted some few years ago that the spectroscope was to be the instrument to which we should be indebted for the means of putting a measuring tape around the girth of a star. Of the dark satellite of the variable star Algol so such has been deduced by the aid of the new spectroscopic methods that Sir Robert Ball is able to say: "Here is an object which we have never seen, and apparently never can expect to see, but yet we have been able not only to weigh it and to measure it, but also to determine its movements."—London News.

Indian Children.—General Morgan, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in an article in the New York Independent, pleads for the same charity in estimating the educational progress of the Indian children which we accord to our own offspring. He shows that the Indian child enters school with many disadvantages—one is the ignorance of the English language; and another, the want of the preparation derived from early training in cultivated families.

The Home Mission Committee of London Yearly Meeting.—A correspondent of The British Friend expresses his views of the practical results of the establishment of that Committee as follows: Perhaps it is not too much to say that in looking back over the ten years that have passed since this step was taken, the fears of those to whom the first proposal was unsatisfactory, have been more than realized. The workings of the new system, limited though it has been in this country, have in the judgment of many, told unfavorably on the Ministry in our meetings—on the sense of responsibility in small churches, and on the unity with which London Yearly Meeting has been so long favored. In this un-Quakerly procedure the Society has in some measure practically retraced its steps, and gone back to a cumbersome and artificial line of action which it had once, and on principle definitely abandoned. It has admitted into its organization the germs of the "one-man system," with all the risk, and with already some of the results of its paralyzing influences. The tone of many of our Meetings and much of our Ministry has been distinctly lowered by this unhappy and inconsistent policy. Faith in silent waiting and all that it implies has been disparaged, and the spirit that feeds on words has been roused, and is manifesting itself in a way of unpromising ways.

The Best Argument for Christianity.—Great men are not required to confute the cavils of unbelievers. Any Christian can do that. A good life is the only argument needed. "For so is the will of God, that by well-doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men." The best answer to objections against Christianity is a Christian life. This argument is unanswerable. By the grace of God every believer can frame this argument.—Christian Advocate.

A Rebuke to Infidelity.—At a recent meeting in New York City, in honor of Frederick Douglass, one of the speakers had the poor taste to make an attack on Christianity, and called upon the negroes present not to follow the God of the whites, or any God who had permitted slavery in the world. After he had finished, Chauncey M. Depew, who followed in turn, called the attention of the colored people to the fact that slavery was universal in the world when Christ appeared upon the earth; and just as far as the true spirit of Christianity had extended, slavery had disappeared. This reply aroused great enthusiasm in the audience.

A National Disgrace.—The Board of Directors of our proposed World's Exposition recently resolved to allow exhibitors of various kinds of intoxicating liquors to sell the same within the enclosure on each day upon which the Exposition is opened, provided that a reasonable share of the profits goes into the treasury of the Exposition aforesaid!

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 9, 1892.

The regulations adopted by the Society of Friends for the transaction of its church business and for the regulation of the conduct of its members—collectively known as the "Discipline"—is not the product of a set of men who had undertaken the task of compiling a systematic set of rules; but is the result of the deliberations of the Church during successive generations, on questions that arose from time to time, and on which the body, guided as we believe by its Holy Head, issued advices or instructions, which are collected for the information of our members in the Book of Discipline.

The severe persecutions to which our early Friends were exposed, involving imprisonment and loss of property, soon rendered it apparent that there would be a service in the organizing of meetings which should look after the wants of prisoners and the families of such as were in need, should see that all things were reputable and orderly in the cases of proposed marriage, and should exercise a care that the members lived in a manner consistent with the principles they professed. Thus Monthly Meetings became established, as the executive bodies of the Society. Although George Fox met with considerable opposition in their introduction from some who feared their liberties would be unduly curtailed, yet the manifest advantages connected with them soon opened the way for their permanent establishment among Friends.

The Yearly Meetings were originally composed of the ministering Friends, who naturally assembled at intervals to consider the cases of those under sufferings, the spiritual interests of those whom they had been instrumental in convincing of the Truth; and other matters connected with the spread of the kingdom of Christ among men.

In the Annual Epistle issued by this Body in 1675, it is recommended that the Friends of every Quarterly Meeting send up a faithful, understanding Friend, to meet with Friends at London, so that they may advise together for the help of those under suffering, so as to put a stop to their persecutors and destroyers. These representatives joined with the ministers constituted the Yearly Meeting. In process of time, other solid Friends were allowed to sit with these, until gradually the door was opened to admit all in membership who walked orderly. But the practice of sending representatives is still continued, although with us but few duties devolve upon them, except naming the Clerk and Assistant.

The Journal of John Hunt, a minister residing near Moorestown, N. J., illustrates the manner in which many of the provisions of our Discipline were framed, to meet the cases which arose from time to time. He mentions that, at a Yearly Meeting in Philadelphia in 1796, he was on a committee concerning a case brought from Rahway, of a mulatto woman that had requested to be received amongst Friends; and of whom they gave a very favorable account, but could not unite in receiving her on account of her color; so they brought the case to this Yearly Meeting. When the committee met, Martha Routh, from England, Mary Miffin, Ann Miffin, and a considerable number of other weighty, wise, solid women Friends, and likewise a number of men Friends who were not of our committee, attended, and gave in their testimony and views in a solid manner; and it was a heart-tendering season. Jacob Lindley, Samuel Smith and John de Marsillac also appeared zealous in behalf of this cause; and it was unanimously agreed that there never was any Discipline amongst Friends to prohibit any from being received into membership on account of color or nation, whatsoever. We therefore reported to the Yearly Meeting, that Monthly Meetings should be considered at liberty to receive all such, when they were convinced of their sincerity, without distinction of nation or color; with which the meeting very heartily united.

In our Book of Discipline, this provision will be found with the date 1796 formal code.

The Discipline is not a mere formal code of laws, with regulations adapted to every particular case that may arise, but it is also a declaration of principles to be applied as best wisdom may point out.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement shows a decrease of $1,256,362 during Third Month. Total cash in the Treasury, $800,762,212.

The Supreme Court of the United States on the 4th inst. decided the case of O'Neal a dealer, of Whitehall, New York, who filled orders for liquors received from Rutland, Vermont, sending the jugs by express, and marked "c. o. d.," the persons ordering paying express charges. O'Neal was indicted under the laws of Vermont, forbidding unlicensed sale of intoxicants. After trial he was convicted of 307 offences, the fines amounting to $6,140, and it was adjudged that O'Neal should remain imprisoned three days for each dollar of fine or costs unpaid, which would amount to 19,914 days if none of the fines or costs were paid. One month's additional imprisonment was also ordered, with additional imprisonment in case of the fines not being paid. The Supreme Court, Judge Blatchford delivering the opinion, held that the sale was made in Vermont, and that the large aggregate sentence imposed did not bring the case into conflict with the constitutional provision prohibiting cruel and unusual punishment any more than could the fact that sentences of a large number of burglaries might result in imprisonment for life. There was no Federal question involved of violation of the Inter-State Commerce clause of the Constitution. Justices Field, Harlan and Brewer dissented.

The Legislature of Mississippi adjourned finally on the 23d inst. One of its last acts was to amend a section in the crimes chapter of the new Constitution, as follows: "Any news dealers who shall offer for sale any newspaper or publication containing a letter advertisement shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to imprisonment for six months."

On the 31st ult. a cyclone swept over Kansas and Nebraska, and portions of Missouri, Iowa, South Dakota and other States. In Kansas alone it is estimated that thirty-five persons were killed and that the number will probably reach fifty. One man was fatally injured in St. Louis by the collapse of a wall, and two persons were killed in other portions of the State; one man was killed at Winterset, Iowa, and there were five victims of the storm in Texas.

Later she was situated at the Hotel de Maximilian, and after the famous Cinco de Mayo, followed the fortune of Emperor Iturbide.

A woman and six girls, named Harvey, were arrested on the 4th inst. at Salmon City, Idaho, for stage robbery. They were dressed in male attire, and one of the girls said she had been trained to the business by their father and mother.

Thirteen members of the North United Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, three of whom were elders, have withdrawn from the church because a majority of the congregation decided to introduce instrumental music in the church service.

Of the whole number, 230 were males and 220 females; 53 died of pneumonia; 49 of consumption; 39 of diseases of the heart; 24 of age; 17 of Bright's disease; 16 of convulsions; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 15 of apo-

FOREIGN.—In course of a long article on the situation in India, growing out of the fall in the price of the rupee, the London Times of the 4th inst., says:

From the time of the demonetization of silver in 1875 to the passage of the Bland Bill, India has been helpless. She sees her currency the plaything of foreign legislation. The present rates of exchange are an intimation to everybody and to every firm with money invested in India that they may soon have to write off its value one-half of what it was valued at twenty-five years ago. As far as can be seen the rupee has not yet reached its lowest value, and that it will scarcely reach its lowest price until the American Treasury continues to make enforced purchases of silver.

The coal strike has brought about an alarming amount of distress in the North of England. The River Tyne is literally blocked. Vessels are unable to get up the river, and are rotting at anchor.

The French Senate has decided, by a vote of 134 to 104, that the working time of factory women as well as of children should be limited to eleven hours daily.

On the 30th ult., Leon Ravachol, a notorious criminal, was caught by the gendarmes of Paris. He was held responsible for the recent explosions in that city, and more recently it is said that he has made a full confession.

A dispatch of the 30th, from Paris, says: In accordance with the decision of the Government to adopt the most stringent measures to repress the Anarchists, and for their expulsion from France were to-day communicated to forty of the leading foreign Anarchists in Paris. No actual crime is charged against these men, but the authorities are determined to prevent them from committing any acts of violence here. They are known to be hand-in-glove with the French Anarchists, and it is believed they will be far less dangerous if they are driven from the country. Several other Anarchists, who were warned a short time ago to leave France, paid no attention to the warning and gave no sign that they intended to depart. To-day they were taken in charge by the police and conducted to the New York.

The New York correspondent of the Tribune of last week, says: The political situation in Berlin continues confused, but it is clear that the old order of things is broken up. The Catholics cannot forgive the Emperor for his change of front on the Education question. They have expressed their opinion of his desertion, as they take it to be, putting his Ministry in a minority in the Reichstag on a question peculiarly Imperial. The Reichstag by seventy majority refused to vote money for a corvette which the Emperor wants. The way is still his, and he renews this vote with the hope that he may be equally bitter to him to feel that he has lost control of the Reichstag and lost touch with the country.

He was a very kind and affectionate toward his family and friends, and often expressed the gratitude which he felt for any tokens of interest in his spiritual welfare. Many seasons of mental conflict were his portion, but some days before his departure he obtained peace, and removed, and we believe that he felt that peace for which he had longed so earnestly, and could truly accord the language, "Thy will be done." He passed quietly away, leaving with his friends the comforting belief that he has entered into rest.

Memorial of Joseph Scattergood.

A Testimony of Birmingham Monthly Meeting of Friends, Pennsylvania, concerning JOSEPH SCATTERGOOD, a Minister, deceased.

From the lively remembrance we have of the religious services and exemplary Christian walk of our late beloved friend, Joseph Scattergood, we are engaged to issue a memorial concerning him, as a testimony to the effect of early submission to the transforming power of Divine Grace, which made him what he was, and as an incentive to others to so follow Christ, that they also may become prepared to serve Him, as did this, our beloved Friend.

He was the son of Joseph and Mary Scattergood, and was born in the city of Philadelphia on the 18th day of Seventh Month, 1839. He became a member of this meeting in 1860, and in the Tenth Month of that year married Elizabeth, daughter of David and Deby Cope.

In his nineteenth year he wrote, "Humility and meekness are essentials necessary for a Christian, but I fear I lack both in too great a degree. Entire resignation to Divine disposal is a great attainment, and is, I trust, what I sincerely hope to be truly sensible of. There is some consolation in the thought that Jacob wrestled all the night, and I sometimes experience a hope that if I strive to do right I will not be forsaken by my Heavenly Father, but that in his own good time, which will be the best time, He will condescend to pour the 'oil and the wine' into my often distressed soul."

Having thus in early life set his face heavenward, and yielded to the constraining and restraining power of Divine Grace, he was enabled to grow therein, and was qualified to fill several important stations in our Society. In the Eighth Month of 1875, he, with others, was appointed by Concord Quarterly Meeting to visit its subordinate meetings. Of this appointment he says: "The service was an important one, and proved to my mind very instructive, introducing me into earnest desires that I might in no way bring reproach upon the precious cause I was professing to advance." "In some of these meetings my mind was much impressed with matter which seemed to me to require expression, and in several of the Monthly Meetings I ventured to express what impressed me; also in a few families where religious opportunities occurred, I expressed a little which seemed to arise with freshness. The first of these was at the family of a Friend, where during the evening, after falling into silence, my mind was impressed with this passage of Scripture: 'Affliction cometh not forth of the dust, neither doth trouble spring out of the ground,' believing it right to express it, which I did with a few comments, which seemed to come before me for expression. This act of dedication was followed by comfortable feelings."

The first public appearance in the ministry of our friend was in a Preparative Meeting at Chester, in the First Month of 1876, in regard to which he says, "The constraining influence, as I believe, of Divine love, was so strongly felt that I yielded, and kneeling down in the second meeting, uttered these words: 'We acknowledge, Oh Lord, that we are poor and weak and feeble, but we know that Thou art strong and mighty; and we are emboldened to entreat Thee to pour out upon those of this place and elsewhere, such a measure of thy Holy Spirit, that we cannot resist it; that we may be thereby enabled, even as those have been who have gone before us, to serve Thee and our generation also in accordance with thy holy will: and in the end be permitted through thy adorable mercy to enter one of those blessed mansions which Thou hast promised to all those who are faithful unto Thee.' This act was succeeded by such feelings as I never remember to have experienced: a peaceful solemnity or awe seemed to cover my spirit for some days, and I hoped that what I had done was not displeasing to my Heavenly Father."

Under date of Tenth Month, 1876, he writes: "As I entered our meeting-house gate a passage of Scripture very powerfully arrested my attention, and the thought presented, 'Suppose I am required to proclaim it among us.' After taking my seat I became, as I thought, sensible that the service would be required at that time, but I felt so fearful of being deceived that I craved that if my Heavenly Father did require it, his power might be manifested by my being raised upon my feet without effort of my own. This thought had not much more than passed through my mind till I found myself standing before the congregation, and these words ran through me almost without effort: 'It is with me, my beloved friends, to revive in our hearing the gracious invitation of our Holy Redeemer when He said, 'Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest; take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls: for my yoke is easy and my burden is light.' Earnest are my desires that we who are in the prime and vigor of our day may comply with this precious invitation, and thus be preserved from the many snares and temptations which an unwearied adversary is continually throwing before us. For I believe there are those in this assembly who can acknowledge from their own experience that his yoke is easy, his burden is light, and his reward for faithful obedience is unspeakably precious."

My mind since this surrender, has been preserved calm and comfortable, and an absence of condemnation encourages me to believe that this appearance was in Divine ordering, and whether ever called to the same service again or not, I desire to bear in mind the condescension of my Heavenly Father in furnishing me with an evidence that He still continues to be gracious and merciful to all those who are earnestly desiring to follow and serve Him."

In the attendance of religious meetings he was diligent, not allowing press of business to prevent him from thus mingling with his friends for the solemn purpose of worshipping Him who is a spirit, and must be worshipped in spirit and in truth.

In the beginning of the year 1880, his Monthly and Quarterly Meetings acknowledged his gift and recorded him a minister of the Gospel. In a letter to a friend, dated Second Month 27, 1880, he alludes to this subject as follows: "Respecting the important step which the members of our Monthly and Quarterly Meetings have taken in my case, I confess it almost makes me shudder at times, when the responsibility of the position in which I am placed, comes before me in its various bearings. And I can and do very earnestly desire to be preserved on every band, and made a vessel truly qualified and fit for the Master's use. Ah, I feel very sensibly that the gift is in a truly earthen vessel; yet I know that He who in mercy dispenses his gifts, is also able and willing to keep us from falling, and to present us faultless at the end of the race, before the throne of his glory with exceeding joy. I often crave that this blessed experience may be mine."

His ministry was clear and connected, free from unnecessary repetition, and in the exercise of it he was concerned to wait for fresh anointing from on high. He was often led to unfold the doctrine of redeeming love and mercy, to exalt the Saviour of the world, and to bear emphatic testimony to his propitiatory offering on Calvary for the sins of the whole world. He was earnest in pressing upon his hearers the necessity of accepting Him in all his offices. He was often solemnly engaged in our religious meetings in supplicating the Throne of Grace, especially for the preservation of the children and rising generation; and on more than one occasion, his affectionate pleading in our business meetings for the removal of all hardness of feeling that might exist among our members, was very tender and earnest. His example in silent waiting was very instructive. He was at times eminently endued with a clear discernment of the state of individuals, and in the power of the Gospel was made instrumental in baptizing many into deep contrition, through a heartfelt sense of their own condition.

Sympathy with the afflicted was a marked characteristic of our beloved friend. In the sick chamber he was often engaged to intercede that the afflictions thus meted out might, in the Lord's time, redound to his praise and to his glory.

Being of an affable, engaging disposition, he had much place with those who came within the sphere of his influence. This, no doubt, caused his ministerial offerings to be more acceptable and helpful in winning souls to Christ, the Chief Shepherd.

He was especially affectionate and tender in his own family, and sympathetic toward his young friends; and his friendship was felt to be helpful, encouraging them in the path of self-denial. He was quick to notice in them any action, however small it might seem to others, which evinced to him that they were endeavoring to serve their Heavenly Father; showing to them, both by example and precept, that a religious life, far from being a gloomy one, is truly a life of happiness. It may be said of him that his house and heart were always open for the entertainment of his friends, particularly such as were travelling in the ministry.

He was often drawn forth in a loving concern for the young and the middle-aged, especially those just starting in business, and those near his own age, exhorting them to yield themselves in the morning of their day to the restraints of the cross of Christ, and to the attendance of mid-week meetings, believing they would find a blessing in so doing, and thus would be enabled to become helpers in promoting Christ's cause, and entreating them to be more earnest and dedicated to the service of Him whose love is infinite, and whose power is beyond measure; and that it might be their individual resolution, let others do as they may, "as for me and my house we will serve the Lord." On these occasions his ministry was not with the enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the spirit and of power.

In the Fourth Month, 1878, he was deprived, by death, of his beloved wife, which was to him a very close trial, but he subsequently acknowledged, "I have abundant cause of gratitude to our Heavenly Father, who, though He would eth, yet his hands make whole." In the fall of 1881 he was married to our friend Mary Ann, daughter of the late Samuel and Ann Cope.

In 1882, as a member of the Yearly Meeting's Committee to visit the subordinate meetings and members, he attended a small meeting, of which he says, "I went to the meeting in much poverty, but in process of time was enabled to bear testimony to the power and efficacy and universality of Divine Grace, rising with the language of Revelation, 'Behold I stand at the door and knock,' &c., and endeavoring to show that it was only by diligent and faithful co-operation with the visitations of Divine love that we could know what it was spiritually to sup with Him and He with us."

At the end of the year 1883, he wrote, "As the year is now about closing, it seems well to me thus to record, that to my own immediate family it has been a year of blessing, of happiness and health. It is my fervent prayer that we each may be kept during the year just dawning as in the hollow of the Lord's holy hand, and enabled to live still nearer to our Heavenly Father, knowing his blessed work to be carried on within, till the enemies of our own household are entirely subdued."

Near the close of the year 1885, he obtained liberty from his Monthly Meeting to pay a religious visit to the meetings composing Caln Quarterly Meeting, of which he writes, "During the visit I felt sensible of Best Help being extended in the needful time, qualifying to engage in the ministry at all the meetings."

In reviewing the events of the preceding ten years he thus records his feelings in 1887: "And now the earnest desire of my soul is as I pen these lines, to know Him yet more and more intimately, to love and obey Him yet more devotedly, and to be prepared through his mercy and by his power to enter, when my time comes, that rest which is prepared for the people of God."

During the greater part of the last two years of his life he was closely occupied as a member of a committee appointed by the Yearly Meeting, in attending meetings within its limits, in reference to which, he writes, First Month 22, 1889, "Let us, my dear friend, continue to love and serve Him here as well as we can, and then when the day's work is ended, however arduous or tribulated, or exercising it may have been, the assurance remains that there remaineth a rest, glorious and eternal in his holy kingdom."

On the 29th of Twelfth Month, 1889, he attended his own meeting at West Chester, and was engaged to address those assembled upon the uncertainty of time, and the necessity of becoming prepared for our final change, affectionately pleading with all—particularly the young men, who were just entering upon the duties of life—to be willing to take up the cross of Christ who had laid down his precious life for their sakes; commenting upon the passage, "No man can serve two masters," in an earnest and impressive manner, and concluding with the words, "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." During the afternoon of that day he more than once remarked, "How I am enjoying spending the day with my precious family," and as usual had them collected for reading the Holy Scriptures, after which he read one of the accounts recorded in a "Youthful Piety." In the evening he was taken with a severe illness, and it soon became evident that his recovery was doubtful. On being asked early in his sickness if he wanted to get well, he replied, "Why, certainly, I don't feel ready to leave my precious family yet." At another time, "I have not been clearly shown, but if it is the Divine will, I would like to live; but if not, I want Him to prepare me and take me to himself." On one occasion he remarked, "I feel as if I had been an unprofitable servant, if a servant at all: that is what my dear father said on his death-bed." At another time, "I don't know why this is permitted, unless it is for a testimony." In reply to the inquiry whether he felt anything in his way, he answered, "No, I believe not," and again, as to whether he was afraid of death, "No, I believe not, but it is an awful, awful thing to die." Continuing conscious to within a few minutes of the close, in this peaceful and resigned state of mind, he quietly passed away on First-day afternoon, the 5th of First Month, 1890, in the fifty-first year of his age, to enter, we reverently believe, through mercy into the joy of his Lord.

1810. At our Quarterly Meeting, the public service fell to Sarah Cresson, a young woman, and she appeared famously and worthily. It hath been my prospect for years past, that as the professors of other societies generally do not allow of women's preaching, so, in best wisdom, it hath been ordered that the testimony of Truth should be raised into dominion amongst the women in our Society; and even young girls have been and continue to be raised up, and qualified to preach the Gospel in the demonstration of the Spirit, and with life and power.—John Hunt.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 252.

It so happened that while Dorothea L. Dix, in 1853, was engaged in asylum work at St. John, Newfoundland, there occurred a fearful storm, attended by appalling shipwrecks, which left a lasting impression on her mind. She had gone through some perilous experiences of her own on these exposed coasts, but from a letter to a friend, describing the fury of the elements on this especial night, it was evident that her whole nature had now been wrought to the pitch of a fixed resolution to devise some efficient practical means for the rescue of those at the mercy of such terrible gales. Hence her visit to Sable Island, so fitly named "The Graveyard of Ships." The familiar maxim, "It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good," was now destined to receive a fresh commentary.

Sable Island, jutting far out into the western Atlantic, lies in latitude 43° 56' north, longitude 60° 3' west, some thirty miles southward from the easterly end of Nova Scotia. It is a waste of desolate, windswept sand hills, fringed with everlasting surf, harborless and shelterless on every side.

The whole region for leagues around is a trap and a snare. One sunken bar stretches sixteen miles away to the northeast, another twenty-eight miles to the northwest. The embrace of these long arms is death, for between them lie alternate deeps and shoals, and when the sea is angry it thunders and reverberates along a front of thirty miles, extending twenty-eight miles to seaward. No lighthouse sends its warning gleam beyond this seeming death-line, for stone structures will not stand upon these ever-shifting sands, and wooden ones of sufficient height could not withstand the storms. The mariner drifts to his grave through total gloom. The whole island bristles with stark timbers and the debris of wrecks. Thus, like the monster polyyps of ancient story, it lieth in the very track of commerce, stretching out its huge tentacles for its prey, enveloped in fogs and mists, and scarcely distinguishable from the gray surf that unceasingly lashes its shores.

Official records set the number of known wrecks on the island, occurring between 1830 and 1848, at sixteen full-rigged ships, fourteen brigs, and thirteen schooners. Besides these the loss of large numbers of unknown vessels, engulfed and never surviving to tell their fate story by more than a floating spar, would have vastly farther swollen the tragic list.

Making Sable Island, landing there for a stay of several days, and then getting away again, is an undertaking always involving a certain amount of risk. There is no harbor, and even on the north, the more sheltered shore, vessels have to lie off at a considerable distance, ready at the first sign of an unfavorable change of wind to put to sea. Fortunately for the purposes D. L. Dix had in view, her visit occurred at a time especially good for her, though ill-omened for others. It so chanced that a wreck actually occurred during the two days of her stay on the Island—that of a fine new vessel, the "Guide," with a cargo for Labrador. She went ashore on the south side; no storm; but a dense fog prevailing, in which she became bewildered till she found herself within the fatal arms of the sand polyyps.

As the weather remained calm, all lives were saved by the surf boats. The wreck, however, enabled Dorothea to secure a vivid object-lesson of what could and what could not be done by the force of men and character of apparatus on hand. Oddly enough, moreover, an incident occurred which united in a kind of dramatic unity, a romantic blending of her old mission in behalf of the insane with her new in behalf of the sailor. It is thus described in a letter from E. Merriam, of New York, who later on rendered invaluable service to her scheme for equipping the island with proper life-boats and appliances.

"The ship was abandoned by all but the captain. He had become a raving maniac, and would not leave. Miss Dix rode to the beach on horseback, as the last boat landed from the ill-fated ship, and learned the sad fate of the commander, who, the sailors said, was a kind-hearted man. She pleaded with them to return to the wreck and bring him on shore, and to bind him if it was necessary for his safety. They obeyed her summons, and soon were again on the beach, with their captain bound hand and foot. She loosened the cords, took him by the arm and led him to a boathouse built for the shipwrecked, and there by kind words calmed his mind and persuaded him to thank the sailors for saving his life; she trusted that rest and nourishing food would restore him to his reason."

Scarcely back in the United States, she set to work with her usual energy. She had found the boats and the life-saving apparatus at Sable Island far behind the requirements of the day. There was no mortar for throwing a line across a wrecked vessel, no provision of cars and breeches-buoys. Above all, the boats were clumsy and unsafe, utterly incapable of the perilous services demanded of them. Applying at once to her friends among the merchants of Boston, New York and Philadelphia, she was quickly provided with funds for building boats of the most approved modern construction and ordering a full equipment of the newest inventions in apparatus.

The first tidings of the behavior of the little fleet were sent to her—then in England—by Hugh Bell, of Halifax, N. S.

"DEAR MADAM:—The very day after the arrival of the largest life-boat (the 'Reliance') at Sable Island, the others having been, together with the attached cars and wagons, previously forwarded, a large American ship from Antwerp, with upwards of one hundred and sixty passengers, men, women and children, was cast upon one of the sand banks off the northeast end of the island, and lured so that the sea beat into her and rendered all chance of escape by the efforts of the people on board quite hopeless. The sea was so heavy, and the weather so boisterous, that none of the island's boats could live in it. To reach the wreck from the station was over twenty miles; your wagons thus came into use. Your 'Reliance' rode over the waves, as the sailors said, like a duck, and with her and two of your smaller boats, the 'Samaritan' and the 'Rescue,' the whole of the passengers were safely landed; poor things, almost in a state of nudity, not being able to save anything from the ship. Will you not rejoice at this result of your bounty? Including the crew, one hundred and eighty human beings were saved by the means thus opportunely, and may I not add, providentially, furnished through your care.

"I am very truly your friend and obedient servant,

"HUGH BELL."

This letter from Hugh Bell was, a few weeks later, followed by a letter to himself from Capt.

M. D. McKenna, Superintendent of the Relief Station at Sable Island, which gives further particulars.

"SABLE ISLAND, December 6, 1854.

"DEAR SIR:—The 'Arcadia' struck on the S. E. side of the N. E. bar of this island, at 6 P. M., on the 26th inst., in a dense fog, and the wind blowing strong from S. S. W. As soon as we got the report on the following morning, we started at once for the wreck with the largest life-boat, and found the ship lying about two hundred yards from the beach, head to the southward, settled deep in the sand, and listed seaward with her lee side under water, main and mizzen masts gone by the deck, and a tremendous sea running and sweeping over her bows. . . .

"We immediately launched the Francis life-boat 'Reliance,' when the boat's crew took their stations, and with the mate started for the wreck, and after contending for some considerable time with tremendous seas, strong currents and high winds, they got alongside the wreck, and during the afternoon made six trips to the wreck, and brought on shore about eighty persons, large and small. Two other attempts were made to reach the wreck, but the oars and thole pins were broken by the violence of the sea, and the boat had to return to the beach. An attempt was made to send a warp from the ship to the shore, but the current ran at such a rate that it could not be accomplished. When night came on, and we had to haul up our boat, the cries from those left on the wreck were truly heart-rending. In the hurry of work, families had been separated, and when those on shore heard the cries of those on the wreck at seeing the boats hauled up, a scene was witnessed that may be imagined, but cannot be described. I walked slowly from the place, leading my horse, till, by the roaring of the sea, the whistling of the winds, and the distance I had travelled, their doleful cries could not be heard. . . .

"Next morning we launched the life-boat as soon as it was clear enough to see how to work her, and by 10 A. M. we had both crew and passengers safely landed. . . . The ship was broken in a thousand pieces on the night of the 29th, and only a few packages of cargo and some small things of ship's materials are saved. Captain Jordan was knocked down by the sea and very severely cut and bruised, while our boat was making her second trip, which deprived us of his advice and assistance. The mate, Mr. Collamore, acted nobly throughout the whole business. . . . The Island men exerted themselves to the utmost, and the boat's crew nobly stuck to their boat, and declined accepting the offer of the mate to give them a spell with some of the ship's crew. The Francis metallic life-boat 'Reliance' has done what no other boat could do, that I have ever seen. It was a fearful time, yet the boat's crew each took their stations readily, and soon showed that they felt the 'Reliance' to be worthy of her name.

"I am sure that our benevolent friend, Miss Dix, will feel herself more than compensated for her great exertions in behalf of Sable Island Establishment, when she becomes acquainted with what we have already done through the means she furnished, and we, with many others, have reason to thank God that her good works have been felt on Sable Island. For my own part, I shall think of her with feelings of gratitude while memory lasts.

"Your obedient servant,

"M. D. McKenna."

From the "BRITISH FRIEND."
Worship.

Anyone who has taken the trouble to compare the forms of public worship in vogue amongst the churches of Christendom with each other, and with the model of the Society of Friends, will see at once that there is a far wider and deeper distinction between the Quaker Ideal and that of any other community, than there is between any two of the other systems; and that this difference is not one of Social usage only, but that it involves other and far more important questions.

With us public worship means primarily and principally, an opportunity for people to meet together, to wait upon and get help from God. It presents a noble public testimony to our belief in the immanence of the Divine Spirit; our faith in the actual fulfillment of the Saviour's gracious promise to be in the midst of those who meet in his Name. The thought of mutual edification, and of reference to the teaching of Scripture truth is not excluded, but it is not the main idea or purpose.

Now this "waiting upon God," in secret prayer and thanksgiving and reverent expectation,—this communion with God, through the Holy Spirit,—being at once the very essence of worship and a strictly individual exercise, cannot be supposed to be confined to the occasions of public worship, nor to be dependent in any degree upon human intervention or prescribed ritual. We ought to feel and understand that this privilege of secret personal access to God our Saviour is never withdrawn from us.

If we are true to our convictions we do not spend a day even of business engagements, or innocent recreation, without many interludes of happy soul-invigorating worship; and thus (and thus only) are we likely to resort to public worship in a frame of mind in which are we prepared fully to enjoy it and to profit by it. Worship, in brief, is a daily, an hourly, and a life-long exercise.

There is then, no real difference between the nature of individual (personal) worship, and that of a Congregation. It is essentially the same in a closet and a "Church." From first to last it must all be (so far as it is of any value) a very solemn and intensely real exercise of the individual soul. It is therefore, surely—a very serious thing to introduce into the formula of worship any device with a view of gratifying the "aesthetic" tastes of the worshippers; anything that has even a remote tendency to substitute pleasing emotions—sensationalism of any kind—for genuine personal devotion, and the devout listening of each separate soul to the voice of God.

Therefore we need not consider, for a moment how "beautiful," how "impressive," how venerable," how much to the taste of the average religious public are the customary forms and methods adopted by most Christian congregations. If they contradict the essential principles at which we have arrived, we must not hesitate to put them aside. It would be faithless and unworthy to do otherwise.

On a beautiful still autumnal morning, in Derbyshire, I walked four or five miles through the country, in order to attend a meeting in the neighboring town. I was a stranger and alone: but I needed neither companionship nor talk. The sweet fresh morning air—the beauty of the scenery—the worshipping silence of the fields, thrilled now and then by the song of a robin, soothed my mind into tranquillity. My heart seemed irresistibly lifted up to the God of nature and of grace, in adoration and love. When I entered the simple old fashioned Meeting-house, and sat down amongst some twenty or thirty others, no lower note was struck; there was no violent change of surrounding or of feeling. I simply worshipped on—but evidently, in company, one felt as though everybody—down to the three or four children present, must be really worshipping.

And so, for a while, we sat in an atmosphere of restful, refreshing peace and thankfulness; not doubting that the Lord Christ was true to his promise, and was verily in the midst of us. Unless the Bread of Life was a fable, we fed upon it.

BETWEEN THE GATES.

BY JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER.

Between the gates of birth and death
An old and saintly pilgrim passed,
With look of one who witnesseth
The long-sought goal at last.

"O, thou whose reverent feet have found
The Master's footprints in thy way,
And walked thereon as holy ground,
A boon of these I pray.

"My lack would borrow thy excess,
My feeble faith the strength of thine;
I need thy soul's white saintliness
To hide the stains of mine.

"The grace and favor else denied
May well be granted for thy sake."
So, tempted, doubting, sorely tried,
A younger pilgrim spake.

"Thy prayer, my son, transcends my gift;
No power is mine," the sage replied,
"The burden of a soul to lift,
Or stain of sin to hide.

"How'er the outward life may seem,
For pardoning grace we all must pray;
No man his brother can redeem
Or a soul's ransom pay.

"Not always age is growth of good;
Its years have losses with their gain;
Against some evil youth withstood
Its hands may strive in vain.

"With deeper voice than any speech
Of mortal lips from man to man,
What earth's unwisdom may not teach
The Spirit only can.

"Make thou that holy Guide thine own,
And following where it leads the way,
The known shall lapse in the unknown
As twilight into day.

"The best of earth shall still remain,
And heaven's eternal years shall prove
That life and death, and joy and pain
Are ministers of love."

"MY FATHER KNOWETH."

Precious thought my Father knoweth,
In his love I rest;
For what'er my Father doeth
Must be always best.
Well I know the heart that planneth
Nought but good for me;
Joy and sorrow interwoven,
Love in all I see.

Precious thought, my Father knoweth,
Careth for his child;
Bids me nestle closer to Him,
When the storms beat wild.
Though my earthly hopes are shattered,
And the tear-drops fall,
Yet He is himself my solace,
Yea, my "all in all."

Sweet to tell Him all He knoweth,
Roll on Him the care,
Cast upon himself the burden
That I cannot bear.
Then without a care oppressing,
Simply to lie still.
Giving thanks to Him for all things,
Since it is his will.

Oh, to trust Him then more fully!
Just to simply move
In the ecstasies, calm enjoyment
Of the Father's love;
Knowing that life's checkered pathway
Leadeth to his rest,
Satisfied the way He taketh
Must be always best.

British Canadian Travel.

Eighth Month 25th. Got down safely enough last eve by a new trail. The descent in one place—clutching to chance huckleberry bushes, and treeing in the top of a stunted fir, whence I descend the cliff to the edge of the moraine, was rather thrilling. Now I've reached a point by an Indian trail some hundred feet higher than last night, and which ultimately promises a splendid view.

At 10:30, reached the peak of the great lateral moraine. From the hotel this point appears higher than the glacier. In reality it is farther from here to the top of the glacier than to the bottom. The faint trail indications end here, against the breast of the glacier, and further ascent must be made over it at an easy angle of twenty degrees. A person well shod for ice climbing could probably reach the upper ice field by two hours' steady work.

But even here, nearly at a level with a hundred confronting peaks, which circle and buttress the vast amphitheatre, the climber's reward is overwhelming. Small wonder that women burst into uncontrollable weeping as they are dragged up the ice steps of Mount Shasta, and stout-hearted men fall dizzily on their hands and knees if they chance to slip even on the broadest snow-levels.

The elevation of the Great Glacier is considerably below eight thousand feet, and Mount Donald rises about a thousand feet higher, so if we could set Shasta in the midst, these mountains would be mere minarets of a mighty dome of snow rising six thousand feet above them. The size of the Great Glacier is said to be equal to all the combined glaciers of Switzerland—a statement which may either be far below or far beyond the truth, owing to the present ignorance of its real extent. Trackless as it yet is, this glacier is so situated that the persevering tourist can, in six hours from the hotel, view an alpine scene with less danger or fatigue than anywhere in the world that I know of. A week would scarce suffice to see the other wonders around Glacier Station. Air, water and weather at this season are superb, the hotel arrangements and cuisine more than excellent, and one need not (if unable) move off the porch to see mountains, glaciers, waterfalls, fountains and forests in quantity and quality to suit the most fastidious taste.

But excitement must end somewhere; this time in the observation car of to-day's train. Were you with me, this would seem a contradiction as we rise over the dividing ridge of the Selkirk Range through a whirl of snow-sheds (or around them by an outside track, where the view is specially fine), and bridge many a waterfall, leading the eye up green cañons to the snow land.

Again the Columbia rolls along below us, this time to the northward. We crossed it at Revelstoke on its southward course, and now, on its long journey of several hundred miles around the Selkirks, we cross it again at Donald. It flashes upon me that we must now be in sight of the Rockies. Such an event is worth mentioning. Ernest Ingersoll gets into the wildest enthusiasm over it in his "Crest of the Continent," but that was after a monotonous ride over the plains, while here the giant Selkirks to the right of us defy all competitors. For fifty miles we wind up the Columbia, the Rockies far away to the left, the Selkirks nearer.

There is a striking difference in the character of the two ranges. The former are more widely separated, sharp-pointed and bare of trees, and as we approach and enter Kicking Horse Pass, the rocky, rugged nature is strikingly apparent, nothing like it along the whole line of the Southern Pacific Railroad or the Pacific coast, or in British Columbia, till we get here. To heighten this, hardly a live tree stands on the foothills, and, stretching everywhere, from railroad bank to peak, is a desolate sea of whitened tree-trunks and gray rock. Just as we got into the famous pass, I saw the first eastern daisy, so there's nothing left now to stop its westward journey. Chicory looks as much at home on the bank as in its foster home in the Alleghanes.

We stop and pass on at Moberly, Golden, Ottertail and Field, with their innumerable sunset pictures.

The Rockies, between Field and Hector, where the train rises to an elevation of 5,000 feet on the great divide, surpass the most extravagant expectations. It begins to grow dark and nearly everyone leaves the observation car on that account, and because of the cold.

I was writing at the moment, when a gentleman near me, wearing the characteristic English travelling cap, spoke up and said, "We're about to pass some very fine scenery here," "Yes," said I, "we seem to be passing it now." "No, no, no, yet," he responded; "very few people seem to know that at yonder turn there opens up a mountain vista of the grandest extent and magnificence ever seen from a railway train. I've travelled over the border and have passed this place scores of times with veteran travellers, and their verdict is unanimously the same."

"People don't know much about British America yet," said my companion, as we gazed down the gorge; "not even the British Canadian knows it; in fact this is a new country. The Pacific and northwest divisions of the Canadian Pacific Railroad shook iron hands on this pass only five years ago. You may look skeptical, but these twin snow pyramids blocking the foreground are eighty miles away and 20,000 feet high." "Indeed!"—that was all I could say, not having any facts to contradict such a startling assertion.

26th. At Donald time changes one hour. At ten o'clock we reached Banff, after a long, dark descent of several miles on the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains.

This noted resort is 4,500 feet above the sea, on the "hither" side of the Bow River, where at its junction with the Spray, it rushes on to swell the waters of the Saskatchewan. The scene lies among the impressive mountain, lake and river scenery of the National Park. Three large hotels, charging from two to five dollars per day, occupy widely separated points in the Bow Valley. Grand View Hotel lying nearest the famed hot sulphur springs, which attract so many invalids to this spot in summer.

The railroad hotel on the bank of the Bow River, where all true Englishmen and purse-prond Americans must go, has its sulphur water piped three miles from the upper springs, and re-heated to the normal 120° notch for the use of bathers. The drives about Banff are its greatest attraction.

To Devil's Lake is a thrilling ride along the precipitous banks of the Bow. When you get to the lake a steamboat takes you its lovely lengths for $1.00, and on your return a ferocious appetite costs you another. As a Yankee said to me while discussing a glass of sulphur water, "Banff is a good place to blow in money." The testimony of a crutch hanging in front of the Grand View seems to settle the question of its sanitary virtues, above it being written this epitaph—"The man who used this crutch is cured and gone home."

All the Banff waters are charged with sulphur. Their normal temperature of 110°, where they gush from the earth sometimes descends in the middle of a hot day to 90°. This seems to indicate that the supply comes from glacial sources rather than a deep subterranean one. The outcrop of rock in many places shows limestone and sulphur deposits, made by the chemical action of water percolating from above, hence an unusually warm day increasing the supply of melting snow and ice from above, counterbalances the normal warming power of the rock laboratories, and a lower temperature is the result.

Most of the improvements hereabout are carried on by the Government. The public bath and geyser cave is a novel attraction, where one may get a free bathing suit and plunge into the bubbling sulphur water under Government patronage. A tunnel has been driven through the side of the cave, and as one enters he sees by the dim torchlight a pool of steaming green water twenty feet across arched over by a dome of nature's own making. In the top of this is an opening just large enough to admit a person's body, which in former times was its sole entrance. The feelings of a novice descending by a ladder into this dark aperture, half suffocated by the Stygian vapors and nothing but the assurances of the guide to persuade him it is not the bottomless pit, may well be imagined.

Leaving Banff at 2:25, the train courses along the Bow River a few miles and about midnight emerges from its tortuous mountain wanderings upon the vast steppe of western Alberta, and here for the present we must part, hoping some day to resume and complete together the homeward journey.

First Month 6th, 1892.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

In Paul's first Epistle to the Corinthians, 12th, 13th and 14th chapters especially, he labors well to get them to understand that there are diversities of gifts in the Church, but all given by the same Spirit, and says (12th—27th). "Now ye are the body of Christ and members in particular; and God hath set some in the Church, first, apostles; secondarily, prophets," &c. But in this short article I feel led to call the reader's attention to the prophets in the Church. The seers, at times so named in the Old Testament, comparable to the eye of the body. I will illustrate:

In the spring of 1876 a favorable opportunity seemed up before me for the bettering of my worldly business; and after looking it all over I concluded that the Lord had surely provided for me because "I much needed it." Then I went to work and invested all my little means into some machinery, &c. I moved with my family from one of the valleys of California up into the mountains, to engage in a saw mill business; and after I got there everything looked promising. One day, shortly after, the mail brought me a letter from a member of the Society of Friends, belonging to the Yearly Meeting at Philadelphia, in which he used these words, with others: "There has made a wrong move; and the sooner these moves again it may be all the better." Yet I did not believe it, as everything round looked so promising. A week or so after this the mail brought a letter from a Capt. H—, an old acquaintance in San Francisco—"a very Godly man," who had learned of my move in some way; but his letter was not couched in such pleasant wording as the one from my Quaker friend, but breathed more of that authority that sounds from the quarter-deck in a storm, and plainly told me that the Lord never called me there. And yet my surroundings all seemed good—a Protestant community, a good school for children, &c.

A few weeks later another was received from a young woman in Santa Cruz, in this State, who had been a former neighbor of ours, and a devoted Christian. I had written to her from my mountain home, giving our new address, and also mentioned our good prospects; but her letter was also very discouraging and gloomy. She expressed her fear that we would even get in straitened circumstances, and enclosed a few postage stamps for us to use.

Neither one of these three Christians had ever been to Clipper Mills, in California; neither did they say that any one informed them about it. But the sequel showed that they were all three right—and all living many hundred miles apart—neither knowing of the existence of each other, yet all of the same mind, and all seeing eye to eye, as revealed unto them by the Spirit.

Three years later I had to leave Clipper Mills, somewhat poorer than I went there, but wiser, having learned this lesson—that it is highly necessary to know the mind of the Lord in our every business movement. And if not revealed unto ourselves directly by the Spirit, then let us inquire of the prophets who are yet in the Church of our Lord and Saviour, and who often admonish us—warn and counsel us—but we are slow to hear them.

My next stopping place was my present place of residence, where we had a sick and dying daughter, who had gone hither in quest of health, and shortly afterward departed this life.

I wrote my Quaker friend shortly after my arrival here, stating my prospects, which were gloomy enough—a dying child (13 years old) to watch with and care for; my purse getting low, and nothing in view whereby I could replenish it. He immediately answered; and about the first sentence in his letter read thus: "The Lord has got thee in the right niche. Now He can use thee and bless thee in the place that thou art now in. And in several words of cheer he comforted me greatly, whilst outward appearances pointed otherwise. For several months of the spring and summer of 1879 I still remained here, looking round for some business to make a living by, and could find none. Every day reading the column of business chances in the daily papers of San Francisco, until at last, and as a last resort, I commenced a small mercantile business, with no flattering prospects. I yet continue in it, and all along these thirteen years have been greatly prospered in it. As also in spiritual and heavenly things I have been made a blessing unto many of the poor outcasts of our people and have been used by the Master to lead many into the true Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world. And this was all made known to my friend (whom I never saw, and he never saw me), yet his predictions of thirteen years past prove true today.

Capt. H—, aforementioned, still lives, and often visits us here, with words of good counsel in the name of the Lord—being now a man of more than seventy years, yet active in the Master's work.

We read of prophets among Friends in the early days of the Society. John Roberts told his poor, distressed neighbor where his lost cows were to be found. Also William Edmundson and many others were true seers. And such there are among us yet. But we lack the faith of the fathers. And therefore so many of us grope our way through this world in the dark. May the Lord increase our faith.

SAN LEANDRO, Cal., Third Mo., 20, 1892.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

To the Law and the Testimony.

"To the law and the testimony if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." We see from this expression of the prophet the importance of teaching in harmony with the law and the testimony.

If any should not, the prophet tells us, there is no light in them. The apostle told the Galatian Church that he marvelled that they should so soon turn to another gospel, which is not another gospel, though we or an angel preach any other gospel than what we have preached let him be accursed, or if any man preach any other gospel than what you have received let him be accursed. If that angel that John saw flying through the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwelt upon the face of the earth of every nation kindred, tongue and people crying with a loud voice, fear God and keep his commandments for the hour of his judgments is come, and worship Him that made heaven and earth, the seas and the fountains of waters; if that angel had had any other gospel to preach than what Paul preached, Paul's denunciation must rest upon him as well as upon himself.

The Galatians were not in possession of the gospel until they received it. The apostle, in writing to one of the churches, told them that it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believed; that he preached Jesus Christ, and Him crucified, to the Jews a stumbling block, and to the Greeks foolishness, but to them that believed the power of God and the wisdom of God, that the preaching of the cross to them that perish was foolishness, how important then in this our day that we preach the same gospel which is the power of God unto salvation, unto all them that believe. For as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of Man be lifted up that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life.

Salvation by the way of the cross is foolishness to them that perish, but to them that are saved the power of God and the wisdom of God. We want to preach the same Christ that Paul preached, that bore our sins in his body on the tree, and by whose stripes we are healed. He was wounded for our transgressions, was bruised for our iniquities, and the chastisement of our peace was on Him. We have to acknowledge with the apostle, that without controversy great is the mystery of godliness. God manifest in the flesh, seen of the angels, preached to the Gentiles, received up into glory; while Christ in the spirit visits everybody, making salvation possible to all that close in with the offers of mercy. Yet He is the same Christ that, as Mary's Son, was crucified, rose from the dead and ascended on high, and ever liveth to make intercession for us.

GEORGE BRIGGS.

NEW SHARON, IOWA.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

As the time draws near for the gathering together of Friends for our Yearly Meeting, the minds of the truly concerned become exercised, that the gathering of the people may be to the Lord; and that He may be pleased to meet with us and own us. This is no new concern, but are not our ranks very much affected by the removal of many dear and valued Friends since our last Yearly Meeting? And do we not feel more and more the pressure to move forward under well-directed intellectual influences instead of waiting in deep abasement of self upon Him who called our forefathers and enabled them to stand forth for Him.

May the youth be encouraged and the younger Friends made strong in their dedication to Him who is calling upon them for service. If those whose hearts are touched will yield; and those whose minds are affected with the love of the Father will submit to the sweet influence of heavenly love, our cause will prosper and these will find their peace and comfort to increase day by day.

Extracts from "My Christian Experience."

BY T. G. TAYLOR, THE CONVERTED CONVICT.

What poor, short-sighted creatures we are. We often think we see clouds before us, and conclude it must end in our destruction. We imagine "God hath forgotten to be gracious;" we think He hath in anger shut up the bowels of compassion. Oh! this short-sightedness—when we ought to believe in God—when we ought to look at the heaven that awaiteth us, and the glory for which this light affliction is (or should be) preparing us; when we should be resting on the invisible arms of the immortal Jehovah, and triumphing in his love, we are distrusting. God forgive us for this, and enable us henceforth to look not at our troubles, but above them—even to Him who, with infinite wisdom and love is guiding us, and has promised to bring his trusting ones safely through.

GO AND TELL JESUS.

It is the privilege of every Christian to go and tell Jesus the ills that prey upon and mar this troubled life; to tell Him all the cravings of the soul. Has any dark shadow fallen across life's pathway and obscured the sunlight, go and tell Jesus, the Light of the world. He can dispel spiritual darkness and illumine with beams of Heavenly joy. Has any deep sorrow come like a withering blight, crushing and consuming life, go and tell Jesus. He can command the turbulent elements of passion to subside, even as He once did the dark, rolling waves of Galilee. In personal communion with Him thou shalt obtain consolation, instruction, and new power, so that thou mayst boldly say, "The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man may do unto me."

THE WORK OF THE SPIRIT.

Let us ever remember, that Christ on the cross is of no value to us apart from the Holy Spirit in us. In vain that blood is flowing unless the Spirit applies that blood to our consciences. The river of the water of life cannot quench our thirst, till the Spirit pours into our hearts the refreshing stream. All the things which are in the paradise of God, could never be blissful to us, so long as we are dead souls—and dead we are, until that Heavenly wind comes and breathes upon us, that we might live.

Thou, Oh! Spirit, art He who enables us to receive that Divine virtue, which flows from the Fountain Head, the Father, through Christ the channel, and which by thy help enters into our hearts and there abides, and brings forth its blessed fruit. There never was a heavenly thought, a hallowed deed, or a consecrated act, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ, which was not worked in us by the power of the Holy Spirit.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Butterflies.—Near the summit of Mt. Washington, in New Hampshire, is a small community of butterflies which do not descend below the 5,000 feet line. The same butterflies reappear on Long's Peak, in Colorado, 1,800 miles distant; and in Labrador, 1,000 miles to the north. In the intervening districts there are no insects of the same species. These are the only representatives of their kind now remaining on the whole earth—left behind like the ark on Ararat amid the helpless ruins of an antediluvian world.

Vitality of Plants.—A number of plants have the singular power of living a long time without water, and without any connection with the earth. Dr. Torrey found a root with some signs of life in a herbarium long after it was collected, and hence we have Lewisia rediviva. The Rose of Jericho is a plant not distantly related to the wild carrot, which draws itself out of the ground and rolls into a ball, driven by the winds and then spreads, roots and grows under the first rainfall. In Mexico, Arizona and Texas, is a club moss (Selaginella lepidophylla), which also dries into a ball, and is sold in curio stores as the "Resurrection plant." It develops in earth or water after a six months' drying, just as well as if nothing had happened.

Wild Dogs in the North.—In the Lake of the Woods country, which may be described as a wilderness of forest, rock and brushwood, a race of wild dogs have established themselves and are increasing in numbers so rapidly that fears are entertained that the animals will yet become troublesome. When the Canadian Pacific Railway was under construction the camps of the workmen had, of course, to be frequently moved, and dogs were often left behind, and eventually, like wolves and foxes, found means of sustaining themselves. The animals are large, lean, short-haired, and generally red, or red and white in color. They are exceedingly wild, and fly in the first approach of man. In winter they live by catching rabbits that abound in the wilderness of brushwood; in summer the wild dogs catch fish that crowd the smaller streams that connect inland lakes. The Indians detest the wild dogs, as they pursue game and take the bait from traps, and are a general nuisance.

Sometimes a wild dog is taken in a trap that has been set for other animals, but the beasts are exceedingly cunning, swift and watchful. A race of wild dogs is said to exist in Newfoundland, keeping near the coast, and subsisting on what the sea casts to the shore.—Pilot Mount Sentinel.

Many consumptives are killed by their friends very frequently asking them how they are. At health resorts the conversation is something extraordinary. I sat in the parlor of the Highland House, at Aiken, one morning listening to the conversation of certain old ladies and others, "Mrs. C., what was the character of your expectation last night? Have you got over your night sweats?" and so they went on with questions of that sort, interlarded with prognostications concerning certain patients who had not been seen at table for two or three days.

Anxious mothers sometimes kill their children in this way. A physician asked a mother to mark a stroke upon a paper each time she asked her sick daughter how she felt. She found to her astonishment the next day, that she had made one hundred and nine strokes. The doctor simply prescribed for the relief of that patient a three-months' visit away from home.

Taking patients' temperature for four or five times a day and making reports is enough to kill an ordinary consumptive. In going to any place for health talk as little about the disease as possible. Answer inquiries courteously in monosyllables. Talk about other subjects; read pleasant literature; stay in the open air; take all possible exercise.—J. M. B. in Christian Advocate.

An Elephant Who Liked a Joke.—The elephant of the Jardin des Plantes at Paris used to play his visitors a trick which could not have been thought of but by an animal of much intelligence. His house opened upon an enclosure called the elephant's park, containing a pond, in which he would lay himself under the water, concealing every part of him except the very end of his trunk—a mere speck that would hardly be noticed by a stranger to the animal's habits. A crowd would often assemble round the enclosure, and, not seeing him in it, would watch in expectation that he would soon issue from the house. But, while they were gazing about, a copious sprinkling of water would fall upon them; and ladies and gentlemen, with their fine bouquets and coats, would run for shelter under the trees, looking up at the clear sky, and wondering whence such a shower could come. Immediately afterward, however, they would see the elephant rising slowly from his bath, evincing, as it seemed, an awkward joy at the trick he had played. In the course of time his amusement became generally known; and the moment the water began to rise from his trunk the spectators would take flight, at which he appeared exceedingly delighted, getting up as fast as he could to see the bustle he had caused.—Presbyterian.

Old Ways of Getting Water.—When David Lindsay returned from his expedition across a part of the Australian desert a while ago, he said the whole of that almost waterless country was inhabited by natives who get their water supply by draining the roots of the mallee tree which yield quantities of pure water. This tree, absorbing moisture from the air, retains it in considerable quantities in its roots and thus makes it possible to live in an arid region which would otherwise be uninhabitable.

There are people in other parts of the world who get their supply of water in a peculiar way. The explorer Coudreau, for instance, found a white age, while wandering among the Tumuc-Humac Mountains, in the western part of Guiana, that it was not necessary for his men to descend to a creek when they wanted a drink of water. A vine known as the war vine is found all through that region. It yields an abundant supply of excellent drinking fluid whenever it is called upon. This vine grows to a height of sixty to ninety feet. It is usually about as thick as the upper part of the human arm. It winds itself loosely around trees, clambers up to their summits, and then falls down perpendicularly to the ground, where it takes root again.

The natives cut this vine off at the ground, and then, at a height of about six or seven feet, they cut it again, which leaves in their hands a very stout piece of wood a little longer than themselves. In order to obtain its sap they raise the lower end of the vine upon some support, and apply the upper end to their mouths. The section of the vine, while showing a smooth, apparently compact surface, is pierced with many little veins, through which the sap flows freely. Six feet of the vine gives about a pint of water, which is slightly sweet to the taste. Coudreau says that it quenches thirst as effectively as water from the most refreshing brook.

The bushmen in the Kalahari Desert often live scores of miles from places where water comes to the surface. During a certain part of the year, sharp storms pass over the Kalahari, covering the apparently arid region with the brightest of verdure, and filling, for a few short days, the water courses with roaring torrents. The bushmen know how to find water by digging in the bottoms of these dried up river beds. They dig a hole three or four feet deep and then tie a sponge to the end of a hollow reed. The sponge absorbs the moisture at the bottom of the hole, and the natives draw it into their mouths through the reed, and then empty it into calabashes for future use.

The animals that inhabit such wastes as the Kalahari are of course accustomed to living upon very small and infrequent supplies of water. The Bechuana do not lead their cattle to the drinking places oftener than once in two or three days. It is said that goats in the Kalahari frequently pass months without water, and, according to Mackenzie, there are certain antelopes which are never seen to visit the drinking places.

In that enormous waste known as the Gobi Desert, north of China, showers sometimes fall during the summer, and the torrents of a day fill the dried up water courses, through which water seldom runs. It is in these channels that the Mongols dig their wells, expecting to find a little water, when upon the surface of the plateau itself the soil has lost all traces of humidity. It is owing to the fact that a part of the moisture falling during a few rainy days is thus preserved within reach that it is possible for caravans to cross the desert.—N. Y. Sun.

Papal Revenue.—The Italia Evangelica reports the papal budget for 1892. The income is from the following sources: 1,500,000 lire from spiritual dignitaries and offices and admission fees to the museums; 2,550,000 lire from Peter's Pence; 3,000,000 from English Consols; 200,000 lire from various sources. The expenses are computed as follows: Salaries of cardinals, 650,000 lire; expenses of the Vatican for kitchen and household, including the Guardia Nobile, 2,000,000 lire; for legates, diplomats, etc., 1,000,000 lire; stipends and pensions, 1,500,000 lire; Apostolic palaces; 500,000; for San Giovanni in Laterano, 500,000; Archivio Borghese, 250,000; monument of Innocence III, 100,000; other expenses, 1,000,000 lire. The Pope has preferred to curtail his own household expenses rather than dismiss even a single member of the Swiss Guard or the Cameriere Segreto. In the budgets of preceding years there has always been a special rubric for charity, but this is omitted for the year 1892. The financial losses of the Pope some months ago were so great that economy at all ends and corners is necessary.

Not Even a Drop for His Stowack's Sake.—The late Bishop Doane, of New Jersey, was strongly opposed to prohibition, and his sideboard was lined with brandy, wine, etc. On one occasion Perkins, of the Sons of Temperance, dined with the bishop, who, pouring out a glass of wine, desired him to drink with him.

"Can't do it, bishop. 'Wine is a mocker.'" "Take a glass of brandy, then." "No. 'Strong drink is raging.'" By this time the bishop, becoming excited, remarked to Perkins: "You'll pass the decanter to the gentleman next to you."

"No, bishop, I can't do that. 'Woe unto him that putteth to bed with his neighbor's wife.'"

Trade in Sermons.—The traffic in sermons has stirred a writer in The Nineteenth Century to gather and comment upon some of the advertisements appearing in the English newspapers. Among them are the following:

"SERMONS.—A clergyman will write an original one every week, 10s. 6d.; strictly confidential."

"CHOICE SERMONS.—Edited by M. A. Oxon. Confined to the clergy. S. P. G. Season. See review in 'E.'"

"SOUND CHURCH SERMONS.—Foreign, home, mission, funeral, flower, temperance, volunteers, introductory, farewell; all at 2s. 6d. weekly. No duplicate, 5s. Special to order, 10s. 6d."

"MS. SERMONS (800 for town or country.—Beautifully written. Tone moderately High Church; for all Sundays and Saints' Days. General subjects. 'E.'"

"MS. SERMONS, 500 lithographed; the property of a deceased clergyman, well suited for a village congregation, for 25."

But besides this open traffic there is another method by private sale by which sermons are sent through the mail, on the chance of their being accepted, used and paid for. Again, circulars are sent, of which a few specimens are given.

"A gentleman writes on subjects of deep interest at two and a half guineas each, the lowest sum that will compensate him for his labors. Another offers brilliant sermons, on all subjects, 5s. each, and promises profound secrecy. Another, any number of sound sermons at three guineas a dozen. Another has been in the habit of taking notes of deceased sermons (sic) for 5s., well worth a pound."

The writer of the article has come to the conclusion that the traffic in sermons is beyond all doubt a wide one, and is carried on at a considerable profit, and explains much of the dull preaching that is given to so many sleeping congregations.

The Chinese Massacre in Wallowa.—Some weeks ago an account of this horrible event was copied into our columns from the New York Independent. Our friend, Josiah W. Leeds, wrote respecting it to Edward G. Fowler, a Methodist itinerant in that section of country, from whose reply the following is taken:

"The statement respecting the murder of Chinese miners, to which you allude is only too true. I have occasionally heard it referred to in conversation here, but otherwise know little of the circumstances. A recent issue of the Wallowa Chief contained the dying confession of the father, I believe, of one of the men engaged in the affair. These men, I have understood, killed forty-four instead of thirty-four. The massacre was, I believe, on Snake River, the eastern boundary of the Wallowa."

"The character of the country is changed since then. From an Indian Reservation, then a great stock range, it is now coming to be settled in places by farmers."

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 16, 1892.

There has been in many parts of the Society of Friends so great a departure from that "plainness of speech, behavior and apparel" which formerly characterized it, that it seems proper to refer to the original grounds which induced them to so act as to become a singular people, and thus expose themselves to scorn and persecution.

William Penn, in his reply to an attack made on the principles of Friends by the Bishop of Cork, says: "When it pleased God in the riches of his love, to cause his blessed light to shine out of darkness, and give us the knowledge of himself, we saw and bewailed ourselves, and by an unfeigned sorrow and repentance returned, as penitent prodigals, towards our Father's house, and in this turn, we were brought to die daily to that love and satisfaction we once had in the glory, pleasures, honors, &c. of the world."

"Hence it was, that we became an altered and a distinguished people in our behavior, garb and conversation; more retired, watchful, silent and plain than formerly. It was the work of God's Spirit upon our hearts, who by his light gave us to distinguish between that which pleased Him, and that which pleased Him not."

The apostle Paul exhorted the Roman church, "Be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your minds;" and Peter says, Whose adorning let it not be that of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel; but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is, in the sight of God, of great price." The early Christian writers, subsequent to the date of the apostles, show that a similar concern existed in the church in its earlier and purer days.

William Penn says, that when the eyes of the early members of our Society were opened to see the Christian world's apostasy from God, "A grand inquest came upon our whole life, every word, thought and deed was brought to judgment, the root examined and its tendency considered. The brightness of God's coming to our souls discovered, and the breath of his mouth destroyed every plant He had not planted in us." To those who accused Friends of seeking to set up outward forms as the badge of a party, he declares, that "these are but the imaginations and vain constructions of men, who have not had that sense which the Lord hath given us, of what arises from the right and the wrong root in man."

The experience of the faithful successors of early Friends has been the same in every generation. Through obedience to the inshinings of the Light of Christ, they have been led to live watchful, retired and plain lives; and to deny themselves of many indulgences which the world around them deemed harmless, but which they found, retarded their progress in spiritual things. The laying aside of these testimonies by so many under our name is one of the proofs of the widespread degeneracy which prevails; and we believe that when our people are more generally brought to a sight and sense of their fallen condition, and to an earnest concern for their own salvation, this revival will be accompanied as it was among our early Friends, with a willingness to bring everything into judgment, and to be governed by the Spirit of Christ in "speech, behavior and apparel," as well as in other points more generally admitted in the profane church.

Our friend, Huldah H. Bonwill, again appeals to the benevolent for partly worn clothing, &c., for the relief of destitute persons in the West, among Friends, Africans and Indians. There is often considerable delay in the transmission of such goods and in their distribution. She wishes any packages of the kind sent to her care at the Book-store, 304 Arch St., Phila., so that she can have them packed and shipped early in the Fifth Month.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The House of Representatives on the 7th inst. passed the Free Wool bill, and on the 10th inst. the Cotton Bagging bill, both by large majorities.

Senator Dawes on the 8th inst. introduced a bill to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Cherokee Nation for the cession to the United States of 8,144,682 acres of land in Indian Territory. Upon proclamation by the President these lands are to be opened to homestead settlement at price of $1.50 per acre. To carry out the agreement with the Indians $8,595,736 is appropriated.

Representative Brunner has introduced a bill to provide for the establishment of an educational fund to aid in the support of public schools. For every year of honest passage of the act it apportions from the money in the Treasury received from the sale of public lands the sum of $5,000,000 annually, to be paid to the several States and Territories in the proportion which the number of persons between and including the ages of ten and twenty years, who are unable to read and write, bears to the whole number of persons.

The House Committee on Indian Affairs has agreed to report favorably a bill to ratify an agreement with the Southern Ute Indians in Colorado to open certain lands in Southeastern Utah. The bill has been under consideration by the committee for a long time, and it is now ready to be reported to it. The lands opened to settlement will be disposed of at the rate of $1.50 per acre.

The British Minister has had another conference with the President in regard to the modus vivendi for the trading season. It is understood that a conclusion in the matter has practically been reached, but that there are still certain preliminaries to be settled, one of the most important being the determination of the number of seals which the lesses shall be allowed to take on the Pribilof Islands.

The President has issued a proclamation opening to settlement on Fourth Month 15, 1892, at 12 o'clock noon, the surplus lands of the Sisseton and Wahpeton Reservations, in the Dakotas. The lands to be opened aggregate 947,257 acres.

All mails brought from South and Central America and from the Pacific mail steamers for all points in the United States will be carried by the route to San Diego, California. It is stated that this will expedite the service and result in the saving of many cents.

The great steel arch of the Manufacturers' Building, at the World's Fair grounds at Chicago, has been completed. It is 212 feet high and 375 wide at the base, and is estimated that the maple sugar crop in Vermont this year was only about one-quarter of the average production.

A dispatch from Guthrie, Oklahoma Territory, says that the storms and cold weather in that and the Indian Territory during the past few weeks have caused great mortality among the cattle, the loss in some places reaching from 50 to 40 per cent.

The Washli River at Vincennes, Indiana, has been rising for several days. Crops in the lowlands have been ruined.

Fourier at Columbus, Mississippi, rose over two feet higher than ever in its history. Fourteen persons are known to have been drowned, whilst the loss of life in the wide territory covered by the flood cannot be told.

The Liquor License Court of this city has granted 238 licenses out of 3,015 retail applications, and 540 wholesale licenses out of 563 retail. The number of retail licenses is 135 more than were granted last year.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 495, which is 65 more than during the previous week, and 60 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number, 256 were males and 239 females; 101 were under one year of age; 58 died of consumption; 48 of pneumonia; 40 of diseases of the heart; 26 of convulsions; 22 of old age; 21 of diphtheria; 19 of inflammation of the brain; 17 of scarlet fever; 16 of marasmus; 13 of apoplexy and 12 of Bright's disease.

FOREIGN.—A London dispatch states that another serious outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease has occurred among cattle near Sittingbourne, in Kent.

A dispatch from Paris states that the Chamber of Deputies, by a vote of 314 to 177, has adopted the credit of 3,100,000 francs for operations in Dahomey. Several attempts have been made to dispossess the interior and a thorough punishing of the Dahomeans. The Government speakers, however, maintained that coast operations would be sufficient, in which only Senegal troops would be employed.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily News says: Several letters have been received from a list of 100 workmen who have learned to manufacture panicleite. His avidity to implicate others with the view of securing a lenient sentence tends to increase the belief that he is not a genuine Anarchist, but merely a paid tool of some party or personage desiring to be served by his exploits. It is stated that proceedings against him on the matter charged are in progress, and that he will be tried only for causing explosions.

Severe earth tremors and rumblings occurred on the 6th inst. at Mecina, Province of Granada, Spain. Columns of water rose to a great height from fissures in the air. In the villages of Hungary has been burned. The spread of the flames was assisted by dry and windy weather. Large stores of corn and many head of cattle have been burned. Five persons were killed and thousands are homeless.

The Italian Government has forbidden open air celebrations on May 1st. The garrison at Rome will be reinforced, troops will be drafted in the industrial centres where riots are likely to occur; and the carabinieri and police will be armed with revolvers for a few days.

The London Chronicle's correspondent in the Russian famine districts, who has been visiting Begechet, writes that he saw Count Tolstoy's daughter open in a single day letters containing checks amounting to 5,000 roubles. Most of the letters were from America and England. There was one check from London for £1,000.

The Petersburg dispatch to the North German Gazette speaks of peasants in Kiel selling their children for a few roubles, prior to emigrating.

A dispatch from Sudbury Ontario, says that efforts are being made there to organize a nickel trust to control the entire output of nickel on a basis similar to the copper combine of the United States. The plan of the trustees is to purchase all valuable nickel properties in the district.

When they are to be forwarded by mail a two-cent stamp should be sent with the order.

These orders are ready, and Friends will please obtain them as early as they conveniently can. [The notice of reduced rates was delayed over a week, by the application having to go before the "Trunk Line Association," whose meetings are held in New York City.—T. C. H.]

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Woman's Place in the Church, or the Democracy of Christianity.

The article, "An Ancient Order," in the Sunday Dispatch of Second Month 14th, which gave an account of the appointment, in the last few years, of "Deaconesses" by the Lutheran, Episcopal, Methodist, and other churches, revives, in a fresh and interesting way, the question of "Woman's place in the Christian Church." Was the place awarded her in the apostolic age of the Church, limited, as this modern revival of the ancient Order of Deaconesses seems to be, to lines of charitable work? Or was it broader in its original conception? And if so, how broad?

There are two passages of Paul's Epistles that, as interpreted, have done duty to close the doors of Gospel labor against woman for 1,600 years. But if the one in Corinthians about "women keeping silence" is taken as a Judaizing legal objection against the permission of "all to prophesy," which Paul had granted in this chapter, and the fact that the law is against its authority; and the almost sarcastic answer of Paul shows it to be only this, for with an exclamation of surprise he answers, "What? came the word of God out from you [you men only], or came it unto you only?" That is, the Gospel no more came from men alone than it came to men alone: In the other substitute wife and husband for man and women in the text (1 Tim. ii: 12), as what immediately follows about "child bearing" shows it is a wife's duties and not public service that Paul is treating on. And then there will be nothing in the Bible against a far greater enlargement of woman's place in the Church, than the "Order of Deaconesses" contemplates. As no violence is really done to either of these passages by the above construction, and as it is, as we shall see further on, in harmony with the prophetic place, the promised place, and the actual place of woman in the Apostolic Church: as the prevailing construction by which woman is shut out from Gospel labor is antagonistic to the fundamental principle of spiritual life, that there is "neither male nor female in Christ," it would be a great gain to Gospel Truth to so construe them.

That there is a deep-seated conviction in the Christian consciousness of the present day, that the suppression of woman's work in the Gospel, and its appropriation by men, by the traditional construction of the above texts, handed on from the dark ages, is in violation of the broad spiritual democracy of the Apostolic Church, is shown by the demand for "Deaconesses," and the agitation for "woman's ministry" and representation now going on in the Methodist and other churches. This is an age when antiquity cannot escape the "search-light" of enquiry; and nothing that "can be shaken" has any right to remain. And if all that bears on this question of woman's place in the Church, that the Scriptures and Ante-Nicene history affords is ever fairly placed before the Christian public, the movement to give woman her rightful place in the Church will go on with increased momentum.

At the very threshold of Gospel history on the day of Pentecost, we read that "The women and Mary" were a part of the one hundred and twenty that "waited in prayer" till "tongues of fire sat on each of them," and of the "all that were filled with the Holy Ghost and spake with tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance." This omen of woman's equality in the Gospel was followed by a sermon from Peter, in which the events of the day were declared to be a fulfillment of an ancient prophecy "that in the last days" the Spirit should be so poured out on both "sons and daughters," "servants and handmaidens," that "they should prophesy." If so, the women present not only "spake with tongues" but also prophesied. To these facts and the prophecy of woman's equality which they saw and heard, Peter now further adds a sweeping and all-embracing promise, "that which you now see and hear" is the "promise of Christ," which is to you and your children to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call. Let it be borne in mind that these things, with all that they implied for woman in the great Christian democracy, were for the "last days." If so, they were not for one day only, but for that day, to-day, and every day till the last day of the Gospel Age—"Till the sun is old,

And the stars are cold,
And the leaves of the judgment-book unfold."

If by this initial day Christianity was planted with so much of omen and prophecy, and promise of woman's equality in the Church of Christ, will may we ask—

"What shall the harvest be?"

These events of Pentecost had been preceded at the resurrection, by the women being sent by the angels to bear to the apostles, the first message of the risen Christ. At the birth of Christ we read of the inspired praises of Elizabeth and Mary, and the testimony of the prophetess Anna. In the Bible there is account of Miriam, the mouth-piece of the song of deliverance at the Red Sea: of Deborah the prophetess, whom Tennyson calls the "great dame of Lapidoth," who judged Israel and led its armies to victory as a deliverer; of Huldah, so great a prophetess that King Josiah sent his High Priest and the Prime Minister to obtain her interpretation of the new-found copy of the Mosaic law. Pentecost was followed by many years of Gospel labor. And as co-workers in this labor, Paul commends "the women" of Philippi, who "labored with himself and Clement in the Gospel;" Priscilla, who was "his helper in Christ Jesus;" and Persis, Tryphena, and Tryphosa, who "labored in the Lord."

The public services of woman, from the Red Sea to the "upper room" at Jerusalem, if typical, as they doubtless are, of woman's work in the Gospel, indicate that the "labors in the Lord," "helpers in Christ Jesus," and "laborers in the Gospel," by women at Philippi, Ephesus and Rome, which Paul so commends, were far more than mere works of charity. That they were so is conclusively shown by the Pauline use of the Greek word "diakonos," which is forty-eight times rendered minister or its equivalent in the Pauline epistles of our version.

The gift of prophecy which was exercised by woman all along under the law: at the birth of Christ and on the day of Pentecost is exalted by Paul to the highest place of any given to believers. It is the first in Romans, and next to that of Apostles in 1st Corinthians and Ephesians. In 1st Cor. xii: 5-10, Paul classes it as a distinct ministry or "diaconate;" (3) it is the spiritual energizing gift that enables any gift to "edify, comfort, or minister consolation to the Church," or (24) to "convict sinners." It is the special gift that Paul desired all to exercise (5); that he enjoined the Church to covet (39). It is the one gift that Paul said all might exercise, for his words are, "All may prophesy." Christian writers are agreed that this gift was not to foretell events, but to speak under the influence of the Holy Spirit. Lange says it was to "unfold the mysteries of the inner or outer life by the illumination of the Spirit."

This gift of prophecy so exalted by Paul was the one which we find exercised by the four daughters of Phillip, near the close of Paul's ministry (Acts xxi: 10). And in the same epistle where the adverse objection to women is found, Paul gives instruction how woman can rightly exercise the gift of prophecy and prayer in public (1 Cor. xi: 5-14).

As Phillip's four daughters were prophesying many years after the epistle to Corinthians was written: as Paul desired all to prophesy; permitted all to prophesy; exhorted all to covet to prophesy; and gave directions how woman should prophesy; as they had always prophesied under the law, unless the Gospel is far more narrow and illiberal than the Mosaic law, or than the Church in apostolic times, woman ought to prophesy in this day. And as Paul makes prophecy a distinct ministry, a woman who exercised this gift was a Gospel minister, in the Pauline sense of the word.

Paul applies the word "diakonos" as a minister to Christ, to himself and the other apostles, to Tycheicus, to Aristarchus, Epaphras, Archippus, Timothy, Mark, Apollos, and Phoebe, a woman of Cenchrea. This Phœbe was a woman of such note, that she bore the Roman Epistle from Corinth to Rome. Nevertheless, while the word is rendered minister in every case where it is applied to men, when it is applied to Phœbe precisely as to the men, it is arbitrarily belittled to "a servant" in the face of the fact that Paul had used another word for servant eleven times in this Roman Epistle, and never in his writings used "diakonos" for servant. If Rom. xv: 1 was rendered according to Pauline usage, it would read, "I commend unto you Phœbe our sister, who is a minister of the Church that is at Cenchrea." It is not deaconess, nor servant, but just the same word used for minister nearly fifty times by the great apostle. That is, Phœbe was the same sort of a minister of the Gospel that the men were, so far as Paul could say so by language.

The most remarkable passage where this word "diakonos" is used by Paul, is (1 Tim. iii: 8-13) where it occurs four times and is rendered "deacon" in our version. But in the midst of the six verses, which all commentators agree is a special direction for a particular work, occur the words, "women likewise" or in "like manner." Showing that whatever the service is, it is for both men and women "likewise." Because of this equality of women, thus introduced, this text has been, and is for those who deny this equality, one of the most difficult in Paul's epistles. So great a commentator as Lange actually suggests cutting them out as an interpolation. He says, "We are almost unwilling forced to apply this to the wives of deacons, although it is remarkable that such precepts should be given to these and none to the wives of the presbyters who hold higher rank." All the difficulty is made by departure from Pauline usage of the word "diakonos." It is Paul's word for minister; if it was so used here, as one of the best of the old English translations—Purver's—uses it; it would leave the "deacons" out and put "women ministers" into the Church and restore to Christian ministers the finest counsel left to them in the Bible, which they have in large measure lost by trying to apply it to a mere church official, not otherwise found in the Pauline Epistles.

The reading of this passage is so chaste, simple, and consistent, as Purver translates it, with minister instead of deacon, that it is one of the curiosities of Bible literature. It reads:

"Ministers in like manner must be grave, not double-tongued, not given to much wine nor greedy of filthy lucre, holding the mystery of faith in a pure conscience. And let these also be first proved, then let them minister if they be blameless. The women likewise must be grave, not slanderers, temperate, faithful in all things. Let ministers be husbands of one wife, ruling their children and their own houses well. For they that have ministered well, gain to themselves a good standing and great boldness in Christ Jesus."

The fact that the word rendered "boldness" in the last line means boldness in speaking, is proof that it was spoken by Paul of ministers, and not of a church officer who is not a speaker, and does not have the qualities here commended.

There are many allusions in the writings of the Ante-Nicene age of the Church, that prove that woman's ministry remained in the Christian Church for at least three hundred years. About the middle of the Third Century, or later, the Apostolic Constitutions, Book 8, Sec. 2, on the subject of prophecy, after treating at length for men who prophesy, adds, "Women prophesied also;" naming Miriam, Deborah, Huldah, Judith, Mary, Elizabeth and Anna, and the daughters of Phillip, it adds, "Wherefore, if among you also there be a woman, and such a one obtain any gift, let them be humble that God may be pleased with them."

Ireneus, last half of Second Century, says against the Montanists, "Wretched men indeed who set aside the gift of prophecy from the Church. We must conclude these men cannot admit the Apostle Paul. For in his Epistle to Corinthian he speaks expressly of prophetic gifts, and recognizes men and women prophesying in the Church."—Ireneus Against Heresies, Book 3, Chap. II, Sec. 9.

In the writings of Asterius Urbanus addressed, as Bishop Lightfoot proves, to the "Bishop of Hieropolis" in the last half of the Second Century, also against the Montanists is an account of a woman minister of Philadelphia by the name of "Aunmia," whom he classes with true prophets, and says, "For the apostle deems that the gift of prophecy should abide in all the Church, up to the time of the final advent."—Sec. 10, Ante-Nicene Fathers, American Edition, Vol. 7, page 337.

Justin Martyr to Trypho the Jew, says, first half of the Second Century, "Now it is possible to see among us, men and women who possess gifts of the Spirit of God. The prophetic gifts remain with us even to the present time."

Origen (255) speaks of women's ministry as "existing and necessary."

Tertullian (200) often mentions the prophecy of women, and gives account of one in the Church over which he presided as Bishop, at Carthage.

In the Apocryphal writings of the Second and Third Century, is a history of the ministry of two women, "Theckla" and "Mary Anne," the one as companion of Paul, and the other a daughter of Phillip; showing that the idea of women's ministry was familiar to the public mind of the early Church.

With such a picture of women's place in the public religious service of the early Church, it is not strange that in this age of enquiry, the Christian consciousness should begin to demand the re-establishment of this Christian Democracy—with its original principles of equality—with all its primitive freedom.

5121 LIBERTY AVE., PITTSBURGH, PA.

EXCUSE.—Confessing our faults by attempting to excuse them. We have all of us pleasant evasions enough not only for leaving undone what we ought to have done, but for doing what we ought not to have done.

A gentleman, who had just put aside two bottles of capital ale to recreate some friends, discovered just before dinner, that his servant, a country bumpkin, had emptied them both. "Scoundrel!" said his master, "what do you mean by this." "Why, sir, I saw, plain enough, by the clouds, that it was going to thunder, so I drank up the yale at once, lest it should turn sour, for there's nothing I do abominate like waste." Fuseli, when he failed in any of his serious caricatures, used to complain that nature put him out, and the sluttish house-maid, when scolded for the untidiness of the chambers, exclaimed, "I am sure the rooms would be clean enough, if it were not for the nasty sun, which is always showing the dirty corners."—The Tin Trumpet.

There are recorded some interesting instances of the spiritual illumination bestowed on quite young persons, when their attention is turned to the Spirit of Christ, and a willingness found in them to follow its leadings.

Thomas Raylton, who was a faithful minister in the early days of the Society of Friends, was born in 1671. When about fourteen years of age, he accompanied his mother to a meeting of Friends, where under the powerful ministry of George Rook, he was convinced of the Truth, and joined in heart with those people that directed to Christ within, the hope of their glory.

After his decease, some account of his conviction and spiritual progress was found in his own handwriting, in which he says: "Forasmuch as I was bowed before the Lord, and had given up my name to serve Him, I then saw I must walk in the narrow way, and leave the vain compliments, the putting off the hat, and bowing the knee to man, etc. I was soon taken notice of, and complaint made to my mother, of my neglecting to conform to these things, by the priest, my then master, who was moved at my behavior, and I supposed intended at that time to have used the rod, and having made preparation, called me to him. He said,

'I heard to-day that thou wentest by Mrs. Bounskill, and didst not put off thy hat, and bid good-morrow;' adding, 'What is thy reason for so doing; whether is it pride or religion?' Upon which I told him it was not pride. Then said he, it must be religion; and if so, thou must not be whipped; and so laid down the rod. But, said he, if for religion, let me know thy reason thou refusedst, and give me some precedent. So I told him I had been reading in the Revelations, and there I found that an angel showed John many things, and that John said, 'When I had heard and seen, I fell down to worship the angel that showed me those things, but the angel said, 'See thou do it not, for I am of thy fellow-servants, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them which keep the sayings of this book: worship God.' And from this I told him, I refused to do it unto me.

"But he endeavored to persuade me, that what he requested of me was no more than a civil respect between man and man. To make me the more willing to believe it was no worship, but respect, he turned me to the place of Heth and Abraham's bowing to each other; and also proceeded to show me something of the like kind among the children of Israel, in the time of Moses and Joshua. But all these were to no purpose to me, for my eye was open to see a more glorious dispensation than that of Moses, yea, or the prophets. For though they were good men, and by the Spirit of Christ in them they did foretell the coming of Christ, and of his sufferings; yet they did not live to see those things come to pass, which they had spoken of. So that he had no force in his argument to make me use those things which might be used among the Fathers, and also after the Law. And since the New Testament is silent, and gives no account of either Christ or his apostles being in the practice of bowing; I did not see why either hat or knee should be expected of me. As for the latter, I have no account at all, therefore I stood to my principle, and kept to the light and understanding the Lord hath given me through Jesus Christ my Saviour, who then was come to my house in spirit, and had brought salvation with Him."

As Thomas Rayton was faithful in obeying those requireing of duty which he felt laid upon him by the Lord, he was enabled to encounter successfully the opposition he met with at school; and also at home from his parents, who were displeas'd that one of their children should leave the form of religion in which they had been educated, and decline meeting for worship with the Episcopal Church. A gift in the ministry of the Gospel was bestowed upon him, and he became a laborious minister of Christ, and travelled much in the service of Truth.

His experience recalls that of a more modern minister, the late Christopher Healy, of Bucks County, Pennsylvania. The family were then living in the southeastern part of Connecticut, not far from the border line of the State of Rhode Island, and mostly attended the meetings of the people called New-light Baptists. Christopher was between thirteen and fourteen years of age, and attended a school taught by a Presbyterian master, who heard his scholars repeat their catechism every Seventh-day morning. In looking at the answer that fell to his lot in the lesson one day, he found that to the question, "What are the decrees of God?" he must reply, "That God's decrees are the wise, free and holy acts of the counsel of his will, whereby, from all eternity, he hath, for his own glory, unchangeably foreordained whatsoever comes to pass in time, &c." This doctrine of pre-destination, in subversion of man's free agency, was what his Bible had not taught him; and he found that he must decline these lessons; but how to break his determination to the master was the question; yet, as his peace continued in it, he made the request. In surprise, the teacher desired to know why he wished to be excused from saying his catechism, which he looked upon as next to the Bible. The straitened boy could only reply, that he did not feel easy to learn it. "But," said the master, "I cannot excuse you unless you give me a reason." At length Christopher had fairly to tell him he could not learn his catechism because it was not true. "Not true!" said the astonished master; who, although he set great store by the lad, seemed almost horror-struck at his declaration. However, finding him firm, he told him that if he would make his word good by proving the catechism to be false, he would excuse him hereafter from these lessons; and a time was appointed for the proof.

A time of deep trial the little fellow had till the hour came, to which nearly all his school-fellows staid. But Christopher, though so young, had read his Bible with care, and had a retentive memory; and the good Remembrance brought to his recollection this passage of the prophet Jeremiah, where, speaking in the name of the Most High, it is said, "They have built the high places of Tophet, which is in the valley of the son of Hinnon, to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire, which I commanded them not, neither came it into my heart;" showing that these things were not pre-ordained of God, but were of man's own wickedness. The astonished schoolmaster could only say, he did not think there had been anything like it in the Bible. However, he released the lad from saying his catechism any more.

Twenty-five years afterwards, when Christopher had become a recommended minister in the Society of Friends, a concern came upon his mind to visit the scenes of his childhood; and he came to this very spot, and appointed a meeting to which his old school-master and former school-fellows were invited and came. In this meeting he was led to relate this anecdote, saying, "And ye are my witnesses," as he appeared to them, and detailed some of the dealings of the Lord with him in drawing him towards Friends, and opening one by one their testimonies to his understanding. His old master seemed rejoiced to see him; and his school-fellows received him with open arms.

The Coming of Spring.

It was not until the arrival of the Fourth Month, that the cold of winter could be fairly said to have given place to the milder weather of spring. It was cheering to see the evidences of the return of animal and vegetable life. Now as I write, on the 4th of the Fourth Month, the yellow Jessamine, by the fence of our yard, is thickly studded with its bright yellow blossoms. The mildness of early winter tempted the buds to expand as early as the Twelfth Month, but since that time, it has shown little signs of growth until within a few days.

The Snow-drops and Crocuses in the garden have displayed their beauties—and the wild, bulbous plants, the Garlic and Star of Bethlehem, although not yet in bloom, have sent up their leaves to the height of several inches. Among those which are in bloom, are the Skunk-cabbage, Shad Blossom, Silver Maple, and Candle Alder. And in a walk this afternoon I met with the beautiful little blue Liverwort (Hepatica). Many others are pushing above ground, and in a week or two we may expect a large addition to the wild flowers that will reward the search of the botanist.

Several of our summer birds have returned—as the Robin, Blackbird, Bluebird. And yesterday we saw a small snake, probably a Garter Snake, lying on a path, where a small snake were walking. On our approach it speedily disappeared. The Ants had commenced to repair their nests, and the little piles of fresh sand which they had brought up from below, were spread over the surface. In a pond near by, the Water Tortoises occasionally protruded their heads above water and then sank again into safer retreats. The Frogs plunged into a ditch that bordered our path, and to-day their croaking or that of the toads, which had come to the water to spawn, were heard in the low grounds overspread by the waters of Pensaukin Creek.

As I wandered along a rivulet that ran through the woods, it was pleasant to watch the active motions of the Gyrinus, a small oval beetle that moved rapidly in irregular curves over the surface of the water, and the still more rapid darting hither and thither of a slender-bodied water spider. These insects seemed to be too light to break the tenacity of the top film of water—and supported by it, they apparently rejoiced in the return of warmth, and in their swift, unimpeded motions.

As I was leaving home for a walk this afternoon, I picked up a dead bat in front of our house. A hollow tree had been cut down a few days ago, and it is probable the bat had taken refuge in it for the winter, and was sleeping away the cold weather, waiting till the return of warmth had brought into active life the insects on which it feeds. Probably it was killed in the falling of the tree.

This little animal is an interesting example of the manner in which the organs of the body are modified to fit the animal for the life it is destined to lead. It is as truly an inhabitant of the air as a Swallow or a Thrush. It has hind feet which are adapted to hooking on to the protuberances of the hollow trees or caverns which they frequent, but the front legs have been developed into a pair of long wings, formed by a thin membrane stretched over the enormously lengthened out bones of the arms and fingers.

In enumerating the plants in bloom, I had almost forgotten the Common Chickweed (Stellaria media), hundreds of whose beautiful little white stars may be seen dotting the green sward of some of our yards. Like many other flowers they close up at night, and open again when the sun rests upon them. Where they are numerous the effect is very pretty. J. W.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"No Sacrifice too Great to Win Christ."

(PHIL. III: 8.)

That saying of the Lord Jesus, "It is the spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I speak unto you are spirit and are life," (John vi: 63), makes a clear distinction between the workings and teachings of God's Spirit in us and the natural will of man. The former, he designates "spirit," and the latter, "flesh." The Apostles, notably the Apostle Paul, distinguish the same as the prophets had before done in ancient times.

That God gives a special call to each individual of his flock is certain, for the Good Shepherd declares, "the sheep hear his voice, and he calleth his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out," (John x: 3). As Christ also says in the book of Revelations, "If any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come into him, and will sup with him and he with me," (Rev. iii: 20).

Various, then, are his conditions and his requirements. Many are the teachings of Holy Writ, that nothing whatever must be withheld from Him that He requires. The Jews were commanded to give the first fruits of their fields, the first-born of their flocks and herds, and the first-born of their own offspring. No lame, diseased, nor any animal lacking any or having any superfluous parts, nor blemished inwardly or outwardly, was acceptable as a sacrifice. Yea, these very offerings were acknowledgments, by God's people, that all they had, and all they were, and all they hoped for, was all of the bounty and mercy of God, their Creator and Redeemer, and that not only they themselves, but their lives and possessions, were all at the service of their sovereign Lord.

And as it was with the true Israelite of old, so is it now in this dispensation with the Jew inwardly, who walks not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.

When the rich ruler came running to Jesus, with earnest desires on his part to please God and do his will, he being one who, by the powers of the natural man's goodness, had, as he himself thought, quite fulfilled the law of Moses, yet did the true witness for God's righteousness in the heart so disturb his peace and reveal to him that notwithstanding all this, all was not well, that he came to Jesus, asking, "Good Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?" (Luke xviii: 18). The natural man had already done all that the highest recognized authority on earth required of him to do. Why, then, did he ask, "What must I do?" The natural man can and does make great sacrifices to gain heaven; but it cannot take up the cross to itself, but this is the unalterable rule of the way, "to deny self, take up the cross, and follow Christ." The all just and omniscient Judge discerned the missing link in his title as an heir of heaven. The evangelist Mark records, that "Jesus beholding him, loved him," (x: 21). He who needed not that any should testify of man, for he knew what was in man, saw the contending feelings in this ruler's heart, as He propounded, the one thing which his suppliant lacked to make perfect his title: "Sell all that thou hast, and distribute to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come follow me." The natural man refused to be crucified with Christ—refused his yoke, and we read, as he went away, "he was very sorrowful, for he was very rich."

Our gracious Lord, to whom we owe all, sees in each of us the stumbling block that prevents us laying our all at his feet. Nothing must be to near or too dear to us to part with, that we may win Christ, for He alone will have all the glory. Here are Christ's own words: "If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife and children, and brethren and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." (Luke xiv: 26.) It cannot be by this, that he, who commandeth us to love all, even our enemies, as He himself did, intends that any other feeling than love in us is admissible towards those dear unto us by the ties of nature; but that nature itself, "our own life," with all its affections and desires, must be laid on the altar, and a new heart and a new mind received that will esteem heavenly things above all, wherein Christ ruleth and reigneth, and all the former things will be a hundredfold enjoyed with a pure mind, and a conscience at peace with God and man. But these must all be held at the call of our sovereign Lord, who maketh hard things easy and bitter things sweet.

"Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven. But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in Heaven," (Matt. x: 32, 33).

If, then, we would "win Christ," and so become heirs of heaven, let us strive for grace to do his will, and "present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is our reasonable service, and turn not in sorrow away, when God in mercy leads us into the valley of decision to the foot of the cross. For what is all the honor, glory or riches of this momentary world to the exceeding and eternal glories of heaven, or "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

W. W. B.

The time before tea passed in conversation on religious subjects, I trust profitably; yet it felt to me that care was necessary lest a disposition should be fed which has a life in talking of the mercies of God, without being concerned daily to dwell under a sense thereof ready in acknowledging their own insufficiency and unworthiness, and yet self, and self-activity not so slain, as livingly to feel their dependence on Him, who remains to be "the resurrection and the life" to all who truly confide in Him.

After tea we dropped into silence, and believing myself called upon to minister to our little company, I had to lay before them the necessity of being weaned from all dependence on man, however favored at times the instrument might be, if ever we come to witness a being taught of the Lord, and an establishment in righteousness.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

LOVE-BOUND.

BY JOHN E. HINSHAW.

"Snow-Bound" and Ice-Bound" and "Rain-Bound,"

Beautiful songs, and
But which is the truer and better
Is not for a "farmer" to say.

But the list is still uncompleted,
Till I add to the rest my lay,
For I feel that the strains that I utter,
Is time not tidled away.

For oft when I walk in the meadow,
Or follow the plow in the field,
I think of the "hounds of duty,"
And the influence oft we wield.

We struggle with "fate," as we call it,
Beautiful change for a happier sphere,
But alas! we are bounded by duty,
And remain where surroundings are drear.

But why are we bounded by duty?
Ah! there is the theme to my song,
We see it in all that's existing
And welcome it all the day long.

I speak, but I fain would be silent,
But silence only makes me wail;
And thus we give vent to our feelings,
And thus to our neighbors give cheer.

In the warmth and glow of my singing,
I never have sought to be brief;
No matter how sorrow was wringing
My soul, in the darkest of grief.

And briefly I sing of the pleasures,
That meet us on our path way along;
But never was happiness equalled
By words of the sweetest of song.

And now that I have your attention,
My theme in one word will be found,
And never was sweeter word spoken,
For "duty" is ever "Love-Bound."

THOUGHTS IN A RELIGIOUS MEETING.

BY AVIS C. HOWLAND.

Though few in number Father, Lord,
Still in thy name we come
To wait for thy teaching Word
Though human lips be dumb;
Though neither sad nor joyful tone
Be lent to mortal ear,
Yet thou who knowest the heart alone,
Wilt kindly listen here.

The while a cold or formal throng
We seem to mortal eye,
Thou know'st full many a grateful song,
And many a secret sigh,
And heart-felt prayers for strength and grace
To walk from error free,
Rise from that silent gathering place,
In sounds of power to thee.

The few that here are wholly thine,
Who tread the narrow way,
Told not thy outward seal, or sign
Of thy baptismal day;
Thou only know'st the way and time
Their covenant began
Thou only when they seek sublime
Communion with thy Son.

Join me to these, as deep to deep,
Their way be still my choice;
My soul even as an infant keep
That knows its parent's voice.
While others labor in thy cause
With words of power and skill,
Be it but mine to know thy laws,
To love thee—and be still.

As the kingdom of heaven stands not in words but in power; so it is not words but the power of God that can mortify the deed of the body, change our natures, and make as new creatures,

The Tuskegee Negro Conference.

On the 23rd of Second Month last, a conference of about 450 negro delegates was held at the colored Normal and Industrial Institute, of Tuskegee, Alabama, to consult on the difficulties with which the colored race is surrounded, and the best means of elevating their condition.

Most of them are poor, and when they rent land are compelled to mortgage their crops in advance in order to get the needful supplies which are often charged for at a high rate, and heavy interest demanded. The discussion of these subjects must have had an educating and uplifting effect upon those assembled. The following resolutions were submitted to the conference by a committee, and, after discussion, adopted. We copy them from The Christian Register.

RESOLUTIONS.

We, some of the representatives of the colored people, living in the Black Belt—the heart of the South, thinking it might prove of interest and value to our friends throughout the country, as well as beneficial to ourselves, have met together in conference to present facts and express opinions as to our Industrial, Moral and Educational condition, and to exchange views as to how our own efforts and the kindly helpfulness of our friends may best contribute to our elevation.

First, Set at liberty, with no inheritance but our bodies, without training in self-dependence, and thrown at once into commercial, civil and political relations with our former owners, we consider it a matter of great thankfulness that our condition is as good as it is, and that so large a degree of harmony exists between us and our white neighbors.

Second, Industrially considered, most of our people are dependent upon agriculture. The majority of them live on rented lands, mortgage their crops for the food on which to live from year to year, and usually at the beginning of each year are more or less in debt for the supplies of the previous year.

Third, Not only is our own material progress hindered by the mortgage system, but also that of our white friends. It is a system that tempts us to buy much that we would do without if cash were required, and it tends to lead those who advance the provisions and lend the money to extravagant prices and ruinous rates of interest.

Fourth, In a moral and religious sense, while we admit there is much laxness in morals and superstition in religion, yet we feel that much progress has been made, that there is a growing public sentiment in favor of purity, and that the people are fast coming to make their religion less of superstition and emotion and more of a matter of daily living.

Fifth, As to our educational condition, it is to be noted that our country schools are in session on an average only three and one-half months each year; that the Gulf States are as yet unable to provide school-houses, and, as a result, the schools are held almost out-of-doors, or, at best, in such rude quarters as the poverty of the people is able to provide; that the teachers are poorly paid, and often very poorly fitted for their work, and, as a result of these things, both parents and scholars take but little interest in the schools, often but few children attend, and these with great irregularity.

Sixth, That in view of our general condition, we would suggest the following remedies: 1. That, as far as possible, we aim to raise at home our own meat and bread. 2. That as fast as possible, we buy land, even though a very few acres at a time. 3. That a larger number of our young people be taught trades, and that they be urged to prepare themselves to enter as largely as possible all the various avocations of the field. 4. That we especially try to broaden the life of labor for our women. 5. That we make every sacrifice and practice every form of economy, that we may purchase land and free ourselves from our burdensome habit of living in debt. 6. That we urge our ministers and teachers to give more attention to the material conditions and home life of the people. 7. We urge that our people do not depend entirely upon the State to provide school-houses and lengthen the time of the schools, but that they take hold of the matter themselves, when the State leaves off, and, by supplementing the public funds from their own pockets, and by building school-houses, bring about the desired results. 8. We urge patrons to give earnest attention to the mental and moral fitness of those who teach their schools. 9. That we urge the doing away with all sectarian prejudice in the management of the schools.

Seventh, As the judgment of this conference, we would further declare: That we put on record our deep sense of gratitude to the good people of all sections for their assistance, and that we are glad to recognize a growing interest on the part of the best white people of the South in the education of the Negro.

Eighth, That we appreciate the spirit of friendliness and fairness shown us by the Southern white people in matters of business in all lines of material development.

Ninth, That we believe our generous friends of the country can best aid in our elevation by continuing to give their help where it will result in producing strong Christian leaders who will live among the masses as object-lessons, showing them how to direct their own efforts toward the general uplifting of the people.

Tenth, that we believe we can become prosperous, independent and intelligent where we are; and we discourage any efforts at wholesale emigration, and, recognizing that our home is to be in the South, we urge that all strive in every way to cultivate the good feeling and friendship of those about us in all that relates to our mutual elevation.

A NOVELTY in the line of royal visits is the presence in St. Petersburg of the Emir of Bokhara, Abdul Ahad Khan. It is the first time that a ruler of the ultra-Mohammedan Bokhara has ventured to appear in a Christian capital. Abdul Ahad Khan, twenty-seven years old, is the son of Emir Muzaffar Eddin, who died in 1865, and the grandson of the fanatical Masrullah, who died in 1849. During the rule of the last-mentioned tyrant it was death for a Christian to enter his realm, and in the year 1842 the Emir caused an official delegation, sent by Queen Victoria, to be publicly beheaded in the market-place of Bokhara. In his last will and testament he made it the most sacred duty of his successors to use fire and sword in the extermination of the Christians. Abdul Ahad Khan, however, in his youth, had European instructors, and has introduced European customs and ceremonies at his court. In the capital, Bokhara, which is a station on the great Trans-Caspian Railroad, there is now a European quarter. A nephew of the Emir a few years ago became a convert to Christianity.

The Saving Power of the Prince of Peace.

The following incident was related by George Dillwyn, of Burlington, N. J., a valued preacher in the Society of Friends:—

One of the solitary habitations in the back settlement was occupied by a Friend's family, who lived in such secure simplicity that they had hitherto had no apprehension of danger, and used neither bolt nor bar to their door, having no other means of securing their dwelling from intrusion than by drawing in the leathern thong by which the wooden latch inside was lifted from without.

The Indians had committed frightful ravages all around, burning and murdering without mercy. Every evening brought new tidings of horror, and every night the unhappy settlers surrounded themselves with such defences as they could muster—even then, for dread, scarcely being able to sleep. The Friend and his family, who hitherto put no trust in the arm of flesh, but had left all in the keeping of God, believing that man often runs in his own strength to his own injury, had used so little precaution that they slept without even withdrawing the latch, and were as yet uninjured. Alarmed, however, at length, by the fears of others, and by the dreadful rumors that surrounded them, they yielded to their fears on one particular night, and before retiring to rest drew in the string, and thus secured themselves as well as they were able.

In the dead of the night, the Friend, who had not been able to sleep, asked his wife if she slept, and she replied that she could not, for her mind was uneasy. Upon this he confessed that the same was his case, and he believed it would be safest for him to rise and put out the string of the latch, as usual. On her approving of this, it was done, and the two lay down again, commending themselves to the keeping of God.

This had not occurred above ten minutes, when the dismal sound of the war-whoop echoed through the forest, filling every heart with dread, and almost immediately afterward they counted the footsteps of seven men pass the window of their chamber, which was on the ground floor, and the next moment the door-string was pulled, the latch lifted, and the door opened. A debate of a few minutes took place, the purport of which, as it was in the Indian language, was unintelligible; but that it was favorable to them was proved by the door being again closed, and the Indians retiring without crossing the threshold.

The next morning they saw the smoke rising from burning habitations all around them; parents were weeping for their children who were carried off, and children lamenting over their parents who had been cruelly slain.

Some years afterward, when peace was restored, and the colonists had occasion to hold conference with the Indians, this Friend was appointed as one for that purpose, and, speaking in relation to the Indians, he related the above incident; in reply to which an Indian observed that, by the simple circumstance of putting out the latch-string, which proved confidence rather than fear, their lives and property had been saved; for that he himself was one of the marauding party, and that, on finding the door open, it was said: "These people shall live; they will do us no harm, for they put their trust in the Great Spirit."

A family of Quakers settled in a remote part of Pennsylvania, then exposed to the savage incursions of the Indians. They had not been there long before a party of Indians, panting for blood, started on one of their terrible excursions, and passed in the direction of the Quaker's abode. Though disposed at first to assail him and his family as enemies, they were treated with such open-hearted confidence, and with such cordiality and kindness, as completely disarmed them of their purpose. They came forth, not against such persons, but against their enemies. They thirsted for the blood of those who injured them; but these children of Peace, unarmed and entirely defenceless, met them only with the accents of love and deeds of kindness.

It was not in the heart even of a savage to harm them; and, on leaving the Quaker's house, the Indians took a white feather, and stuck it over the door, to designate the place as a sanctuary not to be harmed by their brethren in arms. Nor was it harmed. The war raged all around it; the forest echoed often to the Indians' yell, and many a white man's hearth was drenched in his own blood; but over the Quaker's humble abode gently waved the white feather of peace, and beneath it his family slept without harm or fear.

Shortly before the Revolutionary War, there were a few families of Friends who had removed from Duches County, and settled at Easton, then in Saratoga County, State of New York. That country was then new, and there were but few inhabitants; and the nearest meeting being at too great a distance to be regularly attended, these Friends requested the privilege of holding a meeting for religious worship, which was granted.

This section of the country proved to be one which was so much distressed by scouting parties from both the British and American armies, that the American Government, unable to protect the inhabitants, issued a proclamation, directing them to leave their country; and most of the people went. Friends requested to be permitted to exercise their own judgment, saying, "You are clear of us, as you have warned us." They accordingly remained at their homes, and kept up their meetings.

Robert Nesbit, who lived at that time at East Hoosick, about thirty miles distant, felt it right to walk through the wilderness country, and attend one of their week-day meetings. After Friends had assembled, and were sitting in the meeting with the door open, they perceived an Indian peeping around the door-post. When he saw Friends sitting in silence, he stepped forward and took a full view of everything that was in the house; then beckoning to his company, they placed their arms in a corner of the room, took seats, and remained till the meeting closed.

Zebulon Hoxie, one of the Friends present, then invited the Indians to his house, and, placing some bread and cheese on a table, desired them to help themselves. After they had eaten, they went quietly away.

Robert Nesbit, who could speak the French language, had a conversation with the leader of the Indians, who told him that they surrounded the meeting-house, intending to destroy all who were in it; "but," said he, "when we saw you sitting with your door open, and no weapons of defence, we had no disposition to hurt you; we would have fought for you."—Friends' Monthly Record.

THAT worthy minister, Thomas Scattergood, said, it seemed sometimes as if he could run from one end of the continent to the other, to tell what the Lord had done for his soul.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Wild-cats in the Huntingdon Valley.—John Martin was in town to-day to collect the bounty on wild-cats, recently killed by him on Stone Mountain, north of this place. He reports an enormous increase in the number of these animals in that part of the country, and he and his neighbors have turned trappers and are otherwise endeavoring to exterminate them, or, at least, to diminish their depredations on poultry and domestic animals on the farms along the mountain and in the valley. Many of the farmers there have been unable to keep fowls during the past winter, and even sheep, pigs and calves have been attacked and destroyed.

It has been impossible to put the cats out of the way rapidly enough with traps or by shooting them, and poisoned meat has been scattered along the mountain side, and many of them killed in that way. The bounty and the price that can be obtained for the skin amount to about four dollars, and this revenue has partly reimbursed the farmers for the destruction committed by these ravenous beasts in their nightly raids.—Public Ledger.

Fowl and Bird Language.—Not only dogs and cats, but chickens and birds also, can find ways of letting human beings know that they want something, or that something is the matter.

"One day a Cochon hen," tells a chicken fancier, in Golden Days, "came and stood in front of me, looked me full in the face, and complained loudly of something I could not translate further. Patient investigation revealed that one end of her perch had slipped down, and Mrs. Buff had no idea of sleeping on an inclined plane. Another time a nervous little Leghorn met me at the hen-house door, fairly screaming and jumping with excitement. I understood from the cackle which finished each sentence that she had been disturbed on her nest. I did not wonder at her new powers of cackling when I found the nest occupied by a cat and three small kittens. When the chickens first begin to move in the egg, just before hatching, the mother hen sings to them a low, crooning song, very sweet, and never heard at any other time. A friend tells me that her canary started her one day by an entirely new call. It was so plainly 'Come here, quick!' that she hurried to the cage to find a cat, with its face pressed against the window-pane, staring in at poor Ned—a danger sufficiently great to account for the call."

We can easily believe that the canary called for her mistress after watching the performances of a tame oriole, who goes by the name of Peter. He has a certain whistle which he seldom uses, and only when something very special is going on, such as the approach of his mistress with some dainty of which he is extravagantly fond. One day, when he was in his cage down-stairs alone, his mistress heard him whistle again and again, and finally went to see what caused his excitement. She found a mouse on the cage, and Peter whistling at him and trying his best to strike him with his long, sharp bill. Peter evidently was not afraid, but he knew the mouse was an intruder, and wanted help in expelling him.

One Tail Feather too Many.—An official connected with the United States Mint is quoted as saying that they had found it necessary to take one feather out of the American eagle's tail on the dollar, because the artist had put in eight tail feathers, while the American eagle had only seven.

Now whoever supposed the eagle's tail feathers were counted? Why might they not have anywhere from six feathers to a dozen? Well, you see that is not the way eagles are made.

An artist once painted a picture of a partridge, which he showed to John J. Audubon, whose magnificent folio books on The Birds of America show that he knew more about birds than any other living man. Audubon said: "The picture is wrong. You have not got the right number of scales on the partridge's legs."

Sanitary Effects of Light.—Darkness is also a cause of sickness. Many good housekeepers are fearful lest the sunlight entering the rooms may fade carpets, furniture and wall papers; but it should always be remembered that where sunlight cannot enter, the doctor is almost always sure to be a frequent visitor. It is better to have faded carpets and faded furniture than faded wife and children. Just as we see plants grow up slender, pale and sickly in a darkened room, so human beings, attempting to live in the dark, finally lose most of their vitality and power to resist disease.

Wire Glass.—Under the name of "wire glass" a new invention has been brought on the market in Dresden. The process of manufacture consists in furnishing glass in a hot, plastic condition, with a flexible metallic layer, iron-wire netting, for instance, which is completely enclosed by the vitreous substance and effectively protected against exterior influences, as rust, &c. The new glass possesses much greater resisting power than the ordinary material, and is, it is claimed, indifferent to the most abrupt changes of temperature, and will even withstand open fire. The glass is specially adapted for skylights, the powerful resisting qualities of the material enabling the usual wire protectors to be dispensed with. As wire glass cannot be cut by the diamond, except under application of great force, and cannot be broken without creating considerable noise, the substance is claimed to be, in a measure, burglar-proof.—Iron.

Chairovancey.—At Birmingham, N. Y. there is a female chairovancy who for a long time has done a great business and made much money locating stolen property. She generally carried her own money about her person, but having two thousand dollars in bills she locked it up in a bureau drawer. She then went out, and when she returned the house had been robbed. The two thousand dollars and several hundred dollars worth of silver had been stolen. Instead of going into a trance and revealing to her husband where it was, she rushed to police head-quarters and put the case in charge of the police. If chairovancey were true, according to the claims of many of its practitioners, all crime could be detected, all intrigue exposed, all stolen property located, and all important political events exposed. Its practitioners are divided into two sorts, one impostors, the other honest dealers; the latter self-hypnotized. When they hit, it is a simple coincidence, like those in dreams. For that they receive great credit among their dupes, who advertise them far and wide. When they fail, those who have paid the money usually keep still, not wishing to advertise their own folly.—Christian Advocate.

Lynching.—The instances of lynching, in which there is no doubt in anybody's mind that the person lynched deserved death, are in nearly all cases instances in which a conviction and execution could have been obtained by due course of law. The instances of a contrary kind—those where doubt exists, are condemned by all. It is only the self-evident cases that are defended. But precisely because justice is easily arrived at, the pretended reason for lynching does not exist in those cases in which lynching is at first sight commended by some not very thoughtful persons. It is grievous to see criminals going unwhipped of justice, but it may be permitted to ask whether the persons lynched are those who would go unwhipped if the law were allowed to take its course? Scarcely. The fact is that the hot blood of the citizens causes them to determine that certain offenses shall be expiated with a measure of cruelty and of enmity, and yet thus they do injustice to themselves.

The solemn and orderly course of the law would be more impressive than this passionate haste. In addition, it is doubtless true that every act of participation in violence, every thought of those thus engaged, develops the lawless spirit, culminating in future violence according to circumstances, and in some instances in murder. Man has still too much of the untamed savage in his composition for him lightly to awaken the passion of revenge. Even legal public executions were pronounced by competent judges of human nature breeding spots of crime by excitement of dormant instincts of destruction. To the publicity of the lynching party there is added the active determination to slay. Think also what a reproach it is to a commonwealth when its people wish to avoedge themselves in the eyes of just judgment of the orderly arrangement of the State. Thinking well on these things it will be seen that there are many reasons beside a specific fear of error as to the guilt of the accused why the lynching party should no longer be participated in by any good citizen.—The Dallas News.

President Grant (U. S. A.) and the Mexican War.—Josiah W. Leeds writes that the war between Mexico and the United States would probably lose much of its lustre in the view of the thoughtful student, did he know that President Grant had made this frank avowal concerning it and his part in it: "I have never forgiven myself for going into the Mexican War. There was never a more wicked war than that; but, as a youngster, I lacked the moral courage to resign."

Separation of Church and State.—The sentiment in favor of a separation of Church and State is growing rapidly in Germany, especially in the conservative circles. It is this feeling which has been at the bottom of the entire agitation for greater freedom of the Church which has been carried on for the past half-dozen years in connection with the von Hammerstein resolutions. Probably the most significant voice in this direction that has been heard for years is that of Steecker, the ex-Court preacher of Berlin. In the first three numbers for the present year of the Deutscher Evangelischer Kirchenzeitung, of which he is the editor, he has a series of articles entitled "The Freedom of the Church as a Condition of her Power." The programme here unfolded and defended practically leads to a disestablishment of the State Church. It is a singular and significant fact that the liberals and radicals in the Church are the ones who fear such a separation. The latent convictions of both conservatives and liberals are that if the Church is left to herself she will develop a positive theology and life.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Militarism in School Life.

Allow me, through the columns of THE FRIEND, to point out to the Society of Friends that a great and growing evil is fastening itself on school life in the United States and Canada, by the introduction of military drill for physical exercise. Athletics can be taught without military movements, the use of which will unconsciously mould the minds of children to accept the lawfulness of military forms and methods. In the gymnasium of the collegiate institute here, boxing has been taught. It is in keeping with the spirit of evil which prompts military display, that stories of battles in prose and verse are found in our school books.

I would urge upon the consideration of the Society everywhere the importance of bearing testimony against these evils. "Blessed are the peace-makers." Incalculable good has been done by the Society as peace-makers in time past. I would breathe the hope that in time to come their light may not grow dim, and that the Spirit of Him who was Prince of Peace, may prompt to continued ministry towards the revelation of his saving health among all nations.

KINGSTON, Ont. Third Month 18, 1892.

EXTRACTS from a letter of John Heald, dated Ninth Month 14th, 1813, to Benjamin Kite: "The Yearly Meeting [of Ohio] was attended by about, I suppose, 2000 Friends, though I am ready to conclude that the number was rather less; although some Friends suppose there were 3000. A solemnity continued to attend the several sittings and deliberations thereof. Near the close my mind was led to view in retrospect the time when the number of Friends' families was less than ten. My father, one young woman and myself were all that attended our meeting; and that the only meeting then in this western country, less than forty years ago. I remember the first established meeting—the opening of a Preparative Meeting—then the opening of the first Monthly Meeting in the Twelfth Month, 1785; and some years since a Quarterly Meeting. Now a Yearly Meeting is opened, attended by such a large number of Friends, and with overshadowing solemnity. I said in my heart, 'How great things thou hast done, and art doing, for this thy people, Oh! Lord. How dost thou delight to do us good! How small but a few years ago; and what a great multitude now!' And all this brought about within the compass of my own knowledge. And the opening of all these meetings I have attended, except the Preparative."

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 23, 1892.

The Meeting of Ministers and Elders of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting convened on Seventh-day, the 16th of Fourth Month. The session was almost wholly occupied in the consideration of the concern for religious service laid before it by our beloved Friends, Samuel Morris and Jonathan E. Rhoads. Their prospect was to visit Australia, Tasmania and New Zealand, looking principally, but not exclusively, to labor among the Friends living there. Also to perform such service as the way might open for in the Empire of Japan, and possibly some of the other lands in the Pacific Ocean. In addition to accompanying Samuel Morris in his visit, J. E. Rhoads proposed visiting Friends in California and Oregon.

It was felt to be a weighty thing to liberate our Friends for such extensive service, and members of the meeting were not hasty in the expression of a judgment—but one after another, they felt prepared, declared their unity with the prospect; and much encouragement and many desires for a blessing to rest upon these ambassadors were uttered. A concern was also felt that these Friends might be preserved on their way, and be favored to return when their work was accomplished, with an increase of religious experience, and be yet more firmly established in the everlasting Truth.

The whole expression was large, and several feeling applications were offered to the Father of mercies for the Divine blessing on those who were going forth, and for the spread of the kingdom of the Redeemer.

A Friend revived a remark made at our Yearly Meeting a year ago by one who had had large opportunities for observation; the purport of which was that he had become convinced that if our Society ever filled the place which the Head of the Church designed it to occupy in the sisterhood of churches, it would be by its faithfulness in upholding the testimonies and principles which Christ had given us to maintain.

The session was one in which the blessed presence of the Head of the Church was to be felt. No other business was taken up, and the meeting adjourned to the usual time on Fourth-day following.

On Second-day (Fourth Month 18th) after the opening business, the minutes for the Meeting for Sufferings were read, which showed that during the past year 10,000 copies were printed of the Address on Behalf of the Indians, approved of by our last Yearly Meeting. These had been sent to the members of Congress, officers of the general Government, Indian agents, Judges of Courts, Young Men's Christian Associations, newspapers and other periodicals, colleges and other schools, libraries, &c. At the time, the Committee in charge of its publication, reported to the Meeting for Sufferings in the Sixth Month last, about 9000 had been thus circulated, leaving 1000 on hand. The most of these have been since distributed, being taken by persons interested in the subject.

In the Sixth Month of last year the Meeting for Sufferings was again brought under a concern which had before claimed its attention, on account of the debasing effects of some of the popular amusements of the day. While it was felt that the Lord's restraining and converting power was the only infallible remedy for such evils, the way opened to appoint a committee to examine the document on Horse Racing and Theatrical Amusements, issued a few years since, and to see whether any alterations or additions could be made to it, so as better to adapt it for present use. This Committee subsequently thought it best to separate the two subjects adverted to in the previous essay, and produced a document on horse racing, which they were encouraged to print and circulate, especially in New Jersey, where illegal races had been maintained, to the great annoyance of its sober citizens.

The Committee had printed 25,500 copies of the Address and had labored faithfully in its distribution in various parts of New Jersey, where far the larger part of the edition was circulated. This distribution was thought to be timely, and to have contributed to the defeat of an effort made by the racing community to obtain the passage of laws by the New Jersey legislature legalizing horse-racing and the gambling practices connected with it.

Memorials for five deceased Friends, ministers and elders, had been revised by the Meeting. This is an unusually large number for one year; and perhaps may be an indication that Friends are becoming more alive to the importance of observing the ancient practice of our Society of preserving some records of those whose lives are as way marks to the seekers after Zion.

On the recommendation of the Charleston Trustees, three appropriations were made from the funds under their care to repair meeting-houses elsewhere—$300 for Westfield Meetinghouse, and $100 for Piney Woods Meeting-house, both in North Carolina; and $100 for repairing the house at Chesterfield, Ohio.

The Report of the Book Committee showed a distribution of 2436 volumes and 3222 pamphlets during the year.

The Trustees of the Legacy of Charles L. Willits have continued the issue of the small monthly periodical, The African's Friend, of which they had printed 4800 copies, and distributed them in the Southern States and Liberia.

Considerable time was spent over two propositions and a question sent up from three Quarterly Meetings—one of these was a suggestion to modify the clause of the Discipline which prohibits our members from attending marriages of our members, accomplished out of the prescribed order. Another looked towards substituting "intoxicating" for "spirited" liquors in the Fourth Query. The issue of the whole was to authorize the Meeting for Sufferings to make a general revision of the Discipline and suggest to the Yearly Meeting any changes that they might deem advisable.

SYSTEMATIC SCRIPTURE INSTRUCTION.

In a letter written by William Foster, of England, soon after the introduction to Ackworth School of a more systematic study of the Scriptures, he expressed the fear lest, in injudicious hands, "it might have the tendency of drawing our young people from the root of religion in their own experience, to become satisfied with their acquaintance with the principles of Christian truth stored in the memory."

While the Bible is a great storehouse of Christian truths, which we ought to value and to use, yet religion itself is not derived from it, but from the experience of the operations of the Holy Spirit on the heart. Hence it is very possible to be deeply learned in the contents of the Scriptures, and at the same time to be ignorant of the nature, and to be destitute of the possession of that religion, which is accompanied with the change of heart which our blessed Redeemer declared was the indispensable requisite for admission to the kingdom of heaven—"Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God."

We have received from the publisher, John Dalziel, of Plainfield, New Jersey, an illustrated Gift Book for young people, entitled "Strength and Beauty." The text is a selection from Krummacher's Parables.

The parables selected contain valuable instruction, and the illustrations and mechanical execution of the book are good—so that it seems well adapted to the object for which it is published.

It may be had of the publisher, or of J. Smedley, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia. The price is 75 cents per copy, bound in paper boards, and $1 in cloth.

Joseph J. Green, of Ashmole House, Hampstead, London, N. W., has prepared an Index of the names of deceased Friends, noticed in the 80 volumes of the Annual Monitor, from its commencement in 1813 to 1892. It contains over 20,000 names—arranged alphabetically—and must often prove a great convenience to those who are seeking information in regard to members of our Society in Great Britain.

The price is six shillings (about one dollar and fifty cents.)

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A complete and amicable settlement has been reached of the international difficulties between the United States and Italy growing out of the New Orleans tragedy. The Government of the United States has placed in the hands of the Marquis Imperiali, Italian Charge des Affaires in Washington, a sum of 125,000 francs or $25,000, for distribution among the heirs of the three Italians who were killed and were found to be subjects of the Italian Government.

The Sisseton Indian Reservation, at the northwest corner of South Dakota, and extending into North Dakota, was opened to settlement on the 15th inst. Thousands of home-seekers entered the new lands at the signal from the military authorities, and there was an exciting race for the choice claims. The settlers entered from every side. Governor Millette, of South Dakota, was on the reservation with 2,500 deputy agents to preserve order.

On the 14th inst. the House Committee on Indian Affairs authorized a favorable report on a bill to declare citizens of the United States all Indians twenty-one years of age, who have heretofore or who may hereafter attach themselves for ten years at the expense of the Government, in whole or in part, or who have had ten years of industrial training.

Judge Dennis, in Baltimore, has given an opinion that an extra dividend in stock does not belong to a life tenant of an estate as income, but becomes part of the principal of the estate.

The loss of the lives of the miners entombed in the Hill Farm Mine, at Dunbar, Pa., in sixth Month, 1890, has been recorded.

The paper mill of Z. & W. M. Crane, at Coltsville, Massachusetts, where all the United States bank and treasury note paper has been made for several years, was burned on the night of the 14th instant; loss, $125,000.

The reported loss of life and property by the floods on the Tombigbee River has been confirmed, according to a dispatch from New Orleans. The citizens of Lowndes Couny, Mississippi, have petitioned Congress to allow them to be representative, to ask the Government for aid, through its own means, in order to meet the needs of the homeless people. The losses of life are variously estimated at from fifty to two hundred, all of whom are negroes. Losses of live stock and crops are beyond computation at present, but will be considerable.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 412; being 53 less than the last week, and 92 less than the corresponding week last year. Of the foregoing, 244 were males and 168 females; 62 died of consumption; 41 of pneumonia; 37 of diseases of the heart; 17 of diphtheria; 14 of cholera; 14 of convulsions; 14 of infantile; 14 of bronchitis; 13 of old age; 13 of typhoid fever and 10 of casualties.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 & 102; 4's, 115½ & 116½; currency 6's, 109 a 118.

BERNESE.—A dispatch dated London, of the 18th inst., says: Considerable surprise has been caused by the resolution of the non-union miners of Durham, about 10,000 in number, to resume work on the 19th. These men had nothing to do with the strike, but were forced out of employment by the strike. Owing to the cessation of the work through the Durham coal strike, between 18,000 and 20,000 men, women and children, who are not parties to the dispute, were deprived of the means of earning their livelihood. Therefore, there is deep and widespread distress at Darlington, Stockton, Middlesbrough, and the Hartlepool and the surrounding district.

On the 14th inst. two pearls were thrown into a Catholic religious procession in Madrid. A number of persons were injured, and the church services have since been poorly attended, owing to the threats of Anarchists.

The Berlin Post announces that Dr. Carrow, of the Mosbit Hospital, has discovered the measles bacillus. The President of the Berlin Municipal Board states that out of the twenty-four members composing the board, thirteen, or a majority, were Hebrews, and the rest agnostics, and that all of them co-operated against religious teaching in the schools.

Charles Johnson, the United States Consul at Hamburg, complains that the decrease in the exports of sugar from Hamburg are largely due to the fact that German manufacturers are combining to raise prices, and that the American merchant is naturally looking elsewhere for his supplies. Johnson gives it as his opinion that Cuba and Brazil will be largely drawn on to supply the American market. The great quantities of sugar now stored in Hamburg, and the failure of the plans of the German manufacturers, will be offered at lower rates.

The Sanitary Council of Hungary, of which Dr. Lannitzer is President, has petitioned the Government to forbid ladies wearing long trains, for the reason that they sweep the dirt on the streets and spread infectious diseases in the floating particles of dirt and germs. The prohibition has been actually carried out in Meran, in the Tyrol, but more authority is wanted before extending the prohibition.

An epidemic of black small-pox is raging in Poland, especially in the Galician frontier. The disease is very fatal, most of those who are attacked dying on the third day.

Owing to differences that arose at the last three cabinet councils over the financial measures to be submitted to the Italian Parliament, the whole Ministry have tendered their resignations to King Humbert, and are awaiting the royal answer.

The King has charged the Marquis di Rudini, the Prime Minister, to reconstruct the cabinet. No change in the ministerial programme is expected, except that the Marquis di Rudini proposes to insist more strongly upon the Government's financial proposals.

The condition of the Kingdom of Italy is deplorable. The great Roman princely families are ruined. Prince Sciarra is almost a bankrupt. He secretly sold his pictures against his will. Louis, Prince di Borghese, lives in the country, his whole fortune, which is inalienable, consisting of 12,000 fr., a fourthly the income of the Borghese family was 1,000 fr. a day.

The peninsula are fleeing to the Argentine Republic in spite of the official warning. They say they prefer to risk the gloomy situation in that country to staying to die of hunger in their own. This unfortunate condition of affairs is caused simply through Italy becoming a part of the Dual Empire, and in order to increase her armament continually, spending three hundred millions a year more than she ought in order to play the role of a great military Power. Reasoning Italians, and they are many, quite understand the necessity for a change of policy. The people also see that the Republic is only beginning to grow. It declares that Italy ought to give up the German alliance for the French alliance.

From advices received in London, it is learned that cholera is spreading at an alarming rate in the Punjab, British India, since the return of the pilgrims from Hurdwar, down and upon pilgrimage, where it has been epidemic for the largest part of the year, being attended annually by from 200,000 to 500,000 persons, and in every twelfth year by from 1,000,000 to 2,000,000 pilgrims and dealers. The Punjab pilgrims were forced to disband at Hurdwar in consequence of a virulent outbreak of the dreaded disease.

A dispatch from Tokio says that the conflagration that broke out there on the 10th inst., did enormous damage. The dispatch is vague as to which portion of the city was burned over, but states that 6,000 houses were destroyed. The loss of life was heavy. Up to the present it is known that 1,000 natives lost their lives, and a number are still missing. The city of Tokio covers an area of about twenty-eight square miles, and in point of extent, after London, the largest city in the world. The population is placed at between 900,000 and 1,000,000.

DIED, at his residence, near Winona, Columbiana County, Ohio, on the 18th of First Mo., 1892, LEWIS B. WALKER, in the eighty-eighth year of his age, a much esteemed member of New Garden Monthly Meeting. As the infirmities of age increased, his interest in the welfare of our Society seemed unabated, and although often of latter years unable to meet with Friends, he at different times expressed a lively concern that our meetings might be kept up to the honor of Truth. His last illness (an attack of the prevailing influenza) was short, and though it was with difficulty he conversed, yet he gave evidence of entire resignation to the Divine will. On being queried with if he felt peaceful, he replied, "Yes, I feel that peace that the world can neither give nor take away."

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 254.

From The Word of Life the following interesting narrative is extracted:

The late James Sherman, of Surry Chapel, relates an incident of his student life while at Chestnut College, which made a deep impression on his mind, and it may be repeated in this form for the encouragement of all who have suffered reverses, and for the strengthening of the faith of the poor and needy in the God who hears prayer.

After preaching one day at a neighboring village, he called at a house overshadowed by a dark cloud of affliction. The family consisted of a father and three daughters, and they were all bearing the yoke of trial. One daughter had a white swelling, another had a cancer, and a third was down with a fever, while to crown the series of disasters, the father had been brought home the day before with a broken leg. James Sherman read Psalm 30th and offered prayer, not forgetting to enquire of the eldest daughter what means of support remained. "None now," she frankly replied; "but in all our affliction we have always been provided for, and I doubt not we shall be still." He gave them all the silver he had, which after much hesitation they were induced to accept.

Walking back to the college, he reflected that he had given away all his money, and that he did not know when or whence the next would come. Just as he was sending up a prayer to Him who is the kind Provider for his children, an old farmer who had heard him preach and who was watching for his passing, called to him, and offered to walk with him. "Your sermon," said he, "directed my thoughts to my previous history, and as it will beguile our walk and illustrate your discourse, if agreeable to you, I will relate the circumstances." James Sherman gladly consented. We give the substance of his narrative:

About forty years before he took a rather large farm. For a number of years he went on prosperously. His crops were good, corn brought a high price, and his sheep and cattle returned a good profit. He had borrowed money to help stock his farm, and this he was able to pay off, as well as to lay by something year by year. "I began to think," said he,

"that my mountain stood strong, and that I should never be moved." His wife was prudent and thrifty, and, with four of his six children, was a member of the church, of which he had been chosen one of the Deacons.

He was respected and honored by all who knew him, and congratulated by his friends as a prosperous and well-to-do man. Religion with him was not a hollow pretense nor a mere profession. He was a faithful man, and out of his ample income he gave liberally to the cause of God, while his gifts fitted him to assist in the spiritual duties of the Church.

But after many years of prosperity, reverses came. Everything seemed to go wrong. One of his sons took to drink, and became a grief and a curse to him. A daughter, the most attractive of them all, foolishly listened to the proposals of a man—a dissolute, ignorant fellow—one of her father's carters. She married him, and within three years she was left a widow with two small children, a third being added soon afterwards. All came home to the farmer for support.

Then two other daughters were laid low with a malignant fever and died; his wife was soon worn out with anxiety and fatigue; and as everybody was afraid of the fever, he and the doctor were her sole attendants. To make matters worse, a person to whom he had lent money, left the village and never repaid him. This was not all, a murrain seized his cattle, and he lost nearly all of them. This was followed by a bad harvest, and his crops were carried away with the flood. Like Job he sat speechless, and wondered what the end would be. The next calamity was the death of his wife, who sank overwhelmed by her afflictions. Thus he was left a widower, penniless and in debt. No friend came forward to help him, and those who had the will to assist him had not the ability.

In the midst of this distress a writ was issued against him, and he could see nothing before him but a prison and subsequent poverty. He knew, for he had often proved, that God is the hearer of prayer, but the blows of adversity had so stunned him that he could do little besides cry in a few broken sentences to his Father in Heaven, the God, who had been his friend and helper in times past to undertake for him. But the terrible writ hung over him like a dense thunder cloud, and the day for its execution drew nigh. The day before the last came, and no help appeared.

Before its lingering hours had passed, however, a stranger walked into his house, introduced himself by name, and said he had walked several miles to see him. He was evidently tired and thirsty, and as the farmer was about to enter into conversation, the other said, "Will you give me a glass of milk?" "I am sorry to say," said the farmer, "that all my cows are dead." With considerable emotion the stranger enquired the cause of this altered state of things, for now he noticed more particularly the haggard appearance of the farmer. He listened with evident interest to the relation of the various painful visitations which had reduced him to his present condition. When he had finished, he asked,

"Do you remember a lad by the name of B—, whom you once advised and befriended?" "I do," said the farmer. "Do you know what has become of him?" "No, but I heard that he went to sea some time after." "Yes," said the stranger, "he went to Spain, and through the assistance that you rendered him, he acquired property, and has now returned to his native land, and God has sent him to help you in your trouble."

So saying, he took out of his pocket-book a check, filled it up for £1,000, and gave it to him. "Accept that," said he, "as a proof of my gratitude, and if you want more you shall have it."

The farmer thus taken by surprise, and almost overcome by the goodness of God, was about to stammer out his gratitude, when the stranger said, "Now let us both return thanks to God." And kneeling down, he poured out his heart for the farmer and his remaining children to Him whose name is Jehovah-Jireh, in strains which melted both into tears. The stranger left him full of wonder and joy at God's faithful performance of his ancient promise, by which he had been so unexpectedly relieved of his difficulties.

"The munificent gift," said the old man to James Sherman, "enabled me to pay my debts, and take another farm, where, through the goodness of God my latter end has been better than my beginning."

James Sherman was then quite a young man, inexperienced in the ways of God, and being himself at that time almost penniless, the farmer's story of providing care and mercy made a deep impression on his mind. He returned to his little room at the college, filled with joy and peace in believing.

In three days' time a surprise came to him in the receipt of a parcel containing "Wisdom on the Covenant," a piece of fine French cloth for a suit of clothes, three golden guineas, and several other articles especially valuable to him at the time. The parcel contained no note, nor anything to indicate the name of the kind donor, nor was it until twenty-six years afterwards, that he learned to whom he was indebted for such generous sympathy and such timely aid.

"Do you remember," said one of his members at Surry Chapel, "receiving a parcel when you were a student at Chestnut, containing?"—such and such things, as he had described. "Certainly I do," said James Sherman. "It was sent by one," said he, "who belonged to a little band who received the Gospel from your lips."

Many Christians are deficient in simple, hearty trust in God for needed supplies of earthly good; and while some lack sufficient energy to use the means within their reach others are too prone to lose sight of the fact, that "unless the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it," and so rob God of his glory. The way of trusting in the Lord at all times for all things, and with all our heart, is not only the wisest and best, but is that which brings peace and quiet to our own minds and honors to Him.

"In quietness and confidence is our strength."
The birds without barn or storehouse are fed.
From them let us learn to trust for our bread;
The good that is wanting shall ne'er be denied,
So long as 'tis written, "The Lord will provide."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

EXTRACT of a letter from Betsy Purington, on the death of her brother Micajah Collins:

For six months past everything of much note appears to be marked preparative for the event, which was amply tested both in public and in private. His testimonies during this period have been noticed as being increasingly weighty and lively, often recurring to a settled belief that his time was drawing to a close, and in the last select Preparative and Monthly Meeting he attended, he spoke of the necessity there is for us to keep to the ancient principles and simplicity of Friends, and observed, if this was not more attended to we should be cut off from society, and our godly heritage would be taken from us, and others called in from the highways and hedges, and requested them to mark it as one of his last testimonies or legacy of his love. After which he attended their Quarterly Meeting at Seabrook, about forty miles from his home, but the weather being extremely cold, his dear, slender frame shrunk under it, and he returned home very much chilled, but was at their meeting on First-day following, both morning and evening, and spoke in each very impressively on the subject of preparing for the final close. Was out and visited his friends Second and Third days; in the evening took his room with a bilious fever, but not being alarming for several days, after which it assumed a more serious aspect bearing on typhus, with so little suffering that nothing seemed complained of except thirst, until about two days before the close. But his friends being careful of him, did not admit much company, at which he seemed grieved, and often said it would not hurt him, but do him good; and on the day previous to his dissolution, when all prospect of his recovery was relinquished, people by his request were admitted, and it was judged that more than one hundred went into his chamber, all of whom he took by the hand and bid them farewell, and to many said something very pertinent and impressive. At which time he requested a friend to sit by him and wet his mouth with one teaspoonful of wine and water at a time, without speaking or interrupting him; which being done he began to speak, and continued about two hours, so loud and clear as to be understood below, and even out of doors, with such melody and so impressive that strangers were broken into tears; but none of it moved him though they wept loud.

Some dark spirits who had heretofore manifested no kind feeling towards him, came to his bedside, to whom he spoke of the principles by which he had been actuated, of which they had heard him speak, which he had lived by and which he was willing to die by, and desired them not to make light of it, for there was nothing to sport with now, for these things were solemn. And often said he had nothing to boast of; he felt himself to be a poor creature, a mere worm of the dust, but knew he was in the hands of One who was able to raise him up or take him to himself; which was alike to him, and that he felt no anxiety about it, as there was neither spot nor shade between him and his Judge—that he had been permitted to see wonders on his sick-bed, things awful and solemn. That he had seen those whose names were written in the Lamb's Book of Life, and those that were entirely blotted out, but mentioned none; that he also saw angels as plain as he saw the faces of those about him, and the heavenly host bending over his bed.

He seemed to notice all that was passing in the room, and on seeing a pencil moving in the room, he said, "Gather up the fragments, that nothing remain; but make a judicious selection." But it was found impossible, as he spoke so much and with such rapidity, and more especially as their feelings were so deeply involved with his, it seemed as though he could not give himself to rest or sleep, but continued speaking, with very little intermission, for four or five hours—often asking if we had come. Just before his close said, he had but one thing to regret in this world, and that was not seeing his dear sister. Would often inquire, if that could be a death-bed where there was so little suffering; said it was like a bed of roses; and thus he passed away without sigh or struggle. His dear remains were taken to the meeting-house, where there was a large concourse of people, and a number of lively testimonies borne. By the request of his friends the coffin was opened, and it was believed that hundreds went to pay the last tribute of love to the dear departed—when the language applied to the blessed Master, at the grave of Lazarus, might be applied here—"Behold how they loved him." All was done without any confusion.

He left a large Journal of several hundred pages, about sixty of which contain a complete history of Rantership.

There was wisdom in the words that a pious Scotchman once addressed to his pastor after the latter had delivered a discourse in the village kirk. The pastor was the well-known John Macnab. The occasion was a communion season, and the subject of the address was "Heaven." It was a long sermon, but the people thought it as beautiful as a series of dissolving views. It had, however, one defect—the length of this descriptive part left no time for the application.

Old George Brown met the preacher at a friend's house, and astonished him by the resumé he gave of the sermon.

"It was really a grand sermon as far as it went," he said, after he had finished his report. "I never enjoyed a description of heaven better. Ye told us 'athing about heaven except hoo to get there; and, Maister Macnab, ye'll excuse me, my young friend, for sayin' 'that that shouldna ha been left out, for ye'll admit yers' if that's awantin' a's awantin'. Ye'll mind the king's son's feast? The servants didna only tell that 'athing was ready, but they compelled them to come in'."

The young preacher was too intelligent not to see the aptness of the criticism, and when George had retired he said to his friend:

"I've been criticised by learned professors and doctors of divinity, by fellow-students and relatives, but that good old man has given me more insight into what preaching should be than all the others put together."

To be blest with the presence of the Lord in a dungeon is preferable to liberty enjoyed in palaces without it.

A Visit to Ohio.

A recent visit to eastern Ohio, which involved the crossing of the whole breadth of Pennsylvania, presented many scenes which were instructive to one interested in the geological features of that State, which abounds in strata and minerals of great interest.

In studying a geological map of the State, one's attention is soon arrested by the broad belt of hills and mountains which sweeps in a curved line across it, in a general direction from N. E. to S. W.; culminating in the Alleghany range, the highest of them all.

The Pennsylvania Railroad, after leaving Philadelphia, enters into the great limestone valley of Chester County, which is bordered on both sides by ranges of hills. But the streams which enter it from the north, instead of following the valley eastward to the Schuylkill, and through its waters towards the ocean, all cross it pretty directly, and have cut for themselves channels through the South Valley hills, and flow by less circuitous routes to their final destination. This is shown at Downington and Coatesville, where the east and west branches of the Brandywine cross the valley.

A reference to the map shows that this is not a peculiarity of the Brandywine, but it seems to be a general law obeyed by all the principal rivers of the State—the Delaware, Lehigh, Schuylkill, Susquehanna, Juniata, &c. For a time, they may follow the course of some of the mountain valleys, but they will be found to make a right-angled turn in their direction and cut straight across the opposing hills.

Thus the west branch of the Susquehanna, after draining the wild, mountainous regions of Clinton, Cameron and Potter counties, flows for many miles in a direction somewhat north of east, along the Bald Eagle Valley, till it passes Williamsport, when it turns rather abruptly to the southeast, and forcing its way through all obstacles, keeps that general course until it pours its mighty waters into the Bay of Chesapeake.

By following up these natural water-courses, the railroad engineers have been able to reach sections of the country which otherwise would have been practically inaccessible to the locomotive. The Pennsylvania Road, after leaving the Susquehanna, a short distance above Harrisburg, follows the waters of the Juniata, till it comes to Altoona, at the foot of the Alleghany Mountains. After crossing that range, it keeps the path marked out by the Conemaugh, which flows down the western side towards the Alleghany, and is thus conducted through the labyrinth of hills which skirt the western slopes of the great mountain range.

As the train climbs the mountain side, going west from Altoona, the traveller notices with interest the layers of bituminous coal exposed by the railroad cuttings, and observes that the strata of rock are nearly horizontal—very different from what we are familiar with in the eastern part of the State, where the rock layers are curved and tilted in every degree of inclination.

Professor Leslie, in contrasting the coal beds of the two regions, says: On the Alleghany and Monongahela Rivers the coal beds are spread out in their original horizontal positions over hundreds of square miles. In the anthracite country, the beds are contorted, broken, jammed together, turned over on their faces and squeezed by the enormous pressure. This description of the coal beds is true also of other strata of rock.

Western Pennsylvania and eastern Ohio is a very hilly section of country, but the hills are made by the washing out of the intermediate valleys. This may be observed by any one who crosses a valley and climbs the hill on its side, along a common country road. He will observe as he ascends, layers of limestone, coal and sandstone. After he passes the summit and begins to descend on the farther side, he will meet with the same layers in the same relative position.

It is the opinion of geologists that the layers of rock in the anthracite regions of Eastern Pennsylvania and in the bituminous regions of Western Pennsylvania and Ohio were deposited in the same era of the earth's history at or near the water level—that in course of time the whole of the eastern part of the American continent was lifted up to an elevation of several miles—and that then there was a continuous sheet of coal, of which only detached fragments are now left—that a large part of the strata so lifted up have been swept away by the action of running water, continued for a long period of time—that in the eastern part of Pennsylvania there have been foldings of the rocky strata, which have produced the distortions already referred to, but that west of the Alleghany Mountains, they have been comparatively free from disturbance. On my return from Ohio, I noticed that the rocks on the Alleghanies were nearly horizontal, but that as we came down towards Altoona, they soon assumed a very slanting position.

My readers may find it very difficult to conceive that such enormous amounts of material could have been removed from the elevated plateau of Pennsylvania, as to produce the present broken surface it presents. But one who watches one of our large rivers as it pours its waters along, heavily loaded with sand and clay, after a storm, will be impressed with the conviction, that running water is a powerful agent.

Careful observations have been made as to the amount of water discharged into the Gulf of Mexico by the Mississippi River, and the solid materials it conveys with it. And it has been estimated that these are sufficient to make annually a solid pile, of a mile square and 268 feet in height. This is equivalent to lowering the whole area drained by that river by 1-6000 part of a foot in a year. So that if we will grant enough time, there is no conceivable amount of denudation which is not credible. Besides, it is very probable that in a former condition of the earth's surface, both the chemical and mechanical actions were more effective than we now behold.

On our way we passed several ranges of coke ovens, where the bituminous matter is driven off from the coal, leaving as a residuum the coke, a form of fuel better adapted to the manufacture of iron, and other uses. While recognizing the value of the process of coke-making, a feeling of regret arose that so much valuable material for producing heat and light as the bitumen, which may be regarded as solidified gas, should be wasted.

If all our coal had the same origin, how is it that there is such a difference in it? At first, no doubt it was all bituminous. Now the proportion of gas varies from 2 per cent. at Mauch Chunk to 40 per cent. in the west. Professor Leslie says: "In the undisturbed country west of the Alleghany Mountains, the soft shales covering rocks have prevented the escape of the volatile hydro-carbons from the coal, which, therefore, retains its original bituminous character. In the more disturbed semi-bituminous middle belt of country, the volatile matters have escaped to some extent, through the crevices of the enclosing rocks. In the upturned and overturned anthracite country, the whole mass has been thoroughly dried and consolidated, the shales intensely hardened, and the coal reduced to its most compact and semi-crystalline condition, with scarcely any hydrogen left in combination with the carbon."

We have spoken of the valleys of western Pennsylvania, as having been formed by a washing-out process. The advantage of these valleys to the inhabitants is great. By the removal of the heavy masses of earth and rock which overlie the coal, they make this invaluable fuel readily accessible to the people, and thus furnish them with a fuel so cheap, that the farmers find it better to buy coal for their fires than to pay for cutting and preparing wood, even when they have an abundance of it on their farms.

What exalted views of the wisdom, foresight, and beneficence of the Almighty are opened to us by the history of the coal formations. Through the operation of those laws of Nature, which are but the expression of his sovereign will, He lowered the surface of the earth, created the vegetation which has condensed into coal, then raised it up into high plateaus, and carved these so as to render the buried treasure accessible. Through countless ages was this process carried on, with unwearied patience—reminding one of the sublime expressions of Moses, the man of God, in the 90th Psalm, when addressing the Almighty, he says, "A thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night."

FROM THE "BRITISH FRIEND,"

Edward Burrough.

Edward Burrough, than whom, as an example of a faithful and zealous young man amongst early Friends, perhaps no better is to be found, knew much of labor and trial, and ultimately died in prison for the Truth which he had so perseveringly declared and witnessed to. He was from Underbarrow, near Kendal, Westmoreland. A quiet, thoughtful youth, fairly well educated, quick, intelligent, with his mind soon turned to godliness, and longing to serve God according to his ability. In him there was the struggle, which is to be noticed in most eminently gifted men, for satisfaction, the seeking for it here and there, the tossings to and fro, yet through all, if not finding at once, the continuance of the search; at times under clouds and almost despairing, then rousing to a more earnest, thirsting life till the prize sought for is attained and peace comes. What peace? a bodily rest? not at all: peace of mind. His life is almost activity personified. Peace of mind but not of body. Turned out of his father's house for embracing the views he does, he attributes it to their blindness, and as part of the dealings of an all-wise God with him. Having found that he had so longed for, he rejoices in that, heeding not so much what he has lost and likely to lose as what he had obtained.

I have not had to hand any account of the reconciliation with his earthly parents, yet I think it probable that they, as in many other cases, had their hearts touched and opened to receive him, and maybe, as Admiral Penn did to his son William, encouraged him to continue steadfast in that which he found to be truth.

What a testimony Admiral Penn gave to his son before his death—"If you and your friends will only keep to your plain way of preaching you will soon make an end of man-made preachers." So in Burrough's case I think his parents soon saw his sincerity and approved it.

As to his early life, quick, intelligent, thoughtful, laid beyond his years, he took no delight in boyish pastimes. A boy's age, a man's staidness, of an excellent spirit, a seeker at twelve years of age. Brought up an Episcopalian he is dissatisfied with that way, and mingles with the more sober sort of Presbyterians, although, for so doing, he is reviled by his youthful associates. Not satisfied here at seventeen, he confesses to hearing a voice as though it told him he was ignorant of God. This voice, why should it make him so at unrest? Was it not because it witnessed true to his state? Thus from seventeen to nineteen years of age he was in great mental conflict, discerning that the preachers he went to had not possession of that which they spoke of. Exemplary himself in life, often warning the outwardly ungodly in his youthful days, yet his deep, earnest longing continued for a nearer, closer, and more perfect knowledge of God. Fit ground for good seed to fall into and take root. The great Husbandman was there preparing the ground, and in due time the seed was planted. George Fox, coming northward after his vision on Pendle Hill and visit to Sedberg, near Kendal, met with Edward Burrough, and, on his way from Kendal to Underbarrow, which is about a mile and a half from the town, he had, as he records in his journal, "great reasonings with Edward Burrough," whose eyes were being opened to see the spirituality of the Gospel of Christ. After this interview he came forth as a minister amongst the rising children of the Light. A youthful minister, probably between eighteen and nineteen years of age, yet soon an able and powerful advocate of the word he had received.

Francis Howgill, who had been a clergyman, accepting the views of Friends, or "Children of the Light," about the same time, although older considerably than Burrough, found in the youthful convert a co-partner and laborer; for in 1654 these two are in London, believing that is the field of labor they are called to. There is an interesting account of the Prentice lads in London on holiday, having wrestling matches in the fields near London. Burrough came upon such a company where was a champion in the ring who challenged any to come and throw him, for he had already thrown several. Upon hearing the challenge he went in, to the astonishment of the onlookers. After a time he tells them what he wrestles for, and whom. Apparently his address had a good influence upon the rough crowd. At this time he would be about twenty years of age. Here, although a believer in the peaceable nature of Christ's kingdom, he boldly shows that he is a fighter, not missing opportunity to declare whom he would they should serve, fight, and wrestle for. James Parnel and he were bright examples of early dedication. Both of dauntless spirit; who, having girded on the armor, stood faithful. In it Parnel soon finished his course, dying in Colchester Castle in 1655, aged probably eighteen or nineteen years, a mere youth, yet old enough to have left behind him men as seals to his ministry, who afterwards were eminent for righteousness—as Stephen Crisp, who was amongst those convinced by Parnel.

In 1654 Burrough and Howgill were at Bristol, and the meetings they had with the people soon brought them into contact with the authorities, for they were summoned before the mayor and council, and ordered to leave the city at their peril. Their answer was, "They came not in man's will, nor are we at liberty to leave in man's will; but if by violence you put us out and have power we cannot resist it."

In the First Month, 1654, there was a general order against ministering Friends, for the constables to seize them, and bring them before the magistrates. The reply of these two ministers is remarkable and worthy of thought. It points to one of the distinguishing features of the ministry and journeyings of Friends in those days. They had the firm belief that they were servants sent of God to do his work. To use a Scripture simile, like Paul when he saw and heard a man of Macedonia saying, "Come over and help us," upon one of his journeys, so they considered it their duty to obey God, yet if man had power to restrain them by force, then they by force would not resist such power. The rulers at Bristol, which was a much more important town than than now, classed Quakers with emissaries from Rome, and others also looked upon them as secretly Jesuits. This shows how little magistrates and rulers were acquainted with the real views of Friends. Emissaries from Rome? Friends believed in no separate class of priests and people, but in the universal priesthood of believers. They believed in no sacrifice of the mass, or bread and wine, but in the spiritual eating of the body and drinking of the blood of Christ; they believed in no sprinkling or baptizing with outward water, but in an inward washing and renewing of the heart; they acknowledged no man as their head but Christ, ever present with them, to whom they wished to give obedience in all things. The very spring of their actions struck at the root of the doctrines held by Romanists hearing the church and traditions. Their cry was, Hear Christ and his immediate teaching. Rome, with its one outward visible head ruling over all the other parts of the body, unto whom they must submit and under whom they must serve, had no unity with the views of Friends. Where was Burrough ordained? for we have now got to the years of his active service; not amongst the Romanists, nor Episcopalian, nor Presbyterians, though for a time amongst the last two he sought for that he could not find. He believed his appointment to the ministry was from Christ himself; to Him he was responsible. He looked for no reward from man for his ministry, and preached, The Spirit and the bride (the true Church) say come, and partake of the water of life freely. Perhaps this very belief in the ever present Head of the Church directing and guiding the true ministers, and other religionists being unable to grasp it, was one cause of much hard speaking and rough usage by those called ministers of the Gospel against Friends' ministers.

In 1655 E. Burrough and F. Howgill were in Ireland, and spent about three months in and near Dublin. It was on this visit that William Ames, said to have been born near Bristol, who at one time was a Baptist minister, then an officer in the Parliamentary Army, embraced the views held by Friends. At that time the temporal powers were at work to get quit of them from Ireland. Probably Cromwell began to fear the further increase of the views they preached spreading among his officers and soldiers, and so weakening his hands, for Cromwell had trouble with Anabaptists in Ireland; but from whatever cause, an order of banishment was issued against them, and they were shipped out of the country. Arrived in England, Burrough was in controversy with Saints' Rest Baxter, who published a book in 1657 containing twenty-four reasons against being a Quaker. Amongst the twenty-four are—"1. They deny and revile the churches and ministers of Christ. 4. Because of their false and pernicious doctrines and their notorious uncharitableness. 16. What reasonable man should turn a Quaker that sees the common form of their doctrines? . . . they hate both Godly teachers and people. 19. They are in evident division amongst themselves, as Fox and Naylor (poor Naylor! a mark for the archers to shoot at, yet he came into unity with Friends again, and is one whose life is worthy of deep thought). 20. To make all their delusions more odious wickedness, they father it upon the Holy Ghost." These few extracts from the twenty-four reasons will give us an index to the nature of his pamphlet. It was cried up and down the streets of London for sale. Zealous Burrough was moved to reply as to early Friends and their views of those generally called ministers of Christ. They placed little confidence in such ministers, especially if they preached for money or taught for this world's reward, and from the clearness with which such as Burrough and Howgill spoke (Howgill had in his day preached for tithes, but for peace repaid them after his conviction), against such teachers, they probably were roused to unite against them, whether Romanists, Episcopal, Presbyterian, Independent, or Baptist, and because of their speaking on this subject so plainly many looked upon Friends as uncharitable. All true charity stands in the love of God and not in a smothering down and hiding of the testimonies God gives his children to bear for Him. They having had their candle lighted placed it upon a candlestick to be seen of men.

UNCERTAINTY as to one's position and duty is destructive of efficiency in any line of practical endeavor. In order to stand firm, one must be sure of his standing-ground. In order to move forward forcefully, one must have no question as to the direction in which to move. Not the dangers before us, but the questionings within us, are main causes of helplessness in an emergency. A gentleman who had seen much of active service in varied spheres was describing his first experience of an earthquake shock in South America. "I was completely bewildered," he said. "Up to that time, no matter how tight a fix I had been in, I had always had something to stand on; but now the very ground below me was giving way. I didn't know which way to move." And that is the natural consequence of being in doubt about one's position. "A double-minded man," says the Apostle, "is unstable in all his ways." Even the most unpleasant knowledge is a surer basis of action than any uncertainty can be. Whichever way one must go, it is better to know that that is the way, than to stand halting—in double-mindedness—between the ways. Welcome, therefore, the light, whatever may be disclosed by it! Better than wandering aimlessly in the desert of unbelief, is the entering into that land where giants are to be battled with, and walled cities are to be fought for, at the call of God. In uncertain questioning there is never rest. There is rest in very conflict when conflict is duty. "We which have believed do enter into that rest."—S. S. Times.

TRUST.

Storms and winds without may roar
And night come darkly down;
There surges break against the shore
Beside the sleeping town;
The giant waves may landward roll
Up from the infinite sea;
May submerge the bar and cover the mole
And terrify you and me.

But the sleeping town is heedless
Although the breakers roar;
And our fear and alarm as needless
As of troubled souls before,
For God watches over his people
And over the infinite sea;
"Thus far, oh sea, no farther,"
He guards even you and me!

THEY ALSO SERVE.

"They also serve, who only stand and wait."
Take comfort from that thought in lonely hours,
When naught seems set aside for you by fate
To do; or while others have far richer dowers,

With days bright full of hope and work and love;
Full to the brim, and happily, running o'er.
The angels, watching from their homes above,
Can see how sad the waiting is; how sore.

But if the waiting is not all in vain,
If those who wait are serving truly, too:
Oh, then they need not mind the nameless pain,
And but think it is the part they are to do.

And peace and rest will fill the lonely days
That once were filled with naught but pain and woe,
For, though we cannot understand his ways,
Enough to know our Father will it so.

THE WIND OF MARCH.

BY JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER.

Up from the sea the wild north wind is blowing
Under the sky's gray arch;
Smiling, I watch the shaken elm-boughs, knowing
It is the wind of March.

The stormy farewell of a passing season
Leaving, however rude
Or sad in painful recollection, reason
For reverent gratitude.

Welcome to reverent hearts its harsh forewarning
Of light and warmth to come,
The longed-for joy of Nature's Easter morning,
The earth arisen in bloom!

In the loud tumult winter's strength is breaking;
I listen to the sound,
As to a voice of resurrection, waking
To life the dead, cold ground.

Between these gusts, to the soft lapse I hearken
Of rivulets on their way;
I see these tossed and naked tree-tops darken
With the fresh leaves of May.

This roar of storm, this sky so gray and lowering
Invite the airs of Spring,
A warmer sunshine over fields of flowering,
The bluebird's song and wing.

Closely behind, the Gulf's warm breezes follow
This northern hurricane,
And, borne thereon, the bobolink and swallow
Shall visit us again.

And in green wood-paths, in the kine-fed pasture,
And by the whispering rills,
Shall flowers repeat the lesson of the Master,
Taught on his Syrian hills.

Blow, then, wild wind! thy roar shall end in singing,
Thy chill in blossoming;
Come, like Bethesda's troubling angel, bringing
The healing of the Spring.

Culture and Christianity.

An article on this subject in the Illustrated Christian Weekly, contains some sentiments which deserve serious attention. While admitting that literary and even artistic culture is not necessarily hostile to Christianity, the writer adds:—

Taking things as they are, and not as they ought to be; human nature as it is, and not as we fain would have it; which is the only basis on which to treat the subject practically; the influence of artistic culture on Christianity in general, and certainly upon vital Christianity in particular, has in the main, that is, in the vast majority of instances, been deleterious.

That the theatre, for example, might be under certain imaginable circumstances a school of high morality is undoubtedly true and a pretty theory, but as a matter of fact, taking circumstances as they exist and have existed in the past, and human nature as it is, excepting in rare instances, the theatre has always been a school of vice, and will continue so to be.

So of this high culture, the question is what it has been among men in the past, is here and now. Not what it might be in heaven, but what it is upon earth; not what it might be to an angelic nature, but what it actually is to a human soul.

And first, if there is no necessary antagonism between Christianity and culture, it is equally true that there is no necessary connection between them.

Aesthetic taste has sometimes been present where the commonest principles of humanity were absent.

Men have gone into ecstasy over art, and at the same time been guilty of the most detestable cruelties.

Describing the massacre of the Swiss Guards in the Gardens of the Tuileries, August 10th, 1792, the historian says: "Some miserable wretches climbed up the marble monuments which adorn that splendid spot; the insurgents abstained from firing lest they should injure the statuary, but pricked them with their bayonets at their feet; an instance of taste for art mingled with revolutionary cruelty, perhaps unparalleled in the history of the world."

If a passion for art and a common humanity have thus no necessary connection, we need not expect to find culture and religion indissolubly wedded.

Nor indeed is culture a necessity to piety. Piety and illiteracy are very frequently conjoined. The sweetest, purest, holiest and most Christ-like lives have been many a time lived, as, for example, such lives as those of the "Dairyman's Daughter," "The Young Cottager," "The African Servant," of Leigh Richmond story, by those who had no pretensions whatever to human learning or culture, and whom the world, and society so-called, would set down at once as tasteless ignoramuses. No need to enlarge upon a truth to which the personal experience of each one supplies its ready witnesses.

The converse of the proposition is quite as obviously true, that a high culture, scientific, artistic or literary, is frequently found co-existing with irreligion and utter godlessness.

History is a terrible witness, consistent, unimpeachable and not to be silenced to the fact that in the experience of nations the ages of basest villainy and grossest corruption in moral and political life have been all too often the ages of luxury, high culture, adornment, refinement, artistic and literary attainment. *

Advance a step and note next that this culture is actually and in fact unfriendly to vital Christianity. *

The masterpieces of Titian and Correggio, for example, lead the soul away from communion—away from penitence—away from worship, ever to dwell on the delight of youthful faces, blooming color, graceful movement, delicate emotion.

Art by magnifying human beauty contradicts these Pauline maxims—"For me to live is Christ, to die is gain." "Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth." "Your life is hid with Christ in God." *

Writing of the times of Pope Leo X., an age of high culture, Van Ranke says: "Men frequented the Vatican less to kneel on the threshold of the apostles, than to admire those great works of ancient art that enriched the dwelling of the Pontiff, the Belvedere Apollo and the Laocoon." *

John Ruskin writes: "One great fact meets me—I cannot answer for the experience of others—but I never yet met with a Christian whose heart was thoroughly set upon the world to come, and so far as human judgment could pronounce, perfect and right before God, who cared about art at all." *

It is about time that this truth came to wider recognition and larger dominance in our churches, institutions, schools and homes. The nude statuary of our drawing-rooms, the too-scantly-draped figures which are supposed to grace some private homes and public galleries, the indecent posters on the dead walls appealing to the baser passions of our youth, the theatre with its exposure, half-nakedness and too suggestive attitudes, the undress of the boxes and the ball room which rival and even out-do the undress of the stage—these and other things said to make for the Higher Culture, are, as human nature is constituted, powerful appeals to the animal and sensual that is in us, and possess an element which is in deadly hostility to true spiritual life.

It is idle, worse than idle, in such connections, to cry, that "to the pure all things are pure."

Such sophistries should not for a moment deceive us. For the vast majority of men there is a subtle power and fascination of evil, in all exhibitions of this sort, though ladies of accredited refinement may go into rhapsodies over them, school teachers may take their pupils to study them for education's sake, as they say, and even clergymen, alas, may be found defending them.

A while ago one of the public prints told of an Art Association in which a number of young men and women had been studying together, side by side, nude subjects. Their instructor had the audacity to say that such association was harmless, for the true artist rose above all thought and suggestion of the evil and impure.

Out upon such absurdity, the man was either a liar or a fool! He may have deceived himself. He is hardly likely to deceive anybody else. Human nature is human nature—and "he that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption." Feed the animal propensities, bring sensual passion into the presence of that which stimulates it, and the result is as inevitable as the explosion which follows the application of fire to gunpowder. This is a law of our being from which there is no escape.

As for culture of other kinds—literary and scientific—it is apt to foster a spirit of pride and self-sufficiency which leads the soul, not toward, but away from God.

It too little cherishes that lowliness and humility of mind which is a prime condition of the acceptance of the Gospel and a true living to Him who said, "Except ye be converted and become as little children ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven."

Jesus as an Eastern Teacher.

There was nothing in the manner of the commencement of the public ministry of our Lord which was not in accordance with what the men of his time and nation would look for in one who began to present himself as a great Teacher. He went into the synagogue of his own city, and there, in accordance with the custom of the Jews, where the exposition of the Law and the Prophets was open to any one after the usual prayers and psalms had been recited, unfolded the teaching of Moses. He then went round the neighboring villages, teaching in the same fashion. Having thus attracted many followers, he selected his twelve apostles, and, as it were, enrolled them in his service. Thus had the prophets of old gathered their disciples. We must remember that long before the coming of Christ, indeed, from the earlier times of the settlement in Canaan, the prophetic had been separated from the priestly office. It was so in the time of the judges. The priests might perform with more or less exactness the rites of the law; but plainer and more directly hortatory or minatory teaching was needed to rouse the people in times of deadness or ignorance. The prophets were therefore raised up from time to time, sporadically, and by no unbroken succession either in time or place, but by direct inward call from God. Their authority was impressed by their teaching alone; sometimes, but not always, by the endowment of wonder-working power. Thus they were, above all else, teachers. In this capacity they gathered followers and founded schools,—the schools of the prophets. These schools were rather peripatetic than stationary; and they continued under various leaders during the whole period of the monarchy. We must not imagine a Hebrew Yale or Harvard, but a company of young men drawn together by their devotion to their teacher, and accompanying him as he travelled from town to town in his circuit, stirring up the religious life by his teaching from place to place. These followers gathered the people together to hear him, secured him hospitality, prepared quarters for him, and acted as his attendants. The more experienced and trusted scholars were sent into the neighboring villages to teach and prepare for his coming. After the Captivity the continuity of these prophetic schools was interrupted, and the formal instructions of the rabbis at fixed centers took their place. But the tradition was not forgotten in that epoch of cold formality; and as Wesley in an age of dead formalism gathered followers and pupil preachers everywhere through the length and breadth of England, so the new Teacher of Nazareth arrested the attention of the thousands who were all waiting for him; for their spiritual yearnings were unsatisfied by the dry husks of the legal teachings which had lost all its spirit and life. It was in accordance with the ideas of the time, that he should select from those who surrendered themselves to his teaching a band of assistants,—in short, a new school of the prophets. Not otherwise acts the dervish or prophetic teacher among the Mohammedans at the present day. We compare not the teaching of prophet or of dervish with that of the Lord Jesus; we only show that he adopted the method of promulgating his doctrine which was suited to the habits and ideas of his country. But that doctrine was far beyond all human conceptions of the prophetic expounder of the law. He spake as one having authority; and his disciples prepared the way for his reception by preaching every where, like his forerunner, that men should repent.—H. B. Tristram in S. S. Times.

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Camel.—In a recent article on the camel, Lehmann remarks, according to Nature, that neither the most broiling heat, nor the most intense cold, nor extreme daily or yearly variations hinder the distribution of the camel. The dromedary of the Sahara has better health there than in more equably warm regions, though after a day of tropical heat the thermometer sometimes goes down several degrees below freezing point. In Eastern Asia winter is the time the animals are made to work. In very intense cold, they are sewn up in felt coats. Each race does best in its home, as a Sâdan camel would not flourish in Northeast Asia. Camels are very sensitive to moisture. In the region of tropical rains they are usually absent, and if caravans enter such regions the results are greatly feared. This sensitiveness to dry or wet conditions is seen in the characters of the different races. The finest, most noble-looking camels, with short, silk-like hair, are found in the interior of deserts (as in the Juarek region in North Africa), and they cannot be used for journeys to moist regions. Even in Fezzan (south of Tripoli) the animals are shorter and fatter, with long, coarse hair; and in Nile lands and on coasts it is the same. These animals, moreover, are less servicable as regards speed and endurance.

Copper Production.—The Engineering and Mining Journal says the present price of copper is 104 cents a pound, which is less than the actual cost of its production at some of the Lake Superior mines. This indicates that unless there is an advance in price, those mines which are the least favorably situated, will be compelled to shut down.

A Crow Story.—People who don't know the crow may find difficulty in believing the following anecdote, though Anglo-Indians will accept it without hesitation. A dog of my acquaintance—a fox terrier of long Eastern experience—was one morning eating a chicken bone on the veranda, when two crows happened to pass, and, observing the dog and his bone, wheeled down and lighted on the veranda railing, whence they set to work croaking to induce him to drop his breakfast. Under ordinary circumstances, an English dog will fly at a crow the moment he appears; but on this occasion Jack simply looked up, growled, and continued gnawing. The crows ceased croaking, and consulted together for a moment, then one of the pair dropped into the veranda a few yards behind the dog and croaked at him again, once more obtaining no answer but a growl. After strolling casually round the veranda for a minute, to let Jack settle down, the bird hopped up silently and swiftly, and gave the dog's tail a cruel nip. That was too much. With a howl of pain, Jack turned upon his tormentor, and crow No. 2, who had been patiently awaiting this opportunity, swooped down upon the bone, and carried it off. You never saw a dog wear a look of such abject humiliation as did Jack when he recognized how he had been fooled.—Illustrated Christian Weekly.

The Basking Shark.—The basking shark of the North Atlantic seems also not to be an uncommon visitor in New Zealand waters, as it visits certain localities on the coast for its food, which is thought to consist of small jelly fish and other minute animals. This shark can be easily recognized, says a writer in Nature, from its habit of swimming on the surface of the water, a portion of the back and the huge dorsal fin being usually exposed. It is from this fact, together with its slow motions, that it has received its name. On the west coast of Ireland as many as five hundred have been taken in a single season. The liver often weighs as much as two tons, yielding six to eight barrels of oil. A few years ago, when shark's oil was more valuable than at present, the oil from a single full-sized specimen would often realize from $200 to $250.

Vegetable Fly-catcher.—In South Africa nature furnishes ready to hand a substitute for the fly paper Americans have so patiently to prepare in the shape of a plant botanically Roridula dentata. It grows several feet high, and is hung in rooms of the colonists to catch flies, just as the artificial article is here. It is closely allied to the Droseras—the Sun-dews of our swamps—made so memorable by Darwin's works, in which he shows that these plants catch insects for the direct purpose of eating them—that they are really carnivorous plants.

Sponge Trade.—The United States Consul at Nassau, in reporting on the sponge trade of the Bahamas, says that from 5,000 to 6,000 persons, most of whom are colored people, are engaged in this industry. The sponges are gathered by means of iron hooks attached to long poles. By using a water-glass the fisherman can readily discover the sponges at the bottom, hooking up the larger ones, leaving the smaller ones untouched. The vessels are fitted out for a voyage of about six weeks. Of the larger sponges a catch of 5,000, or of the smaller ones 7,500 is considered an average one. It is supposed that a healthy sponge will reach a marketable size in from twelve to eighteen months.

Gold in South Africa.—The gold output of the Witwatersrand mines in South Africa, in 1891, was $12,750,000, more in value than was produced by all the mines of Leadville, Colorado.

Chips of Moss Agate.—The Ground Covered with them in a Petrified Forest in Arizona.—From the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad it is not hard to reach one of the greatest of natural curiosities—the petrified forest of Arizona. Much the nearest point is the little station of Billings, but there are the scantiest accommodations for the traveller. Only a mile south of the track at that point one may see a low, dark ridge, marked by a single cottonwood tree.

Walking thither (over a valley so alive with jack rabbits—that there is some excuse for the cowboy declaration "that you can walk clear across on their backs!") one soon reaches the northern edge of the forest, which covers hundreds of square miles. Unless you are more hardened to wonderful sights than I am you will almost fancy yourself in some enchanted spot. You seem to stand on the glass of a gigantic kaleidoscope, over whose sparkling surface the sun breaks in infinite rainbows. You are ankle deep in such chips as I'll warrant you never saw from any other wood pile.

What do you think of chips from trees that are red moss agate and amethyst and smoky topaz of every hue? Such are the marvellous splinters that cover the ground for miles here, around the huge prostrate trunks—some of them five feet through—from which time's patient axe has hewn them. I broke a specimen from the heart of a tree three years ago which had around the stone pith a remarkable array of large and exquisite crystals; for on one side of the specimen—which is not so large as my hand—is a beautiful mass of crystals of royal purple amethyst, and on the other an equally beautiful array of smoky topaz crystals.

One can get, also, magnificent cross sections of a whole trunk so thin as to be portable and showing every vein and "year ring," and even the bark. There is not a chip in all those miles which is not worthy a place, just as it is, in the proudest cabinet, and when polished I know no other rock so splendid. It is one of the hardest stones in the world and takes and keeps an incomparable polish.—St. Nicholas.

Dwellers in the Arctic.—In 1813, Sir John Ross discovered an isolated race of human beings, numbering about two hundred souls, living on the inhospitable shores of North Greenland. To this community he gave the romantic name "Arctic Highlanders," a name which, unfortunately, is misleading, for they are littoral people and cannot inhabit the Arctic highland, as it is an everlasting ice-cap, and moreover they will not even visit it, for this inland ice is to them a region of terror; a land where abide their demons and evil spirits.

At the present day they number, as near as can be estimated, about the same as when the knowledge of them came to the civilized world; nor have they increased their territory, but live on the narrow strip of mountainous coast, which is left bare during the summer months by the retreat of the winter snows. They could not be more cut off from other human beings did they live on some small oceanic island. Practically they do live on an island, for they are surrounded by water; by great expanses of solid water; for they never pass the ice barrier of the great Humboldt Glacier, with its sea face of sixty miles; they never ascend to the summer foot of the "ice-blink," some two thousand feet above sea level; nor attempt to wander south over the vast ice-floes of Melville Bay, one hundred miles in extent. At 79° north latitude, near the southern edge of the Humboldt Glacier, is a collection of huts known as Elah, their most northern settlement, while at Cape York, in latitude 75° 55' North, probably their largest encampment, is their southern limit and which, as near as we could determine by the sign language, they call Pitanilo. Their country may be said to be about one hundred and eighty-five miles long and from three to five miles in breadth.—Benjamin Sharp, Ph. D., in Scribner's.

Mice.—The mice plague in the south of Scotland is spreading. The mice are swarming into Annandale, the Moffat Water district, and along the northern district of Dumfriesshire, and the southern portion of Lanarkshire. Owing to the destruction of grass many farmers have had to remove their stock to the low country.

Who Drinks Most?—Which of the three kingdoms consumes most intoxicating liquors per head? England, Scotland or Ireland? Some answer this question from hearsay, some from prejudice, some from limited personal observation, and in most cases the saddle is put on the wrong horse. Permit me to give you the true answer.

Dawson Burns, D. D., of the United Kingdom (Temperance) Alliance has collected from government reports and collated the drink statistics for the three kingdoms for 1891, and published them in the London Times, which endorses their correctness. (See weekly edition of Second Month 19th.) Each family of five persons drinks annually on an average: Spirits—Scotland, 9.25 gallons; Ireland, 5.90 gallons; England, 4.50 gallons. Wine—England, 2.05 gallons; Scotland, 1.85 gallons; Ireland, 1.55 gallons. Beer—England, 180 gallons; Scotland, 67½ gallons; Ireland, 41 gallons. Total—England, 188.55 gallons; Scotland, 78.60 gallons; Ireland, 48 gallons. The cost—England, $101; Scotland, $81; Ireland, $52. Grand total for Great Britain and Ireland, 1,209,000,000 gallons, and its cost, $705,000,000.

It thus appears that the Scotchman drinks one and a half times as much as the Irishman, and the Englishman twice as much as the Irishman. And they all spend their money in that which is not bread, and their labor for that which satisfieth not. Over a thousand million gallons of curses poured annually into the head of the thirty-eight millions of Britons! About thirty-two gallons per head, and some of them can hold much more.

The Ayrshire Friends.—William Hobson, who had been visiting among the Ayrshire Friends in Scotland, sends to the London Friend some account of these interesting people, who, with little outward instrumentality, have become convinced of the doctrines held by our Society, but are not in membership with it. He says:

"We found them scattered over various parts of the county, chiefly in Ardrossan, and Crosshill, near Maybole, but they are in groups also in Irvine, Ayr, Maybole, Girvan, and away from towns in isolated places. Yet they all seem to know each other, and Christian love in a remarkable degree binds them into one. During the time of our visit no less than fourteen of them—seven men and their seven wives—applied for membership to Edinburgh Two Months Meeting. At Ardrossan they are searching for a suitable site for a new Friends' Meeting-house, and at Crosshill there has been for years past practically a solid Friends' Meeting in operation, a recent mission there by two of themselves, Alexander Dunlop and David Wilson, of Ardrossan, having given quite an impulse to the work.

"But when did they arise, and how did they become Friends? The answer to these questions is remarkable, and brings us back to 'Early days.' Nearly ten years ago several of them occupying positions of activity in the various Kirks, becoming uneasy with the teaching to which they listened, and not having their soul-hunger satisfied, were led, as they say, 'to turn inward,' to listen to God's voice within, and hearing, to obey. This resulted in their withdrawing from the Kirks, and led to grievous misunderstandings, and not a little persecution. Perseverance and patience, however, prevailed, and by-and-by they came to know each other, and to 'edify one another.' As time has passed by, one to another have been added to their numbers, and thus we have something like a revival of primitive Quakerism in Scotland."

Professional Titles.—We read in the Christian World that some professional ministers are desirous of shaking off the title "Reverend." Probably they will find it easy to carry out their purpose. If they cling to the position the shadow of the priest will follow them. One of the monks of what has been called "The Relapse of the West" is seen in his very thing. The shadow of the priest is following these paid Quaker pastors! "Rev. Herbert Douglas is 'Rev. Luke Woodard.'" "Rev. Daniel [pedraff]" These terms are reported to be found in a paper claiming to be a Quaker periodical; and, strangest of all, London Yearly Meeting corresponds with these people as if they were Friends!—British Friend.

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 30, 1892.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING, CONTINUED.

On Third-day morning the Representatives proposed that Joseph Walton and John E. Carter should act as Clerks for the present year—which was agreed to.

The first six Queries were weightily considered. Many Friends spoke in a lively and weighty manner on the different subjects which claimed attention; and it may thankfully be acknowledged that the presence of the blessed Head of the Church was to be felt among his people. A hope was awakened that the time was drawing near, when it would please the Lord to go through his camp and to pour out a fresh visitation of his Spirit on the people, for their own salvation and for the spread of his righteous cause among men.

The Meeting closed with the reading of a Memorial for Abigail Hutchinson, a minister, prepared by the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

On Fourth day, the remaining Queries and the additional Queries were read. The decease of nine ministers and elders since last year was mentioned—Edward Marshall, Sarah M. Schill and Hannah Warrington, Ministers; Susan E. Comfort, John S. Comfort, Joseph Eastburn, Philip P. Dunn, Hannah W. Cooper, and Seth Warrington, Elders.

A Friend introduced the subject of Bible Study; apparently desiring that the Yearly Meeting would officially recommend increased attention thereto. This opened the way for a considerable range of remark, the general tenor of which was, that the value which our Society set upon the Bible was sufficiently shown by the Discipline and advices of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, but that as religion is not founded on the Bible but upon the revelation of the Spirit of Christ, by the aid of which holy men of old wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, it would be a sign of declension and departure from our fundamental principles, if the Society of Friends should imitate other denominations in their methods of training persons for the service of the Gospel. In reading the Scriptures it ought to be done with a reverent mind, looking and waiting for the unfolding of their spiritual meaning by the fresh openings of the Holy Spirit.

The evils of setting apart a peculiar class of men to preach and administer the offices of religion, were spoken of; and one Friend, who had formerly been a minister in another denomination, and knew whereof he spake, bore a clear testimony against these evils, and the effect of systematic study and training, and the delusive and hurtful tendencies of music, especially the public singing of hymns. While the system of hiring and indeed of any stated and haphazardly arranged ministry was condemned, as inconsistent with our views of spiritual worship, no disposition was manifested to speak harshly of those of other persuasions, who were sincere, and acting up to the measure of light they had received.

On Fifth-day forenoon Meetings for Worship were held in three of the Meetings-houses in the city. In the afternoon, the Reports from the Quarterly Meetings on Education, stated that we have 708 children of school age, of whom only 127 have been at schools altogether from under the care of Friends.

The Report on the use of intoxicating drinks showed that 252 of our members had partaken of these during the past year, many of them very seldom. As is generally the case, this subject occupied considerable time, and some diversity of judgment was manifested, as to the best method of dealing with the evil. The members are very much united in their desires that all under our name may entirely avoid the use of intoxicating drinks, both for their own preservation from falling into habits of intemperance, and for the sake of the influence on others which a consistent example will give them. But some of them felt that the practice we have been in of late years of reporting to the Yearly Meeting the number of offenders in this respect was not wise, and wished it discontinued; others thought that its discontinuance would be regarded as a retrograde step. It was concluded to request statistical reports from the subordinate meetings for next year; and a committee was appointed to consider the whole subject, and, if practicable, to suggest to our next Yearly Meeting some method of labor, with which all would be satisfied.

A Memorial for Rebecca S. Allen, an Elder of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, was read and directed to be recorded.

Sixth-day (Fourth Month 22d). An interesting Memorial of Chester Monthly Meeting (N. J.) for David and Rachel H. Roberts, Elders, was read. Vocal testimony was borne to the worth of these dear Friends, both of whom lived to advanced age, and were removed by death within about six months of each other, after a happy marriage union of nearly sixty-six years.

A Minute prepared by the Clerk, embodying some of the exercises that had been expressed in the Meeting, was read, and with a slight alteration adopted. Among the subjects adverted to in it was the importance of individually walking in obedience to the Divine Power inwardly revealed, which would qualify for the Lord's service on earth, and lead to everlasting happiness.

The advices formerly issued by the Yearly Meeting, to be frequent in the perusal of the Holy Scriptures were revived, with the added caution that this should be done with a mind turned to the Lord, seeking for Him to open their spiritual meaning. For if they are studied in the same manner as other works, the knowledge gained will be merely intellectual, and have no necessary tendency to promote a growth in religion, which ever has depended and ever will depend on submission to the inshunings of the Light of Christ in the soul.

Reports were read from the Westtown School Committee, the Committee on Education, the Indian Committee, and the Treasurer's Committee. $2,000 were directed to be raised for the use of the Meeting, $1,500 for the Committee on Education, and $2,500 for the Indian Committee—$6,000 in all.

A visit was paid by a man Friend to the Women's Meeting, and one of our Women Friends visited the brethren. Both of these visits were believed to be satisfactory.

A Memorial of Chester Monthly Meeting (N. J.) for Hannah Warrington, a Minister, was read. She lived to an advanced age, dying in her ninety-ninth year. She was a connecting link between the present and past generation, having been well acquainted with Thomas Scattergood and other worthies, who long since joined to their eternal reward.

The Meeting closed after a long sitting.

RUSSIAN SUFFERERS.

The following acknowledgment from the London Committee for the relief of Russian sufferers from famine, may interest those who have kindly contributed to the fund for this purpose collected by Friends of Philadelphia, aided by contributions from other parts of this country. At the time it was written, the London Committee had received from this source $1,000. Nearly $7,000 have now been sent to them, and there are a few hundred dollars yet to be forwarded.

The imports were valued at $872,058,585, as against $335,600,364 in the previous year.

It is said that the reports received from the different countries have satisfied President Harrison of the advisability of an International Conference on the silver question, and that he has practically decided to take the initiative in the matter.

The National Silver Committee, at its meeting in Washington on the 23d inst., decided to call a National Bi-Metallic Convention, to meet in the National Capital on Fifth Month 20th, 1892.

A Duluth despatch says there is now in store in the elevators in that city more wheat, with one exception, than has ever been collected in one market at one time in the history of the American grain trade. The total amount is 15,200,000 bushels, and all but 140,000 bushels is of the finest milling grade.

The great bridge across the Mississippi River, at Memphis, is completed.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 436; which is 6 less than during the previous week, and 32 less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing, 226 were males and 210 females; 53 died of consumption; 45 of diseases of the heart; 41 of pneumonia; 21 of convulsions; 17 of bronchitis; 16 of diphtheria; 14 of old age; 14 of inanition; 13 of paralysis; 13 of apoplexy; 13 of marasmus; 13 of smallpox; 12 of cancer; 11 of scarlet fever; and 10 of inflammation of the brain.

FOREIGN.—W. E. Gladstone has written a pamphlet on the question of female suffrage. In this pamphlet Gladstone gives his reasons for opposing the enfranchisement of women. He considers that the question ought to be further discussed by the press and on the platform, and that the time is not yet ripe for legislative interference.

It is stated that, owing to the depression in the British tin plate trade, resulting from the workings of the McKinley duties, the proprietors of a number of the largest tin plate factories in Wales intend to erect works in America.

It has been learned that the money stolen by Jaeger, the defaulting chief cashier of the Rothschilds, at Frankfurt, amounts to 1,700,000 marks. He had used the proceeds of the proceeds of his robberies in speculating in fruit and corn, in Berlin and Odessa. These speculations turned out unremunerative, and when he thought there was a chance of his pecuniations being discovered he fled. As yet the police have discovered no clue as to his whereabouts.

The agitation has been started against the project for a lottery to cover the expense of beautifying the approaches to the Schloss, and greatly to alter and improve the Unter den Linden, in Berlin. The opponents of the project declare that lotteries are increasing to an alarming extent, and that the growing love thereof among the people will result in a pernicious influence upon the prosperity of the country. The lottery is especially opposed to the lottery scheme, and would himself meet the expense, but the heavy drain on his own exchequer in order to pay for refunding a number of the guests' rooms in the Schloss precludes him from doing so.

DIED, at Salem, Iowa, Third Month 8th, 1892, MARY ELMA, only daughter of Isaac T. and Anna M. Gibson, aged 21 years, 11 months and 11 days. She was buried in the same room wherein she fell asleep in Jesus. She had excellent health until about four years ago, when by over-study her sight was seriously impaired. She was very anxious to recover her sight, especially for the purpose of resuming teaching among the Indians at the Osage Agency, Indian Territory, where she had spent several years of her life. She was when her father was Agent; yet near the close of life, in reviewing the past, she said: "If these walls could speak, they could tell better than I of those long, dreary days I have spent in solitude and darkness; yet I think it was the greatest blessing of my life when my sight was taken from me. I did not then think so, but I do now." She begged her parents not to mourn for her as dead and within the grave, but to think of her as alive and with Jesus in heaven, where she pleased with her young associates to meet her.

At his residence, Mount Laurel, N. J., Eleventh Month 24th, 1891, STACY B. HAYES, in the 64th year of his age, member of Evesham Monthly Meeting of Friends, New Jersey.

At the home of her brother in New Bedford Second Month 22d, 1892, MARY ROOTH, in the seventy-seventh year of her age, a member of Dartmouth Monthly Meeting of Friends. Of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price.

At her home in Barnsville, Ohio, on the 14th of Twelfth Month, 1891, ELIZABETH BAILEY, relict of Hezekiah Bailey, in the sixty-sixth year of her age. The summons came so suddenly and the close so peaceful that—

"She was spared the pain of parting tears,

She was spared all mortal strife;

It was scarcely dying, she only passed

In a moment to endless life."

At her home in West Chester, Pa., on the 29th of First Month, 1892, ELIZABETH M. WORTH, wife of John D. Worth, in the sixty-ninth year of her age, a member of Birmingham Monthly Meeting.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting, Haddonfield, N. J., on Fifth-day, the 24th of Third Month, 1892, OLIVER W. COPE, of Hatboro, Pa., to SARAH P., daughter of Joshua T. and Lydia S. Ballinger, of Haddonfield, N. J.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 255.

Various are the ways in which it pleases Him who is perfect both in wisdom and goodness, to awaken the careless and rebellious sons and daughters to the danger of their situation, and to lead them to seek his help and forgiveness.

The Ernest Christian gives a short sketch of the life of Jane Dunning, a member among the Free Methodists, who died in 1870. The account says:

Her parents were not religious and she had realized no particular conviction for sin until one night when perhaps about twenty years of age, she returned from a ball where she had been the gayest of the gay. She went to her room, and as she removed her things and loosened her hair she saw her reflection in the mirror, and at the same moment a voice seemed to say, "What are you living for?" She became frightened. The question was repeated, and she saw in that instant the emptiness of earthly pleasures. She dare not go to bed until she had knelt and promised God she would never attend another ball. And she kept her vow, although she had an engagement ahead for one where she had anticipated great pleasure.

A minister once called to converse with a family on the subject of religion. A gay young woman perceiving him, withdrew through the back door to the house of a neighbor, saying, is she ran, "He shall not get me this time." The minister came in disappointed. He brought himself, however, of a method of reaching the fugitive, and picking up a Bible, turned round a leaf at a passage: "The wicked flee when no man pursueth," and requested the mother to hand it to her when she should return. She returned in triumphant glee after he minister had left the house, joyous in her thoughtlessness, when her mother showed her the passage. She looked at it, her countenance all. The thought struck her that she could flee from God, from whose searching eye at the remotest distance, nor the deepest darkness could hide her. Deep conviction succeeded serious reflections. She now sought the minister, and with weeping eyes made her apology to him, which was rather an humble confession than an apology. "Make your confession to God," said he. "Who am I? You have given me neither offense nor injury. But you have offended your Saviour, and to Him you must go."

The Youth's Companion relates the following incident:

Many years ago a gentleman, his wife, and their little boy ten years old, were visiting the State Prison at Charlestown, Mass. While they were passing through one of the corridors, the gentleman made some inquiry of the attendant in regard to a man sentenced to imprisonment for life for a brutal murder. "By the way," said the officer, stopping before an open door, "this is his cell," and as the three visitors drew near, the father gently pushed his little boy inside, and closed the door. The child was terribly frightened, and at his screams the door was at once opened, his mother saying, as she took him in her arms and wiped his eyes, "No, no, they sha'n't shut up my little son in prison!" As they walked on, the boy gave one more glance at the dreaded cell, and saw upon the door in large yellow figures the number "68." Years passed by. His parents died; he became a sailor, and at the age of twenty-three was second officer on board a large steamer, plying between New York and the Isthmus of Panama. Unfortunately, however, he contracted the habit of drinking, and lost his situation. Unable to obtain another, he went to Boston, where his uncle, a man in prosperous circumstances, entertained him with the utmost hospitality, obtained for him a situation in New York, and gave him a liberal amount of money and a railroad ticket for that city. On his way to the station the young man stopped at a saloon for "one glass," and falling in with some old companions, remained until midnight, when he was turned into the street by the proprietor. His money and ticket were gone, and half mad with drink, he resolved to rob his uncle's house. He entered the house successfully, but while he was packing a large quantity of plate and other valuables some member of the family discovered him, and his uncle, exasperated at his ingratitude, gave him in charge of the police. He was sentenced to four years in the State prison. Upon his arrival there he was conducted to a cell, upon the door of which he saw in large figures the number "68." It was the same cell into which he had been thrust when a child. Up to this time he had been in a state of sullen indifference, but suddenly memories of his childhood came rushing upon his mind. He heard his mother say, "No, no, they sha'n't shut up my little son in prison!" and throwing himself upon the floor he wept bitterly.

There upon the cold, bare stones he breathed a fervent prayer that God would help him in his great affliction. He rose from his knees with a determination to redeem his lost character. After serving out his sentence, he obtained with some assistance, a situation aboard a vessel. A few months later, the warden of the prison received a letter, from which the following extract is made: "I deem it my duty to drop you a line. I should have written long ago, but I thought it might be best to delay it until I had been long enough in the service to know whether I liked it or not. It was rather hard at first, at least it seemed so to me; but now I can say I am perfectly satisfied, and was never more at home in a ship. I have the good will of all the officers, and especially of the captain. I am coxswain of his boat, and he tells me that he will get me an appointment as boatswain in the service, on my return."

"A few years had passed," says the warden of the prison, who tells this true story, "when a gentleman whom I did not recognize was shown into my office, and after greeting me warmly, introduced himself as my former prisoner. He had risen step by step, and now occupied a position far above any he had hoped to attain. Best of all, he had faithfully abstained from liquor since the day when he became 'Number 68,' and asked God to aid Him in retrieving his wasted past."

A minister had delivered a course of lectures on infidelity, and as time went on he was delighted to find that one who had been regarded as an infidel was anxious to unite himself with the congregation. "Which of my arguments did you find the most convincing?" asked the minister. "No argument moved me," was the reply, "but the face and manner of an old blind woman who sits in one of the front rows. I supported her one day as she was groping along; and putting out her hand to me, she asked, 'Do you love my blessed Saviour?' Her look of deep content, her triumphant tones made me realize as never before, that He who could suffice to make one so helpless bright and glad, must be a Blessed Saviour indeed."

The Christian Weekly publishes the following incident, under the heading, "The File-grinder's Story:—"

I met an old "file-grinder" a few years since, who told me the following story:

In the room where he had worked nearly twenty years were twelve massive grindstones. Each stone had its boss, who daily "dressed" it, and, mounted on a wooden seat above it, ground files. Occasionally a stone while going at full speed would burst, flying in all directions with tremendous velocity, and as two men had been killed in that room, and a stone might burst at any time, it made the men quiet and cautious; yet among them all there was no Christian.

It was just after the noon hour, and the operatives had come in from a half-hour discussion about the genuineness of some recent conversions among the "furnace men." The general opinion was that it was a matter of imagination, and that if there was a God no man had ever heard from Him; that He never did either call or warn any one.

The "speed" had started, the grinders were in their places, and work was progressing rapidly, when one of the men got down from his seat, pale and agitated, and staggered to the other side of the room. He was hardly able to speak for an instant, but when pressed, said:

"Boys, something or somebody said to me, 'Get down from your seat; the stone will burst.'"

Hardly had he said this when the very stone over which he had been working burst in pieces, crushing his seat to a shapeless mass, and breaking the heavy "guards" as if they were glass.

There was no more scoffing that day.

"Sir," added the old fire-cutter, "we all felt that it was God who spoke, and it made us pretty thoughtful. The man to whom it happened died last year a happy Christian, and there are five of us in that room that are trying to serve God. It is hard work to keep straight there, but it pays. A man can do his work better, and he feels that if a stone should burst and kill him it would be all right with him."

"So you think that God really spoke to that man, do you?" said I.

"Certainly I do, sir," he said earnestly. "He saw that we were all asleep; that it would take a loud, strong voice to awaken us, and so He spoke as He did, loud and strong, and we could not help hearing."

Friend, look back over your life. Has not God spoken to you many times? Have your ears become so deafened by the clatter of the world's machinery that you can no longer hear his voice? You are in danger.

J. W.

THE DANGER OF DARKNESS IN SICKNESS.—There is nothing so bad as a dark sickroom; it is as if the attendants were anticipating the death of the patient; and if the reason be asked, the answer is as inconsistent as the act. The reason usually offered is that the patient cannot bear the light; as though the light could not be cut off from the patient by a curtain or screen, and as though to darken one part of the room it were necessary to darken the whole of it. The real reason is an old superstitious practice which, once prevailed so intensely that the sick, suffering from the most terrible diseases, small-pox, for instance, were shut up in darkness, their beds surrounded with red curtains, during the whole of their illness. The red curtains are now pretty nearly given up, but the darkness is still accredited with some mysterious curative virtue.

A more injurious practice really could not be maintained than that of darkness in the sick-room. It is not only that dirt and disorder are the result of darkness, but a great remedy is lost. Sunlight diffused through a room warms and clarifies the air. It has a direct influence on the minute organic poisons, a distinctive influence which is most precious, and it has a cheerful effect upon the mind. The sick should never be gloomy, and in the presence of the light the shadows of gloom fly away. Happily the hospital ward, notwithstanding its many defects, and it has many, is so far favored that it is blessed with the light of the sun whenever the sun shines. In private practice the same remedy ought to be extended to the patients of the household, and the first words of the physician or surgeon on entering the dark sick-room should be the living words of Goethe, "More light, more light!"—Sunitarian.

There is something so honorable in the frank acknowledgment of a fault, and in deep humiliation for it—that all who see it must needs approve it.

From the "BRITISH FRIEND."

Edward Burrough.

Previous to his reply to Baxter's book against Friends, E. Burrough had written a reply to John Bunyan, who wrote against Friends in 1656. Bunyan, so far as I can gather from Burrough's works, held that the light and conscience were one and the same. This, Burrough says, Quakers do not hold; and in Bunyan's second appearance against Friends, Bunyan affirms that all have the light, but all have not the Spirit of Christ. Burrough replied that the light which Quakers pleaded for is the Spirit of Christ, a manifestation of which is given to all.

It is interesting, as showing the time, to note that Bunyan, a Baptist, preached in "Paul's Steeple House," on 23rd of 5th Mo., 1656, at Bedford. Did Bunyan ever dream that this people against whom he wrote so severely, and wondered why the earth did not open and swallow them alive, would help to include his name amongst their friends who were to be released out of prison and conscience' sake therefore? But so it was. Bunyan, it is said, used to express the months of the year by numerals. Strange to find such a man, and Baxter, accusing Quakers of harboring a spirit of persecution.

Several letters to Oliver Cromwell are found in Burrough's works. He evidently looked upon Oliver as unfaithful in fulfilling that which he was raised up for. The first one was in 1655, telling the Protector the Lord's controversy was against him. In 1657, he again wrote Oliver, for the people of England were thinking of making him king. Burrough urges him to beware of persecution and oppression, and reminded him of the grievous burdens under which many innocent people were suffering, probably referring to Friends who were in prison for refusing to pay tithes and take oaths. It is said that Oliver Cromwell, before the battle of Dunbar, whilst there was apparently little hope for him and his army, said that if the Lord brought deliverance, he would do away with the ungodly oppression of tithes. Some efforts were made by commission during the Protectorate with this object in view, but the committee could never agree on a workable plan, or perhaps, rather no plan at all, as Carlyle puts it in his life of Oliver Cromwell.

But writing to Oliver did not relieve Burrough's burdened spirit on account of suffering, persecuted Friends. So he laid the case before the Protector, who told him he was against all persecution. But Burrough still looked upon him as a permitter of oppression, when a word from him would have been the means of staying it in great measure. In 1658 Burrough's mind was much occupied with the hard usage of Friends. Again and again he wrote to Cromwell telling him that his real safety lay in relieving the oppressed. Speaking of God, he says— "And He it is that can break thee down and build thee up, who can wound thee and restore thee, and bring thee to destruction;" and again—"but if thou continuest in oppression, the Lord will suddenly smite thee." This is an extract from a letter written to him in 1658.

So Oliver's time here draws to a close, and Friends are in prison still for oaths and tithes. Great upheavings are at hand. In the 8th Month Oliver is ill and his illness increases. On the 30th of 8th Month a terrific hurricane burst over London, such, it is said, as had not often been known. T. Carlyle gives a graphic description of Oliver's state during that boisterous night, and Oliver's prayer. He grows worse, his friends pray for him; but another storm is at hand, for Oliver's end is near. On the 3rd of 9th Month he passed away, and with him Puritanism, with its bright hopes, wanes for lack of head, the people groaning and ill at rest, some already longing for Monarchy again. Burrough, who had been away from London for a short time, returned thither on the 23rd of 9th Month, 1658, and found London astir and pilgrimaging to see the image of Oliver. His heart is stirred, and he writes and testifies against it, calling it idolatry, for that is the light he saw it in, and says that Oliver himself would have condemned such proceedings. A great man had passed away from amongst the people, and no one comes forward inheriting like ability to take his post. The blow came suddenly, as Burrough in his letter had hinted at. The waft that Geo. Fox had seen against him had come. The stiff, sturdy, rugged, indomitable nature of Puritanic Oliver was not to be found in his son Richard, who is said to have been named by Oliver as his successor. And Richard comes to the front, and for a short time takes the position for which he is so little adapted. Henry Cromwell appeared to have had more of the spirit of Oliver in him than Richard, yet Richard held the Protectorate in name for a time, till monarchy gained strength and courage to come forth refreshed, and with power to again assert itself. E. Burrough was not long before he wrote to Richard, the Protector, "To relieve the oppressed;" following it up with several others to Richard and the Parliament. In a short one, dated 10th Month, 1658, he writes—"The Lord God will shortly make you know that we are his people, though we be accounted as sheep for the slaughter. Yet our King of Righteousness will break you to pieces, if you harden your hearts and repent not. And that if God's love will not draw you, his judgment shall awaken you." It was in the 3rd Month that E. B., travelling in Warwickshire, says that a cry ran through him, saying—"The Lord will be avenged upon his enemies, and He will avenge the cause of his people." He believed it his duty to write to the Rulers and warn them yet once more. Great changes were about to occur in the nation, for in the 4th Month Richard laid down his protectorate. In the 9th Month, 1659, E. Burrough writes to "the Present Rulers and Committee of Safety," warning them of coming trouble, and to the military power, saying—"As you have not been faithful your estates shall not be spared from the spoiler, nor your heads from the axe; your enemies shall charge treason upon you." The country was in great unsettlement, in which Royalty was reviving, Puritanism having lost its guiding spirits, and the people generally dissatisfied, having hoped for so much and having gained so little, they also began to long for a quiet and settled government. Burrough evidently looked upon the state of public affairs as the result of the Puritans not keeping true to that which was required of them from God who had brought them to such power, and being unfaithful, the same power which raised them up was about to overturn them also. Friends certainly had no rest under the Commonwealth, for many were prisoners from one cause or another for what they looked upon as their duty to God, such as refusing to swear, to pay tithes, and testifying against a hiring ministry—whether state paid or otherwise. Active in delivering what he looks upon as a message and warning from God to the ruling powers, still he found time to pass over to Dunkirk, where was an English garrison, accompanied this time by Samuel Fisher, a learned Friend who had been brought up in the Established Church, then a Baptist, and ultimately joined Quakers. This was in 5th Mo. They seek an interview with friars and nuns there, and are ready for public discourse with their leaders, in vain endeavoring also to gain one with the Jesuits. They confer with the soldiers and officers also, and wrote an epistle to the English army at Dunkirk. Several of the prominent Friends of this time had come from the army, as Dewsbury, Ames, Naylor, Edmondson, Lillburn, David Barclay, &c. These may be classed amongst those who had found that there was a more honorable victory than that of overcoming outward enemies, and had seen the ground of war in themselves struck at by the spirit of Christ and removed. Scarcely had King Charles II. come to the throne than Burrough wrote to him and the Royalists a long letter under date of 3rd, 5th Mo., 1660, headed, "A Visitation of Love to the King." Also from Bristol he wrote to the King's Council "to have compassion on those their enemies who are now in your power." In this year he interceded with the king for Friends at Boston (America), and with Geo. Fox had an interview, Burrough telling Charles II. that "there is an innocent vein of blood being opened in New England," upon which the king said, "I will stop that vein." Burrough entreats him to do it speedily, upon which the king said—"As speedily as ye will; call the secretary and I will do it presently." The mandamus was drawn up and Burrough pressed in spirit called again in a few days. The king told him he had no occasion to send a ship, but if they would send one they might at once. The king allowed Burrough to name the bearer of the mandamus. He chose Shattock (a Friend) to take it, who had been banished by them under sentence of being hanged if he returned. Friends chartered a ship and with a prosperous passage in about six weeks they were at Boston. He was evidently a man prompt in action and of great energy in carrying out his business. It was well for Friends in Boston that he was, for four had already been hung, Marmaduke Stevenson, Wm. Robinson, Wm. Ledra, and Mary Dyer; others had their ears cut off, and others were in prison, apparently awaiting the same lot.

God gives to every man an opportunity, but not every man improves the opportunity that God gives him. Every man's life is a plan of God, in the sense that every man has a plan of God in his behalf set before him, for his acceptance or rejection. But it is for every man to accept or reject God's plan as he will, and upon his choice pivots his character and his destiny. It is the man who fills the place God offers him, whose life is an eternal success. It is the man who refuses to fill the place that God opens before him, whose life is an eternal failure.

DISCONTENT.—Being unhappy at the non-possession of that, of which the possession would not make us happy. Whence comes it that most men are satisfied with their country, to whatever sufferings its climate may expose them, while few or none are satisfied with their lot? In the former instance a man is on a par with his neighbors; in the latter, the man being necessarily inferior to the few, pride makes them imagine that they are all too low, because they are not all at the top.

FOR "THE FRIEND," A Visit to Ohio.

While seated in the parlor of a Friend at Pittsburgh, my attention was called to a little stove in the room, in which natural gas was burning. By simply turning on or off the supply, that was introduced through a pipe, the degree of warmth was easily regulated. I found the Pittsburgh housekeepers highly appreciated the convenience of this kind of fuel, which was perfectly clean, and involved no labor in carrying in coal or wood, or in removing ashes; and which could in a moment be made to burn to its full extent, and be as quickly quenched or diminished.

Its advantages are so great, that not only in western Pennsylvania, but through much of Ohio and in Indiana thousands of wells have been drilled to procure this invaluable fuel. These numerous wells have thrown much light on the deeply sunken rocks of Ohio, and the order of their succession; and some reference to these points will furnish to the reader a clearer conception of the phenomena which have led to the storing of this material in layers of rock, which are now being made accessible to man.

A thick bed of limestone underlies the entire States of Ohio and Michigan. It is called the Trenton limestone, because it attracted notice at the Trenton Falls on West Canada Creek, in Oneida County, New York. It is one of the most important of the older formations of the continent, and extends from New England to the Rocky Mountains. In Ohio it is generally buried from 1,000 to 2,000 feet below the surface, and the only place in the State where it comes to the surface is at Point Pleasant, about twenty miles from Cincinnati.

Ascending, we find above the Trenton limestone beds of shale (slate or hardened mud), mostly of a dark color, more or less intermixed with limestone and sandstone, forming together strata of many hundred feet in thickness. A well drilled at Wellsville showed it to be not less than 2,600 feet.

Above these is a layer of sandstone, called Berea grit, from the village of Berea, in Cuyahoga County, where large quarries of it are located. This Berea grit must at one time have been a beach or shore line, for its surfaces are often ripple-marked, and it abounds with worm holes.

The strata of Ohio were nearly all deposited in the waters of an ancient arm of the sea, of which the Gulf of Mexico is the dwarfed and diminished remnant and representative. The shales were no doubt deposited as mud in seawater of moderate depth, large areas of which were covered with great masses of sea-weed, like the Sargasso Sea in the Atlantic. To this sea indeed, they owe their black color, and the bituminous matter they all contain.

A chemical analysis of a portion of this shale at Columbus Ohio, showed that it yielded more than ten per cent. of volatile and organic matter. But estimating the amount of petroleum in a stratum of rock at only one-tenth of 1 per cent., and supposing the stratum to be 500 feet thick, it would contain 2,500,000 barrels of oil to the square mile. So that the amount of oil diffused through the Ohio rocks is simply inconceivable. But in this diffused state it is useless to man, for the expense of separating it would cost more than its value.

But a bountiful Creator, in thus laying up a store of fuel for the use of man, has also provided a means for enabling him to procure it.

Over the shale spreads the Berea grit, a layer of porous sandstone, which becomes charged with the gas and oil which are evolved from the organic matter in the shale. And over the sandstone is spread another thick layer of shale, impervious to either gases or liquids, which effectually prevents their escape. When the drill of the well-borer pierces through these overlying strata and enters the sandstone, the gas which fills its pores, and is strongly condensed by the pressure of the water at such great depths, makes its escape through the channel thus made for it by man. In some wells the pressure of the gas amounts to 750 lbs. per square inch. The gas issues from the well with a velocity greater than that of a bullet leaving a rifle. Sets of drilling tools nearly 100 feet long, and weighing 2,000 pounds, are lifted out of a well 1,000 or 1,500 feet deep and thrown high into the air. The roaring of the escaping gas is literally deafening. One such well, it was estimated, produced more than 12,000,000 cubic feet of gas in a day.

Of course, when such large volumes of gas were pouring out with such velocity and power, it was difficult to bring it under control so as to utilize it for the wants of man; and in the neighborhood of Findlay, Ohio, it is said that not less than 18,000,000 cubic feet per day were being wasted for several months.

The general course of these wells is, that after the first outrush, the supply gradually diminishes, and after a longer or shorter period, the salt water, which always accompanies these deposits, and is probably derived from the ancient sea in which they originated, comes in and stops the flow of gas and oil. This shows the importance of preventing the enormous waste which attended the first introduction of this fuel, for there seems no reason to believe that when the supplies now stored in the porous strata are exhausted, there will be any perceptible replenishing of them in our time.

The chemical composition of this gas is nearly the same as that formed by the decomposition of leaves and other vegetable matter in the mud at the bottom of ponds—a light carburetted hydrogen—in which the proportion of carbon is small, so that it gives but little light in burning, although its combustion is attended with much heat.

While in Pittsburgh we visited a friend whose chamber was warmed by a grate in which natural gas was burning. Stretched across the open space, where it could receive the full effect of the flame, was a curtain, with long fringes, well adapted to radiate through the room the heat to which it was exposed. It was a curious sight to watch the lines of redness running up these fringes as the flames flickered, as if they were burning—yet they remained unchanged—for the material was asbestos.

Asbestos is a fibrous mineral which varies considerably in composition and character, but consists principally of siliceous (quartz), magnesia, alumina (clay), and oxide of iron. In some forms of it the fibres are so fine and elastic, that they may be detached in a floss resembling in appearance cotton wool; and may be woven into a cloth, which is practically indestructible in fire. The fibres are so smooth that they do not adhere to each other with the tenacity of the fibres of wool and cotton, and the cloth formed of them therefore is deficient in strength. The material is much used as packing for steam pipes and other purposes where there would be danger of fire from the employment of combustible substances.

True asbestos is a fibrous form of hornblend. The substance, which exists so abundantly in the serpentine deposits of Lower Canada, south of Quebec, and whence is derived nearly or quite all of the material manufactured in the United States, is termed by mineralogists Chrysotile. It seems like crystallized serpentine, filling cracks in that rock with a compact mass of fine crystals running across from side to side of the crevices.

When in the neighborhood of Salem, Ohio, I had occasion to pass through a piece of woodland, in which were some sugar maple trees. Into these small iron tubes had been driven, which projected a few inches outside of the tree. On these were hanging small tin buckets which received the sap that came out through the tubes. This sap is boiled down to make the maple syrup—one of the most delicious of sweets to those to whom the maple flavor is attractive. We were told that thirty-two gallons of the "water," as the crude sap is called, make about one gallon of good syrup. The richness of the sap varies, however, with the season. The most favorable time for collecting it, is when the temperature falls below 32° at night, but rises above it in the daytime.

The species of Maple from which sugar is obtained is the Acer Saccharinum, the Sugar or Rock Maple, a beautiful tree largely cultivated for shade and ornament, but which grows only sparingly in the eastern section of our country. It is more abundant west of the mountains, and especially in the mountains, and to the northward.

Probably more of the syrup and sugar are manufactured in Vermont, than in any other part of the United States. J. W.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Plainness.

I am a firm believer in plainness of speech, deportment and apparel; and would encourage it in all. I, myself, in years past, ran into the gay fashion of the world, and I believe that I was thereby led farther away from what was right in the Divine sight than I might otherwise have been. Plainness is as a hedge around us, and may keep us out of company which might be detrimental to our everlasting welfare. But plainness alone will not save us. Christ said, "Except ye are converted and become as little children, ye cannot see the kingdom of God."

As a child places all its trust and confidence in the mother, even so we must place ours in our Heavenly Father. Yes, we must become as clay in the hands of the potter, and let Him fit, fashion and mould us as seemeth good in his Divine sight. We must give up everything that his controversy is with. Some one may say, how am I to know what is contrary to my Master's will?

Is it not recorded in the Scriptures of Truth that the grace of God that brings salvation hath appeared unto all men, teaching them the denying of ungodliness and worldly lusts, and that we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world? Well, this grace or spirit of Christ in the secret of the soul will teach us if we pay attention to it, will guide us aright. It is a measure of that light that enlighteneth every man that comes into the world. It is this that justifies us when we do right and brings sweet peace to the soul. It is this which condemns us when we do wrong and brings sorrow and remorse. Oh, let us mind the light while we have it; for the Master has said, "My spirit shall not always strive with man." Oh, let none put off till a more convenient season, for that may never come. Surely the fields are white unto harvest, and the laborers are few. Let us pray that the Lord may send forth more laborers into the vineyard. Oh, that as a society may be aroused and shake ourselves from the dust of the earth, and that we may be instruments in the Lord's hands in turning the people from darkness to light and from the power of Satan to God!

Let us observe due moderation in all things, and be careful in the furniture of our houses as well as in our dress. If the dear Master has blessed us both in basket and in store, oh may we use it for the furtherance of his cause of truth and righteousness in the earth. W. T.

SPRINGVILLE, IOWA.

FOR "THE FRIEND." WANDERINGS.

Straight was the road, but I missed my way,
On the by-way's devious turning,
Clear was my path by the light of day,
But the night fell down, and I missed my way,
And the sun had ceased his burning.

Then by my side stood a shrouded form;
And I knew 'twas the form of sorrow.
Her eyes were red, and her cheeks were pale,
From her ashen lips there escaped a wail,
As she thought of the cloudy morrow.

Bitterly weeping she led me back
To the path for which I wandered;
She set my feet in the narrow track,
And chided me sternly for all my lack,
And the many hours I squandered.

Then the morn arose, and she fled away;
And in his sun she came clearly o'er me.
My heart was warmed 'neath its cheering ray,
A cloudless sky, a perfect day,
And the narrow path before me.

But again I strayed, and by my side,
As I wandered sad and tearful,
Came a pallid form, with distorted eyes,
And hair disheveled, and tears and sighs,
A presence wild and fearful.

It was Pain I knew, and a dreaded guest
To each weary sin-worn being,
Though she follows quickly our Lord's behest,
And drives men back to the paths of rest,
From doubt and danger fleeing.

Sore pressed by Pain, once again I turned,
But, scarce had her form departed,
When with willful folly I went astray,
To gather flowers across the way
Where the humming-birds glanced and darted.

Oh I wandered far, till at length I found
Earth's sweets on my senses pallng,
The fairest roses had thorns below,
In each daisy bud I marked a hidden foe,
And my feet were tired from falling.

Far o'er the fields where the sunlight falls
On the narrowing path of duty,
There stood a firm of exceeding grace,
With face more fair than an earthly face,
And a smile of surpassing beauty.

The sunlight gleamed on her golden hair,
And shone like a halo o'er her,
She spoke in tones of sweetest rare,
She called my name, she was passing fair,
And my soul bowed down before her.

Earth's snares were sundred. "Oh Lord Divine
I come at thy gracious calling,
My soul, my body, my all are thine,
Oh leave me never; but ever shine
Till death's shades on my day are falling."

"Oh child, I ever am by thy side,
And in weariness I've sought thee.
Are thy eyes so blind that they cannot see?
Do thy ears not hear how I call to thee?
Know'st thou not how my blood has bought thee?"

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"LEARN TO LABOR AND TO WAIT."

I see thee stand beneath that stately oak,
With eyes cast down, and look dejected and sad,
Who lately in such glowing language spoke,
As if thy zeal had almost made thee mad.

The world to thee seemed full of sin and wrong,
But thou wast full of earnestness and might,
And hoped that thou with thy right arm so strong
Could help to set a multitude aright.

The world goes on as though thou hadst not been;
To-day thy efforts seem all made in vain,
It seems as if the evil one might reign,
And spread abroad his kingdom far and sin.

'Tis not for thee to judge the earth young man,
A higher power than thou rules it and thee,
Nor shouldst thou stop thy wickedness to scan,
With idle ears thou'st soon drift out to sea.

Fill well the place God giveth thee to fill,
And lose no time in making needless moan;
Thus thou wilt help to bring about his will,
And both in earth and heaven erect his throne.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

SPRING SONNET.

The balmy breath of spring is on the air;
Exhaled from growing grass, and opening flowers,
While sunny days, and warm refreshing showers,
Ope to life each dormant bud so fair.

Each tender twig its plumes unfolding, where,
On field, or leafless tree, or faded bowers,
The frosty crystals traced this world of ours,
While winter's icy hand was resting there.

Of summer songsters from their wintry flight,
Each day restores some quaint and shining wing;
Whose hearts for very gladness can but sing
The praise of Him who formed the morning light.

Shall man, in grateful tribute, fail to bring
A song of praise to greet thee, joyous Spring?
COAL CREEK, Fourth Mo., 1892.

Catharine W. Morris.

The beloved friend named above will no doubt be remembered by some as one prominent in our religious society in their earlier days. She was descended from a family which had furnished many conspicuous examples of men and women devoted to the cause of Christ, but her father, Samuel Morris, did not adhere to the faith of his ancestors, and was a military officer during the Revolutionary war.

Catharine W. Morris passed away on the 10th of the Twelfth Month, 1859, in the 88th year of her age, full of years and in the faith and hope of the better inheritance.

Her funeral took place from her residence in Fourth Street above Arch, where she had lived for many years before her decease, and it was attended by a large number of relatives and friends. It was remarkable for having been probably the last Friend's funeral in Philadelphia in which the remains were carried to the grave yard on a bier, borne by a number of young men. The interment was in the Eastern Burial Ground on Fourth Street south of Arch. In a series of memoranda addressed to her executors, she gave expression to views and feelings which can still be read and studied and profit.

In one of these she says:
"That health and salvation may attend you, is the aspiration which at present flows fervently on your behalf, and for your good and establishment my prayers have oft ascended I hope to the Lord of glory! Oh may you cherish the cementing influence of this Love. Be faithful in seeking to know his will and obedient to every manifestation of duty; then will your peace flow as a river, unobstructed by obstacles which this world or the spirit of it, may cast in the way."

She further adds:

"Under a sense of the uncertainty of time and having been thoughtful on the subject * * * I believe I may say, that should I be called as it may be suddenly, it will be no matter of surprise. * * * I think I can in sincerity say, I have wronged no one designedly or knowingly, my desire for many years having been to do the blessed will of my Heavenly Father, who truly is kind. All glory be ascribed to Him and his dear Son Christ Jesus our Lord.

My trials have felt great and weighty, particularly in the early part of my life, but I trust I may say his gracious arm has been wonderfully displayed for my support especially in that time of sore affliction, and continues able to save and willing to deliver to the very uttermost, all those who confide in Him. May thanksgiving and praise be given to his ever adorable name now and forever."

One of her brothers who survived her gave forth the following testimony on her behalf. A few trifling alterations have been made and some words omitted to adapt it for publication.

"In early life she was surrounded in no common degree by the respect and esteem in which her father was held by the citizens of Philadelphia and others who had taken part in the revolutionary conflicts, through all classes, from Washington downward.

From this she turned feeling it her duty, constrained by the love of God to follow Jesus as her Shepherd, her guide and her counsellor. Not of robust health, she sought for her companions the meek and the lowly in their own estimation, and in a remarkable manner her covenants were with these, and with them to seek out the habitations of the distressed from whatever cause under the influence of her Redeemer; on no occasion assuming anything to herself, but following her guide, the Pattern on the Cross, who laid down his life for a fallen race.

She did not shrink from menial acts, but from washing the feet of the disciples to the entertainment of those in more conspicuous walks she had her consolations. Holding no man for a pattern, the Spirit of her Redeemer was in a remarkable manner her Guide and Counsellor. In benignity of manner she swayed the sceptre of his love, so that from little, very little, it may be truly said, "The least of seeds became a tree, and the fowls of the air lodged in the branches of it." In how many ways is not needless here to be enumerated, but to God she gave, and so let us give, all the glory.

In her attire she was strictly exemplary—she was deeply concerned that her adorning should not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair and of wearing of gold, or putting on of apparel, but in the hidden man of the heart—so devoid of change, that dresses made one year lasted for many—no change for fashion; and while liberal to others restriction for herself ruled her actions.

The lady throughout in her manner and address, the latter conforming to Scripture language, she commanded so much respect, that on occasions when the writer has been with her at places of resort for health, it was very remarkable how to her was given the preference of place. It was her singleness of heart and purpose to which I wish to call our attention, God in himself the only hope of glory, and in the immutability of his counsel how even here the hundred fold was added."

The writer feels much satisfaction in bringing to light these reminiscences which have lain dormant for more than thirty years. It was his privilege from early boyhood to know her as a near neighbor—further—as one who was justly beloved for her work's sake. Would that there were more such as she was, in our own day—those who might follow her as she followed Christ.

G. V.

In an article published in The British Friend headed, "The Message of Quakerism to the Twentieth Century," Thomas Hodgkin points out some of its testimonies which he believes are destined to exert a powerful influence in the world. After speaking of the leading message of its primitive preachers—"Listen to the Divine voice which speaks to thee in the secret of thy own heart. Nothing can be true or right which clashes with that Divine voice"—he calls attention to the following points:

1. Its great and perpetual "testimony" to the un-Christian character of War, which has been for more than two hundred years like the voice of one crying in the wilderness, is at length reaching the ears of kings, prime-ministers and parliaments. With so many of the nations of Europe running apparently a headlong race to bankruptcy, goaded on by the tremendous demands of their war-budgets, and with Socialism uttering its low growl of discontent in each of the largest capitals of the world, we may be sure that the secret wish of every clear-sighted European statesman is that he could at least diminish the pressure of the war system on his people; and in this mood of mind the voice of those men who say "Christ came that He might destroy the works of the devil, and one of those works is War," has some chance of being listened to.

2. In all the discussions on the nature of the inspiration of the Jewish and the Christian Scriptures, and the claim which should be made on their behalf to the unquestioning obedience of the human reason, Quakerism may, and probably will, in future bear an important part. Mediaeval philosophers thought they were discharging a sacred duty when they tried to extract the knowledge of all things human and Divine from the letter of the Scriptures, often distorted by the wildest allegorizing. Puritan divines, finding the need of some other test of truth, instead of the Church authority which Luther had broken to pieces, put the books of the Bible, from Genesis to Revelation, in that seat of infallibility from which the Pope had been deposed. It was thought that a text of Scripture might be found not only to solve every theological question which arose, but almost to decide all men's actions in daily life; and Cromwell's soldiers doubtless honestly believed that Samuel's hewing Agag in pieces justified the execution of Charles Stuart.

To such an age the arguments of the great Apologist of Quakerism were directed, pleading that the Spirit by whose aid the Scriptures were first written still remained, immeasurably above his own work; and that that Spirit rather than the mere letter of the Old or even the New Testament should be spoken of as "the Rule of Faith."

3. Lastly comes the undying protest of Quakerism against every manifestation of the spirit of Sacerdotalism. It is hard to utter this protest without wounding the feelings of some whom we love and reverence, but still it must be done. All honor to the "priest," whether Romanist or Anglican, who is laboring in a crowded parish of the poor, teaching the little ones, reasoning with the vicious ones, comforting the dying ones, endeavoring to bear their sins and sorrows on his heart, and to stand like Moses between the people and God. All honor to him for the Christ-like work which fills up a great part of his life; but still we cannot assent to his theory of his commission to undertake it. He thinks that it is only the imposition of a bishop's hand which gives him the right to act as shepherd to the flock, and that he thus receives a mysterious power, transmitted like an electric current through the bishops of eighteen centuries, and ultimately derived from the Apostles, or rather through them from their Master.

This theory of Apostolical Succession obliges him to claim spiritual kindred with some of the worst men that the world has seen, with all the hypocritical, grasping, persecuting prelates of the Middle Ages; and, contrary to his own secret apprehensions of the truth, it obliges him to renounce the brotherhood of thousands of earnest and tender souls, touched with the same aspirations as his own, but not connected with the same ecclesiastical organization. Over against this rigid mechanical theory of "Ordination," we set our belief in the ever-working energy of the Spirit of God, who calls men and women out of every rank and station in life—even as He called of old the High-priest's son, or the dresser of sycamore trees in Tekoah—and makes them able ministers of the new Covenant. This we believe to be the true ideal of a Church; and we look upon the other theory with its tendency to establish a priestly caste, and interpose them as mediators between the soul and its God, as one of the greatest hindrances that the world has seen to the spread of the free, pure, life-giving Gospel of Jesus Christ.

We believe that to the Church of the future the Society of Friends will have some precious gifts to contribute; and in order that these gifts may not miss their intended purpose, it is important that we should carefully guard that good thing which has been committed to us, and not in a weak and faint-hearted desire to be like the nations around us, shrink from acknowledging the guidance of our unseen King, and make for ourselves human leaders, whose tendency will be to lead us back into the bondage from which Christ set our fathers free.

Exports from Bermuda.—The United States Consul at Bermuda reports that the principal exports from the island to the United States are onions and potatoes. Of the onions the shipments are valued at about $375,000, and of the potatoes at $125,000. The next most valuable production is lily bulbs, of which $22,000 worth are sent annually to us.

Introduction of Agricultural Pests.—In 1858 and 1859 a vessel in distress was brought into Bermuda. It was loaded with oranges which were sold at auction and carried all over the island. In a few months after the orange trees were covered with an insect which fed on the bark, extracting the sap therefrom, and causing the bark to curl up. The island was soon cleared of every orange tree. Another insect was introduced in peaches, which destroyed all the peaches on the island.

Tea.—By whom and when the use of tea for drinking purposes was discovered is lost in antiquity. The famous herb is referred to in the Chinese annals as far back as 2000 B. C., at which period it was cultivated and classified almost as completely as to-day.

One ancient legend says that its virtues were learned by accident by a Chinese monarch, King Sheng Nung, "The Divine Husbandman," who flourished forty centuries ago, and who, in boiling water over a fire made from tea-branches on which the leaves still hung, allowed some of the latter to fall into the pot.

Tea was highly esteemed in nearly every ancient Asiatic city near the sea and was used as a royal gift from the Chinese monarchs and great merchants to the potentates of the East. Some of these presents must have been worthy of a crown. One is thus recorded: "It weighed 40 catties (about 50 lbs.), and each leaf was perfect in color, size and age. The leaves were divided into parcels of five maces each (a little over half an ounce), and each parcel was wrapped in fine white paper, and these in turn wrapped in pure silver foil and put into little bags made of bright colored silk. A hundred bags were placed in a porcelain jar, whose lid was securely fastened and sealed, and each jar was protected by a box of camphor-wood trimmed with silver hinges and ornaments."

Before the time of Confucius it had supplanted every other fluid for assuaging thirst. Its sanitary excellence was appreciated by Shên Kung, a celebrated scholar and philosopher, who said: "Tea is better than wine, for it leadeth not to intoxication, neither does it cause a man to do foolish things and repent thereof in his sober moments. It is better than water, for it does not carry disease, neither doth it act as a poison as doth water when the wells contain foul or rotten matter."

That the use of tea is universal is borne out by one of the maxims of Confucius, the wisest man of China, when he said: "Be good and courteous to all, even to the stranger from other lands. If he say unto thee that he thirsteth, give unto him a cup of warm tea without money and without price."

The Chinese merchants and officials with whom I have conversed state that the crops this season are larger and very much finer than ever before in the history of Formosa. This will be good news to Americans. Formosa tea is, without doubt, the best in the world, and Americans almost monopolize its use, consuming 95 per cent. of the total output. It is so superior and popular that unscrupulous dealers in Japan, Corea, and especially Indian and Ceylon teas have been doing a large business in sending to the American market their own goods put up in imitation of the Formosa article. The new law compelling importers to brand each package with the name of the place it comes from has struck a blow at the evil and given much satisfaction to merchants in China. It may be questioned, however, if the statute goes far enough, and if further legislation is not necessary. I have had the opportunity of studying tea culture in Ceylon and Formosa, and find there is great room here for the improvement and cheapening of the curing processes. The Chinese still cure the leaf in small bamboo baskets over charcoal fires in the same way as did their ancestors thirty centuries ago. The new processes, invented chiefly if not solely by Englishmen, use copper, iron, or porcelain plates, hot air and more or less labor-saving machinery. The result is a great saving in time and labor, and the production of a very uniform article. The Chinese object to the new processes on the ground that they destroy the bouquet of the fine leaf and add an unpleasant metallic flavor to the tea. They make the further objection that the new system would throw thousands out of employment, and so injure the nation.

Tea culture is assuming large proportions outside of the Chinese boundaries. The Spanish authorities have tried to raise it in the Philippines; the Dutch in Sumatra, Java, and Borneo; the English in the Straits settlements, and the French in Cochinchina. Nearly all these experiments have been failures: the only successes reported being from mountain countries, where there was moisture, good soil, and not an excess of warmth. The Dutch have turned this discovery to account, and now confine their efforts to the high mountainous districts with which their colonial possessions abound. While good tea has been produced in a number of places under these auspices, the quality has been very inferior to the fine growths of Formosa and Foo-Chow.

In Russia and Japan, and above all in China, there are epicures more dainty as to their daily tea than wealthy connoisseurs at home are over their Madeira and Burgundy. The Governor of Formosa pays from $10 to $20 per pound for his tea. When I dined with him I justified the extravagance. The perfume of the tea filled the palace, and the exquisite, incomparable flavor lingered upon my palate hours after the meal was over.

The American people will spend over $11,000,000 for Chinese tea in 1891-'92. Of this vast sum the planters will receive $3,000,000, the tradesmen and home dealers $2,500,000, and foreigners, with no interest in America or China, the handsome balance of $5,500,000!

A few words of advice to tea-drinkers may not be malapropos. When I left the United States I was considered a fair judge of tea. Now, after having visited Ceylon, Formosa, and the Amoy district, I find I knew nothing of tea. We Americans don't know the first principles of making tea. The delicate leaf should never touch metal. It should be kept in paper, wood, glass, or porcelain. To make it, put a small quantity in a porcelain cup, fill the latter with boiling water, cover it up with a porcelain saucer and let it stand three minutes.

Above all things, do not boil tea. The heat drives off the perfume, spoils the flavor, and extracts the tannin, the astringent principle. If the boiling be done in a tin or iron pot, the tannin attacks the metal and makes the liquid black. This fluid is simply diluted ink.

Beware of green tea! It is an abomination and a fraud. In the first place it is the unripe leaf and bears the same relation to the real article that the green does to the ripe peach. The green tea of commerce derives its rare color from being cured, or rather killed, on dirty copper pans, from being mixed with weeds and shrubs, from being stained with indigo and chrome-yellow, from being colored with verdigris, grass-juce, or chlorophyll. Every green dye known to commerce has been used to produce that much admired but death-dealing color excepting it may be Paris green. As soon as the use of that poisonous substance will give a profit of a cent a pound, no doubt it will be liberally used by the mercenary Mongolian merchant and the much more mercenary cultured European tea trader.

The tea plant is very sensitive. It flourishes best on a mountain side, where it is neither very warm nor cool; where the soil is dry but the rains and dews are frequent; where the force of the wind is broken by adjacent woods or hills; where there is a maximum of sunlight, and, according to the Celestials, of moonlight; and where the surrounding ground is kept free from weeds or other vegetable growths.

There are farms in Formosa, Fo-Kien, and other tea districts where these conditions exist unchangingly, whose tea crop is as famous and distinctly known in the eastern world as the various chateaux of France are to the wine experts of Europe. Just as the millionaires of Europe control certain vineyards, so do the millionaires of the flowery kingdom control tea plantations, whose annual output is worth a king's ransom.—Extract from Report by Consul Bedloe, of Amoy.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Few Words More.

As eternal life is promised to those who by a patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, opportunity is afforded in the adding of days to "the life of the Christian, for improvement in the art of living aright, that when all things of a terrestrial nature shall have come to an end, an entrance through mercy may be abundantly administered into the Everlasting Kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

"The words of the pure are pleasant words." The Lord's servant Job said: "How forcible are right words!" Whereas argument based on words not uttered in a right spirit fail to administer reproof or to edify. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him; and He will show them his covenant." In advocacy of Truth He will also show when to speak and when to keep silence. Therefore, let us fear, lest a promise being left of entering into his rest, any of us should seem to come short of it." The Apostle Paul, in his way of enforcing Truth to the Corinthians, spake with earnestness: "This I say, brethren, the time is short." He knew the forcibleness of words spoken in season and from what source they came, thus prepared to speak as one having authority he gave forth the exhortation that "we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip." Being myself admonished of the shortness of time, I feel that it is in the love of the Everlasting Gospel that words are required of me to speak while time and opportunity by kind Heaven is afforded, knowing, "That soon will end my earthly mission."

PROVIDENCE, Fourth Month list, 1892.

DON'T ABUSE BEASTS.—"When I was a boy and lived up in the mountains of New Hampshire I worked for a farmer, and was given a span of horses to plow with, one of which was a four-year-old colt. The colt, after walking a few steps, would lie down in the furrow. The farmer was provoked, and told me to sit on the colt's head, to keep him from rising while he whipped him, 'to break him of that notion,' as he said. But just then a neighbor came by. He said: 'There is something wrong here; let him get up and let us examine.' He patted the colt, looked at the harness, and then said: 'Look at this collar; it is so long and narrow, and carries the harness so high, that when he begins to pull it slips back and chokes him so he can't breathe.' And so it was; and but for that neighbor we would have whipped as kind a creature as we had on the farm because he laid down when he couldn't breathe.

"It was only the other day I heard of a valuable St. Bernard dog being shot, because, having a wound on his head, concealed by the hair, he bit a person who handled him roughly. Boys, young and old, please remember that these creatures are dumb. They may be hungry, or thirsty, or cold, or faint, or sick, or bruised, or wounded, and cannot tell you. Think before you strike any creature that cannot speak."—The Presbyterian.

A wrong step can never be canceled, but in some instances it can be retraced. And when a wrong step can be retraced, its retracing is the only way out of the trouble that has already come, and that is sure to continue, from its first taking. A man leaves the firm road and steps into the outer edge of an impassable morass. Seeing his error, there are two ways possible to him: he can push on and push in, and sink deeper and deeper, until all hope is past; or he can struggle back to the right road again, and, with soiled feet and garments, begin his way once more. One of these ways is right; the other is wrong. The same is true of every departure from the path of virtuous action. A step in the wrong direction needs to be retraced by him who would live. No matter how difficult it be to turn backward, or how surely the signs of defilement from the wrong doing will adhere to the traveller, the backward step is the only step of hope. No gain toward the right can ever be made by pushing on in the wrong direction. Backward, not forward, is sometimes the way of life. "Except ye turn, * * * ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven."—S. S. Times.

George Fox's Birthplace.—A Friend calls our attention to an announcement in the papers, that the cottage at Fenny Drayton in which George Fox was born is being taken bodily to Chicago for exhibition! It is well for our Friends and the public to know that the real cottage is believed to have disappeared many years ago. A Friend visiting Fenny Drayton in 1872 was shown the site of the cottage by the resident clergyman, who had evidently investigated the matter carefully. The reported spot was on the borders of a cultivated field, and there still traces of brick-work in the foundation. Popular relics of departed worthies are often of very doubtful authority.—British Friend.

Temperance Legislation in Mississippi.—In an interesting article on this subject by Bishop Gallaway, in The Independent, an encouraging view is given of the growth of prohibition sentiment in that State. The Bishop says that forty-one out of her seventy-four counties in the State enjoy prohibition under a local-option statute. "Every indication prophesies victory, and that Mississippi will soon take her place in the column of Prohibition States."

The Ute Indians in Colorado.—A letter from the Indian Rights Association informs that the Indian Commissioner of the House has agreed to report favorably the bill providing for the removal of the southern Ute Indians from fertile lands in Colorado to wild and inaccessible lands in Utah. The letter says: "If the removal shall become an accomplished fact, the Government of the United States will have deliberately receded from its policy of Indian civilization." There is a strong minority in the Committee opposed to the bill and to the wrong which it involves. It is to be hoped that this measure may fail to become a law.

The Gambling Passion.—A recent daily paper reported that the gambling tables at Monte Carlo were crowded nightly, that the players and onlookers were standing round the tables five deep, and that large sums were paid for a seat at the table. Nine-tenths of the people were said to be English. It is indeed sad that the passion for gambling among our own countrymen should be so great as to take them hundreds of miles from their own land in order that it may be indulged. The effect of the spectacle upon foreigners can only be to favor the impression that the English are a gambling race, and to lower in the eyes of the world the high moral standard that in many ways our nation has endeavored to uphold. We need a stronger public opinion upon this matter, so that those who take bring discredit upon the English name may be made to feel that their actions are viewed with the deepest disfavor by the circles amongst whom they move at home.

While we note with sadness the terrible story of the gambling fever abroad, we do not forget how strongly tainted are many who stay at home. The eagerness with which the sporting columns of the daily papers are scanned at our public libraries, the existence of the large number of papers devoted exclusively to "sport," the records of the police court, and the common talk of daily life, bear witness to the fearful inroads which this vice is making upon our national morality. The Anti-Gambling League has been in existence for two or three years, and has been earnestly upholding the cause of righteousness. Not a few public men have accorded it the support of their voice or pen. But much more needs to be done to stem the current.—London Friend.

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 7, 1892.

It has ever been the belief of the Society of Friends, that in the transaction of its church business it is necessary to wait upon and seek the guidance of the Lord, so that Christ may be practically as well as nominally the Head of the Church. The reasonings of man and the judgment of those who are naturally wise must be kept in subjection to the gentle motions of the Spirit. When a proposition is brought before a meeting, the degree of religious weight which accompanies it, and the feeling of unity and comfort attending it, are of far more importance in determining its rectitude, than the force of the arguments advanced in its favor, or the numbers of those who may favor it.

These views were clearly brought to notice during a trial in New Jersey, soon after the separation of 1827, in which the question was involved, as to which of the two bodies into which the Society had separated, was the legitimate Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia, and therefore entitled to a fund which was in dispute. One of the witnesses was Samuel Bettle Senior, a man of unusual abilities and long experience in the affairs of the Society of Friends. He had acted for a number of years as Clerk to the Yearly Meeting. In reply to a question, as to how questions are decided in meetings for business, he gave the following answer:

"Our mode of deciding questions is peculiar. It is intimately connected with our religious principles and doctrines. When an individual or a religious assembly is gathered into a reverent, inward, waiting state of mind, we are sensible at times of the presence of the invisible, omnipresent One—qualifying the heart for secret communion and approach unto God—consistently with the doctrine of the blessed Saviour, 'that without me ye can do nothing,' and that 'where two or three are gathered in my name, there am I in the midst of them.' Hence the Society believe, and it is one of their peculiar and distinguishing doctrines, that there may be secret approach to and worship of God, without any ceremonial outward act or service. And in our meetings for business we also hold that it is needful to experience the same power to qualify us for right discernment, and to restrain our own spirit and will; and we do believe that when our meetings have been thus in a degree influenced, there have been wisdom and judgment better than our own; consistent with the prophetic declaration respecting the blessed Head of the Church, that 'He should be a Spirit of judgment to those who sit in judgment.' With these views and a corresponding practice, though deeply sensible of the weakness and frailty of man when left to himself, whether in an individual, or collective, or social capacity, our Society has been favored to come to its decisions and conclusions at its various meetings, with a remarkable degree of harmony and unity. These conclusions have never been come to by a vote or the opinion of the majority."

The views thus expressed by Samuel Bettle accord with the counsel given by George Fox to Friends, to hold all their meetings in the power of God. For in this power of God, he testified, was the authority of meetings.

In the London Annual Epistle for the year 1688, the acknowledgment is made, "that according to the wanted kindness of our tender and merciful God, we have had a very living and refreshing assembling together, and the glory of the Divine power and presence of God hath shined upon us from day to day, to our great consolation."

The Discipline of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting distinctly recognizes this principle, where it says: "The love, power and peaceable Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ being the alone true authority of all our meetings, it is the fervent concern of this meeting, that they may be held under the sense and influence of that holy unction."

And again, "It is no man's learning, nor artificial requirements; it is no man's riches nor greatness in this world; it is no man's eloquence nor natural wisdom, that makes him fit for government in the Church of Christ; all his endowments must be seasoned with the heavenly salt, his spirit be subjected, and his gifts pass through the fire of God's altar, a sacrifice to his praise and honor, that so self being baptized into death, the gifts may be used in the power of the resurrection of the life of Jesus in him."

We believe there is a danger to which some well-disposed persons are exposed, in the transaction of the business of our meetings, of trusting too much to their natural wisdom, and of deciding questions that may arise from its dictates, without humbly feeling after that spiritual guidance, on which the safety of the Church depends. If the time should ever unhappily come, when the decisions of our meetings will rest upon human wisdom and attainments, which have not "passed through the fire of God's altar," it will be sadly true that the glory will have departed from our Israel—for the Lord will not give his glory to another, or his praise to anything of man's devising.

May we then, in the transaction of the business of our meetings, be increasingly concerned to feel after the arising of Divine life, and move and act under its influence.

Our friend, HulDAH H. Bonwill, requests that persons forwarding partly-worn clothing, &c., to her at the Book Store, No. 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, for the relief of destitute persons in the West, among Friends, Africans and Indians, will prepay the expense of carriage. She has to pay the necessary expenses connected with the shipment of the goods from Philadelphia, and feels it a burthen to be required to pay the freight on this to city.

As the time is now at hand, when the goods should be packed and forwarded, those intending to aid her benevolent efforts should promptly send what materials they can spare.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Secretary of the Treasury has issued a circular to customs officers, in which he says: "In view of the partial interest in the movement of the imports and exports of silver bullion should be known. You are therefore instructed to require persons importing and exporting silver bullion to exhibit on the import entries and export manifests thereof, commencing with May 1, 1852, the quantity of silver bullion in ounces fine, as well as the value, and include this information in your returns of imports and exports of silver bullion rendered to the Bureau of Statistics of this Department after that date."

A company has been formed at Christiansa, Norway, to replace an icebergs as a vessel as can be sailed across the ocean to exhibit at the World's Fair. It will be an exact model of the Viking boat discovered some years ago in an ice floe. The original boat is eighty feet long and seventeen feet wide, with a cross at the bow.

Indians from Lower California, who have arrived at Yuma, Arizona, report that the volcanoes near Lake Sululle, close to the Gulf of California, are in active eruption, and that the eruption has been attended by earthquake shocks.

San Francisco, Vacaville, Esparto and Winters, in California, were visited by an earthquake a few minutes after 4 o'clock, on the afternoon of the 29th of last month. The only damage reported was the throwing down of some scaffolding at Esparto. The vibrations at San Francisco were "north and south."

The New York Sun states that a letter from Ala-ka has been received, in which the Government of the Alaskan coal mines, and it also says that gold mining will be actively prosecuted there this summer. The Alaska fisheries are growing in importance, and there is an immense supply of Alaska salmon, for the canning of which a trust was recently formed. There was also a petition presented to the appropriation of $25,000 to build a pack trail across the Chilkat Pass.

On the 2d inst. the British steamship Tynehead sailed from New York with 7,000,000 pounds of wheat for Riga, Russia, the contribution of the farmers of Iowa for the famine sufferers.

On the evening of the 27th ult. a fire originated in the "Central Theatre," of this city, at Eighth and Walnut Streets. The flames spread with great rapidity and two of the actors and four of the actresses were unable to leave the building before it was too late, and they were burned to death. About one hundred of the audience that were burned or otherwise injured, were treated at the hospitals and privately, one of whom has since died and several others are not expected to recover. The flames extended to the Times newspaper's Annex building, which was destroyed, and to the city of the farmers' building. The losses are estimated at a little more than six hundred and thirty thousand dollars. Places of amusement of like character, on the site of the late theatre, have on three prior occasions been burned, causing the loss of a number of lives, particularly dancing girls. And yet we are so heedless, that it is announced that the theatre is to be rebuilt, immediately.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 430; which is 6 less than during the previous week, and 21 less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing, 297 were males and 223 females; 56 died of cholera; 10 of pneumonia; 37 of disease of the heart; 19 of diphtheria; 16 of Bright's disease; 15 of inanition; 15 of convulsions; 13 of marasmus; 12 of cancer; 11 of typhoid fever; 11 of old age; 11 of bronchitis; 10 of croup and 10 of apoplexy.

Markets.—C. U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, 115½ a 116½; currency 6's, 109—118.

Corn was quiet, but steady, on a basis of 7½c per bushel, including uplands.

Wheat—Winter, hard, bulk, $18.50 a $19.50; spring do., in bulk, at $17.00 a $18.00.

Flour.—Western and Pennsylvania super, $26.5 a $30.00; do. do., extras, $31.5 a $35.00; No. 2 winter family, $30.5 a $33.00; Pennsylvania, soft, straight, $34.00 a $37.00; Western winter, clear, $41.5 a $43.00; do. do., straight, $41.0 a $46.5; winter patent, $44.5 a $49.00; Minnesota, clear, $40.0 a $42.5; do., straight, $42.5 a $45.00; do. patent, $46.0 a $48.5; do. favorite brands, higher. Key flour was dull and unchanged. We quote at $4.00 a $4.15 per barrel, of quality.

GRAIN.—Red wheat, 95½ a 95½ cts. No. 2 mixed corn, 47½ a 47½ cts. No. 2 white oats, 37½ a 38½ cts.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 4½ a 5 cts; good, 4¼ a 4½ cts; fair, 4 a 4½ cts; common, 3¼ a 3½ cts; culls, 3¼ a 3½ cts; fat cows, 2½ a 3 cts. SHEEP.—Wool, 18 a 19 cts; clipped sheep, 3 a 6 cts. Wool lambs, 5½ a 7 cts; clipped lambs, 4½ a 6 cts.

HOGS.—Chicago, 6½ a 7 cts; other Western, 6¼ a 6½ cts; State, 6¼ a 6½ cts.

FOREIGN.—In the House of Commons, on the 27th ult. Sir Arthur Kaye, Bala's motion for the second reading of his Woman's Suffrage Bill, was defeated by a vote of 175 against 152 in its favor. On the 29th, Clark's bill for local self-government in Great Britain and Ireland, was rejected, yeas, 64; nays, 74.

"May day" was observed in London in a very quiet manner. Large numbers of the Trades Union men embarked and marched to Hyde Park, where monster meetings were held. A large number of speakers addressed the crowd, including Cunningham Graham, the Socialist member of the House of Commons; T. Mann and B. Tillett, the labor leaders, and Stepiak, the Russian. A Riot Bill, which had been introduced by Parliament to pass an eight-hour bill and calling upon Parliament to pass an eight-hour bill. There was no disturbance.

The same day was observed throughout various European countries with unexpected quiet. Not a single arrest was made in Paris. A few bombs were exploded in Lyons, without any results to life, otherwise fears of serious trouble proved groundless. Ravachol and Simon were found guilty in Paris last week, and sentenced to penal servitude for life.

The emigration of Prussian Poles, chiefly to the United States, is rapidly growing heavier. This augmented the large number of emigrants to the United States, and to the general fear that war with Russia is inevitable sooner or later. The emigration from Germany has been heavier thus far this year than for many years past. Figures so far show that the emigration has doubled since 1888.

The Hon. Mr. Lay, United States Minister to Russia, has made his report to the American contributors to the relief fund. Besides the two shiploads of food, over $77,000 in money has been sent to the American Legation for distribution. Wherever the contributors indicated how their gifts should be applied their instructions were followed. With the exception of three special channels, all the money was expended through three channels, the Relief Organization of the British-American Church of St. Petersburg, the Jewish Relief Committee and Count Tolstoi. The greater part went through the first. In every case detailed reports were required, so that it would be possible to tell how the money was expended, and what was done with it. The Russian Government furnished the necessary cars and transported the flour without cost, and delivered it to the persons designated.

The inhabitants of the village of Tschesnopof, a short distance from the town of Constantinople, in the province of Kieff, have been greatly incensed by the rapid growth of Studism at that place. On the 25th ult. the village was the scene of a disgraceful proceeding. Led by the village officials, the inhabitants belonging to the Orthodox faith made an attack upon the house of the Studite, and, after a short and bloody struggle, they way into the houses and dragged the occupants out on the streets, where members of the mob, armed with knouts, severely flogged them. No respect was paid to sex, and women and young girls were as badly whipped as were the men.

At Rio, Japan, on the 10th ult., consumed 5,000 houses on twenty streets, including forty warehouses, several police stations, a panorama building and three school houses. It is variously estimated that from seventeen to forty-five lives were lost.

Advices from the interior of Africa have just reached Zambesi, from the late Consul, Dr. R. Stuhlmann, who, with a detachment of Emin Pasha's expedition, was last reported to be marching on Bukoba, had reached that place on Second Month 15th. It is said that he intended to take possession of sundry stores and munitions lying at Bukoba for the use of the expedition. The march from Wadela to Bukoba was greatly hindered by famine and disease.

Emin Pasha is reported to be ill. He was following Dr. Stuhlmann from Wadela by easy stages.

A dispatch from Melbourne, dated the 2d inst., states that the jury in the case of Frederick Bayley Deeming, charged with the murder of his wife, on that day returned a verdict of guilty, and added that the prisoner was not insane. Deeming is believed to have murdered two more women that he married, and his four children, also thought to be the perpetrator of the Whitechapel murders.

A dispatch received in London on the 27th ult., by a news agency from Rio Janeiro, states that the Brazilian Government has ordered its Consuls abroad to refuse to dispatch vessels for Matto Grosso, which State has declared its independence of the Brazilian Republic.

A blizzard, "the worst for years," set in on the afternoon of the 27th ult. in Manitoba, and over a foot of snow fell. In Winnipeg, people were blown off the sidewalks, and it "was impossible to see two feet ahead on the prairie." On the Red River, at St. Vincent, the waves were reported to be fifteen feet high. The loss of one life is reported.

The Canadian House of Commons adopted on the evening of the 25th ult. McNeill's resolution asking the admission of Canadian products to the markets of the United States on more favorable terms than is accorded to the products of foreign countries, and calling for a reduction in Canadian duties on British manufactured goods. The Government supported the measure and it was adopted by a vote of 97 to 63.

Members of the Committee

Haddonfield, N. J.

Departed this life, at Haddonfield, N. J., on the 2d of the Fourth Month, 1892, DEMORAT RIGGANS, in the seventy-first year of her age. A beloved minister and member of Haddonfield Monthly Meeting of Friends. She had been of a conscientious and pious disposition from early youth, giving her affections to her Saviour in submission to what she believed his requireing, and she was ever ready to be instructed by a goodly life and conversation. In the year 1858 she first appeared publicly in prayer in Arch Street Meeting-house, and her gift as a minister was acknowledged by Chester Monthly Meeting and Concord Quarterly Meeting, Pennsylvania, of which she was then a member, in 1862. She continued to minister for a goodly life of weeks' duration, and was borne in much patience. She desired that her friends should not pray for her recovery, but rather that she might be favored to enter the heavenly kingdom. On one occasion she remarked that she wanted to praise and honor her Saviour, in whom alone she placed all her hope, and longed for a fuller sight of his face and Divine communion. Subsequently she spoke of this favor having been granted in a precious season of heavenly peace which overshadowed her the previous day. She also expressed her feelings of love to the members of her own Meeting and the Yearly Meeting, and her resignation to the Divine will with regard to the final issue of her illness. "And to her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white: for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints." "Blessed are they which are called unto the marriage supper of the Lamb."—Rev. 19: 8.

MARRIED—At Friends' Meeting-house, Westley, R. I., on the 13th of Fourth Month, 1892, THOMAS K. WILBUR to ELIZABETH W. GARDNER, daughter of John and Mary Gardner.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 256.

In the life of John G. Paton, who labored for many years among the New Hebrides Islands to spread a knowledge of Christianity among the people, there is a very interesting account of his efforts to obtain a supply of fresh water, by digging a well on the coral island of Aniwa. It furnishes a striking example of the success that often attends persevering labor; and of the faith in Divine direction that enabled him to complete the arduous task, under great discouragements. He thus describes the well digging:

At certain seasons the natives drank very unwholesome water; and, indeed, the best water they had at any time for drinking purposes was from the precious cocoa-nut, a kind of apple of Paradise for all these Southern Isles! They also cultivate the sugar-cane very extensively, and in great variety; and they chew it, when we would fly to water for thirst, so it is to them both food and drink. The black felloe carries with him to the field, when he goes off for a day's work, four or five sticks of sugar-cane, and puts a his time comfortably enough on these. Besides, the sea being their universal bathing-place, in which they wrattle like fish, and little water, almost none, being required for cooking purposes, and none whatever for washing clothes, he lack of fresh springing water was not the dreadful trial to them that it would be to us. Yet they appreciate and rejoice in it immensely so, though the water of the green cocoa-nut is refreshing, and in appearance, taste, and color of unlike lemonade—one not filling a tumbler; and though when mothers die they feed the babies on it and on the soft white pith, and they flourish on the same; yet the natives themselves show their delight in preferring, when they can get it, the milk from the goat and the water on the well.

My household felt sadly the want of fresh water. I prepared two large casks, to be filled when the rain came. But when we attempted to do so at the water-hole near the village, the natives forbade us, fearing that our large casks could carry all the water away, and leave none for them with their so much smaller cocoa-nut bottles. This public water-hole was on the ground of two Sacred Men, who claimed the power of emptying and filling it by rain at will.

The superstitious natives gave them presents to bring the rain. If it came soon, they took all the credit for it. If not, they demanded larger gifts to satisfy their gods. Even our Aneityumese teachers said to me, when I protested that surely they could not believe such things—"It is hard to know, Missi. The water does come and go quickly. If you paid them well, they might bring the rain, and let us fill our casks!" I told them that, as followers of Jehovah, we must despise all heathen mummeries, and trust in Him and in the laws of his Creation to help us.

Aniwa, having therefore no permanent supply of fresh water, in spring or stream, or lake, I resolved, by the help of God, to sink a well near the Mission Premises, hoping that a wisdom higher than my own would guide me to the source of some blessed spring. Of the scientific conditions of such an experiment I was completely ignorant; but I counted on having to dig through earth and coral above thirty feet, and my constant fear was, that owing to our environment, the water, if water I found, could only be salt water after all my toil. Still I resolved to sink that shaft in hope, and in faith, that the Son of God would be glorified thereby.

One morning I said to the old Chief and his fellow-chief, both now earnestly inquiring about the religion of Jehovah and of Jesus—

"I am going to sink a deep well down into the earth, to see if our God will send us fresh water up from below."

They looked at me with astonishment, and said in a tone of sympathy approaching to pity, "Oh Missi! Wait till the rain comes down, and we will save all we possibly can for you."

I replied, "We may all die for lack of water. If no fresh water can be got, we may be forced to leave you."

The old Chief looked imploringly, and said, "Oh Missi! you must not leave us for that. Rain comes only from above. How could you expect our island to send up showers of rain from below?"

I told him, "Fresh water does come up springing from the earth in my land at home, and I hope to see it here also."

The old Chief grew more tender in his tones, and cried, "Oh Missi, your head is going wrong; you are losing something, or you would not talk wild like that! Don't let our people hear you talking about going down into the earth for rain, or they will never listen to your word or believe you again."

But I started upon my hazardous job, selecting a spot near the Mission Station and close to the public path, that my prospective well might be useful to all. I began to dig, with pick and spade and bucket at hand, an American axe for a hammer and crow-bar, and a ladder for service by-and-by. The good old Chief now told off his men in relays to watch me, lest I should attempt to take my own life, or do anything outrageous, saying—

"Poor Missi! That's the way with all who go mad. There's no driving of a notion out of their heads. We must just watch him now. He will find it harder to work with pick and spade than with his pen, and when he's tired we'll persuade him to give it up."

I did get exhausted sooner than I expected, toiling under that tropical sun; but we never own before the natives that we are beaten, so I went into the house and filled my vest pocket with large beautiful English made fish-hooks. These are very tempting to the young men, as compared with their own, skillfully made though they be out of shell, and serving their purposes wonderfully. Holding up a large hook, I cried, "One of these to every man who fills and turns over three buckets out of this hole!"

A rush was made to get the first turn, and back again for another and another. I kept those on one side who had got a turn, till all the rest in order had a chance, and bucket after bucket was filled and emptied rapidly. Still the shaft seemed to lower very slowly, while my fish-hooks were disappearing very quickly. I was constantly there, and took the heavy share of everything, and was thankful, one evening, to find that we had cleared more than twelve feet deep, when lo! next morning, one side had rushed in, and our work was all undone.

The old Chief and his best men now came around me more earnestly than ever. He remonstrated with me very gravely. He assured me for the fiftieth time that rain would never be seen coming up through the earth on Aniwa.

"Now," said he, "had you been in that hole last night, you would have been buried, and a man-of-war would have come from Queen Toria to ask for the Missi that lived here. We would say, 'Down in that hole.' The captain would ask, 'Who killed him and put him down there?' We would have to say, 'He went down to see himself!' The captain would answer, 'Nonsense! who ever heard of a white man going down into the earth to bury himself? You killed him, you put him there; don't hide your bad conduct with lies!' Then he would bring out his big guns and shoot us, and destroy our island in revenge. You are making your own grave, Missi, and you will make ours too. Give up this mad freak, for no rain will be found by going downwards on Aniwa. Besides, all your fish-hooks cannot tempt my men again to enter that hole; they don't want to be buried with you. Will you not give it up now?"

I said all that I could to quiet his fears, explained to them that this falling-in had happened by my neglect of precautions, and finally made known that by the help of my God, even without all other help, I meant to persevere.

Steeping my poor brains over the problem, I became an extemporized engineer. Two trees were searched for, with branches on opposite sides, capable of sustaining a cross-tree betwixt them. I sank them on each side firmly into the ground, passed the beam across them over the centre of the shaft, fastened thereon a rude home-made pulley and block, passed a rope over the wheel, and swung my largest bucket to the end of it. Thus equipped, I began once more sinking away at the well, but at so wide an angle that the sides might not again fall in. Not a native, however, would enter that hole, and I had to pick and dig away till I was utterly exhausted.

But a teacher, in whom I had confidence, took charge above, managing to hire them with axes, knives, etc., to seize the end of the rope and walk along the ground pulling it till the bucket rose to the surface, and then he himself swung it aside, emptied it, and lowered it down again. I rang a little bell which I had with me, when the bucket was loaded, and that was the signal for my brave helpers to pull the rope. And thus I toiled on from day to day, my heart almost sinking sometimes with the sinking of the well, till we reached a depth of about thirty feet. And the phrase, "living water," "living water," kept chiming through my soul like music from God, as I dug and hammered away!

At this depth the earth and coral began to be soaked with damp. I felt that we were nearing water. My soul had a faith that God would open a spring for us; but side by side with this faith was a strange terror that the water would be salt. So perplexing and mixed are even the highest experiences of the soul; the rose-flower of a perfect faith, set round and round with prickly thorns. One evening I said to the old Chief—

"I think that Jehovah God will give us water to-morrow from that hole!"

The Chief said, "No, Miss; you will never see rain coming up from the earth on this island. We wonder what is to be the end of this mad work of yours. We expect daily, if you reach water, to see you drop through into the sea, and the sharks will eat you! That will be the end of it, death to you, and danger to us all."

I still answered, "Come to-morrow. I hope and believe that Jehovah God will send you the rain water up through the earth." At the moment I knew I was risking much, and probably incurring sorrowful consequences, had no water been given; but I had faith that the Lord was leading me on, and I knew that I sought his glory, not my own.

Next morning I went down again at daybreak and sank a narrow hole in the centre about two feet deep. The perspiration broke over me with uncontrollable excitement, and I trembled through every limb, when the water rushed up and began to fill the hole. Muddy though it was, I eagerly tasted it, and the little "tinny" dropped from my hand with sheer joy, and I almost fell upon my knees in that muddy bottom to praise the Lord. It was water! It was fresh water! It was living water from Jehovah's well! True, it was a little brackish, but nothing to speak of, and no spring in the desert, cooling the parched lips of a fevered pilgrim, ever appeared more worthy of being called a Well of God than did that water to me.

The chiefs had assembled with their men near by. They waited on in eager expectancy. It was a rehearsal, in a small way, of the Israelites coming round, while Moses struck the rock and called for water. By-and-by, when I had praised the Lord, and my excitement was a little calmed, the mud being also greatly settled, I filled a jug, which I had taken down empty in the sight of them all, and ascending to the top called for them to come and see the rain which Jehovah God had given us through the well. They closed around me in haste, and gazed on it in superstitious fear. The old Chief shook it to see if it would spill, and then touched it to see if it felt like water. At last he tasted it, and rolling it in his mouth with joy for a moment, he swallowed it, and shouted "Rain, rain, yes it is rain! But how did you get it?"

I repeated, "Jehovah, my God, gave it out of his own earth in answer to our labors and prayers. Go and see it springing up for yourselves."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Across Thibet.

BY GABRIEL BONVALOT.

The author of this book is a Frenchman who had before travelled in Asia; and in the summer of 1889, accompanied by the young Prince Henry of Orleans, left Paris to perform an overland journey to Tonquin. The route he sketched for himself was, after leaving Siberia, to cross Chinese Turkestan, the higher table lands of Thibet, and the valleys of the great rivers of China and the Indo-Chinese peninsula. It was a difficult undertaking, for much of the way was unknown to Europeans, the travellers were compelled to carry provisions and everything needed with them through an inhospitable country, over high and difficult mountain passes, and among a people who looked with jealousy on all strangers. Thibet is indeed forbidden ground. And the measure of success that Bonvalot attained, he attributed in part to the fact that he had not applied to the Chinese government for passports. For, although these would have been granted, the Mandarins, made aware of his plans, would have sent orders to the governors of the provinces to hinder his progress and turn him back.

The caravan was organized on the frontier of Siberia, and on the 12th of Ninth Month, they left Kuldja and commenced their march. The loads were carried by camels, and the travellers rode on horses. On reaching Kourla, they made a number of purchases in preparation for the Thibetan part of their journey, and hired twenty-two camels to carry their purchases. Among them were 4,600 Russian pounds of bread, done down in fat and salt, made up into small cakes about as thick as the finger, and as broad as the palm of a man's hand. There were also 520 pounds of the best flour; 280 pounds of mutton, salted and done up in skins; 160 pounds of small raisins, very delicate in flavor, with no pipes, which will be mixed with rice, and only distributed later, when the cold, salt meat, forced narches and great altitude have brought about a state of weakness like scurvy; eighty pounds of Sesamum oil for hasty puddings; tobacco, bags, pieces of felt, and 6,000 pounds of barley for the horses.

Lob Nor, a lake in the desert, which had been previously visited by travellers, was the end of the first section of the journey. It is formed by a river which rises far to the west in the mountains of Kashmir and Kamir, and here loses itself, as so many other streams do, in the sands of the great Gobi desert. The course thus far was in a southeast direction.

Before leaving Kourla, they were shown an order by one of the Chinese Mandarins, directing that they should retrace their steps. To this they replied, that when ready they would load their beasts and start on their journey, that they were not evil-doers and did harm to no one, and ought to have the same privileges as common traders.

They found Lob Nor in apparently a dwindling condition, the waters being confined to much narrower limits than it once occupied.

It is probable that its size varies with the seasons, and the varying amount of water brought into it by the river Tamir, which feeds it.

One of the interesting things in that vicinity is the existence of a species of wild camel, which must be able to endure a low temperature, as our travellers, who were there in the Eleventh Month, speak of the thermometer being but little above Zero.

Bonvalot had in his mind a remark made by Carey, an English traveller, that he had heard the natives speak of a southern route leading to Lhassa, the capital of Thibet. He made many inquiries, without being able to gain any definite information, but decided to venture without a guide, in hopes of falling in with some traces of previous caravans. The route lay through mountain passes into the high table lands, where the winter cold was very intense. Some of these passes were very difficult, so that at times they were compelled to hoist up the camels, and to carry all the baggage. Several of the men suffered from mountain sickness.

"At night," he says, "we could hear the men moving about and sitting up to relieve the oppression of the chest, while others vomited, and there was a long succession of groans and complaints." As they began to descend the next day, the mountain sickness decreased, and a difference in altitude of a few hundred yards sufficed to restore those who had been unwell. As water was scarce on these highlands, they were compelled often to carry ice with them, the melting of which furnished them with that indispensable article of food.

Under date of 13th of Twelfth Month, our author describes the parting with some men from the neighborhood of Lob Nor, who had accompanied them on their way, and now wished to return:

"When all is ready they sit round in a circle, the Lobis pouring out the tea themselves and handing round the cups; then they get up, and our men load Abdullah Ousta with small packages, and charge him to give them to father, brother, wife, friend or master, as the case may be. Then they stand motionless, old Abdullah recites a prayer, and they all exclaim, 'Allah is great!' lifting their hands to their beards as they do so. They kiss one another with tears in their eyes, and Timour commits his wife to the care of Tokta, who is to bid her, 'have patience, not leave the house, or go and live with some one else. I will come back with money for her.'

"Allah is great!" exclaims Timour once more, and the others repeat it in chorus with him. They go down on their knees to us, and we shake them by the hand and thank them, begging them to retain kindly recollections of us. They wish us a safe journey and commit us to the care of Allah. They are all of them more or less affected, and if the tears in the eyes of some of them do not trickle down, it is only because the cold congeals them. And so we part."

On the 19th of Twelfth Month, the horses which had been picketed out to graze wandered off in search of water; and one of the men who went in pursuit remained out all night. As the thermometer during the night registered 25° below Zero, his companions became quite uneasy about him, but he returned the next day apparently uninjured. In describing his adventure, he said that he caught sight of the first horse about three in the afternoon. "I gradually caught them all, and as I caught them I hobbled them with their halters. Despite the orilliance of the stars. I could not find the camp, so I tied the horses together, and slept leaning against one of them which had lain down. This warmed me a little, but it was bitterly cold."

Of the effect of the rigorous climate Bonvalot remarks: "At each step one takes it becomes clear that this is not a country in which it would be possible to live, for the solitude is too great, and the cold too intense. Most of our men are coughing during the night, and everything gets so dry that our toe and finger nails snap off at the least touch, while wood breaks like glass. The beard does not grow but loses its color, the hands chap, the skin cracks, the lips swell. None of us escape the mountain sickness, to combat which great energy is required, for it saps all one's strength."

They were travelling in this part of the journey at elevations of from 16,000 to 20,000 feet. One of the inconveniences attending their elevation was that water boiled at so low a temperature that it was impossible to cook the rice they carried with them. The meat did not cook much better; it was frozen so hard that when they wanted to put a piece in the pot they had to chop it off as if it were a piece of wood, while the fat they eat for butter was as hard as a stone, and might be used as a projectile.

Several of their camels and horses and two of the men succumbed to the hardships of the journey. It was not until the 31st of the First Month, 1890, that they came upon any of the people of Tibet. This was very cheering to the caravan, who had so long been traversing an uninhabited desert.

Although within a few days' march of Lhasa, the sacred city of Tibet, both men and animals were so exhausted by their journey, that they were quite dependent on the Tibetans for assistance. The authorities at first demanded that they should return by the route by which they had come. This they positively refused to do, insisting that they should be helped on their way to Batang, whence they could travel southward to Tonquin, and come among their own countrymen. To this the chiefs at last consented, and supplied them with yaks, the native beast of burden, to carry their baggage, and horses for their own use.

The Tibetans are a pastoral people, raising yaks, cows, sheep and goats—on the milk and flesh of these animals they subsist in large part. The women smear their faces with butter, the butter catches the smoke and dust, and as they never wash, becomes a regular mask of soot. This probably protects their faces against the biting winds.

The religion of the country is a form of Buddhism. Buddha is believed to be incarnate in the person of the Talai Lama, who is at the head of both the religious and political power of the State. His position is very similar to that of the medieval popes. The number of priests (lamas) is astonishing; there being 18,000 in Lhasa alone; and numerous populous monasteries in other parts of the country, of course superstition is very prevalent. One of the most striking illustrations of this is the frequent use of prayer wheels, turned by hand or by wind power. The misguided people think the turning of these wheels, on which prayers are written, counts for as much in the eyes of heaven, as if they had uttered the same with the tongue, which in one sense is true, for neither could be of any avail, unless prompted by the feelings of the heart. Bonvalot says of one of the Lamas-houses, "Beneath a gallery running almost entirely round the house are enormous bobbins composed of printed prayers. These bobbins are turned by hand, and as it is said that each is composed of 10,000 prayers, and as there are at least 100 of them, it is easy to see what an enormous quantity of prayers can be said in a walk around the building."

Near Batang they found a company of French missionaries. Their collections of curiosities were taken in charge by an English naturalist, who conveyed them down the waters of the great Yan-see-Kiang River, so that they finally reached France in safety. The travellers had an easy passage by boat on the Red River to Tonquin, and after their many perils and adventures reached their home.

Ministry.

"Till I come give attention to reading, to exhortation, and to doctrine."

This was the injunction of the Apostle Paul to Timothy, his son, in the faith. The primary meaning of doctrine is teaching, and as a teacher Jesus stands pre-eminent, for he taught as never man taught. And if ministers in the church are derelict in teaching things which they should, there will not be wanting those who will teach things which they ought not. By means of good teaching good principles are exhibited, and from these we may expect the fruit of good deeds, as the same apostle says, "by doing this thou shalt both save thyself and them that hear thee." It is foretold that there would be a time in the Christian church when they would heap to themselves teachers and would not endure sound doctrine. Such are they who love the things of this world, and walk not in the way of the cross to the follies, the pleasures and vain delights of the sons of men; and walking in the way of uncrucified lusts and pleasures choose for teachers those who will palliate their conduct, and, not reprove them for their disobedience to the law of God. But the true servant of Christ, not looking for his own gain, honor, emolument, but the honor alone of his Divine master seeks not to please men but God, who trieth the hearts, and speaketh the mind of the spirit, for "if any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God." To such teaching the spirit witnesseth in the hearts of the hearers, and receiving it by faith, they are baptized by the spirit, for "he that ministereth to you the spirit, doeth it by the works of the law or by the hearing of faith?"

The great promise of the new dispensation is that "they shall all be taught of God," but this does not preclude the proper exercise of the Christian ministry, but all being thus taught and abiding under the anointing, all have a right as "wise men to judge what is said," since it is not as men they judge but as being themselves spiritually minded. Again, in the prophecy of Joel, regarding the spiritual blessings of these gospel days the Lord says, "I will pour out of my spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy * * * and in the preceding verse 'ye shall know that I am in the midst of Israel, and that I am the Lord your God, and none else.'" See Joel 1: 27, 28. The Apostle Peter speaking by the inspiration of this same spirit of promise, on its first bountiful outpour on the day of Pentecost interprets this Scripture as being then fulfilled, and to show that it was to be the enduring privilege and glory of the Christian church throughout all ages, he affirms "For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call." See Acts i: 16-18 and 39 v.

And the Lord Jesus himself again and again reaffirmed this crowning promise; "When the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of Truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me: and ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning," and again, "Lo I am with you always even to the end of the world." The same Lord who condescended to manifest his presence by a visible glory in the outward tabernacle and temple at Jerusalem, is now none the less present, and known and felt amongst such as are true Israelites indeed, for "they are the temple of God, and God dwelleth in them." No more doth he recognise an outward temple made by hands but He buildeth up, as with living stones, such as are sanctified by his grace that they may be a holy temple unto the Lord, wherein holy, spiritual sacrifices may be offered, acceptable to God through the one mediator, the Lord Jesus Christ.

And as Jesus the Anointed One received the Holy Spirit, without measure, and so taught, God's covenant with Christ and his people is by Him even now fulfilled wherein He says, "My spirit that is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and forever. Is. xlii: 21.

And it was the Spirit of Christ which was in the prophets of old that enabled them to minister to us the things they left on record, but their writings now extant, and the number whose names are in the Holy Writ, formed but a fraction of those by whom God instructed his people, for we read of "schools of the prophets." And we read that they spake when "the spirit of God came upon them." II Chron. xxiv. 20: xv. 1. And that this declaration of the mind and will of God, and of the character and attributes of the Deity, under the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit is not abolished but (under the Christian dispensation) more generally diffused the world over, so that all Gentiles are partakers of the blessing. The Apostle Paul defines prophesying as "speaking unto men to edification, exhortation, and comfort" and our Lord himself says of the Holy Spirit that "he shall tell you things to come." These ends are identical with that of the Holy Scripture itself, which was so given, but from hence it does not necessarily follow that all have the same measure and power of the spirit, but "he that ascended on high gave gifts unto men" according to the measure of his grace, and these gifts are to be exercised under the immediate supervision of the Great Head of the Church who hath declared "where two or three are gathered together in my name there am I in the midst of them." Neither do we assume that the communications of all or any ministers are of equal authority with the Holy Scriptures nor would it be right to compare ourselves or our gifts one with another, as none of the prophets ever did, and since it is the spirit that quickeneth and not the letter, the virtue of the communications lieth in the spirit of Christ which directs all in all ages, for the letter without the spirit killeth, and this spirit of prophecy is not given for the glory of man but for that of God and the salvation and comfort of men. And that there are those in the church who in these days receive certain gifts is certain, and when the Apostle says, "Ye may all speak one by one" he is speaking more particularly of those recognised by the church as thus gifted, when he says, "let the prophets speak two or three and let the other judge," but this doth not exclude any member, male or female, upon whom such a duty may fall to speak a word, but none should dare to speak unless they do it in the fear of God believing it to be laid upon them, for any, that speak from their own mind and not the Lord's, put themselves on a par with the false prophets of old, of whom it was said "Who hath required this at your hands?" Such discourses tend not to build up a church on the true foundation, and are out of the true gospel order, of which God is the author, and if persisted in, will bring poverty of spirit to both speaker and hearers. By this we would not by any means curtail any true exercise, that any should withhold more than is meet, for that also tendeth to poverty, and to him that is faithful in little, more will be given. The Lord Jesus who ever liveth hath all power in heaven and in earth given to Him is now able to feed a great multitude with a few words from an obscure member, as he was to feed the multitude with the five loaves and few small fishes, brought by the lad, neither is it the splendor of the gift that carries weight in the balance of the sanctuary, but the altar sanctifieth the gift, the two mites of the widow being accounted of more value than all the offerings of the rich.

"As every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God. If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God; if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth; that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen." I Peter iv: 10-11. And the Saviour's command to his Apostles coincides with his servant Peter's admonition, "Freely ye have received, freely give." From such passages we learn that the main duty of a minister as such, is to speak all and that only which the Lord shall command him to speak, the ability, the utterance, and the accompanying converting power of the spirit, are all promised and should ought else be spoken they cannot be but feigned words that turn away from the truth. The custom of the teaching priest amongst the Jews was to officiate in the temple in the abode of God's presence, and when commissioned, to go forth to the people, who awaited the message in silence, e. g. Zacharias, see Luke i: 21-22, so saith the Apostle Peter, "let him speak as the oracles of God."

This indwelling presence of Christ as the crowning glory of his church, as the Head of all, the divine director of the heavenly order of worship, their Great High Priest who ever liveth to officiate in the sanctuary not made with hands, as the ruler, governor, and king of his people, as their leader and commander, who leads and guides into all truth, and the fulfilment of his promise that He would make himself manifest to his disciples and not to the world, is that which truly constitutes Him to be the one true foundation of his church the same on which the apostles and prophets were built. And "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his," for they are the Sons of God, who are led by the spirit of God" and it is more especially when we come together to worship God who is a spirit, in the spirit of his dear Son, that it is awfully incumbent on us that we are so led, and that we do not offer service kiddled from sparks from our carnal minds. Such as the latter was the prayer of the Pharisee who went up into the temple, but the omniscient judge of all mankind hath left us here a lesson, that the heart of man knoweth not its own real needs how much less those of others. It is the Spirit of God that searches the heart, that knoweth our needs, and that maketh prevailing intercession for us, because that He doeth it according to the will of God, and these prayers of the spirit may alone find utterance in sighs, or groans, or the downcast eye of him who is afar off crying in the secret of his soul, "God be merciful to me a sinner." Yes these are they who return to their homes with the inward witness that it is God who hath justified them, and they can pursue their way, even though it be a thorny one, with rejoicing:

THE STORY OF GRUMBLE TONE.

BY ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

There was a boy named Grumble Tone, who ran away to sea.

"I'm sick of things on land," he said, "as sick as I can be!
A life upon the bounding wave will suit a lad like me!"

The seething ocean billows failed to stimulate his mirth,
For he did not like the vessel, nor the dizzy, rolling berth,
And he thought the sea was almost as unpleasant as the earth.

He wandered into foreign lands, he saw each wondrous sight,
But nothing that he heard or saw seemed just exactly right,
And so he journeyed on and on, still seeking for delight.

He talked with kings and ladies fair, he dined in courts, they say,
But always found the people dull, and longed to get away
To search for that mysterious land where he should like to stay.

He wandered over all the world, his hair grew white as snow,
He reached that final hour at last, where all of us must go,
But never found the land he sought. The reason would you know?

The reason was that, north or south, where'er his steps were bent,
On land or sea, in court or hall, he found but discontent;
For he took his disposition with him everywhere he went.

TWO MEN.

Two men toiled side by side from sun to sun,
And both were poor;
Both sat with children when the day was done
About their door!

One saw the beautiful in crimson cloud
And shining moon;
The other, with his head in sadness bowed,
Made night of noon.

One loved each tree and flower and singing-bird
On mount or plain;
No music in the soul of one was stirred
By leaf or rain.

One saw the good in every fellow-man,
And hoped the best;
The other marvelled at his Master's plan,
And doubt confessed.

One, having heaven above and heaven below,
Was satisfied;
The other, discontented, lived in woe,
And hopeless died.

A SEAWEED ON DECK IN MID-OCEAN.

BY CLIFFORD LANIER.

Brave langle, color-glinting weed,
Thou stayest not our huge ship's speed
One little whit. Thine atom's need,
We heed it not.
Could not Leviathan's vast greed
Spare thee one spot?

Fierce winter gales thy cradle shook,
Within some isle-sequestered nook;
Thine ancestors there refuge took
Against the storm,
The parent safe from alien look
Thee nested warm.

Did thy forbears Columbus know,
When that discoverer long ago,
Solemn with prophecy of woe,
His deck did pace—
Whose caravels and pinnace slow
Sargasso trace?

Mayhap thy scaped De Soto's keel,
Whose enterprise of sword and steel
Is brave with hopes his Spaniards feel
Of empires grand,
Yet desperate for food or weal
(Hidalgo band)!

Or did they look on Wesley born
To haste his fate, yet none forlorn,
For still delays Conversion's dawn?
And Ogletheer,
Who quits with store of oil and corn
His easeful dorp

To found asylums in the west
For debtors and all sore-oppressed?
Ye, fervid zeal, good English breast!
Ye loved 'e'en weeds:
Your very heart-throbs beat and pressed
For human needs!

How long, thou tiny lichen, thou
Sea-alga tossed above our prow
And rudely kept by strangers now
From out thy home,
Hast known Time's furrowing ocean-plow
Divide the foam?

What jetsam, flotsam, of sad wreck,
That lately graced some freighted deck
Of souls who danger little reck
As even we,
Hast thou seen sorrowful, weedy speak—
Lost, tossed at sea?

Wood masses tame ken not the strife,
The warfare waged for merely life,
Wherewith thy battle here is ripe
'Mid wind and wale:
Their days are joys of folk house-wife
From birth to grave.

Thine is the warrior-martyr's fate,
To bleedling fall without the gate
Of Israel, die, and, with no date
On sandy tomb,
To lie, and to the ages prate
Of war's sad doom.

Such would he be, if this meagre art
Thine only record were. Thy heart
Be comforted! A better part
May yet befall.
Impaled upon an expert's dart
Against the wall

In some museum's richest niche,
Thou shalt high lore of science teach,
And secrets of huge ocean preach—
Gain out of loss!
Beyond the heaven, thou yet shalt reach,
Of weed or moss.

MONTGOMERY, ALA.

In all religious performances and meetings, silence is better than words without life; for Divine life is the crown of all religious assemblies.

For "THE FRIEND."

William Ridgway.

BY WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

Fifty and seventy-five years ago, Burlington, New Jersey, was a centre and stronghold of Quakerism in this country. The meeting held there was large and strong in every sense. Among the heads of the meeting were men not only possessed of deep religious experience and spiritual gifts, but they were leaders in the community in which their lot was cast. Some were striking examples of the fact that good natural abilities and material wealth, when combined with true piety, can lend dignity and valiant service to the cause of Christ. The type of Friendliness which they represented is happily not altogether a thing of the past. Let us recollect that it is practicable for us to perpetuate it by attention to the Light that they permitted to guide them, and by loving the Truth as they loved it. What memories cling to the honored names of Grellet, Smith, Mott, Ridgway, Thomas, and many other residents of Burlington, during the first half of this century! They now rest from their labors; and it is for us to seek to emulate their honorable example.

The subject of this little history, William Ridgway, was an interesting character. Born in excellent circumstances, he when a boy ran away to sea, and for many years lived a wayward life, almost entirely unrestrained by religious thought or feeling. He endured many hardships, and met with strange adventures by sea and land; many of which will be depicted in this narrative. He was master of a vessel when young in years, for he possessed excellent ability. As years progressed, afflictions and attention to the voice of the merciful God who still followed him, induced him to settle in Burlington, and there enter into business. In course of time he became a prosperous and prominent citizen. Not long after his entering a religious life, a gift in the ministry of the Gospel was conferred upon him, and he was for many years engaged to tell others of the heavenly mercy, and invite them to forsake worldliness for the humbler paths of peace.

This sketch is largely made up of memorandums written out by him when in his seventieth year; and he in a pleasing style tells of some of the remarkable events in the early part of his experiences. He says they were written for the benefit of "my children and posterity, if happily their attention may be fixed on that all-preserving principle that has been as a lamp to my feet, and when I have faithfully followed and depended upon it, has led me safely, and preserved me."

William Ridgway was born in the year 1755, in Burlington County, N. J. His parents were both members of the Society of Friends; his father being an overseer of their meeting, and his mother was a pious woman. His father was extensively engaged in farming, and employed a large number of work-people. He remarks, that "it often happened that some of these were of loose, immoral character, and as I was growing up I was often put to work with such; my mind was often contaminated with many unprofitable and corrupting things, which my pious mother observing, became very desirous that I might be placed out an apprentice in some religious and well-regulated family. After a time I was placed apprentice to John Hoskins, about the seventeenth year of my age, to learn the tanning business. My master was very strict with his apprentices, and for a time I was kept in moderate bounds; but my natural disposition to levity led me to seek new acquaintances of the same cast as myself. I began to resume my former habits of libertinism; associates were not wanting to prompt me on.

"About this time one remarkable occurrence took place. I dreamed one night that I was taken extremely ill, and that a doctor was called in, who bled and blistered me, but without affording me any relief, and that I continued to grow worse, and the family despaired of my recovery, and that my parents were sent for, and that I saw them weeping around my bed, and thought I saw Lucifer at the foot of my bed, presenting the most horrible and frightful appearance that it is possible to conceive, waiting, when the last breath was gone, to take possession of me. This horrible appearance awoke me, and the agony I was in remained the rest of the night, and did not wear off for several days; however it gradually went off, and that night, one week after, I awoke out of my sleep with a violent pain in my side. The family endeavored to relieve me, and having done all they could without effect, the same doctor was called in that I had seen in my dream. He also bled and blistered me, and pronounced it a violent attack of pleurisy; my parents were also sent for and came, and for a time there was but little hope of my recovery. All had come to pass exactly as I had dreamed thus far, and now I began to think of the remaining part, of the dreadful image of the wicked one; this led me to supplicate Him who hath all power that He would be pleased to preserve me from the jaws of this fell dragon, and in his boundless mercy He was pleased to hear my cry, and restore me to health again. Notwithstanding this remarkable visitation and preservation, after a time the impressions then made, began to wear off, and old habits to acquire strength and grow upon me; so that my master often had occasion to reprove me." Finally his master, finding that proof was of no avail, in accordance with the custom of the time, attempted to correct him. This he would not submit to, and resisted. As a consequence of this trouble, he left the tanning business and returned to his father's home in the country.

But country life soon became tiresome to him. He longed for more activity and liberty. There had been working on his father's place a man who had been a sailor, but who having been shipwrecked on the Jersey coast, had been hired to work on the farm. This sailor often entertained them with strange stories that extolled the pleasures, not the sorrows, of a sailor's life. William Ridgway had created within him a great desire to go to sea; but his anxious mother would not give her consent. He says: "My retired situation in the country becoming wearisome to me, and my libertine and roving disposition increasing, I concluded to leave my parents and try my fortune upon the ocean. In the nineteenth year of my age I sat out privately in the night; went to Philadelphia, and from thence to Baltimore, where I first shipped myself on board a coasting vessel bound to North Carolina, where we arrived safely; there I left this vessel, and went on board a vessel bound to Vigo, in old Spain; where, after a very long and boisterous passage, we arrived. Our vessel having sprung a leak soon after we were out to sea, required one pump to be kept going; and I being a raw hand and a surly youth, it was my lot to have a large share of this labor. So wearied and exhausted was I at times, that I have actually dropped down at the pump for want of sleep. Some may suppose that this was enough to cure my roving disposition. It is true my thoughts were often turned towards my father's house; and my heart was often tendered when I thought of my dear, pious mother, whom I had reason to believe had shed many tears for me in my absence."

After arriving at Vigo, they found the market unsatisfactory, so that the captain decided to proceed to Lisbon. The beautiful scenery along the coasts of Spain and Portugal excited his admiration. Meanwhile his hardships and sufferings had made him desirous of getting home. There was in Lisbon at that time the brig Rachel, of Philadelphia. It was owned by James Pemberton, of the latter city, who was a large shipping merchant in his day, and a prominent member of the Society of Friends. Ridgway prevailed upon his captain to release him; and then secured a passage home on the Rachel, upon condition that he would do duty without wages. So under these rather humiliating circumstances he reached Philadelphia. His parents were glad enough to welcome back their wandering son, and, doubtless wisely, received him with but little reproof.

He now returned to farming, but was not cured of the disposition to rove. He accordingly, this time with the knowledge of his parents, shipped as a common sailor on the sloop Rising Sun, commanded by Captain Wills, and bound for St. Eustatia, in the West Indies. This voyage was made in safety, but they narrowly escaped capture by a British cruiser. The revolutionary war was then commencing, and his father finding him still inclined to a seafaring life, proposed his studying the art of navigation. He spent four weeks at this occupation; and again shipped as a common sailor on the Rising Sun. Although only supplied with a smattering of navigation, he concluded to keep a reckoning, which proved upon arrival in the West Indies to be very correct. Whilst in port, the captain and mate had a quarrel, and the latter was discharged. The captain finding that Wm. Ridgway was capable of supplying his place, promoted him; and he returned home as mate of the vessel.

By this time the British fleet had blockaded the mouth of the Delaware River, and the Philadelphia merchants were obliged to use smaller ports in connection with their enterprises. The owners of a vessel then in Egg Harbor bay, wanted a master for her, and Ridgway was recommended by his old captain, as a competent man; so was placed in command of her. He was then not quite twenty-one years of age. In those troublous times it was a risky business to attempt sailing on the North American coasts; for powerful British fleets were everywhere seeking to destroy the commerce of the revolting colonies.

IGNORANCE, how judged of often: A friend of mine, a country parson, on first going to his parish, resolved to farm his glebe for himself. A neighboring farmer kindly offered the parson to plough one of his fields. The farmer said that he would send his man John with a plough and a pair of horses on a certain day. "If ye're goin' about," said the farmer to the clergyman, "John will be unco weel pleased if ye speak to him, and say it's a fine day, or the like o'that; but dinna," said the farmer with much solemnity—"dinna say onything to him about ploughin' and sawin'; for John," he added, "is a stupid body, but he has been ploughin' and sawin' all his life, and he'll see in a minute that ye ken naething about ploughin' and sawin'; and then," said the sagacious old farmer, with extreme earnestness; "if he comes to think that ye ken naething about ploughin' and sawin'," he'll think that ye ken naething about anything!"

From the "BRITISH FRIEND."

Edward Burrough.

In 1660 he visited Friends in Ireland, leaving them in 2nd Mo., 1661, having been about six months there. In his letter to all Friends travelling in the Ministry about that time, he says, "We found things well and Truth prospering in Ireland, meetings quiet, growing; and I have been well cared for, the presence of the Lord was with me." In England again, he wrote to the king and council informing them of the views of Quakers, so that if they would persecute for conscience, they should not do it in ignorance.

In 4th Mo., 1661, this long letter is written. In it he treats of oaths, meetings for worship, tithes, security or bonds, government and persecution. Friends now were in prison for not being able as Christians to take the oath of allegiance, and they could not forbear meeting for worship. The authorities were striving to suppress what they called conventicles. Friends could not pay tithes but suffered restraint instead; they could not give bond to live peaceably, as they were often required to do, for they held that a bond was for the guilty, not for the innocent. Also, he pleads for "true liberty of conscience, as of itself strengthening the king's hands, whilst all persecution for conscience," he argues, "weakens them."

In 1662 appears his last book. "The case of the people called Quakers once more stated to the world." In reply to an Act that had just passed for "preventing mischief and dangers that may arise by certain persons called Quakers and others refusing to take lawful oaths," he argues clearly, for it appears the Friends were quick to avail themselves of the law, pleading—"It is not we who judge, but the law. Burrough brings forward other laws then in force against drunkenness and vain people, which the justices and constables pass by, but rejoice to imprison Quakers for conscience' sake. The Act ran thus: "If any maintained an oath unlawful and contrary to the Word of God, after 24th of March, 1661, and refused to take it, or endeavoured to persuade others to do so, or print or write, or otherwise maintain that the taking of oaths is unlawful, or if the Quakers after such date, go from their habitations or assemble to five or more of the ages of 16 or upwards, at one time, in one place, under pretence of worship not authorized by the law of the realm, being convicted as guilty by 12 men of such offence, a penalty not exceeding £5 shall be incurred for first offence; for second, not exceeding £10, to be levied by distress; but if not able to pay by distress, or unpaid for a week, the person convicted shall be conveyed to common goal for three months; for second, six months, with, out bail, and kept to hard labour. For a third offence shall abjure the realm, or be transported by his Majesty's order beyond the seas to his Majesty's plantations." I have quoted this Act more fully, so that we can come to some opinion as to the growth of liberty of conscience in 230 years in England; and this liberty has been gained to some extent by the imprisonment and death of many worthy, peaceable, yet firm fellow-countrymen. Such a law was a curious weapon to make men religious—to make them obedient members of the Church. How contrary is all the imprisonment following such a law to the gentle, tender breathings of our long-suffering Jesus? Does it not partake more of that life manifested amongst the outward Jews—"We have a law, and by our law they stand condemned." Such laws might inflict great hardship on innocent individuals; but as to converting such to the rulers' way of thinking they had no power. Men like the early Friends showed their faith by their continued, patient, peaceful bearing what the laws of men placed upon them, though plainly speaking of the uselessness of such laws to build any up in the Kingdom of Christ. Edward Burrough came under the lash of such a law as the one quoted, and hundreds of his way of thinking also; for prisons were filling up quickly with those of whom the world would probably say, "These people will be neither led nor driven." It was currently reported that the Quakers would soon be put down. Certainly they were put into prison, but still they grew in number. In London alone 500 were in prison. It is interesting to look into a book written by E. Burrough. He styles it "The Everlasting Gospel of Repentance, etc., etc., with certain Propositions of faith, which every one must believe, or they cannot be saved." Rather a significant title to a book in such a season.

I will give the headings of the different chapters and leave readers to form their own conclusions as to Friends' belief necessary for salvation.

1. They must be saved from sin, for it is that that bringeth wrath.
2. They must own the Light.
3. Must be born of the seed of God.
4. They must receive the Spirit and it must dwell in them.
5. They must be sanctified, cleansed, and purified.
6. They must witness Christ revealed in them.
7. They must live in the power of God and deny all forms without power.
8. They must witness the Scriptures of truth fulfilled in them.
9. They must believe in Christ and take up his cross.
10. They must come out of the apostasy and come into the life and power the apostles were in."

Such are the headings of his views of what is necessary for salvation. All pointing more or less to an inward work on the heart by the power of God.

We turn again from his writings to the closing part of his life. After visiting Friends in Bristol, in 1662, he is said to have taken an affectionate farewell of them, saying he must return to London, and that he did not know that he should see them any more, exhorting them to steadfastness in that in which they found rest. Sewel quotes him thus: "I am now going up to the city of London again to lay down my life for the gospel and suffer amongst Friends in that place." He probably returned about the beginning of 4th Mo., 1662, for not long after his return, visiting the "Bull and Mouth" meeting-house and preaching there, he was taken out by soldiers and brought before Rich. Brown, an Alderman, at the "Old Bailly," fined 20 marks or to lie in prison till paid. He finding no liberty to pay the fine went to prison, where there were 60 or 70 Friends already for various so-called offences, viz., going to meeting, not taking the oath, and such causes. Richard Hubberthorne was seized in 6th Mo., 1662, at the same "Bull and Mouth" Friends' Meeting, taken also before R. Brown and committed to Newgate, and two months after, died there. Brown was a bitter man against Friends at this time. Sewel says, "he could commit cruelty with a smiling countenance." Friends were evidently still a mark to be shot at, whether the government was a commonwealth, a committee of safety, or a monarchy; under each they were as a target for the arrows of the ruling sportsmen. Yea, even from the rulers across the Atlantic who had left Old England for conscience' sake, and strange to say the New England rulers excelled in zeal, cutting off ears, whipping with a specially made cruel whip, banishing, and hanging. In Old England the powers did not go so far as hanging. Imprisonment till death released the prisoner was the result in many cases.

A petition was sent to King Charles from the General Court at Boston by the tender conscientious ones, signed by John Endicott, the governor, in which the assembly accuse Quakers of "the common error of being open blasphemers, and that they had been obliged to banish them on pain of death, and that it was the Quakers' own contempt of authority that brought some to death." In another part of the address to King Charles, they remind him that it was because of their being unable with a clear conscience to be under the prevailing hierarchy in England that they "came out into the wilderness of New England, rather than live in England with its pleasures and impositions." What a picture for men to read! The acts of men in power, what a lesson to all who take upon themselves to rule! Know, O man, he that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of the Lord.

Burrough proved himself no coward whilst at liberty, and near the end of his life the rulers of this world had him in their control in prison. Will imprisonment shake his steadfastness? Some of his friends die in the same prison. All this shakes him not. He suffers patiently, believing in this he is submitting himself to the will of his God, prepared for it, even having had a foresight of it whilst among his Bristol friends. This champion, who was so diligent in seeking relief for his suffering friends—this man who had visited Charles II. to rouse him to a sense of his duty in putting a stop to New England barbarities in the name of the religion of Christ—now a prisoner with many like minded with himself. His spirit rises above it all. He is an upholder of the hands of his true brethren, still exhorting them to steadfastness, looking for the reward from Him who called them to the work, and not from man. The death of his friend and fellow-laborer, R. Hubberthorne, in the same prison and during his imprisonment, shakes him not; but he is ready himself, if called unto it also, to lay down his life and finish his testimony in prison sooner than mar the brightness of his love to Christ. He grows weak in body but stronger in spirit. The intimation he gave to Bristol Friends some nine months before, looks likely to be realized. Loving Friends are alive to his case; they seek for his release; they urge the King. Many know his true worth, for he has been the means of leading them to the peace their souls were searching after. For eight years this north-country man had labored zealously amongst them. Friends succeeded in obtaining a special order for his release from the King. Is he then to be amongst them again? No, the King's special order moves not the octopus of the world's religion; its many arms are even at the King's commands long in unfolding to release their victim. His release is to come from another and more powerful King than Charles. The closing scenes and words of such a man are well worthy of record, for there is so much that reminds us in history that as earth and earthly things are about to pass, good men have more clearly beheld and borne witness to eternal things. So he had to witness, saying at one time during his illness, "I have had the testimony of the Lord's love unto me from my youth and my heart hath been given up to do his will; I have preached the Gospel freely in this city, and have often given up my life for the Gospel's sake, and now, Lord, rip open my heart, and see if it be not right before Thee." And again, "There is no iniquity lies at my door, but the presence of the Lord is with me, and his life I feel justifies me."

Clear testimony this, as to what justifies him—Christ's life. He remembers Alderman Richard Brown in his illness and prays on his account—"Lord forgive Richard Brown if he may be forgiven." Again, about himself, he says, "And now my soul and spirit is centred into its own being with God, and this form of person must return from whence it was taken; and though this body of clay must return to the dust, yet I have this testimony that I have served God in my generation, and that spirit that hath lived and acted and ruled in me shall yet break forth in thousands." So Burrough though passing away, was not without hope of children like to him being raised up. George Fox when in Cambridgehire heard of Burrough's death, and wrote a short characteristic epistle to Friends in London. "Be still in quiet in your own condition, and settled in the seed of God that doth not change, that in that ye may feel dear E. Burrough among you in the seed, in which and by which he begat you to God, with whom he is; and that in the seed ye may all see and feel Him, which is the unity with Him in the life, and so enjoy Him in the life that doth not change, which is invisible. Arbitration and War.—The London Freeman remarks: "Since the Peace Society has been at work, there have been more than sixty cases of arbitration, in almost every instance condemned by military advocates, but in each preventing war, and in no case inflicting a penalty that was a fraction of what would have been the cost of a single campaign."

The aggregate national debts of eighteen European States in 1891 amount to about 5,000 million pounds sterling, the great proportion of which huge sum has been incurred, directly or indirectly, by war. The interest of these debts amounts to 250 million pounds. The cost of the existing armies and navies of Europe amounts to an additional 200 million pounds a year. The cash paid out for war during the past forty years has been estimated at £3,245,500,000. The amount is inconceivable.

"Open your Bible and put a £1,000 note on every letter from the first of Genesis to the last of Revelation, and you about pay the bill."

The great curse is the bloated Militarism. To-day there are more than twenty million soldiers in the armies of Europe. The finest manhood of the world is in the Cain business. During the past forty years two millions and a-half of men have been slaughtered in war. Most of them hurried to their eternal state in the most diabolical temper they ever fell into. Oh, it is unexpressed sad that men should be ever fured to call this glory. Or to mark otherwise that with the severest repentance, as the grossest failure, any statesmanship that can sanction a curse of so much abomination.

"Then there comes the awful fact that the root of this satanic evil has been nurtured by the professing Church of God. The tombs of warriors are placed in our churches, as though the fighters had been the most noble amongst men. The torn colors of regiments are hung up in churches to foster a military spirit among the young. And ministers of the Gospel have forgotten the angels' song and preached on the glory of war, whilst the finest hymn of the Christian Church is used as a victorious battle song."

Ex-President Hayes (U. S. A.).—There is a story told of President Hayes in connection with the appointments made to fill the vacancies in the United States army. A gentleman, distinguished in social life, was extremely anxious to have the son of a warm friend designated for one of the vacancies. He called upon the President and made known his request. "You see, Mr. President," said he, in advocating the young man's claim, "his father is a distinguished ex-army officer, his great-grandfather was a gallant soldier in the army, and his great-great-grandfather was an officer in the navy during the Revolutionary War." These points were pressed with force upon the attention of the President. All of a sudden the President said, "And this young man's father, grandfather, and even a remote grandfather, have all been officers of the United States?" "Yes," came the reply. "Well," replied the President, "don't you think it about time that some one in that family earned a living for himself?"

Effect of Intemperance.—A man who obviously gave a false name when called up for sentence was found unconscious with drink, covered with mud, and taken to the Thirtieth Street station-house of this city in a hand-cart by two policemen. After he had left the cell the keeper found the following epigraph on the whitewashed wall written with a trembling hand:

"In this cell was confined a man who spent his time in idleness, corruption, and vice—a warning to himself and all mankind. Born a gentleman, he will probably die a rowdy."

This is an epitome of many a life.

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 14, 1892.

The Society of Friends have ever placed a high value on the Scriptures of Truth, believing, as they themselves assert, that "Holy men of old wrote them as they were moved by the Holy Ghost;" but they have never given to them that exclusive claim to authority, which most Protestant denominations ascribe to them. While Friends have been willing at all times to submit their doctrines and testimonies to the test of Scripture, as an outward standard agreed upon by all; and have acknowledged that no other writings are to be compared with them in divers respects, especially in the importance of the historical information they furnish us with, as well as the records they contain of the teachings of the Blessed Redeemer of mankind, and the doctrine preached by his Apostles; yet being assured that the Spirit of the Lord still visits the hearts of men, and is as able now as ever it was to reveal the truths of religion to his obedient followers, they have been careful not to undervalue his continued manifestations. Their belief has been in accordance with the Scripture declaration, that every writing inspired of God is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness. While we grant the pre-eminence of the books embraced in our Bible, we believe there are many other written declarations of holy men, as well as spoken declarations uttered under the influence of the Spirit of Christ, which are entitled to a measure of the same authority.

Edward Burrough says: "The Scripture we own in its place to be a true declaration of God, of Christ and of the saints' conditions, but they are not the Light, but Christ is the Light, as themselves bear witness; nor are they the saints' guide, but the Spirit that gave them forth, as they themselves bear testimony. He that hath the same Spirit which spoke them forth, reads them and understands them, and none else."

In a treatise written in 1656 and entitled "Truth Defended," in which E. Burrough answers certain accusations cast upon the Quakers by the teachers of the world, he boldly declares, that his "Discourse is written by the same Spirit that gave forth the Scripture." In this treatise, after pointing out the works of apostasy in the public preachers of that day, he adds: "We witness to have received according to measure, the spirit of the prophets from which they spoke, which is Christ made manifest in us, and happy are all they that receive our testimony. For by the same Spirit of Christ we do declare against these abominations now, as the holy men of God did then. For God and his Spirit is the same as ever was."

In an Answer to priest Jackson, published about three years after this treatise, he brings forth the same view—"That [they] who now speak, or are moved to write forth by the Spirit of God, they speak and write by the same Spirit that is infallible, that the Scriptures were given forth by."

The need of Divine enlightenment to comprehend the spiritual meaning of the Scriptures has ever been a point of great importance in the views of Friends. In the lively narrative of the interview of John Roberts with the Bishop of Gloucester, it is mentioned that the Bishop asked him what it was that had opened the heart of Lydia, when she attended to the preaching of the apostle. John replied that it was the key of David—and went on to say—"It is written, thou hast the key of David, which opens, and none can shut; and if thou shuttest none can open. And that is no other but the Spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ. It was the same spiritual key that opened the heart of Moses, the first penman of the Scripture, and gave him a sight of things from the beginning. It was the same spiritual key that opened the hearts of all the holy patriarchs, prophets and apostles, in ages past, who left their experience of the things of God upon record; which, if they had not done, your bishops and priests would not have had anything to make a trade of; and the same spiritual key hath, blessed be God, opened the hearts of thousands in this age; and the same spiritual key hath, in a measure, opened my heart, and given me to distinguish things that differ; and it must be the same that must open thy heart, if ever thou comest to have it truly opened."

So impressed was the Bishop with this clear testimony to the illuminating power of the Spirit, that he exclaimed, "It is the truth, the very truth. I never heard it so defined before!"

Many have experienced that as they have read the Scriptures in a serious frame of mind, with desires to be rightly instructed thereby, they have been favored with a degree of sweetness and comfort; and thus been edified and strengthened to go forward in their spiritual journey. But in the formal study of them and comparison of text with text, the attention is generally turned outward rather than inward, and the individual relies more on his intellectual attainments or the suggestions of others. To such Isaac Penington says, "Ye must come out of the knowledge and wisdom ye have gathered from the Scriptures, unto a feeling of the thing there written of, as it pleaseth the Lord to open and reveal them in the hidden man of the heart."

Holding these views, we believe it much safer and more profitable for our young people to read the Bible in the retirement of their own rooms, with minds turned to the Lord for refreshment and instruction, than to form themselves into classes for its study, and intellectual investigation.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A census bulletin just issued shows the number of dwellings in the United States to be 11,858,318, as compared with 8,555,812 in 1880, the average number of persons in a dwelling to be 4.35, as against 3.60 in 1880. Massachusetts, Rhode Island and New York are most densely peopled, having more than six persons to a dwelling.

The "act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States" was laid before the President on the 5th inst. and he had a conference with the Attorney General in regard to it. The latter examined the matter carefully and informed the President that it was a very grave question whether all the existing restrictive legislation did not expire on the 6th. In order, therefore, to avoid any possible legal complications, he will arise on that point the President affixed his signature to the bill.

On the third inst. the Postmaster General made a report to the Senate of the results of the experimental free delivery of mails in small towns. Forty-eight towns in all parts of the country were selected, and in every case the service has been highly successful. We nearly every town the increase in postal receipts was equal to the additional expense of free delivery service.

The House Committee has agreed to report favorably the bills appropriating $100,000 for the extension of free delivery in rural districts, and providing for the issue of fractional notes.

Concerning the sale of liquor on the World's Fair grounds, a Chicago dispatch says: "W. G. Carlisle, attorney of the World's Fair Board of Directors and John F. Wilson, after carefully going over the Hyde Park contract, reached the conclusion that under the present enactments no intoxicants can be sold on the Midway Plaisance, invalidating two contracts for valuable concessions which have been granted space on the Plaisance."

The Massachusetts Supreme Court has rendered a decision that patent cannot be enforced for a bill for intoxicating liquors sold and delivered in Boston, but intended to be resold in Maine. The Court holds the contract void because the seller of the liquor not only knew what use was to be made of them, but facilitated the disposition of the goods in a State where their sale is prohibited.

The Charleston News and Courier has reports from every county in South Carolina, showing that the cotton acreage has been reduced about 25 per cent, and that the acreage taken from cotton is being given to bread crops.

A high dispatch of the 9th inst. says: "It was learned to-day that the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor intends issuing a circular in a short time warning workmen to remain away from Chicago, as there are now 30,000 men walking the streets of that city. Since the World's Fair buildings were started workmen from all parts of the country have flocked to Chicago, and the result is that an army of men are idle."

A Montreal dispatch says: "The migration of French Canadians to the New England States is large. It is stated that for two months the regular trains on the Grand Trunk railway carried each week about 1,000 French Canadians to the United States."

Since last week's SUMMARY was made up, five more of the victims of the Central Theatre fire have died.

"Applegate's Carrousel" in this city, a resort of idle and dissolute young people, was burned to the ground on the 7th inst. The proprietor has pleaded guilty to keeping a disorderly house, and the court has said, "that if the carrousel is rebuilt, or any similar place is opened by the defendant, directly or indirectly, in this jurisdiction, I will send for him and sentence him on this bill. The future depends on himself. If he attends to his business, he will be sentenced for this violation of good faith; not for the future violation, but for the past."

Deaths in this city last week numbered 454; which is 24 more than during the previous week, and 20 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing, 236 were males and 218 females; 48 died of pneumonia; 46 of consumption; 38 of diseases of the heart; 21 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 20 of diphtheria; 19 of convulsions; 16 of marasmus; 14 of old age; 14 of burns and scalds; 14 of inanition; 13 of congestion of the brain; 11 of scarlet fever; 11 of Bright's disease and 10 of casualties.

W. E. Gladstone's refusal to receive an eight-hour deputation, followed by his letter to the Fabian Society, in which he evinces a lukewarm disposition toward the cause, has caused a number of remonstrances of dissatisfaction among the Radical supporters of the Liberal party. A serious quarrel is considered certain and a split in the party not easily avoidable unless Gladstone's attitude is modified so as to be more in accord with the views of the advanced wing of the party.

The Radicals have already informed the Fabians unofficially that Gladstone's letter does not voice their views. The Fabian Society represents the best element of Socialism, and its make-up is of such a character as to form a desirable addition to any party. It is socially and theoretically, not violent, type, and is socially distinguishable from Radicalism or extreme Liberalism. The Liberals are annoyed at Gladstone's apparent indifference to the interests of the party in his treatment of the whole matter.

Cummingham Graham, Socialist Member of Parliament, has been temporarily suspended from membership in consequence of another member, insulating the Speaker and defying the authority of the House. His conduct has not been approved by the Socialists.

A dispatch from London, dated the 8th inst., says: "All the indications point to the continuance of the extreme ease of the money market. In fact, the plethoric condition of the banks, and the fact that there are so loaded with deposits that they are reluctant to grant any interest on them.

A novelty in yacht building will be an aluminium vessel of thirty-two feet in length, which Wells, of Leith, has received orders to build. The boat will be of the lightest possible construction necessary."

The Belgian press declare they have discovered evidence of a most formidable conspiracy, the headquarters of which is in Liege. The conspirators, they say, are a thoroughly organized body, and their aim is to terrorize the law-abiding population by means of explosions.

It is stated that the manufacture and sale of explosives in Austria and Hungary will be made a State monopoly.

On the 5th inst. a vote of confidence in the financial programme of the present Government was defeated and the Ministry resigned.

According to the correspondent of the New York Times very genuine nervousness is felt in the governing centres of Europe over the collapse of the Italian Ministry. There could hardly be any other Parliamentary event on the Continent which would create equal interest and anxiety. It has been recognized for a long time—indeed, quite from the beginning—that the weak point in the triple alliance was the increasing difficulty Italy experienced in keeping up her monstrous armament. Outsiders see no valid reason why Italy should be so poor. In fact, magazine writers of other nations are all the while explaining to Italy a hundred and one ways in which she might become extremely prosperous. Unfortunately, for one reason or another, this recurring avalanche of good advice is always wasted. Italy continues to get poorer than ever. Every year, too, it becomes more difficult to keep the burled national docile under the towering load of taxation which is levied in order to keep the Germans in Alsace and Lorraine and the Russians on of Galicia and Bulgaria. It is not surprising that the Italian taxpayer should ask what interest he got for performing these feats at such heavy personal expense. He has at last progressed so far toward an answer as to decide that his army and navy are costing too much. Here, for the moment, the Italian statesman. No responsible Italian statesman desires to take up the task to which Rudini has proved unequal, for no one sees how it can be done.

A dispatch from Kazan says: "The overflow of the unemployed from all parts of this province is collected here and one way in which these poor people are begging the means of sustenance, and many of them are dying of starvation."

A dispatch from Warsaw of the 3d inst., says: "Out of the 38,000 Polish emigrants who went to Brazil, 1,500 are recorded as having returned. It is estimated that 1,000,000 have emigrated from Brazil to the yellow fever. The many bad reports from Brazil have diverted the stream of emigration to the United States, and this has been increased by the recent bad harvests in Poland."

Information from the northern coast of Newfoundland depicts a wretched condition of affairs there. Owing to the ravages of the yellow fever, the inhabitants were unable to gather their usual catch of fish, and during the long winter they have been on short allowance of rations. Several people have died of starvation.

Eighteen thousand women have memorialized the Dominion Parliament to be entered to vote for members of that body. Prime Minister Abbott has informed Mary McDonnell, of Toronto, the women's representative, that their request will be granted.

FRIENDS' INSTITUTE EXCURSIONS.—Excursions are planned for Seventh-days in the Fifth Month, and probably in the Sixth Month. Send names and addresses to Friends' Institute, 1305 Arch Street, for particulars.

DIED, at his home, near Smyrna, Harrison County, Ohio, on the 20th of Third Mo., 1892, HENRY BRIGGS, in the seventy-ninth year of his age, a member of Flushing Monthly and Guernsey Particular Meetings of Friends. His dear Friend was a regular attendant of meetings, when health would permit, and firmly attached to the doctrines and principles maintained by our early Friends. He often expressed grief and sorrow to see so many of our younger members depart therefrom. He had been in declining health for several years; often expressing himself as though he thought his life would be short, though he had said but little in regard to his spiritual welfare, his relatives and friends have the comforting belief that his end was peace.

He resided in Concord, Delaware County, Pa., Second Month 13th, 1892, ROBERT BURTON, aged fifty-two years, a member of Concord Monthly Meeting of Friends.

On the morning of Fifth Month 7th, 1892, at the residence of Clement E. Lloyd, in this city, SARAH LLOYD, in the eighty-fifth year of her age, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Southern District.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 257.

J. G. Paton, in his account of his well-digging at Aniva, mentions his bringing up some of the water he had reached, and showing it to the natives, and telling them to look down the well and see it for themselves. He thus continues his narrative:

Now, though every man there could climb the highest tree as swiftly and as fearlessly as a squirrel or an opossum, not one of them had courage to walk to the side and gaze down into that well. To them this was miraculous. But they were not without a resource that met the emergency. They agreed to take firm hold of each other by the hand, to place themselves in a long line, the foremost man to lean cautiously forward, gaze into the well, and then pass to the rear, and so on till all had seen "Jehovah's rain" far below. It was somewhat comical, yet far more pathetic, to stand by and watch their faces, as man after man peered down into the mystery, and then looked up at me in blank bewilderment. When all had seen it with their own very eyes, and were "weak with wonder," the old Chief exclaimed—

"Missi, wonderful, wonderful is the work of your Jehovah God! No god of Aniva ever helped us in this way. But, Missi," continued he, after a pause that looked like silent worship, "will it always rain up through the earth? or, will it come and go like the rain from the clouds?"

I told them that I believed it would always continue there for our use, as a good gift from Jehovah.

"Well, but Missi," replied the Chief, some dimming of self-interest beginning to strike his brain, "will you or your family drink it all, or shall we also have some?"

"You and all your people," I answered, "and all the people of the island may come and drink and carry away as much of it as you wish. I believe there will always be plenty for us all, and the more of it we can use the fresher it will be. That is the way with many of our Jehovah's best gifts to men, and for it and for all we raise his name."

"Then, Missi," said the Chief, "it will be our water, and we may all use it as our very own?"

"Yes," I answered, "whenever you wish it, and as much as you need, both here and at your own houses, as far as it can possibly be made to go."

The Chief looked at me eagerly, fully convinced at length that the well contained a treasure, and exclaimed, "Missi, what can we do to help you now?"

"Oh, how like is human nature all the world over! When one toils and struggles, when help is needed which many around could easily give and be the better, not the worse, for giving it, they look on in silence, or bless you with ungenerous criticism, or bad you with malicious judgment. But let them get some peep of personal advantage by helping you, or even of the empty bubble of praise for offering it, and how they rush to your aid!

But I was thankful to accept of the Chief's assistance, though rather late in the day, and I said—

"You have seen it fall in once already. If it falls again, it will conceal the rain from below which our God has given us. In order to preserve it for us and for our children in all time, we must build it round and round with great coral blocks from the bottom to the very top. I will now clear it out, and prepare the foundation for this wall of coral. Let every man and woman carry from the shore the largest blocks they can bring. It is well worth all the toils thus to preserve our great Jehovah's gift."

Scarcely were my words repeated, when they rushed to the shore, with shoutings and songs of gladness; and soon every one was seen struggling under the biggest block of coral with which he dared to tackle. They lay their limestone rocks, broken up by the hurricanes, and rolled ashore in the arms of mighty billows, and in an incredibly short time scores of them were tumbled down for my use at the mouth of the well. Having prepared a foundation, I made ready a sort of box to which every block was firmly tied and then let down to me by the pulley—a native teacher, a faithful fellow, cautiously guiding it. I received and placed each stone in its position, doing my poor best to wedge them one against the other, building circularly, and cutting them to the needed shape with my American axe. The wall is about three feet thick, and the masonry may be guaranteed to stand till the coral itself decays. I wrought incessantly, for fear of any further collapse, till I had it raised about twenty feet; and now, feeling secure, and my hands being dreadfully cut up, I intimated that I would rest a week or two, and finish the building then. But the Chief advanced and said—

"Missi, you have been strong to work. Your strength has fled. But here rest beside us; and just point out where each block is to be laid. We will lay them there, we will build them solidly behind like you. And no man will sleep till it is done."

With all their will and heart they started on the job; some carrying, some cutting and squaring the blocks, till the wall rose like magic, and a row of the hugest rocks laid round the top bound all together, and formed the mouth of the well. Women, boys and all wished to have a hand in building it, and it remains to this day, a solid wall of masonry, the circle being thirty-four feet deep, eight feet wide at the top, and six at the bottom. I floored it over with wood above all, and fixed the windlass and bucket, and there it stands as one of the greatest material blessings which the Lord has given to Aniva. It rises and falls with the tide, though a third of a mile distant from the sea; and when, after using it, we tasted the pure fresh water on board the Dnyespring, it seemed so insipid that I had to slip a little salt into my tea along with the sugar before I could enjoy it. All visitors are taken to see the well, as one of the wonders of Aniva; and an Elder of the Church said to me lately—

"But for that water, during the last two years of drought, we would all have been dead!"

Very strangely, though the natives themselves have since tried to sink six or seven wells in the most likely places near their different villages, they have either come to coral rock which they could not pierce, or found only water that was salt. And they say amongst themselves—

"Missi not only used pick and spade, but he prayed and cried to his God. We have learned to dig, but not how to pray, and therefore Jehovah will not give us the rain from below!"

The well was now finished. The place was neatly fenced in. And the old Chief said—

"Missi, now that this is the water for all, we must take care and keep it pure."
I was so thankful that all were to use it. Had we alone drawn water therefrom, they could so easily have poisoned it, as they do the fish-pools, in caverns among the rocks by the shore with their nuts and runners, and killed us all. But there was no fear, if they themselves were to use it daily. The chief continued—

"Missi, I think I could help you next Sabbath. Will you let me preach a sermon on the well?"

"Yes," I at once replied, "if you will try to bring all the people to hear you."

"Missi, I will try," he eagerly promised. The news spread like wildfire that the Chief Namakei was to be the missionary on the next day for the Worship, and the people, under great expectancy, urged each other to come and hear what he had to say.

Sabbath came round. Aniva assembled in what was for that island a great crowd. Namakei appeared dressed in shirt and kilt. He was so excited, and furnished his tomahawk about at such a rate, that it was rather lively work to be near him. I conducted short open devotions, and then called upon Namakei. He rose at once, with eye flashing wildly, and his limbs twitching with emotion. He spoke to the following effect, swinging his tomahawk to enforce every eloquent gesticulation:

"Friends of Namakei, men and women and children of Aniva, listen to my words! Since Missi came here he has talked many strange things we could not understand—things all too wonderful; and we said regarding many of them that they must be lies. White people might believe such nonsense, but we said that the black fellow knew better than to receive it. But of all his wonderful stories, we thought the strangest was about sinking down through the earth to get rain. Then we said to each other, 'The man's head is turned; he's gone mad.' But the Missi prayed on and wrought on, telling us that Jehovah God heard and saw, and that his God would give him rain. Was he mad? Has he not got the rain deep down in the earth? We mocked at him; but the water was there all the same. We have laughed at other things which the Missi told us, because we could not see them. But from this day I believe that all he tells us about his Jehovah God is true. Some days our eyes will see it. For to-day we have seen the rain from the earth."

Then, rising to a climax, first the one foot and then the other making the broken coral on the floor fly behind like a war-horse pawing the ground, he cried with great eloquence—

"My people, the people of Aniwa, the world is turned upside down since the work of Jehovah came to this land! Who ever expected to see rain coming up through the earth? It has always come from the clouds! Wonderful is the work of this Jehovah God. No god of Aniwa ever answered prayers as the Missi's God has done. Friends of Narakai, all the powers of the world could not have forced us to believe that rain could be given from the depths of the earth, if we had not seen it with our eyes, felt it and tasted it as we here do. Now, by the help of Jehovah God the Missi brought that invisible rain to view, which we never before heard of or saw, and—" (beating his hand on his breast, he exclaimed)—

"Something here in my heart tells me that the Jehovah God does exist, the Invisible One, whom we never heard of nor saw till the Missi brought Him to our knowledge. The coral has been removed, the land has been cleared away, and lo! the water rises. Invisible till this day, yet all the same it was there, though our eyes were too weak. So I, your Chief, do now firmly believe that when I die, when the bits of coral and the heaps of dust are removed which now blind my old eyes, I shall then see the Invisible Jehovah God with my soul, as Missi tells me, not less surely than I have seen the rain from the earth below. From this day, my people, I must worship the God who has opened for us the well, and who fills us with rain from below. The gods of Aniwa cannot hear, cannot help us, like the God of Missi. Henceforth I am a follower of Jehovah God. Let every man that thinks with me go now and fetch the idols of Aniwa, the gods which our fathers feared, and cast them down at Missi's feet. Let us burn and bury and destroy these things of wood and stone, and let us be taught by the Missi how to serve the God who can hear, the Jehovah who gave us the well, and who will give us every other blessing, for He sent his Son Jesus to die for us and bring us to heaven. This is what the Missi has been telling us every day since he landed on Aniwa. We laughed at him, but now we believe him. The Jehovah God has sent us rain from the earth. Why should He not also send his Son from heaven? Narakai stands up for Jehovah!"

This address, and the sinking of the well, broke, as I already said, the back of heathenism on Aniwa. That very afternoon, the old Chief and several of his people brought their idols, and cast them down at my feet beside the door of our house. Oh, the intense excitement of the weeks that followed! Company after company came to the spot, loaded with their gods of wood and stone, and piled them up in heaps, amid the tears and sobs of some, and the shoutings of others, in which was heard the oft-repeated word, "Jehovah! Jehovah!" What could be burned we cast into the flames; others we buried in pits twelve or fifteen feet deep; and some few, more likely than the rest to feel or awaken superstition, we sank far out into the deep sea. Let no heathen eyes ever gaze on them again!

DISINTEGRATION.—At first there was only a little crack in the marble coping of the temple roof. The rain fell in this, and the frost following the rain widened the crack. Dust settled in it, and by and by with a seed lodged there dropped by a bird flying over. The tiny coteledons swelled and swelled, and made the crack still wider, and as the tiny tree gained strength and size wider grew the crack, until the massive stone parted under the pressure.

It was but a thought passing through the mind, a lust for power, revenge, gold, sensual pleasure; but it came again and yet again, and was not driven out, but given lodgment. It drew to itself nourishment that it throve upon, and established itself in the heart that cherished it. When its roots had wound themselves around the secret fibers of the soul, then it sent forth branches until the whole mind was shadowed by them, and the roots spread and grew till they possessed the soil.

There is a line of the forgotten poet Young that deserves to be remembered. It runs thus:

"Guard well thy thoughts,
Our thoughts are heard in heaven."

He who habitually dwells in a region of noble and pure thought is removed from a great many temptations that beset him who lives on a lower plane. Missions do not haunt mountain tops. The dwellers on the highlands of literature, of poetry, of philosophy, are not infested by a thousand ills that plague those on the lowlands of gossip, suspicion, detraction.

In this age of books we can always find some noble and friendly hand by whose aid we can rise from sordid levels to high altitudes, and gain strength to resist the disintegrating forces that are ever lying in wait to attack us.—Selected.

HOW TO DRINK A FARM.—Bob Burdette gives this simple recipe: "My homeless friend with a chronic nose, while you are stirring up the sugar in a ten cent glass of gin, let me give you a fact to wash down with it. You may say you have longed for years for the free, independent life of the farmer, but have never been able to get money enough together to buy a farm. But that is just where you are mistaken. For some years you have been drinking a good improved farm at the rate of one hundred square feet a gulp. If you doubt this statement figure it out yourself. An acre of land contains 43,560 square feet. Estimating, for convenience, the land at $43.56 an acre, you will see that it brings the land to just one mill per square foot, one cent for ten square feet. Now pour down the fiery dose and imagine you are swallowing a strawberry-patch. Call in five of your friends and have them help you gulp down that five hundred-foot garden. Get on a prolonged spree some day, and see how long it requires to swallow pasture land enough to feed a cow. Put down that glass of gin; there is dirt in it—one hundred feet of good, rich dirt, worth $43.56 per acre"—Western Christian Advocate.

William Ridgway.

On this voyage he arrived at the West Indies in safety, but just as they reached the islands, another vessel that had accompanied them, was lost in a tremendous hurricane. He repaired the damage done to his ship, disposed of his cargo, took on board a returning one, and started for home. On the return he was almost captured by some cruisers of the enemy. The profits of this venture were very great; so the owners soon had him started on a similar voyage. But the termination of this trip was so fortunate as had been the previous one.

One morning when near the Jersey coast, daylight revealed the unwelcome fact that he was surrounded by British men-of-war. All the forenoon he tried to escape, and very likely would have done so, only that suddenly one loomed up right in the direction he was going. He was compelled to strike his colors, and surrender the crew as prisoners of war.

The ship that captured him, was the Experiment, with fifty guns, commanded by Sir James Wallace. He was transferred to her; and some time after, she in turn, fell in with the French fleet then aiding the Colonies. The Frenchmen chased the Experiment through Long Island Sound to New York; and in this escape the Experiment was the first large ship that had ever passed through the dangerous passage of Hell Gate. Upon arrival in New York he was put into a prison ship in the North River. Here a fatal fever prevailed, and many of his companions died daily. In time he also was taken with the fever; but a resident of the city who was a friend of his father's, secured permission for him to go to his house, where he in time recovered from the disease.

After being restored to health, he again shipped as Chief Mate on a vessel bound for Quebec. Twice on this trip he was nearly cast away on some desolate islands, under circumstances that in after years he would commemorate as providential interferences for his preservation. A continuance of tremendous billows day after day, carried away bowsprit masts; but finally they were able to rig out temporary masts, and run in to the West India port of Antigua, instead of New York, their original destination. They had been fifty-nine days on the wreck.

He drifted around the islands from one place to another, and was taken ill with the prevailing West India fever. When very sick with this disorder, he lay in a house, almost unnoticed by its occupants. His only resting place was on a straw mat on the floor. In this condition he was discovered by an American who knew him, and who called in a physician, and whose kind attention and assistance soon procured relief. He remarks, "Many Americans died in the West Indies about this time, and some of my particular acquaintances, but I was mercifully spared." After all these unfortunate experiences he naturally longed to again see his quiet home in New Jersey; so soon sailed for the United States, where, after some narrow escapes from his old enemies the English cruisers, he eventually landed in safety.

His father's home was like that of many another young man's, a haven of rest. But this restless young Quaker skipper was soon offered the position of master of "a very nice small schooner then lying in Tom's River. I accordingly went to sea in her. Perhaps this was the smallest vessel that ever crossed the Atlantic to the West Indies. My crew was two boys, and a man that was not a seaman. We had not been many days at sea when we were overtaken by the equinoctial gale in the gulf stream, which was perhaps the most tremendous gale, and roughest sea, that I ever experienced in all my voyages. Finding the vessel would not lay to (as sailors term it), I was obliged to send, which is keeping her before the wind. The vessel being so small, and the sea so dangerously high, I put all my crew under deck, and put the batches on them. I then lashed myself fast, so that I should not be washed overboard, and sat down on the quarter-deck, and steered my little bark before the wind. And here I may observe, that seeing no prospect of our surviving the gale, I resigned myself up, fully expecting that my grave must be in the deep. Often have I had to remember how I was enabled to do this, and the sweet calm and composure of mind I enjoyed after I had surrendered. Nevertheless, I believed it right while the vessel would be manageable, to do all I could for the preservation of our lives; and it was not long after I was forced to come to this full resignation, that I perceived the gale began to abate; and although the prospect of longer life was sweet, yet I think I have retained some taste of that sweetness which I then had in resignation."

After this storm subsided, he made the best of his way to the port of Guadaloupe. His vessel was so small that the French authorities seized the whole outfit under suspicion that he was a spy. But he was delivered from this ordeal by the testimony of some American captains who knew him, and by the clearness of his papers.

Having by this time had enough of misfortune with his tiny craft, he sold her and the cargo; and put the proceeds upon two ships, the one bound to Philadelphia, and the other to Baltimore. The vessel he was on nearly reached their destination; but head winds and heavy seas prolonged the voyage, so that provisions gave out. They then concluded to return to the West Indies, and were put on short allowance. A very little flour and water was given to each man, and a little meat was daily distributed by lot. When they had come in sight of the islands, an English sloop of war, the Rover, gave chase, and although they could have sat down and consumed all the provisions on board in fifteen minutes, they yet sought to escape. The Rover at last overtook and after firing on them compelled them to surrender. So once again William Ridgway found himself a prisoner on an English vessel. Whilst on this ship he was kept a prisoner in irons, during a battle she had with a French cruiser.

The Rover at last landed him at the island of St. Christopher's; and he once more braved the terrors of the deep and again made the then almost impracticable effort to reach his native land. The revolutionary war was at its height, and armed ships of Great Britain almost effectually blockaded all the colonial ports. He found a large ship bound for Philadelphia, which carried sixteen guns, and a large crew of armed men. The captain having been very ill and having but an indifferent set of officers, was very glad to have Captain Ridgway accompany him. All went well, until one morning when near the United States coast, they fell in with a British man-of-war, the Galette, which having a superior force and carrying twenty-six guns, soon compelled them to surrender. He remarks:

"We were well treated on board of this ship.

Whilst on board of her, she took three other armed American vessels, two of them privateers, one of which engaged the Galette for some time in a running fight. By this time our man-of-war was so filled with prisoners they had to be ironed; and the man-of-war crew to all keep arms about them, for fear of our rising; which was contemplated by the prisoners; and would have been attempted if two hours more had elapsed, before the lighthouse at Sandy Hook was seen. But after that it was given over as unsafe. We were carried into New York, and my old friend David Sprout, being now Commissary of naval prisoners, gave orders for me to have the liberty of going ashore—the others were chiefly turned over to prison ships."

Whilst a prisoner in New York, he made the acquaintance of John Hull, to whom he introduced himself as a member amongst Friends, for he was yet a Friend by birthright, if not by conviction. Hull informed his parents of his situation, and invited him to board at his own house, and kindly entertained him there for several weeks, when an exchange of prisoners between the armies took place. Being once more set at liberty, he returned home.

One would think that Captain Ridgway by this time would be anxious to give up a seafaring life, until, at least, the war was over. But he seems to have been made of stuff that knew no fear even when the odds were against him. He soon was offered the command of a vessel, and accepted. He barely cleared the coast when he ran against the Rainbow, carrying forty-six guns; was for the fourth time during the war again captured, and carried into New York, which city still was in possession of the English army. But soon after another exchange took place, and again he reached his home.

William Ridgway was by this time about thirty years of age. His life had been passed amid scenes of danger, and largely out of the reach of ordinary religious influences. He acknowledges that the gentle religion of Jesus had had no attractions for him. But suddenly his mind was changed. His eye beheld the beauty there is in holiness. The heretofore man of the world was to be transformed into a minister in the Society of Friends. How was the transition made? What were the means employed by his Saviour, to thus win the strong man, and change the ardent nature, into a zealous follower of his forgiving Lord?

The Moderate Drinker.

It is curious how a man will listen to the most elaborate arguments made by the most eminent orators in the cause of religion or temperance without being convinced of the error of his manner of living, and then at some unexpected time a few words spoken by some old friend or neighbor will do what the great orators have failed to do. A case of this kind has just come under my observation. A popular business man about forty years of age, whose principal fault consisted of his determination "to take a drink whenever I feel like it," was one of half a dozen gentlemen assembled in a social group when the subject of alcoholism came up. It was discussed in about the usual way, all the gentlemen present being teetotallers except the business man, who said, after listening to his friends telling about the harmfulness of alcohol: "Well, I take a drink whenever I feel like it, but I have no use for a man who will allow liquor in any shape to become his master, and I know hundreds of men who do the same thing without injury to themselves or to society."

"Are you certain of that last statement?" asked one of his oldest neighbors.

"Yes, I—I think—I—am," was the hesitating reply.

"Well, now let us see about it. You remember Blank, the Seventh Street merchant; and he was just that kind of a man when I first knew him. Do you remember what caused his failure?"

"Yes, excessive drinking and neglect of his business."

"That was my impression. Now, do you see that haggard-faced slouching figure creeping along on the other side of the street? You know him; he was your schoolmate, and the champion athlete of your school. Now tell me what destroyed his health and his prospects and made of him the pitiful object he now is?"

"Whiskey," answered the business man.

"You were on the committee to raise money to pay the rent for our sick neighbor, whose husband is serving a term in prison for having committed forgery, and you know all the circumstances. He started out with almost the same ideas as you now express; what was it that made him a felon and branded his innocent wife and children with disgrace?"

"It was drink that ruined him; but," becoming excited, "these men allowed liquor to become their master."

"True, and so will drink become your master, unless you stop while there is yet time."

"Impossible!" somewhat irritably.

"Come, come, don't get offended. Answer two more questions, and I am done. You say that you know hundreds of men who drink whenever they feel like it without injury to themselves or others; now, candidly, is it not from this very class of drinkers that all the confirmed drunkards come? and is it not a fact within your own personal knowledge that many of your acquaintances, paying for their drinks, use money which should go to provide for their wives and children?"

"Enough, enough, you have presented the evils of moderate drinking in an entirely new light to me, and from this time forth I shall never swallow another drop of intoxicating liquor."

To say that the gentleman who made this conversion was happy when he heard the fervent "Thank God," which the wife of this business man uttered when she heard the good news, it is almost superfluous.—Religious Herald.

SPARE time for reading, or for study, or for the doing of a special work, does not ordinarily come to one in a full half-day or an entire evening, but it is to be found in odd moments here and there, caught from the rush or pressure of duties. Hence it is that it is the busiest man who can do one thing more, and that it is the man who has but little to do who is overcrowded with a sense of his absorbing labors. Napoleon, speaking of the Austrians, after he had repeatedly beaten them in battle, with the advantage of numbers and position all on their side, said: "The Austrians are brave soldiers," but they have never learned the value of minutes." And in that saying Napoleon indicated a source of his own exceptional power. It was by the wise use of minutes that he did his greatest work in the world. The Napoleonic man in every sphere of research or of effort, is the man who has learned the value of minutes, and who uses his minutes accordingly.—Exchange.

THE WIDOW'S MITE.

SELECTED.

BY MARY BRADLEY.

Lord, who hast done all things for me,
What have I now to offer thee?
Thou knowest my daily bread is won
Only by toil from sun to sun;
Yea, that when suns are long time set,
Belated travellers look upon
The lamp that lights me, toiling yet.

Others with full hands to thy shrine
Have brought their corn and oil and wine,
Into thy treasury have paid
Their gold and silver duly weighed.
Two mites, two mites, and nothing more,
Have I, down-hearted and afraid,
To add, O Master! to thy store.

"With thou despise me, Lord, for these?"
I asked Him, trembling, on my knees;
And sweet, sweet as the sun's warm light
After chill darkness of the night,
His answer came:—"Her gift so small
Is the most precious in God's sight,
Because she freely gave her all."

Now welcome, want and poverty,
That show the grace of God to me;
And, heart, go singing—(for the word
That all thy depths to-day has stirred,
Still thrilling from the voice Divine,
Down the long ages shall be heard,
And lift up other souls than mine!)

NEW YORK CITY.

THE YEARS GOD KEEPETH.

SELECTED.

BY ROSA EVANGELINE ANGL.

O years beyond the summer sky,
Beyond the harvest moon,
What gifts within your circles lie?
What gracions, heavenly boon?

Beneath the snows of winter long,
What buds of promise swell?
Within the bappy spring-time song,
What hopes of summer dwell?

O years beyond my seeking sight,
Ye linger in God's hand;
He knows what day will bring, and night
Is day in God's dear land!

And though the shadows fall, and cling
Around my earthly way,
Yet will my heart still trustful sing,
Since God can send the day.

Do tear-drops fall for May's white bloom,
When harvest blushes red?
And who remembers winter's gloom,
When June her feast has spread?

O hidden years, or good or ill
Be what ye hold in store;
Yet will our God his word fulfil—
True this day as of yore.

Faithful from all eternity,
Shall now his promise fail?
Why should thy heart, then faithless be,
Or fear thy forehead pale?

O years beyond the summer skies,
Your burdens He will bear;
So shall I neither faint or die—
He maketh me his care.

And o'er the graves of love and hope
Shall tender blossoms creep;
And sweetly on the grass-green slope
My darlings soft shall sleep.

And faith with folded wings shall wait,
And love shall walk beside,
And Christ hath opened death's dark gate;
"I shall be satisfied!"

O unknown years, ye hold no fear,
Since love is all my own;
And day by day He grows more dear;
I cannot be alone.

Keep close your secret; I would know
Naught but the dear Christ's word;
"Fear not, for I am with thee; lo,
Let not thy heart be stirred

"By doubt or trouble; thou art mine,
Mine through all ages, sealed
With mine own blood!"—O heart, be thine
His peace, through love revealed!

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Mary Ann Kelty's Address.

The history of the Early Days of the Society of Friends as exemplifying the obedience of faith, published more than fifty years ago by Mary Ann Kelty, an English writer and not a member of our Society, concludes with an address to its members, which is well worthy of a serious perusal and thoughtful application to themselves by Friends at the present time. She says:—

And thus having ended the proposed task of exemplifying the obedience which is of faith, the labors of the writer of these pages, might perhaps conclude. But she feels that a further service is required of her, from which, however she might desire it, she cannot conscientiously be exonerated.

It is in simplicity, and as she humbly trusts, in a measure of godly sincerity, to urge upon you, who are the descendants of these witnesses of the Lord, and who profess the same principle of truth as that by which they glorified God—to consider the immense responsibility which attaches to your walk and conversation before your fellow-creatures. Let other religious professors be what they may, let their habits, whether of business or of pleasure, of public or of domestic life, manifest what spirit they will—you are called, and loudly called, to be a marked and separate people; and that not by a system of peculiarities and a rigid attachment to singularities and distinctions, in which it is obvious, that the most insincere can vie with the greatest saint; not by the most rigid faithfulness to any and all of these, will your requirements be fulfilled—but by the display of that "banner of the Lord," which your holy forefathers carried so nobly, and which they transmitted as a sacred trust to you. It is by the unfolding of this ensign, with "holiness to the Lord!" engraved on every part of it—and by being "living epistles of Christ, known and read of all men"—that you are to evince the illustrious stock from whence you are derived; illustrious in that true nobility which comes from God.

"What is it," says one of those truly illustrious ones?—"What is it to have a distinct name, or distinct meetings from the world, unless the power of the Lord be felt in your hearts, and his presence in your assemblies?" What is it indeed, but setting up a broader mark than common, for the profane scoffer at all religion, to shoot his arrows at? For what (it may, and it ought to be asked), do these distinctions denote? Is it not the profession of something deeper, something more real, more influential, more solemn, more Divine, more spiritual and interior, than the generality of religionists profess? Is it not that which your honest ancestors well called Truth? that glorious principle for which they suffered, and for which some of them were content to die? The external nature of formularies, and an adhesion to the letter of Scripture, with the aid of this and the other man's notions about such things, may greatly contribute to keep the generality of persons at ease in a low and worldly profession of Christianity. But you can find no such comfort in your mode of faith; since "one is your master, even Christ—Christ the Light of the world—Christ within, the hope of glory." He will not flatter nor deceive you—He will give you no forced or false construction of your case. If, as your professed principle directs—you come to Him and to his light in your consciences, He will show you how and where you stand; and remember, that if you do not come to Him, a your living and ever-present teacher, dwelling and speaking to you in your hearts, you do not come to that which, as it forms the glory, so it forms the life of your profession of religion. Wherein do ye differ from others? Surely in nothing but in eccentricity, it might justly be replied, if this were not your obvious distinction; that, whilst the greater part of religious professors are but gazing at the letter which describes truth; you seek after, and endeavor to walk by the powerful, internal guidance of the thing itself.

This then, is to be your glorious peculiarity—that you are men and women of Truth! Whilst many who name the name of Christ, so far from departing from iniquity, have it written in living characters upon all their transactions; whilst they are known and despised as cunning and over-reaching in commercial dealings—subtle and deceitful in daily intercourse—worsippers of money—watchers for self-advancement, and in all things proving that the advantages of this world, are the "gods many, and lords many" of their genuine devotion; whilst this, we say, is their condition—you are to be separated in heart and life, from all such defilements; casting them from you to the moles and to the bats.

Suppose it to be the degrading era, when conscience best thrives, where conscience truckles most to the corruptions of mankind; suppose the day, the awful day, be come, "when no man can buy or sell, save he that hath the mark or the name of the beast in his right hand; still, with the holy patriarch, every individual amongst you should be able to say, "my righteousness I hold fast, and will not let it go; my heart shall not approach me so long as I live."

But I feel compelled to pause, and ask if it be needful to make to you this earnest appeal—to you, whose membership is in a society, respecting which, an individual could once thus nobly testify!

"This Light," he says, "teacheth not to covet, not to desire earthly dignities or estates. Let it be looked at over England; which of us, so much as minds these things? Nay, the Lord knows, that the love of these things is daily rooted out of our hearts more and more, and we are a people whom the world cannot charge with covetousness or love of the world, wherewith all sorts of professors hitherto have been too justly charged."*

Oh, friends! if in the least measure, a mightier hand than that frail one which traces these lines, should thereby knock at the door of your hearts, and ask if all be well there; if, "in the cool of the day," that still small voice, which spoke in love and consolation to your fathers, pleads somewhat sorrowfully, and as it may be, in this wise, speaking unto you; "I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, when thou wast after me in the wilderness, in a land that was not sown—Israel was holiness unto the Lord,"—if, to this tender appeal, it might be added, "but now they are gone far from me, and have walked after vanity, and are become vain"—if such should be the case—oh, think once more—how solemn is the admonition!

No common trust was that consigned to you, no common principles—no common, notional, outside religion. It was a reality, a life, and a ministrations of life to those who received it? Where is it then?—for be assured, that God will require it on your hands?—Where is the true Gospel message that was left with you; for this was the message which was declared unto you, that "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all." If any come amongst you, seeking for the declaration of this Gospel message, do they find your ministers breaking that bread of life to hungry souls, which their predecessors in the Master's vineyard dealt out so freely? Suppose the case, that some wounded, wandering sheep, who had long gone astray in the wilderness, asking its way to the true fold, first of one birthing, and then of another, should meet, in its dire distress, with the living ministrations of one of your forefathers; which flowing as they did from the same spirit that gave forth the Scriptures, caused Scripture itself to be understood by this inquirer, as it never was before—suppose such an one—here is this, say, "Here is the ministry of Christ!—here is his true apostle telling me where to seek for my beloved! Oh, here is indeed a 'feeder of the flock'—a faithful overseer! Here I am met with bread, not with the dry, hard stones of words and notions; here I am turned to the life within—the light within—and not drawn out into a labyrinth of confused conceptions about it. Let me join myself to the people who are thus taught, and who are walking by the counsels of this living and ever-present Teacher." Suppose, I say, such an one to come into your assemblies: does he find this peculiar feature of your professed principle, and of your ancestor's ministry, distinctly exhibited, and livingly enforced? I ask again, does he find the peculiar excellence and truth of an inward revelation of Christ the light of life, a Redeemer working redemption within, which formed the unvarying and unceasing theme of the ancient Friends' labors, continually declared, its power testified to, and the way to experience it explained?—or does he find that, commonly, and with very rare exceptions, the declarations of your ministers, are as lifeless, as outward, as doctrinal, as notional, and as profitless (in so far as respects the turning persons to the living and true Redeemer and Teacher, in their own souls), as the effusions of those who openly profess the letter of Scripture to be their only safe and sufficient guide?

Permit me also to suppose the case yet further. If such an one as this, warmed with affectionate esteem for the memory of the just, grateful for the binding up of many wounds, the strengthening of much weakness—and in humility, hoping also the guiding into much good, from the faithful, precious, and sincere example of your predecessors—if such an one as this, I say, should turn an inquiring look upon you as their descendants and proper representatives; does he find you honoring their memory, not merely by an outward adherence to visible distinctions, but by that inward, spiritual and vital separation from all evil, that holy scorn of a vain, proud, covetous, money-loving, worldly spirit, which marked them as a people whom God had set apart for himself?

Believe me, it is no light or superficial feeling that prompts me to submit these queries to your consideration; for if he that converteth a sinner from the error of his ways, does a great and faithful service to the Lord; he that in any wise casts a stumbling-block in a brother's way, hath need to pause in time, and see that he discover and remove it.

I say not that such is your case—I only say, that, considering how great and glorious, in respect to the work of God, were the services and example of your predecessors; how influential and important their ministrations in life and power, and especially in preaching that wherein alone life and power consists, or can ever be found; even in an abiding acquaintance with "the true light which enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world"—it behooves you to see that the talent entrusted to you, is not "laid up in a napkin"—neither that you dig in the earth after the gold that perisheth, and thereby hide your Lord's money.

(To be concluded.)

Natural History, Science, &c.

Migration of Eels.—St. John, in his "Wild Sports of the Highlands," describes a scene witnessed by him at the river Findhorn: "I was much interested one day in May in watching the thousands of small eels which were making their way up the river. It was some distance from the mouth, and where the stream, confined by a narrow rocky channel, ran with great strength. Nevertheless, these little eels, which were about six inches long, and as large round as a quill, persevered in swimming against the stream. When they came to a fall where they could not possibly ascend, they wriggled out of the water, and, gliding along the rock close to the edge, where the stone was constantly wet from the splashing and spray of the fall, they made their way up till they got above the difficulty, and then again slipping into the water, they continued their course. For several hours there was a continued succession of these little fish going up in the same way, and for more than a week the same thing was to be seen every day."

Truffles.—Three species are found in France. They are found in all soils, but chiefly in oak forests, or where the earth is damp and calcareous; thriving best in almost calcareous soil. The ordinary truffle is about the size of a walnut, with a rough, brown, warty skin like a potato. They are not cultivated. As they are subterraneous, they are found by means of pigs, which instinctively hunt them, or by dogs trained for the purpose. They are seldom found in the same place in successive years. The annual production is valued at £600,000.

The New Star in the Milky Way.—About the 1st of Second Month last, a Scottish star-gazer discovered a new star in the constellation Auriga. Like all such exhibitions, its brilliancy after a time began to decline. The examination of its rays with the spectroscope revealed some very interesting facts. It disclosed in the conflagration raging in that distant object, the presence of hydrogen, sodium and calcium. Each one of the bright rays was coupled with a dark line on its blue or more refrangible side. From the study of these lines it became evident that the star was advancing towards our system with a velocity of 300 miles per second; while the bright lines showed a motion in the opposite direction of 420 miles a second. These appearances can only be explained by the supposition that the two sets of lines came from different sources—in short, that there were two stars instead of one, and that these were rushing past each other at the rate of 720 miles a second, or about 62,000,000 of miles in a day.

Leguminous Plants as Fertilisers.—It has been found by observation and experiment that several of the leguminous plants, such as clover, peas and beans, will grow in soil containing but little nitrogen, and are able to obtain that important ingredient from the atmosphere, of which it forms about four-fifths.

The Honey Strawberry.—On the Sierra Nevada Mountains in California, there grows a sweet, juicy and delicious strawberry, which is said to be very desirable and productive. On a single plant sixty-five ripe berries have been counted.

Effects of Rarefied Air.—Now that I was at the foot of the great Tibetan plateau my men's nervousness increased visibly, for on every side they heard the most ghastly tales of the effects of the yen-chang on travellers. The Fung-shih had told them that on one of his expeditions into the country two of his men had been killed by it, and they imagined themselves dying in the desert, and devoured by eagles, bears and wolves. The giddiness, shortness of breath, nausea, and other distressing symptoms due to the rarefied air at high altitudes, are attributed by the Chinese and all the people of Central Asia to pestilential emanations, or poisonous vapors, coming out of the soil. When one has been over the great plateau, he quite comprehends why this explanation, which at first seems far-fetched, is accepted by peoples without any scientific training, for, strange as it is undoubtedly appears, it is not in the most elevated localities that the effects of the rarefied air are most painfully felt by either men or beasts; hence, doubtless, the failure to connect the chang-chi with the altitude.—The Land of the Lamas.

Funeral Instincts of Animals.—R. C. Howard of Franklin, Mass., furnishes to The Independent an incident that he witnessed many years before in California: I was down one day to where the Little Butte Creek sinks on the prairie. The Little Butte on the one side and a succession of sloughs on the other, gradually rising, came at length together, forming a sort of peninsula, covered with oak timber. It was a most beautiful locality and afforded a favorite watering-place for the cattle that were wont to range thereabouts.

Under a tree I found an ox that had apparently just died of a disease known as murrain. At the time I discovered the dead animal there was but one living one in sight, and he was following me in from where I had just forded the slough. While I was busy in examining the dead creature to see, if possible, whose it might be, he halted; but as soon as I passed on he began cautiously to approach it, and then, in a peculiar way, to smell of it, which he continued for some time to do, as if to ascertain what might be the matter. Having completed his examination, and, apparently satisfied himself that his friend was indeed dead, he at first set up a low, piteous moan, which gradually increased in intensity and power, until it ended in a piercing, terrific scream. The next moment the whole country around resounded with the tramp of bellowing cattle. That terrific knell had broken on the ears of the multitudes that roamed over those plains, and was responded to; and, in a very brief space of time no less than one hundred were either present or in the immediate vicinity.

Then came the ceremony. As this was to me an utter novelty, I naturally scrutinized the performance with not a little interest; especially so as it bid fair to be on a decidedly extensive scale.

They commenced, first, going up to the "deceased" two by two, though sometimes three at a time; when each would smelt about him for a moment, and then bid him a final farewell, as it were, by each setting up a roar, which always terminated in a scream. At length, those standing far outside, doubtless waxing impatient at the slow progress made, and in not readily getting access themselves to the dead, began, on all sides, to join their full sonorous voices in the chorus, by loving and howling and screaming; chanting thus, so to speak, a requiem, full of power and pathos, over their departed companion and friend.

"THE STONE TAKEN AWAY FROM THE SEPULCHRE."—To roll away the stone was a feat that no one or even two men could have accomplished unaided. Without a guard, without a seal, the stone itself, when once in position, made the sepulchre sure. The stone was no mere slab, or even stone door, like those in what are called the giant cities of Bashan, where both in tombs and houses we find a massive basalt slab, with what is termed a ball-and-socket joint; that is, a solid knob left on the top and bottom of the slab, fitting into sockets in the stone threshold and lintel, and on which the door revolves. The remains of such doorways I have often found in other parts of the country; but in such cases there is no rolling away of the stone. A tomb recently exposed, after being covered with earth and debris for many centuries, explains this rolling away. The tomb is close by the probable site of Calvary, outside the Damascus gate, among the gardens and oliveyards which still, as of old, occupy the ground. We descended by steps into a small area, which had long been filled in with soil, now removed, and after stooping by the mouth of a well, crept through a low tunnel, and then, turning into a narrow passage hewn in the rock, found a recess or niche, into which the stone door could be rolled back. We then returned, for we could proceed no farther; and facing us, just over the spot where we had examined the niche, was a doorway filled in by a stone door. This door, which must have been inserted during the building, or rather the excavating, of the tomb, was really a circular slab, like a huge millstone, with holes here and there for the insertion of spokes, by which it could be turned and rolled back into the niche we had before visited. But it would require several men, working together, to move it; and when rolled back, it must be wedged and fastened to keep it from closing the entrance again. Nor was this all. Behind it was a close-fitting basalt door, swinging, as has been described above, on its pivot, which could easily be pushed open, but which at once closed again by its own weight, and which could not be opened from the inside, but would at once hopelessly immerse an intruder. We are not to suppose that all these ingenious precautions were taken in the construction of the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea. The circular stone slab, which could be rolled back in its socket, would be sufficient; and it enables us to understand fully the anxiety which prompted the question, "Who shall roll us away the stone?"—H. B. Tristram, in the S. S. Times.

THAT society or people which does not frequently recur to its first principles, will go to decay.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Prayer.

"Pray without ceasing, and in everything give thanks," bespeaks a condition of heart and mind that well might lead to the exclamation, Behold what manner of people we would be in holy conversation and godliness if it were thus with us, so that our whole lives would be governed by the atmosphere of the spirit of prayer.

Is it unattainable thus to be brought into and kept by the power of God? For the spirit of true prayer is the possession of power with God. It is walking in the Spirit by which we are enabled to resist and overcome the motions of sin in the flesh, and by which the heavenly place in Christ Jesus is entered into and abode in.

Christ has not set before us a prize unattainable, for He leads the mind to pray for that for which He himself besought the Father on behalf of his disciples, even that they might be one as they were one, I in them and thou in me that they may be made perfect in one. Yes, this is the goal set before us by the blessed Master, whose promise is yea and amen forever.

To pray without ceasing is to live in the continued sense of the presence of God. Cast down oft by many troubles; battling with many difficulties, and conscious of many infirmities and the sense of not having yet attained to perfect redemption, still in the midst of all there is a continued reaching forth unto God by prayer under the feeling of weakness and dependence and helpless apart from his holy help.

This upward tendency of the spirit in prayer is the evidence of life stirring in the soul, moving it Godward in seeking redemption from the life still living that keeps separate from Him. Such seek to die daily unto themselves and to live anew unto God. When cast down such are sensible there is no hand but the One can lift up, so as to give songs in the night season.

God's temple is the whole earth to such, and his children they who fear his name of every clime and nation. They relax no individual tie, but exhort each and all to faithfulness to individual duty to God in singleness of purpose. They seek not uniformity but conformity to the mind and will of God.

I do crave that the united exercise in prayer of all such may be made more and more apparent by their united influence upon the world around, abounding as it does still in wickedness. All right effort to uplift mankind must be preceded by this secret exercise of soul before God, who only can qualify for service among our fellows to their and our profit.

In this day of much unrest and commotion how needful to know the mind staid upon God, so that at all times in secret the prayer may arise unto Him from off the altar of the heart, to be kept out of the heat and bustle of an excited imagination, and may know that quiet confidence in God by secret communion with Him.

Separated the one from the other as many of us are by the ocean that is between us, we can be drawn near together in spirit in our struggles, trials and temptations, and can mingle our tears at the throne of grace for each other, and for the prosperity of Zion.

Wonderous kinship to the King of kings and to one another. Did we but live more in this holy atmosphere of prayer, how would our burdens be made lighter, our tasks easier, our joys fuller. We would find how true the Master's language is—"My yoke is easy and my burden light."

There may often appear little outwardly given us to do, but what may be called the drudgery of life. But in the doing of this to know the smile of his countenance is more precious than gold or silver, or a name of renown among men. Let us therefore watch and be faithful to the call of his inspeaking Word of Truth, and lift up to Him the sacrifice of prayer and praise He would have his children bring.

And in the inner sanctuary, as also in the duty of our every-day life, let us be true to the inspirings and promptings of His Spirit, both as to ourselves and to others, that God's holy will may be answered by the least child in the fold of Christ, and there may be by all an abiding within the safe inclosure of his holy dwelling-place and habitation, where is peace, quietness and rest, the portion of his inheritance, to which in Christ Jesus we are called.*

Total Abstinence.

Total abstinence has this advantage, it guards a man from dying a drunkard. And it were better for any man to die sober than to die, or to live, in drunkenness. This is a truth that both physicians and patients would do well to bear in mind constantly. That many men and women have been made drunkards through beginning the use of liquors at a physician's prescription, is a fact beyond doubt. Many a good physician recognizes this truth, and is exceedingly cautious in his prescriptions of intoxicating drinks. Recent discussions, in these columns concerning this matter, have prompted a patient of a Pennsylvania physician, who had formerly been overcome by the drink habit, to relate his experience as follows:

"An experience of mine during the past year, somewhat in the line of your recent utterances on the use of alcoholic stimulants in sickness, prompts me to the writing of this letter. For two months last autumn I was confined to my house by a very severe carbuncle. Our family physician was obliged to go to a distant section of the country, and at the most critical period I had to summon a doctor who knew nothing of my past life. At this time the excruciating pain, my inability to take food, and a continued loss of sleep, had brought me into a precarious condition, and I realized that unless a speedy change in my condition was effected I must pass away from earth; and this opinion, on my questioning the physician, was confirmed by him. In addition to other treatment, he directed that I should be given milk punches at frequent intervals. I lay silent until he had concluded his directions, but my mind was occupied in considering the advice he had given. I knew I was exhausted and weak, with a tendency to continued progression in weakness, and felt assured that the stimulant he had ordered would give me, at least, temporary strength, and possibly dull the pain from which I was suffering. I felt confident that the question of my life or death was then in the balance, and I really did want to live if it so pleased God. In the meantime running through my thoughts was a constant prayer to God to help me to a right conclusion. I said to the physician that I would prefer trying something in place of the milk punch; but he replied that while he rarely employed spirituous liquors in his practice, his firm conviction was that they were a necessity in my case, and there was no substitute he could suggest, and that in his opinion to decline their use would lead to a fatal termination of my disease. With another prayer to God for strength and guidance, I again spoke, telling the doctor of my predisposition to the use of intoxicating liquors, of the misery they had brought me to in my past history, and that I had promised God to abstain from their use, and that if now a resort to them was the only thing left to save my life, I felt it would be better to go into the presence of my Father with my promise kept, than to recover my strength and risk the bondage of appetite awakened by following his prescription; and I absolutely refused to take the stuff, and absolved him from responsibility for the consequences. That moment I shall ever look upon as the grandest moment of my life; and God has signally blessed me since then. The doctor at once appreciated my position, and said he would do the best he could by the use of other remedies, but, on leaving, he expressed to my family his regret that he was obliged to do so, and gave little hope for my recovery. But I passed the crisis grandly, and was able to be out of the house a month sooner than this physician, and two others who also saw me, named as the earliest time probable. My healing was wonderfully rapid, and the doctor was daily surprised. I know that you will be interested in this because of the subject, and of the fact that I had given to me the strength to take the stand I did. Desire for life and awakened appetite were both appeased with a strength not to be rightly estimated by one without a history like mine; but when I called upon God he was true to his promise, and made a way for my escape. Had my recovery been accomplished by alcohol, I feel that in all probability I should eventually have died a drunkard's death."

Sin-offering in Tibet.—An old Thibetan trader told me that he and the other traders at Tankar were going to have a Kurin, or guilt-offering ceremony, the next day, and he asked me to be present. A little pyramid made of tsamba, butter, and sugar (known as a torma), about a foot high and set in a small wooden framework, was placed on a scaffolding in a room of the caravansary, and the officiating lamas were seated near-by. While the service prescribed for the ceremony, all those for whose benefit it was being informed passed under the scaffolding, thus diverting from their heads any impending disease or evil. Then one of the lamas took the offering, and, followed by all the others, and the traders in their finest dresses and fully armed with guns and swords, marched out of the lamasery, and went to a place where a pile of dry brushwood had been prepared. Fire was put to the fuel, and as the flames leapt up, the offering was cast into them; thus was consumed all the future bad luck of the trespassers, and they celebrated its destruction with much firing of guns, blowing of horns and mumbling of prayers. When all had been burnt, the procession reformed, the traders, with drawn swords, in single file on either side of the lamas, and with many waving of weapons, and singing of songs in deep bass voices supposed to be terrifying, they returned to their homes.—The Land of the Lamas.

Cruelty in the German Army.—"Miles Tentonius" tells a terrible tale in the United States Magazine, of the treatment of German soldiers. From general to corporal the regulations prohibiting ill-usage appear to be habitually ignored. Captain Müller, a veteran of the Franco-German War, who was deprived of his rank and title by the late King of Prussia, and who had distinguished himself in many cases of ill-treatment which came within his own knowledge, and which he defies the authorities to prosecute him for, as he is willing "to appear before any Court and prove the truth of his statements." Some of the offences cannot be described in decent language, others have resulted in driving men mad. "A Prussian general boxed the ears of a Wurtemberg soldier and called him a 'Swabian swine' because he did not make the requisite number of points at the targets.—The Herald of Peace.

Russian Militarism and Famine.—The Echo observes: "A certain Russophil journalist has taken upon himself to rebuke the English people because they have not taken up the task of feeding the starving peasants of Russia with sufficient heartiness. Heaven forbid that we should do anything to restrain the hand of charity, even from people who are so far off as Russia, though we certainly have more than enough needy people at home. But there is no room for reproach. The real reason why there is such a poor response to the appeals made in England is that it is the duty of the Russian Government to save its people from starvation. So far as money goes, it is perfectly able to do this. Yet the proofs are abundant that it wrung the last farthing of taxes from multitudes of peasants who had starvation staring them in the face. Yet worse, it has befuddled the French people into subscribing a new loan, which is to be mainly expended in warlike expenditure, Russia being the one Great Power of Europe which has no reason to fear either invasion or molestation. When the Russian Government, which spends about twenty-six millions annually on unnecessary and menacing armaments, and which cruelly persecutes Protestants and Jews, crawls, hat in hand, as a sturdy beggar through Europe, we are forcibly reminded of the debased and dejected man who spends his means in whisky, and asks other people to keep his wife and children."—The Herald of Peace.

Dr. Wilhelm Bode, of Hermsdorf, near Dresden, has, in the Christliche Welt, concluded a series of nine lengthy articles, in which, at the hands of an overwhelming abundance of official statistics, he demonstrates that Germany most emphatically has an alcohol question to be solved. It is doubtful whether ever before the terrible facts in the case have been marshalled as the writer has done them here. In concluding he gives in a summary outline some of his results. He says:

"The preparation of alcoholic intoxicants" robs us year by year of six hundred million double hundredweights of grain, twenty million double hundredweights of potatoes, twenty-seven million double hundredweights of coal, and many other useful articles. It robs us, in other words, of the harvest of 1,779,000 hectares, whose rye value would be 350,000,000 marks; it robs every inhabitant of 651 pounds of bread each year. It robs us of the working power of one man out of every sixteen; on its battlefields we find each year 6,343 wounded (natives, murderers, etc.) and 223 dead. The drink bill last year robs us of 2,000,000,000 marks, of which we pay 60,000,000 marks to foreigners; it makes each year 32,000 paupers to be supported by the State and by charity; takes 4,235 German men each year into the involuntary imprisonment of the working colonies, and endows many of men, women and children into other charitable institutions. At lowest estimate fully 1,333,000 German men are shortening their lives through these intoxicants; 1,600 become suicides each year from the same cause, 1,300 are injured by accidents, 30,000 lose their minds, and 150,000 become transgressors of the law. Is there a German Alcohol question?"

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 21, 1892.

It was under a deep feeling of the dangerous condition of those who professed to be Christians, and yet were not living in subjection to the Cross of Christ, that is to the restraining power and government of his holy Spirit in their hearts—that William Penn wrote his admirable treatise, "No Cross, no Crown." In this he shows that without faith in the manifestations of Christ to the soul, and obedience thereto, we cannot be saved.

Christ sent his apostles to turn people from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God—that is, instead of yielding to the temptations and motions of Satan, who is the prince of darkness, they should turn their minds to the appearance of Christ, the light and Saviour of the world; who by his light shines in their souls, and discovers every temptation to them, and reproves them when they give way thereto. And God so blessed the faithful labors of these his ambassadors, that in a few years many thousands were inwardly struck and quickened by the Word of Life, that taught them to deny ungodliness and the world's lusts, and to live soberly, righteously and godly in this present life. Through obedience to the manifestations of this blessed light, they were enabled to resist and vanquish the devil in all his stratagems. Every thought must come to judgment, and the rise and tendency of it be also well approved, before they allow it any room in their minds.

The glory of the cross shined so conspicuously through the selfdenial of their lives who daily bore it, that it struck the heathen with astonishment, and in a small time so shook their altars, discredited their oracles, struck the multitude, invaded the court, and overcame their armies, that it led priests, magistrates and generals in triumph after it.

Now not a vain thought, nor an idle word, nor an unseemly action was permitted; no, not an immodest look: Their care was not how to sport away their precious time, but how to redeem it, that they might have enough to work out their great salvation with fear and trembling; not with balls and masks, with playhouses, dancing, feasting and gaming.

The degeneracy which now so largely extends over Christendom has arisen from a disregard of the light and grace of Christ, which shines in man setting his sins in order before him, and not suffering one evil thought, word or action to go unreproved. One of the most evident marks of this degeneracy, is the extent to which, in nominally Christian communities, theatrical exhibitions are encouraged and patronized, and that even by some who profess to be followers of a Saviour, who taught his disciples to renounce the world and to follow Him in the path of self-denial, and bearing the daily cross. We desire to feel and to speak charitably of the vicaries of this amusement, for the blinding effects of custom and of education are very great. But we have no doubt that those who frequent the theatre and similar places of dissipation enter into what may be properly called in a sense, the Devil's territory, and are not likely to escape without some spiritual loss. It is one of the instrumentalities that lead the unwary down to the pit of destruction, and unfortunately too many go in thereat. The surroundings and the influence of many of these theatrical exhibitions may be described in the language of the Apostle James, as "earthly, sensual, devilish." Even in those of the most respectable class, the tendency is to produce a state of mental excitement inconsistent with that calmness and seriousness of mind which is produced by a thoughtful view of the responsibilities of life, and the tremendous results for good or evil, for time and eternity, which depend on our living in a state of watchfulness and prayer, listening to and obeying the voice of the Son of God.

That some of those who profess to be followers of Christ, should countenance such exhibitions by their presence at them, or by their language respecting them, is a mournful proof of how successful the Enemy of all righteousness has been in blinding the eyes of many.

William Penn, after speaking of many things by which the minds of people are alienated from heavenly things, and exercised about mere follies, adds: "But of all these wretched inventions, the play-houses, like so many hellish seminaries, do most perniciously conduce to these sad and miserable ends; where little besides frothy, wanton, if not directly obscene and profane humors are represented; which are of notorious ill consequence upon the minds of most, especially the youth, that frequent them. And this is that idle and debauched stage as encouraged and maintained; than which scarcely a greater abomination can be thought on of that rank of impieties."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The acceptance by England of the invitation of the United States to take part in an international conference on the silver question, it is believed in Washington, carry the other invited nations with it, and assure the success of the movement. Favorable responses have already been received from Italy and Austria, and a dispatch from London states that Germany has also accepted the invitation.

The sale of postal cards now amounts to 2,000,000 daily.

Senator John S. Barbour, of Virginia, died suddenly on the 14th inst., at his residence in Washington, aged seventy-two years. He was a distinguished orator, heart failure being the cause of his death.

Clement A. Griscom, President of the International Navigation Company of this city, said last week, referring to the act "To Encourage American Shipping" that at least two vessels equalling, if not surpassing, the City of Paris, and the City of New York will be constructed in some American shipyard under contract from his company.

The continuous rains which have fallen over a large portion of the western country the last two weeks have caused a distressing situation of affairs. The rivers in the northern part of the country are swelled with miles of rich farming country which the wet weather has seriously interfered with crop prospects. Many towns are partially submerged. The Mississippi River is ten miles wide below St. Louis.

The California Supreme Court, has declared unconstitutional the act of March 31, 1891, to encourage the cultivation of ramie in the State of California; to provide a bounty for ramie fiber, and make an appropriation therefor; to appoint a State Superintendent of Ramie Culture, and make an appropriation for his salary.

An interesting phenomenon to be seen in the early mornings of this month and of Sixth Month, says the New York Times, is a comet with an unusual number of tails. It is known as Swift's comet, having been discovered by Professor Lewis Swift, of the Warner Observatory, at Rochester, N. Y. By astronomical computations of the orbit of this comet it was found to have made its perihelion passage around the sun early in Fourth Month, and it is now scudding away from the sun at a somewhat lessened rate of speed, being at this time a little over 100,000,000 miles distant from the sun.

Professor Barnard, of Lick Observatory, has made a number of observations of Swift's comet, and on Fourth Month 19th, one of his plates showed that its tail had split into eight parts. On a clear night, or, rather, between 2 and 4 o'clock on a clear morning, the comet may be seen low down in the North-east between the Great Square of Pegasus and Cassiopeia's belt, in the direction of the star Rigel.

One of the greatest labor troubles that New England has ever been afflicted with is now in full progress. It is in the granite trade. On the 14th inst. all of the granite firms in New England, with few exceptions, closed their workmen in a concerted pre-arrangement, mainly because the workmen consent to have all agreements between employer and employee each year from First Month 1st, instead of Fifth Month 1st, as has been the custom.

Such an agreement, the manufacturers claim, is essential to the proper conduct of their business, for most of their yearly contracts are made in First Month, and that is the time when they should know the basis of wages for the year, so that they may intelligently figure on contracts.

A conservative estimate places the number of locked out quarrymen at about 20,000.

It is asserted that in Wisconsin seventy-seven of the post-offices are kept in saloons.

By an explosion of gas in a coal mine of the Northern Pacific Railroad, near Rosalia, Washington, at noon on the 10th inst., forty-three miners were killed. Their bodies have since been recovered. It is said that 250 children have been left fatherless by the explosion.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 443; which is more than during the previous week, and less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing, 220 were males and 223 females; 60 died of consumption; 47 of pneumonia; 35 of diseases of the heart; 28 of old age; 20 of scarlet fever; 20 of diphtheria; 15 of apoplexy; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 15 of cancer; 13 of insanity; 12 of marasmus; 12 of convulsions; 11 of Bright's disease and 10 of bronchitis.

FOREIGN.—The Liberals have been defeated at the local election at North Hackney by a decisive vote. The Unionist majority is more than double that given in 1887 to the Tory candidate, but 534 less than that given to the Liberal candidate in 1891. The Times correspondent credits this result to the opposition to Home Rule for Ireland. The Liberal correspondents attempt to extract some satisfaction by pointing to the gain over the election of 1886.

There is a prospect at last that the Durham strike may end. The Council of the Miners' Association has voted for arbitration. There is rather less left to arbitrate about than when the strike began. Some of the collieries have been ruined, and will never be reopened. The men they employed will have to seek employment elsewhere. There are, say the mayors of the towns of about 100,000 working people in Durham and in the North Riding of Yorkshire. The strike has lasted eight weeks. Not merely the strikers, but great numbers of innocent persons employed in allied trades, have suffered and are suffering. In the Cleveland district alone are 50,000 of these innocent starving persons, and 40,000 more in Durham itself. For the 50,000 miners who are the authors of all this, no wages no appeal is made, but what a picture it is of shortsighted stubbornness and of selfish ignorance! The miners went out for higher wages, regardless of the known and proved fact that higher wages could not be paid. It is still less likely they will be paid now. The men are willing to accept a 12 1/2 per cent. reduction against which they struck; the owners insist on 13 1/2 per cent., and so for the present the strike continues.

Endolph Jaeger, the defaulting chief cashier of the Royal Bank, the great banking-house of Frankfort-on-the-Main, Germany, whose flight was public news, Fourth Month 20th, was arrested on the 10th inst. in a hotel at Ramleh, Egypt.

A man named Gerloff, who is supposed to be an accomplice of Jaeger, was arrested in Berlin on the 10th inst.

The Peather-Lloyd publishes particulars of a terrible disaster that has occurred near Droyly, a town in Austrian Galicia:

While one hundred workmen, with their wives and children, were crossing the river, near Brody, on a raft, the raft capsized and all were thrown into the water, seventy persons perished.

The American steamer Conenagh, Capt. Spencer, loaded with flour, grain and provisions, sent from Philadelphia for the benefit of the starving Russian peasants, arrived in the Riga roadstead at midnight on the 12-13th inst.

A dispatch from St. Petersburg, Fifth Month 15th, says: "In consequence of the case of General Gresser, the Prefect of Police of St. Petersburg, who died a few days ago after being treated with 'vitaline,' discloses traces of poison in the body. Gatskowsky, the inventor of 'vitaline,' by whom General Gresser was treated, has been arrested. He is a Pole and is suspected of having conspired in some plot."

The National Zeitung publishes a dispatch from St. Petersburg, saying that the Russian police, acting on a warning from the police of Paris, have discovered a number of mines under the Gatchina Palace, the mines extending for a distance of several kilometers around the palace. The Russian Government has tried to hush up the fact of the discovery. The populace of St. Petersburg are terrorized, believing that the recent explosions at the Nicolai Bridge and the death of General Gresser are connected with the plot against the Czar.

Ten thousand foreign Jews in Odessa have been ordered to leave Russia forthwith.

It is reported from Astrakhan that the steamer Alexander Wolkow has foundered in the Caspian Sea and that 250 passengers were drowned.

A syndicate composed of French and Russian bankers, and having a capital of 150,000,000 roubles, has made the Government an offer to take charge of the work of construction of the Trans-Siberian Railway. A Government Commission is now discussing the advisability of accepting the offer. Grand Duke Vladimir favors its acceptance.

According to Graham's Messenger, from the administration of the Portman Islands, grants for the past official year, which has recently been issued in Calcutta, it appears that the aborigines of the archipelago are disappearing so rapidly that Portman states the present generation may be considered as the last of the great Andaman tribe. All the people of Butland Island and Port Campbell are now dead and very few are left on the islands of Andaman and Nicobar. It is said that for many centuries the people lived completely isolated from the rest of the world, but, like the Pacific Islanders, they seem unable to withstand contact with external civilization.

DIVINE PROTECTION.

When J. G. Paton went to the New Hebrides as a missionary, he settled on the island Tanna. A season of sickness and the visit of a hurricane which followed, were attributed by the superstitious natives to his presence and efforts to teach them a new way of worship. So they resolved either to murder the mission party or to drive them out of the island.

In his autobiography, Paton says:

The inhabitants for miles around united in seeking our destruction, but God put it into every savage hearts to save us. Old Nowar, the chief under whom we lived, and the chief next under him, Arkurat, set themselves to rescue us. Along with Manuman and Sirawia they opposed every plan in the public assembly for taking our lives. Some of their people also remained friendly to us, and by the help of our Aneityumese Teachers, warned us of danger and protected our lives. Determined not to be baffled, a meeting of all our enemies on the island was summoned, and it was publicly resolved that a band of men be selected and enjoined to kill the whole of those friendly to the Mission, old Nowar among the rest, and not only to murder the mission party, but also a ruder who had lately landed to live there, that no one might be left to give information to the white men or bring punishment on the islanders. Frenzy of excitement prevailed, and the blood-frenzy seemed to over-ride the whole assembly; when, under an impulse that surely came from the Lord of Pity, one great warrior chief who had hitherto kept silent, rose, swung aloft a mighty club and smashing it earthwards, cried—

"The man that kills Missi must first kill me, the men that kill the mission teachers must first kill me and my people, for we shall stand by them and defend them till death!"

Instantaneously, another chief thundered in with the same declaration, and the great assembly broke up in dismay. All the more remarkably was this deliverance, as these two chiefs lived nearly four miles inland, and, as reputed disease makers and sacred men, were regarded as amongst our bitterest enemies. It had happened that, a brother of the former chief having been wounded in battle, I had dressed his wounds and he recovered, for which perhaps he now favored us. But I do not put very much value on that consideration; for too clearly did our dear Lord Jesus interpose directly on our behalf that day. I and my defenceless company had spent it in anxious prayers and tears; and our hearts overflowed with gratitude to the Saviour who rescued us from the lions' jaws.

One day, while toiling away at my house, the war chief, his brother, and a large party of armed men surrounded the plot where I was working. They all had muskets besides their own native weapons. They watched for me some time in silence, and then every man levelled a musket straight at my head. Escape was impossible. Speech would only have increased my danger. My eyesight came and went for a few moments. I prayed to my Lord Jesus, either himself to protect me, or to take me home to his glory. I tried to keep working on at my task, as if no one was near me. In that moment, as never before, the words came to me—"Whatever ye shall ask in my name, I will do it;" and I knew that I was safe. Retiring a little from their first position, no word having been spoken, they took up the same attitude somewhat farther off, and seemed to be urging one another to fire the first shot. But my dear Lord restrained them once again, and they withdrew, leaving me with a new cause for trusting Him with all that concerned me for time and eternity.

Perils seemed, however, to enclose me on every hand, and my life was frequently attempted. I had to move about more cautiously than ever, some days scarcely daring to appear outside my mission premises. For I have ever most firmly believed, and do believe, that only when we use every lawful and possible means for the preservation of our life, which is God's second greatest gift to man (his Son being the first), can we expect God to protect us, or have we the right to plead his precious promises.

One day I held a service in the village where morning after morning their tribes assembled, and declared that if they would believe in and follow the Jehovah God, He would deliver them from all their enemies and lead them into a happy life. There were present three Sacred Men, chiefs, of whom the whole population lived in terror—brothers or cousins, heroes of traditional feats, professors of sorcery, and claiming the power of life and death, health and sickness, rain and drought, according to their will. On hearing me, these three stood up and declared they did not believe in Jehovah, nor did they need his help, for they had the power to kill my life by Nahak (i. e. sorcery or witchcraft), if only they could get possession of any piece of the fruit or food that I had eaten. This was an essential condition of their black art; hence the peel of a banana or an orange, and every broken scrap of food, is gathered up by the natives, lest it should fall into the hands of the Sacred Men, and be used for Nahak. This superstition was the cause of most of the bloodshed and terror upon Tanna; and being thus challenged, I asked God's help, and determined to strike a blow against it. A woman was standing near with a bunch of native fruit in her hand, like our plums called quonquore. I asked her to be pleased to give me some, and she, holding out a bunch, said—

"Take freely what you will!"

Calling the attention of all the assembly to what I was doing, I took three fruits from the bunch, and taking a bite out of each, I gave them one after another to the three Sacred Men, and deliberately said in the hearing of all—

"You have seen me eat of this fruit, you have seen me give the remainder to your Sacred Men; they have said they can kill me by Nahak, but I challenge them to do it if they can, without arrow or spear, club or musket, for I deny that they have any power against me or against any one by their sorcery."

The challenge was accepted; the natives looked terror-struck at the position in which I was placed. The ceremony of Nahak was usually performed in secret, the Tannese fleeing in dread, as Europeans would from the touch of the plague; but I lingered and eagerly watched their ritual. As the three chiefs arose and drew near to one of the Sacred Trees, to begin their ceremonial, the natives fled in terror, crying—

"Missi, away! Alas, Missi!"

But I held on at my post of observation. Amidst wavings and incantations, they rolled up the pieces of the fruit from which I had eaten, in certain leaves of this Sacred Tree into a shape like a waxen cauldle; then they kindled a sacred fire near the root, and continued their mutterings, gradually burning a little more and a little more of the candle-shaped things, wheeling them round their heads, blowing upon them with their breaths, waving them in the air, and glancing wildly at me as if expecting my sudden destruction. Wondering whether after all they did not believe their own lie, for they seemed to be in dead earnest, I, more eager than ever to break the chains of such vile superstition, urged them again and again, crying—

"Be quick! Stir up your gods to help you! I am not killed yet; I am perfectly well!"

At last they stood up and said: "We must delay till we have called all our Sacred Men. We will kill Missi before his next Sabbath come round. Let all watch, for he will soon die and that without fail."

I replied, "Very good! I challenge all your priests to unite and kill me by sorcery or Nahak. If on Sabbath next I come again to your village in health, you will all admit that your gods have no power over me, and that I am protected by the true and living Jehovah God!"

For every day throughout the remainder of that week, the conchs were sounded, and over that side of the island all their Sacred Men were at work trying to kill me by their arts. Now and again messengers arrived from every quarter of the island, inquiring anxiously after my health, and wondering if I was not feeling sick, and great excitement prevailed amongst the poor deluded idolaters.

Sabbath dawned upon me peacefully, and I went to that village in more than my usual health and strength. Large numbers assembled, and when I appeared they looked at each other in terror, as if it could not really be I, myself, still spared and well. Entering into the public ground, I saluted them to this effect—

"My love to you all, my friends! I have come again to you about the Jehovah God and his worship."

The three Sacred Men, on being asked, admitted that they had tried to kill me by Nahak, but had failed; and on being questioned, why they had failed; they gave the acute and subtle reply, that I also was myself a Sacred Man, and that my God being the stronger had protected me from their gods. Addressing the multitude, I answered thus—

"Yes, truly; my Jehovah God is stronger than your gods. He protected me, and helped me; for He is the only living and true God, the only God that can hear or answer any prayer from the children of men. Your gods cannot hear prayers, but my God can and will hear and answer you, if you will give heart and life to Him, and love and serve Him only. This is my God, and He is also your friend if you will hear and follow his voice."

Having said this, I sat down on the trunk of a fallen tree, and addressed them—

"Come and sit down all around me, and I will talk to you about the love and mercy of my God, and teach you how to worship and please Him."

Two of the Sacred Men then sat down, and all the people gathered round and seated themselves very quietly. I tried to present to them ideas of sin, and of salvation through Jesus Christ, as revealed to us in the Holy Scriptures.

The third Sacred Man, the highest in rank, a man of great stature and uncommon strength, had meantime gone off for his warrior's spear, and returned brandishing it in the air and poisoning it at me. I said to the people—

"Of course he can kill me with his spear, but he undertook to kill me by Nahak or sorcery, and promised not to use against me any weapons of war; and if you let him kill me now, you will kill your friend, one who lives among you and only tries to do you good, as you all know so well. I know that if you kill me thus, my God will be angry and will punish you."

Thereon I seated myself calmly in the midst of the crowd, while he leaped about in rage, scolding his brothers and all who were present for listening to me. The other Sacred Men, however, took my side and, as many of the people also were friendly to me and stood closely packed around me, he did not throw his spear. To allay the tumult and obviate further bloodshed, I offered to leave with my teachers at once, and, in doing so, I ardently pleaded with them to live at peace. Though we got safely home, that old Sacred Man seemed still to hunger after my blood. For weeks thereafter, go where I would, he would suddenly appear in the path behind me, poisoning in his right hand that same Goliath spear. God only kept it from being thrown, and, I, using every lawful precaution, had all the same to attend to my work, as if no enemy were there, leaving all other results in the hands of Jesus. This whole incident did, doubtless, shake the prejudices of many as to sorcery; but few even of converted natives ever get entirely clear of the dread Nahak.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Extracts from "My Christian Experience."

BY T. G. TAYLOR, THE CONVERTED COVET.

PRACTICE WHAT YOU PROFESS.

Every young convert must look to Christ for help, and yet must also begin to practice for himself. What are mental faculties and converting grace given to us for, except to be used in the service of our Master? Obedient acts to Divine requirements are but steps in the pathway of Christian duty; and we gain experience as we go along. So if we are wise we will venture forward. Christ never deserts the youngest or feeblest disciple; the meek will He guide in his way, and the limbs of faith grow strong and expert by exercise. "The everlasting arms" are almighty arms; we have only to lean on them and we will not fall; we have only to look to Him, who is the Way, the Truth, and the Life, and we will not go astray, for before us will be the footprints of Jesus to show us where to tread. If I can but set my unsteady foot in the track my Master trod, his mighty arm will hold me.

CHRISTIAN INFLUENCE.

How important that we should walk worthy of our high calling as Christians. Let us remember that we are casting the shadow of our real life upon some one, that Somebody is following us. Happy if, when all the influences of life flow back and meet us at the judgment, we can lift up clean hands and spotless robes, and say, "I am free from the blood of all men." Happy then, to hear one soul saying to us out of the great multitude, that he found Jesus and heaven by following the shadow of our Christian life and devotion.

GOD'S GOVERNMENT.

There are some people whose faith is that events occur at hap-hazard. Alas for us if chance had aught to do with events of our life; we should be like poor mariners put out to sea in an unsafe vessel, without a chart and without a helm. We should know nothing of the port to which we might ultimately come; we should only feel that we were the captives of the tempest, and might soon be the victims of the devouring deep. Alas, poor orphans were we all, if we were indebted for present comfort and future prospects, to nothing but chance. No Father's care to watch over us, we should be pilgrims in a pathless waste, with none to direct us—travellers who might be overwhelmed at any moment. Thank God, it is not so with us. We who are Christians believe that which happens to us is ordered by the wise providence of Him who is our Father and our Friend. We see purposes accomplished where others discern nothing but void and vacancy. We believe that "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof; the world and they that dwell therein." Yea, we believe that "He hath his way in the whirlwind and the storm, and the clouds are the dust of his feet." M. B. T.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

William Ridgway.

Men and women often will not hear the voice of the Spirit unless some unusual circumstance in life directs their attention to it. Often afflictions are the means used to impress them with the uncertainty of worldly things, and with the desirability of seeking for more lasting sources of happiness. Happy are such if they are willing to learn the lessons their God intends to teach, and if they are persuaded to co-operate with the heavenly grace so lovingly offered. William Ridgway was converted under such conditions. He recites that he was no stranger to many mistakes and to some backsliding, yet from this period he learned to rejoice in the forgiveness of the Saviour who had so often preserved his life; and the main bent of his thoughts was to be obedient to the indwelling Light, which he testifies "was as a lamp to my feet."

About this time a tumor commenced to grow in his nostrils on a place where he had once received a severe blow. He consulted a doctor in Philadelphia, who was reputed the most skillful surgeon of that city, and who pronounced it a cancer. Several physicians were unable to remove the trouble. As an apparently last resort, he placed himself under the care of a French doctor in Burlington, who was reputed very skillful. He remarks: "Being in an afflicted state, I began to be very thoughtful, and at times serious, and my very dear friend George Dillwyn, took some notice of me, and I expect entered into feeling with me, as he had once or twice spoken very nearly to my state. As my mind became more and more humbled and brought down, by contemplating the gloomy prospect before me (for Dr. Brogaard did not succeed in removing my complaint), one night while yet boarding in Burlington, I had a remarkable visitation whilst lying in bed nursing. Divine light so broke in and shone upon me, that I saw things unutterable. So delightful was the view of heavenly things, that all within me was enamored with the prospect I enjoyed for sometime. I felt a freedom to write a short note to my dear friend George Dillwyn, giving a little account of how it had been with me, and informing him that when he felt disposed to call in, I should be glad to see him. He was soon over to see me, and had something very suitable to communicate; and amongst other things, that he compared it to the woman, who, on sweeping her house had found the lost piece of silver, and had called in her neighbors to rejoice with her.

"From this time I entered into resolves to try to reform my former way and manner of living. I had hitherto dressed very gay, following the prevailing fashions of the times; and indulged among my associates in the common mode of conversation, and in customs, which I now saw I must take up my cross to. And sometimes, when I looked at the trial of meeting with old associates, and addressing them in the plain language, I was almost ready to conclude I could never do it. At one of these times George Dillwyn came in, and sitting awhile by me in silence, he found me out and told my thoughts; saying I need not fear the cross, for although it seemed to me to be a great point at a distance, yet when I came to it, it would be no point at all.

"After a considerable time under this doctor, I left Burlington and returned to my father's. I had got so that I was able to go about; and having some of my old business to attend to in Philadelphia, I had an opportunity to prove the correctness of George Dillwyn's remarks to me. I was marvelously strengthened to meet my old associates in a different manner from what I had formerly been accustomed to do."

George Dillwyn, above referred to, was one of those rare and lovely characters, who living sheltered lives, and being naturally amiable, seem by their very surroundings, to be able to live in close spiritual communion with their God. Such can often help to build up the good in others who, naturally loving worldliness, and with a less genial environment, find it difficult to tread the narrow way. But the latter kind of Christians often hold out much encouragement to ordinary natures, by proving that Divine grace can overcome human frailty and fears. The great majority of Christians are like William Ridgway was. Doubtless many feel somewhat as he did; and can often testify as to his death-bed he testified, "I know my mistakes have been many; my strong will and corrupt nature would have led me into perdition. I have been as a brand plucked from the burning. I have nothing to trust in but mercy."

His health gradually was restored again, and he settled down to farming, having given up a seafaring life. He began to attend Friend's meetings, and says that he was sensible of the benefits thereof. About this time he married. But extending his operations in business, and cares multiplying, he expresses the fear that as a result he began to lose ground in a religious sense.

"Finding farming but a slow way of acquiring property, and being encumbered, I began to think of having recourse to sea for a few years, in hopes I thereby might realize enough to pay all my debts, and hold my farm. I made two voyages to the West Indies, which answered very well. I had, however, previously rented out my farm, and removed my family to Burlington. These two voyages, I went the first as master only; the second as master and supercargo. I now joined with others in the purchase of a small brig, in which I sailed as master, supercargo, and part owner. We loaded her out for the West Indies, and I arrived in St. François. This was in the fore part of the summer of 1793. When we arrived there we found the state of things very unsettled, on account of many of the blacks having revolted and fled to the mountains. Whilst we lay in the coves, there arose a difference between two French commanding officers, the one who had been in command there, and one who had been sent out from France to supersede him. The one who had been in command was not willing to surrender or give up his authority, and the other undertook to compel him; but the former commandant called in the blacks to his assistance, and put arms into their hands, by which he blacks soon became the strongest party; and seeing the advantage they had, soon embraced it, and claimed their freedom or took it by force. During the contest between these parties great numbers were slain.

"My vessel lay off where we did not apprehend any danger from the shots flying. But here I must note one most remarkable instance of Divine interposition for my preservation, which was as follows: I was standing or rather leaning with my breast on the quarter-rail of the vessel; right under my breast was a broad-headed stay-nail. Whilst leaning in this posture, an unusual sensation came over me, and in intuition that I was not safe there. I immediately left the place, but such a weakness and tremor came over me that I was scarcely able to walk. As I left the place, my mate walked up to it, and put his hand right over this broad-headed stay-nail. He had not been there two minutes, before a ball came from the shore, and slivered his middle finger severely. If I had remained there five minutes longer than I did, this ball would have inevitably entered my breast. Here was a marvelous interposition indeed, of infinite mercy and goodness towards me. This evidence of renewed mercy had a tendency to humble me, and produce very serious reflections. I was enabled to see that although I had departed from my first love, and slighted the tender visitations of a tender and merciful Creator, yet, nevertheless, his mercy and goodness were still following me."

The negro party obtaining the ascendancy, and the town being in great confusion, much of it having been destroyed by fire, he was compelled to leave the port in an unprepared state, and go to sea. He went to the island of Tortuga, and there disposing of his cargo, took in a load of coffee for the home market. But here he had to face a dilemma. All his ship papers had been left, owing to circumstances beyond his control, at Cape François. He was liable, without papers, to be captured by the numerous French or English cruisers then roving the seas; for it was in the midst of a war between those two countries. He remarks: "This circumstance, with a recollection of the above marvelous preservation of my life, and the almost unparalleled distress of many of the French people who had to fly for their lives, kept me very low and humble; and occasioned me often to seek retirement in my state-room. In one of these opportunities it was clearly intimated to me, that if I could keep my eye single to the all-protecting Power, and trust solely to Him, He would bring me safe home. This I resolved to endeavor for; and to the honor of his great and excellent name, he did not fail to assist me in a good measure so to do. Often have I had to look back to the many heart-tendering opportunities I was favored with, when quite alone in my cabin. Precious meetings, indeed, have I had on the rolling ocean."

With his mind kept in this humble and dependent state, he was favored with a short and safe passage home, meeting no molestation on the way. He took with him to the United States as many of the poor, distressed French refugees from Hayti, as his vessel would accommodate. He had resolved to make this his last voyage, and had given up all prospect of ever going to sea again. But being part owner of the vessel, and finding it impossible to sell out without great loss, his partners pressed him to take one voyage more. So he reluctantly consented, and prepared to go.

Gambling.

The New York Independent, in its issue of 5th of Fifth Month, gives its readers a valuable collection of articles on Gambling, written by many prominent individuals for its pages.

The essential vice of gambling is that men play and bet to get something for nothing—"To seek gain or take gain, without an equivalent of service is immoral." "Service is the only just and lawful road to gain. 'He that climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber.'"

Charles F. MacLean, Police Commissioner of New York, says the modern race-course, with all its expensive outfit and costly appurtenances, is an extensive apparatus for gambling. It is stated that within a radius of thirty miles of the City Hall, New York, over nine millions of money have been laid out for the conveniences of horse-racing, besides the vast sums put into racing-stables.

The amount of capital at stake, and the large profits made by those engaged in this demoralizing business, render its suppression correspondingly difficult. This difficulty is shown by the narrative given by Andrew Comstock, of the efforts made by the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice to close these establishments.

The boss gamblers were arrested and convicted in the city of New York; they then opened their places in Queen's County, Long Island City. Strong was the moral stench from these places, that the better portion of the community rallied against them. Evidence was carefully prepared, and complaints and blank warrants drawn. A. C. says: "We found the policemen, sheriff and other officials on friendly terms and patronizing these establishments. Finally warrants were issued by Justice Gilbert, of Brooklyn, and one afternoon we raided these four places and seized several wagon-loads of gambling paraphernalia. I took with me twenty men from the city of New York. I hired these men and took them with me to remove the excuse which I suspected that the Sheriff would at once set up, that 'he had no men to execute the warrants.' I told him that I had the men and the blank commission for him to sign, deputizing them as his assistants.

"While executing these warrants, I, myself was arrested upon a trumped-up charge, made by Coroner Robinson, of that city, and brought before a police Court over a gin-mill. The result of this attempt to interfere with me in the discharge of my duty was my discharge, two days afterwards, when I went before the Grand Jury and had the Police Justice, the Coroner, the officer who arrested me, and the lawyer who had conspired with these men to have me arrested, all indicted.

"Dislodged from Queen's County, these same bosses went to Jerome Park. Here they were again arrested, and fined a paltry $25 each. The same afternoon they went to King's County, and conducted the same business upon the Coney Island Jockey Club race-track."

Under the protection of the Chief of Police, they continued the business, although repeatedly arrested, for several succeeding years, but although convicted, they were not sentenced. In 1857, the Legislature appointed an investigating committee, which reported that the District Attorney of Kings County had systematically and deliberately protected the persons violating the laws from prosecution, and tried to prevent their cases from being brought to trial. But the same year the Legislature passed the infamous Ives Pool Bill, which legalized the very iniquity condemned by the laws and Constitution of New York. No wonder that A. Comstock, in speaking of this act, says: "The Legislature, through the connivance of the Governor, sold out the great Empire State to a fraternity of gamblers and thieves. This was done in the interests of professional criminals."

The practical difficulty there is in closing up these centers of corruption may be estimated from the statement made by John L. Scudder, that the income of the racing association at Guttenberg, from gate money and rental of booths amounts to $10,000 a day.

LITTLE things are little things; but to be faithful in little things is a great thing.

SELECTED.

THE FRIEND'S BURIAL.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

My thoughts are all in yonder town,
Where, wept by many tears,
To-day my mother's friend lays down
The burden of her years.

True as in life, no poor disguise
Of death with her is seen,
And on her simple casket lies
No wreath of bloom and green.

O, not for her the florist's art,
The mocking weeds of woe,
Dear memories in each mourner's heart
Like heaven's white lilies blow.

And all about the softening air
Of new-born sweetness tells,
And the ungathered May-flowers wear
The tints of ocean shells.

The old, assuring miracle
Is fresh as heretofore;
And earth takes up its parable
Of life from death once more.

Here organ swell and church-bell toll
Methinks but discord were—
The prayerful silence of the soul
Is best best fitting her.

No sound should break the quietude
Alike of earth and sky—
O wandering wind in Scabrook wood,
Breathe but a half-heard sigh!

Sing softly, spring-bird, for her sake;
And thou not distant sea,
Lapse lightly as if Jesus spake,
And thou wert Galilee!

For all her quiet life flowed on
As meadow streamlets flow,
Where fresher green reveals alone
The noiseless ways they go.

From her loved place of prayer I see
The plain-robed mourners pass,
With slow feet treading reverently
The graveyard's springing grass.

Make room, O mourning ones, for me,
Where, like the friends of Paul,
That you no more her face shall see
You sorrow most of all.

Her path shall brighten more and more
Unto the perfect day;
She cannot fail of peace who bore
Such peace with her away.

O sweet, calm face that seemed to wear
The look of sins forgiven!
O voice of prayer that seemed to bear
Our own needs up to heaven!

How reverent in our midst she stood,
Or knelt in grateful praise!
What grace of Christian womanhood,
Was in her household ways!

For still her holy living meant
No duty left undone;
The heavenly and the human bent
Their kindred loves in one.

And if her life small leisure found
For feasting ear and eye,
And pleasure, on her daily round,
She passed unpausing by,

Yet with her went a secret sense
Of all things sweet and fair,
And Beauty's gracious providence
Refreshed her unaware.

She kept her line of rectitude
With love's unconscious ease;
Her kindly instincts understood
All gentle courtesies.

An inborn charm of graciousness
Made sweet her smile and tone,
And glorified her simple dress
With beauty not its own.

The dear Lord's best interpreters

Are humble human souls;
The Gospel of a life like hers
Is more than books or scrolls.

From scheme and creed the light goes out,
The saintly fact survives;
The blessed Master none can doubt
Revealed in holy lives.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Mary Ann Kelty's Address.

One word of affectionate and humble suggestion yet remains upon my spirit, to offer to the single-minded and upright among you, of whom I doubt not but there are many. Dear Friends, and honorable descendants of those who "have been succorers of many, and of myself also," suffer the word of exhortation, upon a point wherein it seems to me you are in some danger; especially you who, in early life, are called to minister in holy things. It is that of mixing up the pure, distinct, interior principle of faith in the gift of God, as an invisible and spiritual thing, only to be known, apprehended, believed in, felt, and obeyed, by the inward senses of the new-born creature—I say, it is to be feared, that you occasionally mix and confound this precious, living thing, with the notional, historical knowledge, which is to be picked up from the letter that describes it. If such be the case, you can never hope, whilst it continues, to meet with full acceptance at your Master's hands. He will have no clipping and parsing down of his message. No trimming to suit the religious taste of the times. Remember that it was the marked distinction of the mystery from the history and the vast difference between the birth of Christ in the heart, to mere words and doctrines about it, which formed the whole of the Christianity preached by the primitive Friends; as, in point of fact, it forms the whole truth of the matter; just as the living man, and not his picture, forms the reality of his existence.

You must not suffer yourselves to be deluded with an idea that you are living in better times, as to religion, than your forefathers; and that the apostasy of which they spoke so frequently, and so forcibly, exists no longer; for assuredly, it exists in far greater strength of life than ever. In their times it was not the fashion to be religious; knowledge was more circumscribed; whilst the want of toleration in those who were at the helm of affairs, subjecting conscientious persons to the fiery ordeal of severe persecution, dissent to the authorized and national mode of worship, was then generally the result of deep conviction. But it is not so now—"Many run to and fro, and knowledge is increased;" but with respect to that religion which your ancestors preached and lived, and by the strength of which they were more than conquerors over all their foes, both inward and outward—where is it to be found? With most other religious professors beside yourselves, it has always been, as truth commonly is, a despised and rejected thing. So clearly does all experience confirm the disaffection of mankind for truth, that we might well doubt the value of those religious principles, that met with no opposers.

Take heed then, dear Friends, that you slide not insensibly into the religion of the day. Beware of outwardness in your ministrations. All the world are now worshipping in the outward court; but your profession calls upon you to "measure the temple of God, and the altar, and them that worship within.

"But the court that is without the temple, leave out, and measure it not; for it is given unto the Gentiles;" (Rev. xi: 1, 2.) With them let it remain, and "let the dead bury their dead;" but come ye forth in the strength of the Lord, to fight his battles.

Oh there is much for you to do, and much for every honest-hearted man and woman in the land to do; and that, not by attacking the enemy only in his open and visible camp of vice and abomination; for these are not now his most important strongholds. When there, we see and know what he is about; but he now sits enthroned where we neither see nor suspect his presence; and our eye must be opened of the Lord; and our arm strengthened to resist him with a double portion of the spirit of holiness and power, if we hope to conquer him now. In a word, he has clothed himself with the mantle of religion. He has laid aside for awhile the character of "the roaring lion going about seeking whom he may devour;" for he has found out something in these intellectual times, which better answers his purpose. Satan is now the theologian.

Every thing favors his assumption of this character. There is no fiery ordeal of persecution to try the power of the spirits that are "up and doing." And where is the appointed and proper antagonist of the serpent? Where is the living spirit of the living God? Where is he who, in Elijah of old, troubled the false Israel, and who separated between the worshippers of Beal and of God? Alas! must it not be said that "Ephraim hath mixed himself with the people?" Is not the pleasant plant of the Lord crushed under the heavy weight of lifeless words and barren doctrines? Is not the deliverer silenced, and the usurper, who has assumed his likeness and stolen his sayings, set above him? Is there not, with much variation in the description of it, yet virtually but one way, and one faith, and that a letter-learned and an outside faith? And is it not the work of the deceiver to keep it on the outside and to imprison it in the letter? Ah! doubt it not. Doubt not but he (this subtle theologian) will furnish a religion for the religious world; doubt not, but he will supply them with a plentiful store of external doctrine—an abundant flow of letter-learning—and an amplification of manuals of head-divinity.

It is his day—his triumphant day—though the darkest hour of midnight upon the true Church of God; which sits, indeed, "like a pelican in the wilderness, or like the lonely sparrow on the housetop," mourning for her beloved.

What doth that desolate widow see, in all the pomp and paraphernalia of these imposing times? What does she hear in the din, and bustle, and talk about moral improvement? What doth she feel, when the way to the kingdom is made like the highways in the natural world, of such railroad facility, that a man may hear, and read, and talk himself into it, at pleasure?

Oh, doth she not say in the spirits of the faithful, "How is the gold become dim! how is the most fine gold changed! the stones of the sanctuary are poured out in the top of every street?" And oh, especially, to you, ye children of "her Nazarets, who were purer than snow—whiter than milk—and whose polishing was of sapphires"—doth she not cry, "Awake—awake—shake yourselves from the dust—loose yourselves from the bands of your neck, ye captive children of Zion?"

Doth she not say—"Stand up and plead my

FROM THE "SUNDAY-SCHOOL TIMES."
 The Petrie Greek Papyrus.

BY J. F. MAHAFFY.

The Petrie papyrus, which I have been separating, deciphering and sorting for the last eighteen months, were not found lying inside the coffins, but were actually the coffins themselves. For in Egypt wood was scarce; every tree was required either for fruit or for shade, and so we may assume that wood for such purposes as coffins would be expensive, and not easily procured. Hence the coffin-makers devised the ingenious expedient of molding the coffin to fit the human form by laying together layers of paper, either simply or with glue, and then covering the surface, on both sides, with a coat of Nile mud, upon which they printed designs and figures. Such were the coffins used in the village now represented by the mounds called Tell Gurob, from which Petrie took some thirty or forty of these cases. Finding, while examining the fractures of one of the cases, that edges of papyrus with writing appeared within, he began to separate the layers, and found pieces and patches of writing. Here, then, was the possibility of a great discovery.

But the separation of the layers is a task of great delicacy and difficulty. In the first place, the outer coat of clay or mud must be washed off; and when the writing is turned outward, it is almost impossible to wash off the clay without effacing the writing. Again, where glue was employed, not only is it hopeless to sever the layers without destroying them, but the whole texture is riddled by worms, which have gone in search of the glue, and have reduced the papyrus almost to powder. M. Petrie, in spite of these difficulties, succeeded in separating many pieces, seldom large pieces; for the coffin-makers cut up the rolls or pages in order to lay them conveniently around the curved surfaces of the case, which imitated the human figure in a rough way. Often, of course, we were able to find pieces of the same document severed, and so brought together the parts of shattered sentences.

When Petrie returned, last autumn, to Egypt, to prosecute his researches, he sent me a considerable number of head pieces and feet pieces and breast surfaces, all painted to imitate a draped or swathed human figure. It is in the separating of these, the deciphering of them, and the explanation of them, that I have spent one of the most interesting years of my life.

The great majority of the fragments are portions of household accounts, often different accounts on back and front, and seldom, if ever, found complete. To supply the missing part of an account, is, of course, impossible; and so we have not been able to obtain much by this great body of fragments.

We have also recovered a large assortment of the symbols used for figures by these Greeks. More important is the large list of proper names, Egyptian, Greek, Macedonian, nay, even Persian and Jewish; for these nationalities were comprised in the great mixture of peoples whom Alexander settled in his new kingdom on the Nile.

If so much can be gained from fragments of accounts, may we not expect more from papers of higher interest? I shall begin to ascend the scale, and say a word concerning the contracts, or records of legal arrangements, which are only fragments, also. They give us accurate dates, so fixing beyond cavil the great age of the manuscripts. They give us the names of the witnesses, generally for loans of money, payment of which in money, or in kind, is promised at a fixed date. We find a penalty of fifty per cent. added to the debt, in case of delay. We read that the contract, signed and sealed, is delivered either to a special keeper of records, or, in his absence, into the care of one of the witnesses, who undertakes to produce it in Court.

Together with these contracts, I may mention a whole nest of wills, which, like most of these legal papers, must evidently have been official duplicates, written for the purposes of a court of archives, and not for the very autographs themselves. This is clear from the fact of their appearing in series, one beneath the other, on the columns of the papyrus rolls, and written, not in separate hands, but by the same clerk, upon their roll. We have the solemn dating of these wills by the reigning king (either the second or the third Ptolemy), and queen, and by the priest of Alexander, and the priestess of the deified Arsinoe, queen of the second Ptolemy. This priest and priestess were annual, and their names marked the year, when there was no fixed and universal era, like our B. C. or A. D. Then comes the description of the testator, almost always a veteran with scars, a Greek, a Macedonian, a Carian, a Thracian, as the case may be, of such an age, of such a complexion and hair. Then the formula: "May I be vouchsafed to live on in good health, and mind my own affairs; but should anything human happen to me, I bequeath," etc. There is not one word of religion in this formula; not one hint that the Ptolemaic Greek expected, like the old Egyptian, to be judged hereafter according to his works.

It was a godless society, worshipping no higher deities than their deified kings and queens, and sometimes bequeathing money for their worship,—never, so far as I have gone, for any charitable or useful public object.

The property bequeathed is not often specified, the usual form being: "All that I have I leave to my son, and nothing to anybody else." When particulars are given, and not lost by the fractures of the papyrus, we find them very various.

"My house in Alexandria," "my property in the potteries," in the lime-kilns near Arsinoe," "the money I have out at interest," "my horse and armor," etc. In one case a number of special articles of dress and of ornament are enumerated, which came in with a wife's dowry, and which the son and heir must return or pay for. There follows usually the appointment of the crown as executor, probably on account of the military character of the colonists, and then six witnesses, described as to their rank and appearance.

The private correspondence, or, rather, I should say, the letters from private individuals, are very various. We have letters from a son to his father, inquiring affectionately for his health, begging him to come to see the writer, and giving an account of his money allowances; we have letters of introduction, but very mutilated. More frequently are the business letters, especially to Cleon, the chief architect or surveyor-general of the province, concerning quarries and canals, concerning complaints of workmen, and the injustices of overseers. So also to the governor of the province, Aphthonctus, we have several petitions begging him to hear the case which had been laid before him, and not leave the writers in distress or in jail. It is evident that the law's delays were serious indeed, when there was no habeas corpus act, and the complainant tells us that he was pining away in confinement. We have also the complaints of various officials that they are subject to expenses which they cannot cause! be valiant for the truth upon the earth?" Doth see not remind you that a cross is to be borne—a cross that gives offence—even the cross of boldly testifying to the light within. This is the stone of stumbling, and rock of offence. Oh, beware that you pass it not by, as that with which you have nothing to do! The faithful minister of truth must give offence, and if he gives it not, he cannot give the truth of God.

"If I yet pleased men," says Paul, "I should not be the servant of Christ." (Gal. i: 10.) Beware then that you suffer not the subtle serpent to beguile you with seducing words, as though your ministry should be such as suits the fashion of the day. Harken not to him, when he fixes upon some roughness in the shell, and so would enjoin you to believe, there was no soundness in the fruit your ancestors brought forth. Rude and unpolished as to the outward, no doubt, many of them were—but all glorious within, their clothing was of wrought gold, in the eyes of Him who "is fairer than the children of men."

Yes, ye departed saints—ye spirits of the just made perfect, how beautiful to the enlightened eye is your memorial! Ye were God's building; and of that edifice which the Almighty rears; how truly doth one amongst you thus express the character.*

"Into thy holy building, O God! into thy heavenly building, into the spiritual Jerusalem, which thou rearest and buildest up in the Spirit, no unclean or defiled thing can enter; nor is there any room there for that which loves and makes a lie! Without, indeed, are swine and dogs, vulturous eyes, and crooked serpents, who make a show of what they are not, and lay claim to that which belongs not to them. But within are the children—within is the heavenly birth, even the new creation of God in Christ Jesus.

"For God doth not strip his people, and gather them out of the spirit of this world, that they should be empty and desolate for ever; but He gathers them into, and fills them with his own Spirit; fills them with light, fills them with life, fills them with holiness, fills them with righteousness, fills them with peace and joy in believing and obeying the Gospel!

"And in this Spirit is the kingdom known, which is not of this world—the inward kingdom, the spiritual kingdom, the everlasting kingdom!—where the everlasting throne is near, and the everlasting power revealed! and the Lord God Omnipotent reigns in the hearts of his! and other lords do not reign, but their horns are broken—and the horn of God's Anointed exalteth, who sits ruling as king on his holy hill of Zion!—and they that have suffered with Him, and gone through great tribulation, do reign with Him—blessed be his name for ever! Amen!"

Such, dear Friends, was the testimony of one who had been a workman in the raising of this holy edifice—"a workman that needed not to be ashamed." Oh that the same Holy Spirit which spoke and taught in him, may rest upon you; and that in this day of outwardness of observation—and cry of lo here! and lo there! you may be found faithful—giving forth that, and that only which you have received, and that not of man, nor by any of the natural workings of your own minds; "but by the revelation of Jesus Christ!"

beast. Thus the royal gooseherds write to complain that a requisition of sixteen geese had been made by an official visiting the district.—I suppose for his entertainments, and that, if this kind of thing is allowed to go on, they will be unable to perform their duties to the king.

We have on small scraps receipts to bankers, or bankers' agents, for money; receipts for donkey boys or coachmen for fodder and for pay; depositions of witnesses in lawsuits,—all of them mutilated, but all of them sufficient to give us glimpses into the life of the rich province of the Fayoum at this period of its occupation by the veterans of the Ptolemies and by the Jews.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Ocean Depths.—The researches and especially the deep sea soundings of late times have given us much information respecting the floor of the ocean. Although there are some submarine mountains and deep valleys, yet the general surface of the ocean bottom is that of a gently undulating plain. The average depth of all the oceans is somewhat less than two and a half miles. The Pacific Ocean averages about 1,100 feet deeper than the Atlantic. The North Atlantic is deeper than the South Atlantic; and the Arctic Ocean grows shallower as the Pole is approached.

The sea bed for hundreds of miles from land has been filled up to an enormous extent by the dark-colored soft muds brought down by the Congo and Niger Rivers.

The naturalists on the fish steamer Albatross in the Pacific have found that the forms of sea life in the upper waters may descend to a depth of about 1,200 feet; and that then there succeeds a barren zone, and no animals are found till within about 300 feet of the bottom.

In the Black Sea there is no organic life below a depth of 600 feet, the lower stratum of water being impregnated with sulphuretted hydrogen.

The Banana Trade.—Four years ago H. Duomois & Co. purchased thirty-five square miles of forest land in Cuba. They have cleared about half of the land and planted 9,600 acres with bananas—2,400,000 fruit-bearing trees. During the busy season a vessel load of bananas arrives in New York almost daily and discharges her cargo of 12,000 bunches. The company, it is said, will export from Cuba the present year 1,500,000 bunches of bananas.

A Saw-mill Accident.—In sawing an ash log in a mill at Xenia, Ohio, a sound was heard which created some alarm, and it was found that every tooth of the large saw in the mill was gone, leaving nothing but a round piece of steel. When the log was split open, buried in its very heart was found an iron wedge, which the saw had cut in two. The log was 24 feet through, and the wedge had been in the tree evidently for as many as fifty years.

A Mathematical Prodigy.—Reuben Field, a native of Missouri, is a strong, heavy-set man of forty-five. He has never been at school, because regarded as an idiot. He can neither read nor write, and his reasoning powers have never been developed. But he is able, as if by instinct, to solve difficult arithmetical problems. He has been given such problems as the following: "The circumference of the earth is in round numbers 25,000 miles. How many faxes, allowing 12 to the inch, will it require to reach around it?" Although ignorant of figures on the blackboard, within a minute he returns the answer—19,008,000,000. If the distance to the sun, or any of the planets, is taken, he answers with as great ease.

What is still more remarkable is, that he can tell the time at any hour, day or night, without missing it even one minute. If awakened out of deep sleep in the darkness of night, and asked the time, he gives it at once.

The above account was furnished to the Scientific American by N. T. Allison, of Columbus, Kansas.

Language Among Dogs.—Probably one of the most convincing and remarkable evidences that animals can talk to each other was witnessed a few days ago on the farm of William Seymore. Seymore has two dogs which are accustomed to remain in the barns and have become firm friends with the horses. To such an extent has this friendship progressed that when any of the horses or either of the dogs have been away from home for any time, immediately on their return they rush together and rub noses and give other evidence of delight at meeting. The dogs and horses go to the pasture together and return home at evening in company. This remarkable and close friendship has been noted by many and much commented upon, but the climax was reached when one of the dogs came rushing from a small piece of timber about half a mile from the barn. He ran hurriedly up to the other dog and whined and barked in a queer manner and then ran to the house.

The second dog at once jumped to his feet and started off on a run to the woods as fast as he could go. The first dog hunted around the place until he found Seymore, and then by barks and strange antics attracted his attention and started back toward the timber.

Seymore paid little attention to him until he was told what had occurred at the barn, where the two dogs apparently held conversation, and then he followed to the woods. The dog went straight into the woods, and there Seymore found that one of his horses had fallen down in a small water-course, which was so narrow and steep that it was impossible for the animal to rise.

The horse was lying perfectly still, while the second dog was sitting at its head licking its face and showing by its attentions that it intended to comfort the horse all that was in its power. The fact that the horse was lying in an out-of-the-way place, with the additional fact that the second dog did not hesitate, but went directly to where it had fallen, was plain evidence of the fact that the first dog had told the story and given directions for finding the horse that was in trouble.

Selected for "THE FRIEND."

There is one thing it would be well to remember, and I pray the Lord to help me to recollect it and act accordingly—which is when any thing presents itself to the mind as being wrong, and then doubts arise as whether this feeling may not be a mistake; for instance, in eating, we may think we have enough, but still want more; then I say it is the time to remember that our stay in this world is short, and that it is better to deny ourselves a small gratification than to be in danger of disobeying the voice of Christ—that inward monitor. If we were more spiritual we should not find so much difficulty in denying self. I never feel better satisfied than when on such occasions I give up and take up the Cross as to that particular. Surely this satisfactory feeling must be the consequence of well doing.

Distribution of Friends' Books.

A few months since, a copy of a "Piety Promoted," vol. 5, the new collection of Biographical Sketches, issued last year by the Book Committee, was sent to a Friend residing in Australia. It drew from him the following appreciative response:

First Month 18th, 1892.

DEAR FRIEND:—Though unknown to me, yet beloved for the Gospel's sake, I write to thank thee for the volume received some time back—"Piety Promoted," vol. 5—and thank thee very heartily. The design of the work strikes me as very good and it is carried out excellently, although of some of the characters one longs to learn more details; they seem to have been so lovely, made so interesting they were "the white linen which is the righteousness of saints," the "beauty of holiness." To me there has always been a special attractiveness in the lives and the piety of your people; more particularly so in the case of those in humbler life, the country people as distinct from those dwelling in cities.

My own lot has always been to dwell in towns, and to follow trade, but my desires were towards a country life and for country meetings. In your land, it seems to me, you have been favored with a succession of gifted worthies who, sprung from rural life and the simpler customs of such life, have shown forth the beauty of the Quaker ideal worthily, and labored nobly in the cause of Truth. All honor to such. May America never be without such witnesses, and may the standard of Quakerism which is the noblest, simplest, purest, and completest Christianity extant, long be maintained and displayed before the world, which seems more and more to need its beneficent principles.

We are only a small body in this land of Australia, scattered widely and isolated, but we are trying to build up so far as we can, and at any rate to resist the detriering effects of modern worldliness. What the future of our Society may be none can tell, only we trust the great Head of the Church to work out his own purposes in his own way and time. We of the earlier and the pioneers of the Society are fast passing away, few are now left, and very few years will see all gone from this scene. Will the younger generation, who have known nothing by experience of the English Meetings and corporate life that is connected therewith, will they retain the distinctive character of the Body, or will they seek to assimilate it to the models they see around them? Who can tell?

Though we have no communication with Philadelphia, yet we feel there exists a bond that unites us, and a real interest in your welfare; from some of the other Yearly Meetings of your continent we have occasionally received very kindly greetings.

Again thanking thee for thy very welcome gift, which has been entirely and appreciatively read and which forms a frequent companion, and profitable,

I desire to remain thy friend,

J. A. HORSFALL,

THE doctrine of the Gospel, that we must be made free from sin; and the dangerous consequence of supposing that we may continue in sin with impunity, because Christ suffered for our sins, the just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God, was brought to view.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Suffering for the Truth.

The following letter, addressed to Margaret Haines, a woman much esteemed in her generation, was written by a Friend who suffered imprisonment on account of our testimony against war, having read, under appointment, at the close of the public meeting, a document issued by the Meeting for Sufferings, dissuading Friends from taking part in the Revolutionary struggle, or enlisting in such service. J. E. K.

DEAR FRIEND:

Thine of the 18th ult. came to hand, the contents whereof were very acceptable, and are gratefully remembered, and as thou was pleased to mention in the postscript, thy apprehension of my unscrupulousness toward thee in time past, and my companions having wrote to thee a few days since, conceive it to be my duty to trouble thee with the following lines, to remove thy suspicion of unkindness. I may now inform thee, that through the mercy of the all-wise Giver and Dispenser of every good and perfect gift, that I continue to enjoy my health, and to witness patience in a good degree to bear the present treatment which the present adversaries of Truth have been permitted to inflict on me, and have to acknowledge that such is the condescension of Him, whom I desire to serve, that I am at times made to partake of that peace which our Lord promised to give unto his followers; where the prison house is as a pleasant place, and the iron grates and huge bolts, which strike terror in the transgressor, appear as ornaments to the room; and as affliction hath a tendency to humble the creaturely part in us, have a hope at times that I may so improve under the present dispensation, as to witness my heart yet more contrited, and my natural will thoroughly subjected to the will of the great Creator—a state which I believe to be attainable, as we patiently abide under the operation of that Power, which is able to regulate and bring us into right order before Him. Thus having expressed myself to one whom I esteem to be a mother in Israel, shall conclude with saying, that should be pleased thou would be so far disengaged from the many things, as to pay a visit to my dear wife, and with my kind love remain thy obliged and

P. S.—My fellow prisoner desires his love to thee, and may add for thy information, that we are at present engaged in necessary business, which we believe is better than to spend our time idly. T. R.

In a recent article in the "Magazine of Christian Literature," Marvin R. Vincent, D.D., uses the following language in speaking of the Bible:

It even nowhere calls itself by itself, the Word of God; the fact that it insists on experience rather than on knowledge, or on knowledge through experience; the fact that it emphasizes character above all things and gathers up its whole teaching into the perfect manhood of Jesus Christ—all this seems to me to be pointing to one truth, which has been blurred and hidden by the smoke of the fierce conflict over the Book—the truth that God's great primary purpose in revelation was not to set forth a book, but to set forth a God-man, to the end that men might believe on the Lord Jesus, might be conformed to the image of the Eternal Son, and might thus be saved.

Christ is more than the Book; to be in Christ and like Christ is more than to have a correct theory of inspiration; and the great consummation of God's movement in human history, while it will gloriously vindicate the truthfulness of the Book, will be not the Book on the throne but the Lamb in the midst of the throne, with every knee bent and every tongue confessing that Christ is Lord.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Happiness.

What a pity! pity indeed, that God's creatures—creatures of intelligence should fail to agree with Him in the matter of being happy. Man was not made to be miserable, when, around him his Creator and all-wise Benefactor has scattered blessings innumerable.

Look abroad now and behold the beauties of the out-door world! Who cannot but with admiration exclaim—"The rolling year is full of thee. Forth in the pleasing spring thy beauty walks. Thy tenderness and love." With all the loveliness and beauty which mortals behold, how strange that any should fail "to look through nature up to nature's God!"—failing to love Him because of not knowing Him? Not having the heart's affections placed upon Him, who alone is worthy of love supreme. Christians should meditate in his law in order to enjoy Him—talk of his wondrous works, harmonize in feeling with the man of olden time, who, inspired of God, said—"Walk about Zion, and go round about her; tell the towers thereof. Mark well her bulwarks, consider her palaces; tell it to the generation following. For this God is our God for ever and ever: He will be our guide even unto death."

This constitutes true happiness. "This is life eternal—to know thee the only true God and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent."

Items.

The Tract Association of Friends of Philadelphia.—From the printed report of this Association for the year ending Third Month 1, 1892, we learn that the distribution of tracts during the past year was 99,863. They had also disposed of 4,493 Almanacs, 1,123 Sermon on the Mount, 996 Proverbs of Solomon, 6,187 Juvenile Books, 119 Biographical Sketches and Anecdotes, 112 Meetings and Memorials, and sundry other of their publications.

Four of the series of tracts have been cancelled and new ones put in their place. A change has also been made in the series for children.

The receipts for the year have been $923.11, and the expenditures $984.68.

The present series includes 177 different tracts, of which furnish a large variety of interesting and valuable reading matter, adapted to various states and conditions. Any Friends desiring tracts for distribution can obtain them by calling at the Book Store, No. 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, or by sending a written request to the agent, Jacob Smedley, at that address.

We recommend the subject to the notice of our readers.

Exhibition of Indians.—The Indian Rights Association has sent to the President of the United States a remonstrance against permitting a theatrical company to take from their reservation a party of "Siam" to exhibit in exhibition purposes. It was drawn forth by information that the Secretary of the Interior had granted such authority to a "Wild West Company."

London Yearly Meeting.—The London Friend of Fourth Month 29th, contains a communication suggesting that the Yearly Meeting be sometimes held at other places than London, so as to give the great body of Friends who reside in the North of England a better opportunity for attending once in a while. The time and cost now required prevent many of those at a distance from going to the annual solemnity.

War.—William B. Osborne, a Methodist minister, writing from London to the Christian Standard of this city, thus remarks: "For one I am weary of this horrible science of war, and never more so than since I have been in London, where the great cathedrals and parks and public places are filled with statues and monuments of the great captains and heroes in the numberless wars that England has waged on every sea and land beneath the sun for more than a thousand years—some of them for the most infamous purposes, such as forcing the opium course on China, and us have done with this worship of the god of War."

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 28, 1892.

In 1844, the late William Evans paid a religious visit in New York State. In his Journal he gives the following notice of exercises at Farmington:

"Was at the meeting at Farmington, composed chiefly of Friends, who are warm and active advocates for the freedom of the colored people, and of the total disuse of ardent spirits. They spend much time in discussing these topics; lecturing upon them, and attending meetings held for the purpose. There is reason to fear, that dwelling almost exclusively upon these subjects, there is a danger of getting from under the government of Truth; and that daily exercise of mind which is necessary for our spiritual growth; in which the voice of the true Shepherd is heard, and we are led along by Him in the way and work which He allots to the various members of his Church."

We believe the Spirit of Christ raises a testimony in the hearts of his children against slavery, intemperance and other moral evils; and that they are often called upon to take active measures in opposition to them; but yet in these things, as well as in the ordinary business of life, and in intellectual and scientific pursuits, a care is needed to maintain that daily exercise of mind and watching to hear the voice of the true Shepherd "which is necessary for our spiritual growth." This humble and submissive state is often irksome and distasteful, and persons gladly turn from it to some more active engagement, which, not being the thing called for at the time by our Heavenly Father, will not yield true peace. We apprehend there are few persons of much religious experience who have not been conscious of this danger, and been tempted to turn from that deep introversion of mind into which the spirit would lead them, and to substitute for it, reading the Scriptures, religious conversation, or some other thing which had a show of good. Not but what these things are right in themselves in their proper place and season, but are used in such cases as excuses to shun the appointed work of the soul at the time.

We believe a care on this point is needful for Yearly Meetings as well as for individuals. The crown of our religious assemblies is the presence of a Divine Power, which brings the living members into exercise and travail for the growth of their members in religious experience, and for the arising into dominion of the life of Christ. This travail of spirit should be maintained throughout their sittings, even in the transaction of the more formal parts of the business. There is evidently at the present day a tendency to substitute for this, attention to various schemes of benevolence or moral reform, embracing such subjects as peace, temperance, education, the use of tobacco, &c. We recently saw a letter from an intelligent Friend in England, who said, that such philanthropic subjects "fill up our meetings, till true discipline stands afar off, and equity cannot enter or true judgment prevail."

It is not surprising that such results should follow, for these subjects appeal to our natural benevolent feelings, and many persons feel themselves at liberty to express their views thereon, who would hesitate to give utterance to remarks on more weighty matters, unless they felt a clearer evidence of Divine requiring. The consequence is, that the religious weight of the meeting is lowered, and it becomes in less degree a season for spiritual refreshment.

The following information has been forwarded for insertion in "THE FRIEND," by our friend John W. Foster, of Westerly, Rhode Island: New England Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at Westerly, R. I., will commence with Secret Meeting on the 11th of Sixth Month, 1892, at 11 A. M.; Public Meetings on First-day the 12th, and Meetings for Business on the 13th.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It has been announced at the State Department that the American personnel of the Berlin arbitration has been appointed. As heretofore announced, the arbitrators on the part of the United States are Justice John M. Harlan and Senator John T. Morgan. Ex-Minister John W. Foster is the agent of the United States. He will have charge of the preparation of the case and counter-case, and be the official representative of the United States before the Board of Arbitration. The counsel for the United States consist of ex-Minister E. J. Phelps, James C. Carter, of New York, and Judge Henry W. Blodgett, of Chicago.

President Harrison issued a proclamation on the 20th inst., informing the people of the United States that Guatemala had established reciprocity with this country, and naming the articles that will in future be admitted free of duty to the Central American Republic.

It is announced that the Spanish Government has raised the embargo against American pork.

The low-lying portions of Sioux City, Iowa, were inundated on the morning of the 18th inst., by a "great wave" due, perhaps, to a cloud burst coming down the Floyd River, which flows through the centre of the city. A warning of the approaching flood was given, but few of the inhabitants heard it. Within an incredibly short space of time the water had risen above the first floors, and the people felt panic-stricken to the higher ground. It is reported that thirty-nine persons were drowned, and 8,000 persons are said to have been driven from their homes.

The flood swept the Union Stock Yards away, destroying many houses in the city and damaged railroad property to the extent of $200,000.

The Sioux City, Iowa, Relief Committee have decided to issue an appeal to the benevolent people of the country for aid, it having been ascertained that the losses by the floods far exceed the first estimates. The liquor sellers of Sioux City, Iowa, recently closed by Mayor Pierce, have offered the city $10,000 for the flood fund if allowed to resume business. The mayor has refused to consider the offer.

An estimate of the financial loss caused by the flood in the upper Mississippi River has been made and the figures are astounding. They show St. Louis County, $3,000,000; St. Louis city, $1,000,000; St. Charles County, $2,000,000; the American Bottom, from Alton, Ill., to Cairo, $5,000,000. Totals, $11,000,000.

The Secretary of War has authorized the Chief Engineer to use Government boats against all Western rivers to save human life, when residents of the flooded districts are in danger.

The Colfax West Side Citizen states that platinum has been discovered in the Black Hills near Rapid City, S. D.

A number of stone idols, supposed to be 600 years old, and of a type differing from any heretofore discovered, have been unearthed among Aztec ruins in New Mexico.

The number of deaths reported in this city last week was 432: 229 males and 203 females. (The previous week there were 443, and the week ending Fifth Mo. 14, 1891, there were 423.) From consumption there were 47 deaths; pneumonia, 46; diphtheria, 31; diarrhoea of the infantile age, 19; casualties, 17; scarlet fever, 16; marasmus, 15; apoplexy, 14; Bright's disease, 13; inflammation of the brain, 13; bronchitis, 13; convulsions, 11; inanition, 11, and cholera infantum, 10.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 100 a 102; 4's, 117 a 118; cotton, 10 1/2 a 110.

COTTON was sold but steady, on a basis of 75c. per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter bran, in bulk, $17.50 a $18.50; spring do, in bulk, spot, $17.00 a $17.50.

FOREIGN.—Lord Salisbury, in a speech which he delivered in the House of Commons at Hastings, counselled the working men to follow the example set them by nations and substitute arbitration for the violent methods which were sometimes adopted for settling labor disputes.

He said that a grave matter, in which the prosperity of our country was involved, was the question of free trade. "The attitude which I have taken in regard to it disloyal to the glorious and sacred doctrines of free trade to levy duties on anybody for the sake of anything we get thereby, may be noble, but it is not businesslike. On these terms you will and do get nothing. If you intend to try to own in this conflict of tariffs, you must be prepared to give to all nations who injure you access to your markets. We complain most of the United States, and it happens that the United States mainly furnishes us with articles which are essential to the good of the people, and with raw material which is essential to our manufactures. We cannot exclude either without serious injury to ourselves. I am not prepared, in order to punish other countries, to inflict dangerous wounds on ourselves. We must confine ourselves to those matters wherein we will not suffer much whether importation continues or diminishes. While we cannot raise the price of food and raw material to the enormous rates of imports, such as wine, spirits, silk, glass, and furs, from countries besides the United States, which are merely luxuries, and of which a diminished consumption could be risked in order to secure access to the markets of our neighbors. I shall expect to be excommunicated for propounding such a doctrine, but I am bound to say that I think the free traders have gone too far."

The Durium Miners' Federation has issued a manifesto, which says that the attempt to effect a settlement with the masters has failed; that the deadlock has consequently been accentuated, and that the whole country is in a state of war and that struggling and inevitable rests upon the masters. The manifesto implores the men "not to resort to violence, although the masters intend to starve you into acceptance of their terms," and concludes with an appeal for subscriptions.

Great sympathy is expressed with the miners since the masters refused a ten per cent. advance in pay.

Baron de Worms, Parliamentary Secretary of the Colonial Office, read a telegram in the House of Commons on the afternoon of the 20th inst., fully confirming the terrible hurricane at Martinique. The dispatch read by Baron de Worms said that one-third of the capital city, Port Louis, was destroyed. Among the buildings wrecked were the Royal College and twenty-four worship-houses. Many sugar mills in the country were completely demolished, and the valuable machinery employed in the grinding of the cane and in boiling the product, vacuum pans, centrifugals, &c., were badly damaged.

It is known says the dispatch, that in the city of Port Louis alone 600 persons were killed. In the various country districts thus far heard from 300 persons lost their lives, and these figures are more than likely to be added to when news is received from the remote districts in the mountains. It is believed that when the death roll is completed it will be found that over 1,200 persons were killed in this most dreadful of all hurricanes that have visited the island.

The reduction of the French bank rate, which has stood at three since Second Month, 1889, and only changed eight times in ten years, together with the expected lowering of the Berlin rate, proves that the plethora of the money is universal. The French bank holds gold of the value of £61,500,000, and silver to the amount of £31,500,000. Credit speculation appears to be suffering throughout the world.

Since the Franco-Prussian war Germany has spent $2,200,000,000 on her army and navy.

Gatchkowsky, the proprietor of the quack medicine "Vitaline," the use of which is alleged to have caused the death of General Gresser, Prefect of St. Petersburg, and a number of other Russians high in authority, has been released by the police. His release was made pending an analysis of the alleged cure-all.

The London Telegraph's Vienna correspondent says: "There is no doubt that General Gresser, the Police Prefect of St. Petersburg, was the victim of a plot, of which Gatchkowsky was innocent, and that the plot was discovered with the 'Vitaline,' of which General Gresser was treated. Two plans had been formed to remove Gresser within the past six months. His treatment of criminals and suspects was barbarous. He addressed authors and journalists like common laborers, and often banished them without a trial. He introduced the system of torture of non-political prisoners in all prisons. All attempts to persuade the Emperor to remove him failed."

Dispatches have been received in Odessa telling of a catastrophe caused by an earthquake in Transcaucasia. Three villages near Evian have been destroyed and twenty-seven persons have been killed and a large number injured.

A dispatch from Teheran states that cholera is raging along the Afghan-Persian frontier for a distance of a hundred miles south of Meshed.

DIED, at the residence of his son-in-law, Nathan Hill, Jewell County, Kansas, Second Month 16th 1892, of paralysis, THOMAS PICKETT, aged seventy-eight years and three months, a member of Walnut Creek Monthly Meeting. He had been paralyzed in one side for over four years, and often said, when the right time came he would be glad to be released, but hoped he might have patience to wait until the right time. He was a diligent attender of meetings as long as he was able, and was often concerned to exhort Friends to more faithfulness in the discharge of every duty. He was a strong believer in the ancient faith, and his many dear friends have a well grounded hope that his end was peace.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 259.

It is a precious truth that the love of God extends to all the creatures He has made, and that the visitations of his grace are bestowed upon all mankind—even upon those who are ignorant of the coming of our Saviour in the flesh. No one doubts, that among most nations, there are found some forms of religious worship, and some things which are revered as sacred. But this has been denied by superficial observers to be the case with a few of the more degraded races, especially with the natives of Australia.

When John G. Paton, the New Hebrides missionary, was travelling in Australia he determined to investigate this point. He had with him some small stone idols which he had brought with him from New Hebrides. Visiting an encampment of the natives in Victoria, he says:

Two of them spoke English fairly well. I managed to break through their reticence, and in course of time they told us freely about the customs and traditions of their people. They took us to their "doctor," or Sacred Man, who was lying sick in his hut. Half concealed among the skins and clothes behind him, I observed several curious bags, which I knew at once would probably contain the little idols of which I was in quest. I urged the witnesses who accompanied me to take special notice of everything that occurred, and draw up and sign a statement for my future use. The following is their attested report:

"Mr. Paton having carefully explained to the blacks, that he would like to see some of the sacred objects which they said made the people sick and well, assured them that his aim was not to mock at them, but to prove to white people that the blacks had objects of worship and were not like pigs and dogs. He offered them a number of small pieces of silver to get bread and tea for the 'doctor,' if they would open these little bags and let us see what was in them. After a good deal of talk amongst themselves, he took some of the island stone-gods from his pocket, saying, 'I know that these bags have such things in them.' An aboriginal woman exclaimed, 'You can't hide them from that fellow! He knows all about us.' Mr. Rutherford offered to kill a sheep, and give them sugar and tea to feast on, if they would open the little bags, but they refused. After consulting the Sacred Man, however, he took the silver pieces and allowed them to be opened before us. They were full of exactly such stones and other things as Mr. Paton had brought from the islands, to prove to white people in Melbourne that they were not like dogs, but had gods; he offered the Sacred Man more money for four of the objects he had seen. After much talk among themselves, he took the money; and in our presence Mr. Paton selected a stone idol, a piece of painted wood of conical shape, a piece of bone of human leg with seven rings curved round it, which they said had the power of restoring sick people to health, and another piece of painted wood which made people sick; but they made him solemnly promise that he would tell no other black fellows where he got them.

"On returning to Horsbarn, I informed my dear friends, Rev. P. Simpson and his excellent lady, of my exploits and possessions. He replied—

"There is a black 'doctor' gone round our house just now to see one of his people who is washing here to-day. Let us go and test them, whether they know these objects."

"Carrying them in his hand we went to them. The woman instantly on perceiving them dropped what she was washing, and turned away in instinctive terror. Mr. Simpson asked—

"Have you ever before seen stones like these?"

"The wily 'doctor' replied, 'Plenty on the plains, where I kick them out of my way.'

"Taking others out of my pocket, I said, 'These make people sick and well, don't they?'

"His rage overcame his duplicity, and he exclaimed, 'What black fellow give you these? If I know him I do for him!'

"The woman, looking the picture of terror, and pointing to one of the objects, cried—

"That fellow no good! He kill men. No good, no good! Me too much afraid."

"Then, looking to me she said, pointing with her finger, 'That fellow savvy (knows) too much! No white man see them. He no good.'"

An intelligent native, on being asked how it was that a European settler who had long lived among them, had never heard of or seen these things before, was told—

"Long ago white men laughed at black fellows praying to their idols. Black fellows said, white men never see them again! Suppose this white man know all about them, he would not now see them. No white men live now have seen what you have seen."

On this subject, Paton makes the following comment:

"Thus it has been demonstrated on the spot, and in presence of the most reliable witnesses, that the aborigines, before they saw the white invaders, were not 'brutes' incapable of knowing God, but human beings, yearning after a god of some kind. Nor do I believe that any tribe of men will ever be found, who, when their language and customs are rightly interpreted, will not display their consciousness of the need of a God and that Divine capacity of holding fellowship with the unseen powers, of which the brutes are without one faintest trace."

When J. G. Paton settled on the island of Aniwa in the New Hebrides, the natives would not permit him to occupy a position which he had selected, but compelled him to take another. He says:

"At first we had no idea why they so determinedly refused us one site, and fixed us to another of their own choice. But after the old chief, Namakei, became a Christian, he one day addressed the Aniwan people in our hearing, to this effect:

"When Missi came we saw his boxes. We knew he had blankets and calico, axes and knives, fish-hooks and all such things. We said, 'Don't drive him off, else we will lose all these things. We will let him land. But we will force him to live on the Sacred Plot. Our gods will kill him, and we will divide all that he has amongst the men of Aniwa.' But Missi built his house on our most sacred spot. He and his people lived there, and the gods did not strike. He planted bananas there, and we said, 'Now when they eat of these they will all drop down dead, as our fathers assured us, if any one ate fruit from that ground, except only our Sacred Men themselves.' These bananas ripened. They did eat them. We kept watching for days and days, but no one died! Therefore what we say, and what our fathers have said, is not true. Our gods cannot kill them. Their Jehovah God is stronger than the gods of Aniwa."

"I enforced old Namakei's appeal, telling them that, though they knew it not, it was the living and true and only God who had sent them every blessing which they possessed, and had at last sent us to teach them how to serve and love and please Him. In wonder and silence they listened, while I tried to explain to them that Jesus, the Son of this God, had lived and died and gone to the Father to save them, and that He was now willing to take them by the hand and lead them through this life to glory and immortality together with himself.

"The old chief led them in prayer—a strange dark groping prayer, with streaks of heathenism coloring every thought and sentence; but still a heart-breaking prayer, as the cry of a soul once cannibal, but now being thrilled through and through with the first conscious pulsations of the Christ-Spirit, throbbing into the words, 'Father, Father, our Father.'

"When these poor creatures began to wear a bit of calico or a kilt, it was an outward sign of a change, though yet far from civilization. And when they began to look and pray to One whom they called 'Father, our Father,' though they might be far, very far, from the type of Christian that dubs itself 'respectable,' my heart broke over them in tears of joy; and nothing will ever persuade me that there was not a Divine heart in the heavens rejoicing too."

Very decided and very touching is the testimony of Bishop William Taylor, as to the universality of this love of God. From a report of some remarks which he made at Carlisle, Pa., when on a visit in this country, we extract the following:

"Many divines assert that benighted heathen will be sent to perdition if Christians do not send them the Gospel. The heathen will be saved or lost according as they accept the Light which has lightened every man that cometh into the world. Is it true that enough light has been given to send them to hell and yet not enough to save them? It is not fair play that so large a proportion of human kind as is represented by the heathen should have no way of escape. It is not like God's other dealings with men. He is no respecter of persons. True it is that too many of us have swapped off the truth of God for the devil's lies. Would the Lord Jesus reject a poor heathen fellow because He did not know his historical name? An African heathen was dying, I saw him die. He had never heard of Christ. We had stopped on our way by chance. For the whole day in his death agony he cried Nizpah, Nizpah (the name of God in his language). There was the cry of entreaty, the imploring tone of a soul far off, for a day, but during the night and just before he died the God he sought had come to him. The imploring cry of Nizpah was changed to a low tone of satisfaction, and the African chief folded his hands and thanked the Invisible for his presence! O, Nizpah, O, Nizpah, thou art all I have, I trust thee now, Nizpah. And so he died. Whom do you think he sought and found? Who was near him in the hour of death? Jesus Christ and no other. 'Day unto day uttereth speech and night unto night showeth knowledge!' The night of the heathen has knowledge. God has two schools, the primary school where all flesh has knowledge of him, and the high school of Revelation. It is this high school which we enjoy.

"On my way I stopped at a hut in which was an old woman grinding face paint between two stones. I knew one of her language, and addressing myself to her said, God is good. She dropped her work, clasped her hands above her head, looked toward heaven and answered that she was 'so glad I knew about God.' O, friends, if that poor African woman, who had never read a word of Bible, did not go to heaven, where would she go I ask you?

"At one Missionary station, where we had worked for some time, we had noticed a perfectly deaf and dumb man—we had addressed nothing to him, for how could he understand? One night a voice was heard down by the river: A noise of screaming in no language but in dreadful sounds. The young men got themselves torches and went down to see from whence the notes proceeded. There was the deaf and dumb man calling to God in his wordless voice and looking up to heaven his dwelling place. For a long time he continued his cries and in the morning came to the missionary and asked to be baptized. He then wanted a license to preach—a license for a deaf and dumb man to preach! We evaded him, but still he insisted, and just to get rid of him we gave him a copy of the New Testament. He went away with the Bible under his arm, content that it was his license. Among the wildest tribes by signs he made many feel their sins—how great God is, that He had a Son who was like them, and yet not like them, who died and rose again and is now living with his Father at the court of the great King. He became a great preacher, though instructed himself in only the primary school and in the art of giving and receiving object lessons only. Was not this a manifestation of God? All heathen do not hear the voice of God—they have rejected it as many of us have.

The following lines are extracted from an Epistle "To Absent Members and other Friends in Isolated Situations," issued by direction of the General Meeting of Friends in Tasmania, held at Hobart in the Third Month last:

DEAR FRIENDS:—During the consideration of the Queries there was an earnest concern lest any man-made system should, in the ordering of our lives, take the place which should be occupied by our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. And this concern suggests the enquiry whether the principles professed by the Society of Friends came from the precepts of men, or whether they are entirely in accord with the full revelation of Jesus Christ. To assure our hearts we turn instinctively to that period in the history of the Church when, weaned from dependence upon Jewish ceremonial (all Jewish institutions having been swept away in the destruction of Jerusalem) Christians were able to receive a full revelation in the cloudless Gospel day—a revelation given through the apostle John in a letter to believers with childlike trusting hearts; and written because they knew the truth and therefore could be received into a closer communion with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ.

In the first place we notice how reverently John speaks of Him whom he had in early life seen manifest in personal form, but who was then manifest as a Glorious Presence; he uses no terms of familiarity, but here, as in his gospel, he writes in a deep sense of the greatness of Him who is the First and the Last, of Him who liveth and was dead, and is alive for evermore. At the commencement of his message, John testifies that God is Light, that in Him is no darkness at all; and this testimony is the ground work of the whole epistle. If we would have fellowship with Him who is Light, we must walk in the Light; and, being thus in communion with the Father and the Son, secret sins are laid bare in the Holy Presence, and day by day are believers cleansed from these impurities by the blood of Jesus Christ. Walking in the Light, confessing our sins as they are made manifest and forsaking them, God's will is revealed, and we know that we know Him if we keep his commandments. This testimony is none other than the doctrine of "the inner light."

Similarly do we have testimony borne in this letter of John, that the witness of the Holy Spirit is the supreme test of faith and conduct; that the acknowledgment of Jesus Christ come in the flesh is the test of a spirit being of God; that God being righteous, and every one not doing righteousness, is not of Him, therefore life from Him will have fruit in righteous acts; that witnessing that the Father hath sent his Son to be the Saviour of the world, and that whosoever confesseth that Jesus is the Christ is born of Him, is testimony to the universality of Divine Grace; that as hatred separates from God and Eternal Life, all war is outside Christ's kingdom, whether the strife exist between individuals or between nations; that whosoever is seed remaineth in sin, the wicked one toucheth him not—he is come into the condition of Adam before the fall; that Christ having come as a Living Presence, and having given an understanding that we may know Him, and that we are in Him, and a command following to keep from representations of heavenly things, there can be no symbolizing of an entrance into his kingdom, and no typifying of receiving Him as our heavenly food.

Thus those testimonies, which we speak of as principles of the Society of Friends, were first borne by the Apostle John when the "very light" of Christ's Presence was manifested; and as all through his epistle the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of John's message, so also the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of the principles which we profess to follow. And what if we are entrusted with these testimonies are without faith? God will be found true, though every man a liar; and the glorious inheritance will be for those who come after and receive an entrance into the promised land.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

William Ridgway.

This was in the summer of 1798, when the yellow fever was raging in Philadelphia; and he experienced much difficulty in shipping a crew. Whilst thus hunting for men, he went into a boarding house, expecting to find within some sailors who had engaged to sail with him. He knocked for a long time, and no one coming to the door, he entered, and walked through a long entry to the kitchen. Here sat a woman alone, her face covered with her hands. I inquired for her husband. She replied "he is under ground." He then inquired for the sailors who had boarded with them. She said, "they are all under ground." He by this time realized that he had exposed himself to the awfully contagious disease, and probably had taken it; and his memoranda states, "to go immediately to sea in this situation was awful to me. However, I was enabled to reflect that I was in the hands of a merciful and gracious preserver, and was in some degree resigned to his disposal of me.

"I accordingly went to sea with a humble heart; but very reluctantly, and under an impression that I ought to have sold out and quit the sea at all events. And it proved from the many cross occurrences that continually attended me, that my gracious and merciful Creator designed to try me, and prove me further, by affliction, disappointment and trouble."

He had a long, boisterous passage, and was in one heavy gale, which it seemed impossible they would survive. He first went to Barbadoes, but not finding a market for his cargo, proceeded to the island of St. Vincent. Here he went on shore with his papers on his person, trying to sell his cargo, and left the brig in the bay awaiting his return. In the night she was seized by a French cruiser, who took her to an adjacent port, under the impression that it was a valuable prize, as there were no papers on board to prove where she belonged. Captain Ridgway, finding his vessel gone, endeavored to follow her; and after a tedious search, learned where she had been taken to. He arrived there on the morning of the day she was to be tried in the Court of Admiralty; and coming forward with his papers, proved his ownership, and staggered the captors of the brig. The court was adjourned, but he was detained a long time before he could obtain possession. He was finally given possession, after being ordered by the court to pay a sum of money to his captors, which, although being a very arbitrary and unjust proceeding, he was compelled to do.

During his stay in this port the yellow fever prevailed to an alarming extent. Many vessels there lost so many of their men that they were unable to leave port. In one case, captain, mates, and all the crew died, and no one was left to take charge of the property. Ridgway's crew and himself were attacked with the fever; but having a medicine chest on board, he acted as physician himself. It speaks well for his judgment, to be told that not one of the crew succumbed to the destroying malady. He was brought very low by the disease himself, and the recovery from it was lingering. Having become well enough to leave, he once more started on this unfortunate and disappointing voyage.

American vessels sailing at that time out of the French West Indian ports, were sometimes seized by British privateers, on account of the wars then raging between France and England; and indeed it was largely because of this, that the war of 1812 was some years later brought about between the latter country and the United States. Ridgway was once more on this trip a victim to these conditions. He had hardly started for home, when he fell in with a British vessel, who took possession of his brig, and carried her to the island of St. Christopher, for adjudication. All vessels going into French ports at that time, were subject to this treatment; the British alleging that they were conducting an illegal commerce, and so were liable to confiscation. As their cargoes, and oftentimes their vessels were condemned, he had every reason to expect the same treatment. He thus narrates how he was extricated from this difficulty:

"I was again brought into great difficulty and jeopardy, respecting my property. In the midst of my trouble, I was driven to seek of Him, who I had, under some trials, witnessed to be a present helper in time of need. And whilst secretly engaged in imploring his interposition, it came into my mind, to go to the judge of the Admiralty Court before the court commenced; and state to him my situation, and how I was forced into a French port; and that I was largely concerned in the vessel and cargo; and that I had a wife and young family who were dependent upon me for subsistence; and if the vessel or even the cargo should be condemned, I should be ruined. My intercession with the judge had a reach upon him, and he gave me a permit to pass the port; but requested me not to make any one acquainted with what he had done; but to be off early the next morning, which was First-day. This I attended to, and when we got a considerable way from the island, the captain of the privateer who carried us in, discovering that we had gone immediately followed us; intending to take us to another island where they condemn all. But we were favored to get into the harbor of Eustatia before he could overtake us; and this being a neutral port, they dare not interrupt us. However, she lay to the leeward of the island, expecting we should soon sail from there. But I had obtained information of her design, and concluded to dispose of my cargo in Eustatia; and return home in ballast; as they dare not stop my vessel if I had no produce of the French islands on board.

"After having been from home six months or more, and experiencing a complication of afflictions and disappointments, I was once more with my family, with whom I resolved to remain; and give over all further prospects of going to sea. This was in the spring of 1794. I was now in an unsettled state with respect to any occupation for the support of my family.

Neither my wife or myself were much inclined to return to my farm; I therefore concluded to sell it, pay my debts, and enter into some kind of trade. I tried several kinds of business; but yet remained wavering, both as regards to temporal and spiritual conditions. I had slighted too much, many merciful visitations and preservations, and could not yet give up to all the leadings of truth in the way of the cross. I had departed from my first love and tenderness, and had gone out into many improprieties; which my former friends were sensible of, and I believe looked upon me as one who had made shipwreck of faith. But I am abundantly satisfied, notwithstanding my departure from the simplicity of truth, I was not forsaken, or left without a witness. The good hand evidently followed me."

It was probably about this time that the following interesting incident occurred. This incident proves that the spirit of prophecy and spiritual intuition is not in latter days withheld from those who live close to the Divine guidance, any more than it was in preceding ages. Samuel Eulen was at that time an old man, he had been a devoted minister from his youth, and was now, when near the grave, stricken with blindness. Under these conditions he one day sat by an open window in a friend's house in Burlington. Hearing footsteps approaching, he was led, under the prompting of his Master, to address the unknown passer-by with the words—"I have a message for thee, O captain, I have a message from God to thee, O captain." The person spoken to stopped at this strange salutation. It was followed by a stirring sermon, in which his spiritual condition was clearly stated, and he warned and encouraged to adhere to the path of duty. The individual so aptly addressed by the blind seer was Captain Ridgway.

He remained for some time in Burlington with no regular business, and had thoughts of moving to Virginia, but in this was disappointed. He then decided to go into business in Philadelphia, rented a store and was all ready to move to that city, when a small pimple came on his right hand. This rapidly increased in size and painfulness, and extended over his hand and up the arm, in spite of medical advice. The skin burst open, and a violent fever set in, so as to cause delirium. The doctor decided that his life could hardly be saved. During one of the intervals between the attacks of delirium, he realized the situation he was in, and states, "the spirit of supplication was again poured out upon me, in which it was clearly shown me what to do." This was at night. He immediately sent after another physician, who arrived early in the morning. A change in treatment was at once made, with excellent results. The trouble abated, and again his life was spared.

Speaking of this sickness, he remarks, "a beloved Friend, who was an Elder in the Society, came to see me; and endeavored to encourage me, saying I had two good doctors, and he hoped my life would be spared. I replied, my dependence was not on man. For I had by this time been favored with what I thought was an assurance that infinite goodness was disposed to deliver me once more. This illness prevented me from going to Philadelphia; so I remained yet out of business; and having nothing to do, I was exposed to many dangers, particularly that of being drawn into unprofitable company."

(To be concluded.)

MODERATE labor is good for body and mind; but overmuch is a great hurt to both.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The London Friend, of Second Month 5th, contains part of an essay by John S. Rowntree, of York, England, on the changes which have taken place in the denominational environment of Friends, and the effect of those changes on the Society itself.

To illustrate how decidedly a Friend's career lay outside of the stream of life of an average Englishman, he describes the life experience of a typical member of the Society.

As an infant the typical Friend was not christened, and the services of the priest, who in other cases would have recorded the date of baptism in the usual parish records, were not called into requisition. As the registration of births is important for the purposes of civil society, the Society had early constructed its own system of registration, which, when the nineteenth century opened, was worked with a large measure of efficiency.

In the course of a few years the child would attain "the school age," as it is technically termed. According to non-churchwarden regulations, he would probably enter one of those of the public schools of the Society, which had been provided by the zeal of the Fothergills, the Garneys, the Tukes, and their contemporaries. If the boy was wealthy, Tottenham opened its doors to him; if less affluent, Kendal or York; if not in affluence, Ackworth, Croydon, Sidcot, or Wigton were available. If the family was poor, the Society's system of poor relief, and its educational endowment, helped the boy to obtain an education far in advance of that enjoyed by boys of the same rank in life, not Friends. As regards girls the difference was still more marked. The practical recognition of the truth that in Christ Jesus "there is neither male nor female," and that the gifts of the Spirit are bestowed without the limitation of sex, had predisposed Friends to provide a far more thorough, and character-strengthening education for their girls than was common in the community at large.

For the great majority of children, the education thus supplied by the Society's schools was all that was desired. Those who were intended for professional life in law or medicine might indeed require collegiate training, but against them the English universities were barred by an elaborate network of religious tests and restrictions, which practically excluded the training of female teachers when not present in conviction. If, on leaving school, the youth whose career we are tracing inclined to follow the scholastic profession, the Flounders Institute, after 1843, would give him the needed literary training, possibly in association with apprenticeship in one of the public schools. The same apprenticeship system was available for girls, with some assistance from the York "Girls' School," which began the training of female teachers when not present in conviction. It will be observed that our representative Friend practically completed his school life without coming in contact with the educational institutions of the nation.

We may now assume that he will go to business; in most cases to enter upon commercial life. By religious conviction he is excluded from the church, the army, and navy, and by a breast-work of oaths, he is excluded from the civil service of the nation. Not until after the accession of the present Sovereign could a Friend be a postman, or even, I believe, a letter-carrier.

We may assume that marriage would be the next great event in the life of the individual we are thinking of. The nuptial ceremony was performed in a manner different from that of most of his countrymen, and the registration of the event was made in the denominational registers, not in the national. The nation indeed does not touch the path of the Friend at this important epoch of his life; all his dealings of an official kind are with the denomination. Marriage might suitably suggest making some provision in the direction of life-insurance; after the time of the great Reform Bill, this could be most advantageously done in the Friends' Provident Institution.

Some of the neighbors of the individual we are speaking of would very probably find useful scope for their abilities in the municipal life of the community they belonged to, as trustees of public charities, or in the management of educational endowments. From nearly all these the Friend was shut out by the Test and Corporation Act, and by laws and usages which limited these appointments to the adherents of the Established Church. The magistracy and Parliament were closed to the Friend, and these barriers, in combination with the public opinion of the body he belonged to, resulted in making that religious body the chief sphere of his activity; if inclined to activity; in any case the almost exclusive sphere of his religious and social interests. We assume, I need hardly say, that our present "Friend" was "well concerned." We probably attended three meetings for worship per week—about one hundred and sixty a year—and about thirty meetings for discipline. To these in those days of slow travel, no little time had to be devoted. But, on the other hand, he had not many other meetings to assist at, although it is true those in connection with the Anti-Slavery, Religious Tract, British and Foreign Bible, and Temperance Societies, were growing more numerous.

If, instead of enjoying sound health and the capacity for active life, he should be overtaken by insanity, the denomination to which he belonged had provided for him a Retreat, where the wants of a diseased mind were ministered to, more humanely and rationally than in the ordinary asylums of the country.

When at last the earthly pilgrimage was ended, the Friend could not be laid to his rest in the churchyards of his co-religionists; but the forthright and liberality of his co-religionists had dotted England with graveyards, in one of which he would be interred, with usages differing from those of the vast majority of his countrymen. The registration of the deaths and burials is made in the books of the Society, not in those of the nation. It will be seen the whole career of the Friend, two generations ago, was singularly outside the great stream of the national life.

The principles of religious freedom and of the rights of conscience, which Friends maintained from their rise, have gradually made their way into the public mind. For one hundred and thirty-nine years after the passing of the Toleration Act in 1689, no great measure in the interests of religious freedom was carried through the British Legislature until the repeal of the Test and Corporation Act in 1828.

The removal of the Roman Catholic disabilities followed in 1829. In 1832 the great Reform Bill passed. The following year Joseph Pease took his seat in Parliament, the first Friend member. In the next year, the admission of Friends, Moravians, and Quakers as witnesses on oath as respects the serving on juries, the qualification for office, and all other purposes whatsoever. The reform in the Poor Law, a most important measure, not entirely unconnected with the subject before us, was carried in 1834. The year 1836 is especially notable as witnessing the foundation of London University, and also the passage of the Dissenters' Marriage and Civil Capacity Legislation Acts. The year 1837 witnessed the passage of the Corn Law agitation for the repeal of the Corn Law, and the public mind for some succeeding years. Three men were said to form the A. B. and C. of the Anti-Corn Law League. A. and B. were Friends. The Liberation Society was founded in 1844. In 1853 religious tests were abolished in the Scotch Universities. They were partially removed at Oxford in 1854, and at Cambridge in 1856, and more decisively so in 1870. In 1866 the Qualification for Office Act passed. In 1868 compulsory Church Rates were abolished. The next year religious equality was established in Ireland. In 1850 the Burials Acts Amendment Bill became law.

The effect of these reforms has been to open the way for a greatly enlarged participation by Friends in public affairs. They have served as Poor-law Guardians, as members of municipal corporations and of school boards, as magistrates, members of Parliament, &c. One of the results of this has been to divert the interests of our members from an almost exclusive attention to the concerns of their own Society, and to substitute for this, a care over the concerns of the public.

Scripture Illustration.

THE EXECUTION.—No large band of soldiers, like that requisitioned by the chief priests for the arrest of Jesus, was now required to conduct the victim to the place of execution, and to carry out the sentence. According to the Roman custom, four soldiers would be detailed for each condemned prisoner, all being under the command of a centurion; for the Roman army had no commissioned officers (as we should call them) below the rank of centurion. But here, as in so many other circumstances, all law was set aside in the condemning of Christ. By Roman law, an interval of two days ought to have intervened between a sentence and its execution. Jewish law was yet more stringent, and the judges could not deliver a capital sentence until they had fasted for the day, after hearing the evidence.

THE TITLE.—The title which Pilate wrote was in accordance with the custom that the crime of which the prisoner had been convicted should be written on a white wooden board, and carried in front of him as he was paraded through the streets on his way to the place of execution. The man who carried it also kept continually proclaiming, in a loud voice, the nature of the crime. This was intended to elicit testimony in favor of the criminal, and, if any were produced, the fatal procession halted till it had been examined. Precisely the same custom now holds in Oriental countries, except that the charge is not written, but proclaimed by the crier. The writer, many years ago, met such a procession in Tunis. Three men, who had been sentenced to be hanged for robbery, were being led through the streets, with the halters round their necks. The crier, marching in front, kept proclaiming their names and crimes, and inviting any witnesses, who could confirm or contradict, to come forward, or else be silent forever. Judging from the behavior of the populace, there was not much encouragement for any friendly witness to present himself. The title which Pilate wrote, and which was paraded before the Divine victim on the awful march to Golgotha, was probably written by him both to avenge himself on the Jews and to deride them, through neither he nor they recognized the mighty import of the truth thus unwittingly proclaimed in the three languages; namely, that of the ruling power, the language of the Jews, and the language of culture and ordinary intercourse.—H. B. Tristram, in the S. S. Times.

COURAGE—The fear of being thought a coward. The reverence that withholds us from violating the laws of God or man, is not infrequently branded with the name of cowardice. The Spartans had a saying that he who stood most in fear of the law, generally showed the least fear of an enemy. We may infer the truth of this dictum from the reverse of the proposition, for daily experience shows us that they who are the most daring in a bad cause, are often the most pusillanimous in a good one. Bravery is a cheap and vulgar quality, of which the highest instances are frequently found in the lowest savages, and which is often still more conspicuous in the brute creation, than in the most intrepid of the human race.

HEAVEN ON EARTH.

(From "Lines Suggested by a Wakeful Night," by Elizabeth Gilbert, 1826-1885, daughter of the Bishop of Chichester, blind from her third year, and inaugurator of the British "Association for Promoting the General Welfare of the Blind.")

And He who dwelt on earth to prove with power
That both these worlds are one, meeting in Him—
Since by his mighty will of love He came
To link again upon the Cross the chain
Which, save for Him, had utterly been severed—
He hath said once for every age to hear,
"Within is the Kingdom of God." Blessed truth,
"Within!" And yet we look afar, and gaze
Around in search of somewhat we call Heaven;
And oft, perchance, thinking 'tis the quest,
But soon in sadness is the quest renounced.
For that we seek a kingdom of our own.
No hope that this more utterly forlorn!
We have no kingdom, and we cannot reign.
In serving only can we find our life,
And perfect freedom, the true life of Kings.
But when to us we may, we needs must choose;
And if the happy choice be made, then ours
Becomes the glorious privilege to know
That earth and heaven (how'er Rebellion
With his sceptre print in triumph, saying,
"Behold me by earth's homage king confessed!")
One kingdom are, and one are of one King.
Who through his love will teach this more and more,
Until our hearts, living his life of love,
Shall know and feel his presence all their Heaven.

WHAT WILL IT MATTER?

(After verses by Will H. Kernon, in which the sentiments are changed, but the words and form of the original are followed.)

What will it matter, Friends, where we live?
What will it matter, Friends, when we die?
If we receive all that Time can give—
When under the grassy mounds we lie!

What will it matter to you and me—
To sit in ease in moments of ease—
Whether our funeral dirge shall be
A poor man's praise or a nation's psalm?

What will it matter us then, I say,
Whether a kinder crown we wear,
Or whether we toiled from day to day
Earning our bread from door to door?

What will it matter us then, if we
But kept our lives in moments of repose,
Scattered blessings with glad hands free,
And walked in the strength of a faith secure,

Whether our glory was drags and dust,
A poor man's life among his kindred men,
If we only proved true to every trust—
What will it matter unto us then?

Whether our friends were false or true,
Whether our foes were strong or weak;
What will it matter to me or you
After life's candle is out? O, speak!

FOR "THE FRIEND," KEPT.

BY FANNIE E. DANON.

The chip-sparrow buildeth so small!
So high and so ready to fall!
Winds may sweep her away;
Storms may batter and slay;
Death may spring from the blossoming wall.
Yet calmly she sits on her nest,
With peace in her downy warm breast.
Though she should be snatched out
Yet she mindeth it not,
That the wind bloweth strong from the west.
Sweet life! thou art held at a cost
That keeps thee in calm or betossed.
It thou fall, if thou fly,
It is the sky—
Thou art lost unto none but the lost.

Icebergs.

THE GLACIERS OF GREENLAND AND ALASKA AND THEIR "OFFSPRING"—DANGERS FROM WANDERING ICE ISLANDS.

Standing upon the deck of an ocean steamer, passengers see an iceberg sweeping by in splendid loneliness. Looked at from afar, it seems a huge, curiously shaped ship, with great white hull and great white sails all set and blown full with the breeze. But the strongest glass detects no flag floating from its frozen peaks and sees no crew moving upon its glistening decks. It is an enormous, clumsy craft, with no passing captain's hail; it is one of the rovers in nature's pirate navy, which every skipper avoids. An hour, and the passengers have seen the ice ship vanish in the distance; it is moved in a current of the ocean, and before long it will pass to warmer waters in the South, and there the frozen craft will end its journey and melt out of commission.

Whether one sees a berg which is simply a shapely bulk of ice, or has the fortune to look on one to which the caprice of nature has given the form of an immense ship, there is in these closing days of the life of an iceberg a story of interest to all travellers by sea. Rarely is there a living thing upon any of these floating curiosities; never is there in them any element to support life; and yet the semblance of life does show itself upon these wanderers from the North. They have a beginning and an ending, and in their career they move as living things upon the deep waters of the Atlantic and the Pacific; and when at last their solid masses melt, the ocean gives them up again in vapor, and by and by their elements are carried through the air to the North, and the work of turning them into ice islands, ice mountains, ice ships, or ice castles is done over again.

The story of any of the icebergs seen from a vessel crossing the Atlantic this month begins many years ago. Icebergs are born every day in every month, but most of them remain in or near their native waters for a long time before they escape and wander to the great lanes of travel between here and Europe. The bergs which will be seen this summer are from two to ten years old; that is, they have had an existence individually for years, though the ice from which they are formed is much older, some of it possibly having been frozen first a thousand years ago. Bergs are born of glaciers. Four out of every five floating masses in the Atlantic come from Greenland; the fifth may be from Spitzbergen Sea, Frobisher's Sound, or Hudson Strait.

FORMATION OF GLACIERS.

A glacier is a river of solid water confined in the depressions running down the mountain sides. Soft and powdery snow falls upon the summits, and though some is evaporated, the yearly fall is greater than the yearly loss, and so the excess is pushed down the slope into the valleys, which possibly at the time are covered with green and have afforded pasture lands for cattle. The snow gathers in the high valleys and every day undergoes some degree in the change which finally transforms it into ice. Hundreds of years ago, the people who dwelt at the foot of the Alps, in the Engadine valley, went up the green hillside and built new houses. Far above their homes rose the mountain tops, covered with eternal snow. Little by little a glacier was forming upon the lofty slope above the site of these new houses. The surface of the soft snow river, forced down from the summit was melted day after day, and the water trickling into the mass beneath froze by night. Thus the fine, feathery crystals became changed into spongy-like ice, and, as time went on and the quantity above increased, the pressure became greater, and the sponge ice became harder and then compact and solid. And all this while more snow was falling upon the summits and was driven down the mountain side, piled on the surface of the growing glacier and forced down into the mass beneath as new ice. Scientists estimate that with the thickening of the rigid stream it extended down the hillside seven inches each year. This was going truly at a snail's pace, but at last the slowly creeping river of ice, crested with melting snow, approached so near the homes built upon the slope that the people had to move. Their houses, of course, they had to leave behind them, and in time the solid river came upon the buildings and broke them up and smothered the fragments. This was the Morteratsch Glacier, and many tourists in Switzerland have looked upon it. In 1868 there were great floods in the valley, and many bits of the old dwellings were washed out from under the ice.

Now, just as this Alpine glacier grew and flowed down the mountains, at the rate of seven inches a year, so have greater glaciers grown in colder Greenland, and come down the mountains of that country to the sea. And these glacier streams of Greenland are the parents of the North Atlantic icebergs. So, too, in Alaska there are tremendous glaciers, and one of the incidents of an ordinary Alaskan journey is the cruising of your vessel along the coast, where the glaciers break off and fall into the water. They are far more beautiful than the finest of the glaciers of Switzerland, and in size they are so great that the largest Alpine glacier would make only a fair-sized nose, if it could be taken bodily and placed upon the face of one of the Alaskan giants. At Glacier Bay, icebergs are being born all the while. Muir Glacier, the largest that dips into the bay, presents a front of five thousand feet. It is 700 feet thick, five-sevenths of it being under water. It extends back for miles and miles. Each day the central part moves 70 feet into the sea, the discharge every twenty-four hours being 140,000,000 cubic feet of clear ice. As this great quantity crabs into pieces from the glacier, the bergs of the North Pacific begin their life. The separation from the larger mass and the plunge into the sea cause terrific noises.

A DISTINCT SUPERIORITY.

One of the splendid things about the icebergs created in Alaska is that travellers may comfortably go there and see the sight; whereas, if you want to see how the Atlantic bergs are made you will have to go to the less easily reached shores of Greenland. The interior of Greenland is a solid mass of ice. In fact, some people think that about the central part of Greenland there is a high mountain, around whose sides there has grown through the centuries an enormous glacier sending down in every direction branch glaciers that extend to the coast. It is known that the only part of the land which is not covered completely by ice is a narrow belt around the shore. Crossing this belt at hundreds of places are the glaciers. Some are only a few hundred feet wide and 50 feet thick, while others are several miles wide and measure 1500 feet from surface to bottom. All of these ice streams are making their way to the sea, and as their ends are forced out into the water by the pressure behind, they are broken off and set adrift as bergs. The rate of movement of the glacier is variously estimated. The central part of the glacier moves more rapidly than the sides. The progress of the Greenland glaciers, is, in many cases, at the rate of 47 feet a day in the centre, while at the sides it varies from 10 to 15.

The Weakening of Caste in India.

In a former article I have spoken of some of the indirect effects of the impact of Christianity upon the heathendom of this country, as seen in the great cleavages from the main rock of Hinduism which have taken place during the last forty or fifty years. I might extend the list of such illustrations to a much greater length. I have recently visited the great rock-cut temples at Ellora, which were once the glory of the trifurcated Hinduism of India, viz.: Brahmanism, Jainism and Buddhism. These truly are marvels of patient and laborious architecture, veritable wonders in that world, and are illustrations of the then deep persuasion of the truth of their systems, and of the apparently ineradicable enthusiasm and consecration of the ancient builders. Once they swarmed with pilgrims, and the entire number of these temples (more than thirty in all within a distance of a mile) were all too small for the accommodation of the myriad worshippers. Now they are monuments of the decadence of the faith which animated their builders. Magnificent as works of art, they are fallen into decay, crumbling into splendid ruins, and are the habitations of owls and bats, of jackals and other prowling beasts of the field, not to speak of the visiting tourists who are the only worshippers about their magnificent but deserted shrines. A few begging Brahmans linger about them to get the price which the tourist may be persuaded to part with in return for their services as guides. Even the temples which are still in use over the land show how sadly the number of worshippers has fallen off, and how few comparatively are the gifts of the pilgrims who in former time enriched their coffers, many of them only maintained by the aid of government grants. Decay is stamped on most of the old temples of India, for the reason that the mass of the people have become skeptical and refuse any longer to pour out their silver at the feet of and into the hands of the priests. Fifty years ago the Brahmans were entirely supported by the people and the most of them were comparatively rich and opulent; to-day, as a class, they are glad to avail themselves of the educational privileges of this country, both governmental and missionary, in order that they may be fitted to earn a modest stipend by some "polite" form of labor, chiefly that of writing, in the Government departmental offices. To-day the whilom proud and "divinely twice born" who of yore was defiled by the shadow of a low-caste man falling on him, is hustled and jostled by the same low-caste man in their common struggle for bread. Verily his glory is departed, and with it most of his substantial privileges. Under the influence of Christianity character and not caste is rapidly becoming the test of position, ability and not superstition the key to the situation. It is true that Benares, Muttra and a few other sacred cities receive within their walls and to their hundreds of temples thousands of pilgrims annually who pour out of the villages and country districts; but the number is mightily decreased from that of former years, even though the railroads of the "Christians" have placed these sacred places within the reach of millions who could not before make the pilgrimage. The dwellers in the great cities where these most sacred temples are, are not the chief worshippers.

The other day I was walking with a Hindu gentleman under the shade of a beautiful avenue of trees in Poona, and I observed a lad about eighteen years breaking a cocoanut and opening a pomegranate and laying these fruits, with a small garland of flowers, at the base of a rude stone smeared with red paint, which to him was God. I commented on it to my Hindu friend.

"Yes," he replied, "you occasionally see such things; for the ignorant people have not yet been able to rise out of these gross superstitions; but even among them there is not one such worshipper to-day where there were a thousand thirty years ago."

I asked him if it were not true, however, that many educated men visited the temples daily, worshipped the idols and received the mark of their gods on the forehead; saying that I did not see much difference between worshipping the stone on the wayside by the ignorant boy and worshipping the elaborately carved idol in the temple by the educated man.

"Yes," he said, "it is quite true that many do so; I myself go once a week to the temple and receive the mark afresh on my forehead from the hand of the priest; but I only do it to please my wife and mother, who would be distressed beyond measure if I did not do so, and would give me no peace day or night with tears and cries and fearful prognostications of evil and calamities if I did not do it. It is the easiest way to keep peace with one's womenfolk. Of course we have no faith in these gods, but it does us no harm to get a little paint put on our foreheads; and if it makes one's wife happy and prevents a family row, it is better to do it than to leave it undone."

This, I think, is a fair illustration of the position of the great bulk of the educated Hindus toward their gods. It does not mean that they have become Christian, even in thought; but it does mean that they have become infidel concerning their ancient system of idolatry. With one accord the educated men will apologize for idolatry on the ground that it is necessary for the ignorant people and the women, who are not able to grasp any higher truth. For themselves they either profess pantheism or some form of deism, in some cases a comparatively pure theism. The same is true in regard to the sacredness of their caste. Many do not hesitate to break it in secret, having lost all belief in its Divine origin and all fear of any spiritual consequences to themselves on account of such breaches. Most of them will justify their caste restrictions and regulations on the ground of social necessity, and seek to parallel it by the social distinctions maintained among Christians and the Western nations generally.—The Independent.

There bare belief only of what Christ hath done for men without them will not secure salvation to them, unless they come to witness his work in them, and by it to be born again, or from above, consonant to the doctrine of Christ to Nicodemus. This certainly is the one thing needful for men to have experience of in their pilgrimage here, which, as they grow up in it, is the only evidence of their future happiness.—T. RAYLTON.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Hornets in the Soudan.—On the upper waters of the Nile reside the Bagara, a tribe rich in cattle. In summer they pass with their cattle to the opposite bank of the river, and go to Kava to save the animals from the hornets which assail them in such numbers as often to cause their death.—Gessé's Seven Years in the Soudan.

African Buffaloes.—Buffaloes are so abundant that one is almost certain to meet with some every time one goes to hunt. All animals flee before man except the buffalo and the rhinoceros; these two have the same instinct, and if the wind brings to their nostrils the scent of a man, they turn to meet him. With the Buffalo there is this advantage, that, when he means to attack, he halts at fifteen paces distance, gently lowers his head, and rushes forward at a gallop; one must seize the moment when he stands with his head lowered, otherwise it is too late. The native, when followed by a buffalo, throws himself to the ground, pretending to be dead. The buffalo comes up and sniffs at him for ten minutes, then, seeing him immovable, goes away.—Gessé's Soudan.

Floating Islands.—The upper waters of the Nile are encumbered to an extraordinary extent with a vegetable growth, which at certain seasons renders it very difficult for even a steamer to force its way through. This material often collects into floating islands composed of grass and papyrus, with their roots strongly intertwined. They have generally a width of from four to six yards. Some of them are three or four miles in length. In a strong wind they are driven along and often crowded together.—Gessé's Soudan.

A Seal's Intelligence.—A few years ago some fishermen were following their vocation off a harbor on the Maine coast, when they observed a commotion on the surface, and soon made out a seal leaping from the water as if followed by some enemy.

It came near the boat, swimming around it several times, and then, making a leap, the men saw that it was being chased by a large fish.

One of the fishermen dropped his line, and, stepping into the bow, leaped over and held out his hands. To his amazement, the seal immediately dashed toward him, and, with his help, scrambled out of the water into the boat, just in time to escape the sharp weapon of a swordfish that darted by, its big eyes staring, probably in wonder at the method of escape, to its fishy intelligence being evidently a case of out of the frying-pan into the fire.

But the little seal apparently knew better, and it need not be said that its confidence was not misplaced, as the men were so pleased with its action in coming to them they kept it as a pet, and the seal became a familiar object about the shore.

The fishermen had a small house upon the beach, in which their boats and nets were stored, and here the seal made its home, sleeping on a pile of old nets, and during the day lying upon the sands, lazily rolling over in the enjoyment of perfect freedom.

When the men came down to the shore, the seal was there to greet them, frisking about and attempting to crawl into the boat. When not taken in, it would follow the boat out, swimming alongside, with its intelligent black eyes fixed upon them. If taken into the boat, it would lie on the forward deck and watch his protectors, occasionally eating a fish which they tossed over to it, or diving over after one which they threw away.

During the winter, the seal was moved up to the home of one of the fishermen, where it spent much of its time by the kitchen fire.—Chas. F. Holder, in Golden Days.

Swift's Comet.—An interesting phenomenon to be seen in the early mornings is a comet with an unusual number of tails. It is known as Swift's comet, having been discovered by Prof. Lewis Swift, of the Warner Observatory, at Rochester, N. Y. By astronomical computations of the orbit of this comet it was found to have made its perihelion passage around the sun early in the Fourth Month, and it is now scudding away from the sun at a somewhat lessened rate of speed, being at this time over 100,000,000 miles distant from the sun. Professor Barnard, of Lick Observatory, has made a number of photographs of Swift's comet, and one of his plates showed that its tail had split into eight parts. On a clear night, or, rather, between 2 and 4 o'clock on a clear morning, the comet may be seen low down in the Northeast, or between the Great Square of Pegasus and Cassiopeia's Chair, in the direction of the pole star.

The Big Lagoon.—An Interesting Place by the Sea on the California Coast.—On the northern coast of California, some thirty miles below the mouth of the Klamath River, are some interesting natural formations, known as the Big Lagoon. Here the coast, which runs north and south up to this point, takes a sharp turn inland, bordered by very high hills, running to a distance of about three miles, then turning out again makes a sharp bay almost V-shaped, and for ages past a sand bar has been washing itself up across this bay until the bar has raised up out of the water some ten or twelve feet, having a width of about 100 feet and a length of four miles, reaching across the entire bay.

This bar is in the shape of a roof. When there is a storm the breakers will roll up one side of it, break over it, run down into the bay inside, and it is a novel sight to stand there and watch the waters, mountain high on one side and perfectly calm on the other, the line between the two at intervals hidden altogether. This bar is a sort of short cut and can be traversed on horseback. In a storm the horseman will one minute be high and dry on land, the next minute a large wave will run up, and, running under the horse's feet to the depth of a foot or more, the rider will be, for an instant, four miles or so at sea on horseback, with no land nearer than the high bluffs of the mainland.

Moss agates may be found in abundance on the pebbly beach, and when the sun shines they glitter with dazzling brightness.

The wild duck that frequent this part of the coast literally fill this inland bay, and the passing hunter, should he take a shot at them, will raise such a cloud and such a quacking that he might think all the ducks of the earth have gathered there. Occasionally some wild beast like a bear or a panther will be found crossing this bar, and the Indians have much sport when such a thing happens, the animal rarely escaping capture or death.

Bees.—It is not uncommon in the spring of the year to note humbles in great numbers dead under some tree in flower, and the observer, even one of eminent scientific attainments, may have so far reason to infer that they have been poisoned by the flowers. Recently a large horsechestnut has been charged with the enormity of treating so badly their visiting friends. In other years the Chinese wistaria has had a similar inhospitable reputation. The true facts of the case are that to bees in general only a short lease of life is given. Some species die after a few weeks of hard work. It is not certainly known that any working bee lives over twelve months. Those which lie over all winter die in early spring, and those found dead under the trees have died because their time has come and not from having been poisoned.

Smut in Wheat.—A bulletin of the United States Department of Agriculture recommends the soaking of seed wheat which may be infected with the smut, for fifteen minutes in water heated to 132°—which destroys the vitality of the spores of the smut fungus.

HERE AND THERE.—Teacher, giving directions for standing: "Heels together, toes turned out, making an angle of forty degrees!" A look of bewilderment appeared on one boy's face. Teacher: "Well, Tim, do you know what I mean? Do you know what a degree is?"

Tim: "Yes, sir."
Teacher: "What?"

Tim: "Sixty-nine and one-fourth miles"
There is a Japanese Christian who puts on his door the following notice every morning before he starts for his day's work, which is far from his home: "I am a Christian, and if any one likes to go in and read my good book while I am out, he may." What a simple and original way of obeying the direction, "Let him that heareth say, Come."

"My dear," said the caller, with a winning smile, to the little girl who occupied the study while her father, the eminent literary man, was at his dinner, "I suppose you assist your papa by entertaining the bores?"

"Yes, sir," replied the little girl, gravely; "please be seated."

A little girl was graciously permitted, one bright Sunday, to go with her mamma to hear papa preach. It was a time of great rejoicing and responsibility, and the little face was all alight with happy anticipation. Now it chanced that on this special occasion papa's sermon was of the "warning" order, and his earnest voice rang out solemnly in the Sabbath quiet. After a moment of breathless surprise and horror, the little listener's soul was wrought upon with a great pity for the poor mortals upon whom so much wrath was descending. She rose excitedly to her feet, and, her wide reproachful eyes just peeping over the back of the seat, called out, in sweet chiding tones: "What for is you scolding all the peeples so, papa?"

THIS HAVE I EXPERIENCED concerning the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, that it is an inward and spiritual thing, producing inward and spiritual effects in the mind; and that this is it, even that which slays the enmity in the mind, and crucifies to the world, and the affections thereof. "God forbid," said the apostle, "that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, whereby the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world." Now mark: that which is contrary to the world, and crucifies to the world, that is the cross. The cross has this power, and nothing else; and so there is nothing else to glory in. The wisdom of God is contrary, and a foolish thing to the wisdom of man. Yea, the new creature which springs from God's Holy Spirit, is contrary and death to the old. Now he that comes hither, out of his own wisdom, out of his own will, out of his own thoughts, out of his own reasonings; and comes to a discerning of God's Spirit, and to the feeling of his begetting in his heart, and his stirrings and movings in the life which He hath begotten, and waits here; he is taught to deny himself, and to join to and take up that by which Christ daily croseth and subdueth in him that which is contrary to God. . . . For under the cross the Seed grows up and flourishes, and the flesh withers and dies. And as the power of flesh and death wastes, so the power of spirit and life increases.—PENNINGTON.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

ONE who, while ago, was a member of a liquor-licensing board of a New Jersey city, being at my office not many days since, referred to his having in prospect the erection of two or three contiguous houses upon a lot of ground of which he was the owner. One of the houses he expected to rent out as a tavern. I remonstrated with him on that account, but he said he could get more monthly rent for it than for anything else, and he could not afford to throw away the difference. He had a "great mind," he further said, "to occupy one of the other houses himself, but then it would be next door to a tavern, and that would be an objection." There seemed to be no occasion for additional dissuasive or argument. This man was of the like mind with that Kentucky association of liquor dealers, who, in recently organizing a new settlement of homes at which they expected to locate, made it a condition in the deeds, that no liquor saloon or other nuisance would be permitted.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

There is one thing it would be well to remember, and I pray the Lord to help me to recollect it and act accordingly—which is when anything presents itself to the mind as being wrong, and then doubts arise as whether this feeling may not be a mistake; for instance, in eating, we may think we have enough, but still want more; then I say is the time to remember that our stay in this world is short, and that it is better to deny ourselves a small gratification than to be in danger of disobeying the voice of Christ—that inward monitor. If we were more spiritual, we should not find so much difficulty in denying self. I never feel better satisfied than when on such occasions I give up and take up the cross as to that particular. Srely this satisfactory feeling must be the consequence of well doing.

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 4, 1892.

The citizens of Philadelphia, and thousands of others in various parts of our country, were shocked a few weeks ago by the burning of a low-grade theatre in that city, involving the loss of several lives and the partial burning of a large number of persons, causing much suffering and rendering them incapable of attending to their ordinary business for a considerable time. Many of these were taken to the Pennsylvania Hospital to have their burns dressed. It was a pitiable sight, as described by a visitor to that institution, to see some forty men and boys with their hands and faces bound up in plasters, lying there and waiting the slow process of nature in healing their wounds.

To the thoughtful lover of his fellow-men, it gives an additional pang of sorrow to reflect, that these sufferers, at the time this accident befel them, were in attendance at a place of amusement, where the scenes portrayed were of a sensational character, and calculated to excite a state of mind altogether inconsistent with that settlement of spirit, and watchfulness towards our Heavenly Father, which it is our duty and our highest privilege to feel after and maintain. It is dreadful to think of immortal beings ushered into the presence of the Judge of all, with their minds filled with the debased thoughts which such theatrical exhibitions are calculated to produce.

Our friend Josiah W. Leeds, in an article in The Christian Statesman, gives some interesting information on the subject, from the following particulars are extracted:

The manager of this resort was placed under arrest seven years ago, upon motion of the writer of this, because of his persistent exposure of vice play-bills, but which the chief of police, General Stewart said he was powerless to prevent. The then mayor was noted as a man who held membership in many secret societies. He was fond of the play-house, the ball, the carnival, and (it was charged) of the brutal sports of the prize-ring. To his secretary was intrusted the indecent picture-dissemination, taken from the front of the Central Theatre, copies of which manager Gilmore was charged with exposing everywhere about the city. After many delays, when the case finally came to trial, the police officer who made the arrest informed me that the mayor's secretary had told him he did not have the picture. I at once went to the mayor's office and told the secretary to open the fire-proof. He did so. We stepped inside, and the folded papers were there on a shelf. The manager was convicted, was fined $100, and was given a severe rebuke by the judge. This is the man whose playhouse is now level with the ground, while the bodies of six ballet girls and other players lie beneath the fallen bricks and charred rubbish. They belonged to the company of that miserably sensuous spectacle, "The Devil's Auction."

Four years ago the building then occupying the site received a fire visitation similar to the one of this week. Before that, in 1868, there had been another, and again still further back, in 1861, with loss of life in every instance. Upon the first of those occasions, ten or twelve ballet girls, performing the so-called "demon dance" in the notoriously immoral spectacle of the "Black Crook," were caught in the flames and hurried into eternity.

When in 1888 the structure recently destroyed, was in course of erection after the burning of that year, I hardly refrained from weeping as I went by one day, and thought of the wickedness permitted there by license from the mayor, and which was likely to continue right on until the visitation of another fire effected a temporary stoppage.

The report of the Fire Department Chief and of the Building Inspectors, a year or two ago, reported this theatre building among the many others about the city all "safe." Whatever become of their patrons, their bodies and souls, the buildings and stage properties at any rate were insured, more or less, against loss. There is something to be taken into consideration relative to this matter of "taking risks," which was adverted to in a note to the Illustrated Christian Weekly, at the time of the previous burning (1888) and may now be pertinently repeated.

It has been announced that when the insurances have been adjusted, the erection of a theatre building on the same spot will be again in order. Isn't there a question of moral responsibility at this point, on the part of Christian managers of some insurance corporations? Many individuals acting in a personal capacity, are conscientiously opposed to renting properties as liquor saloons, or loaning money upon properties which are so used. Nevertheless, as members of corporations, do they make bold to declare their convictions upon these matters, and strengthen each other to withstand such iniquities? Or, are they fain to gather under the protecting shelter of that convenient cover which hath for its sorry device, the threadbare legend—If we don't sell, loan, or underwrite, others will.

Looking down the long list of the lads of fifteen, fourteen and fifteen years, burned, mangled and otherwise injured in the late shocking catastrophe, and reflecting upon the character of the spectacles, which boys, such as these, as well as thousands of young men and women, came six nights in the week, year after year to witness, the query straightway arises why such a resort of iniquity should be licensed, advertised in this professedly Christian city.

Every daily paper in the city, advertises the performances at this place, notorious though a large part of those performances are for their nastiness. The proprietor of the best of the dailies has been repeatedly appealed to, to lend the weight of his example and influence against the sensuous and impure representations by refusing to advertise the invitations, but the appeals remain unheard, or at least apparently unavailing."

The Public Ledger of Philadelphia is generally regarded as one of the daily papers, which is more free from objectionable matter than the average issues of the newspaper press, and we believe its proprietor is desirous of promoting the public welfare. We should regard it as a token for good, if he should become so impressed with a sense of the evil influence exerted by theatrical exhibitions, as to entirely exclude any notice of them from his columns. Whatever diminution of pecuniary receipts such exclusion might involve, yet, if the step were taken from conscientious motives, he might take comfort in the assurance of our Saviour, that a blessing would rest on every one who gave up worldly advantages for the sake of Christ.

In consequence of the decease on the 28th ult. of our valued friend JOHN S. STOKES, the publisher of this journal, AGENTS and others forwarding money to the office by post-office orders, are desired to make them payable for the present to Edward Mars, Treasurer.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Intelligence has been received of the safe arrival at Riga of the ship Teinehead, which sailed from Brooklyn on the 2d of last month, loaded with Iowa corn for the Russian sufferers from famine.

Bonfort's Wine and Spirit Gazette says: "Saloon keepers who used to make $1,900 to $2,500 a year (in Philadelphia) now clear ten times as much under high license."

The New York Voice says: "The 'restrictive' legislation of the last hundred years has proven a dismal failure. No one can claim that it has not been fairly tried. It has been tested in every conceivable way. Result: a steady growth of the liquor traffic, a steady increase of its political power, and a frightful temptation in every city to use the license system as a political weapon."

"Two of the strongest daily papers in America, painfully conservative on this line, and hitherto stout champions of restriction by license, namely the Times and the Tribune, have recently come out in frank confession that the system is a failure in New York, and that the entire abolition of the excise system, with its delusive 'restrictions' and its corrupting revenue, would be preferable to its continuance."

Both the Times and the Tribune, which at Omaha on the 28th ult. completed its work and adjourned sine die. The principal business of the session was the adoption of a resolution providing that the annual conferences should vote upon the proposition to make the word 'laymen' mean men only, and in case the proposition was not carried by a two-thirds vote, then the word 'laymen' should thereafter mean both men and women.

In their report the Committee on Temperance uses the following noble language:

"We insist that the United States Government, and the various State governments, in tolerating the liquor traffic for a money consideration, are guilty of a wicked complicity with a business whose awful work of destruction brands it as alike an enemy to God and man."

"We desire especially to place ourselves on record as repudiating to the utmost of our ability the action of the general Government, through the Department of State, in prostituting its powers at the request of American brewers and malsters to collect information and to use the machinery of government to promote the sale of American liquors in South American countries."

"We recommend all members of the Methodist Episcopal Church who enjoy the elective franchise to so use that solemn trust as to promote the rescue of our country from the guilt and dishonour which have been brought upon it by a criminal complicity with the liquor traffic."

"I do not presume to dictate the political conduct of our people, but we do record our deliberate judgment that no political party has a right to expect, nor ought to receive, the support of Christian men so long as it stands committed to the license policy or refuses to put itself on record in an attitude of open hostility to the same."

In the Presbyterian General Assembly now in session at Portland, Oregon, on the 30th ult., a report from the Committee on Temperance was received. It contained resolutions that the whole power of the Presbyterian Church be directed to resist the passage of any law legalizing the liquor traffic in Alaska; that the Assembly stand firmly by the deliverance of former Assemblies on the subject of temperance; that the Assembly regard the saloon license as a curse to this land. The report contained a statement that the committee rejoiced in the fact that a majority of the churches use the unfermented wine and grape in what they call the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. An amendment to strike out the portion of the report relating to unfermented wine was defeated, and the recommendations in the report were adopted.

A motion was made to strike out the following paragraph in the report:

"That the members of this committee that, while it is not the province of the Church to dictate to any man how he shall vote, yet the committee declares that no political party has the right to expect the support of Christian men so long as that party stands committed to the license policy or refuses to put itself on record against the same."

The motion to strike out was lost by a vote of yes 206, says 216. This is truly encouraging to the friends of temperance.

The Governor of Iowa has issued a proclamation calling for relief for the flood sufferers at Sioux City. The proclamation states that the calamity greatly exceeds the early estimates. The number of families homeless is placed at 1,000, and the number of destitute of all ages fully 5,000.

A dispatch from Marianna, Arkansas, says that at least 10,000 people on the lowlands of the St. Francis and White rivers have been rendered homeless by the flood.

Between the 27th and 30th, inclusive, of last month, cyclones, tornados, cloud-bursts and storms have struck various points in Kansas, Missouri and Arkansas. A large part of the town of Wellington, Kansas, was destroyed by a cyclone, fifteen persons killed and 100 injured. At Harper, in the same State, sixty houses were wrecked and one hundred others injured. Hundreds of families are homeless and destitute, without food or shelter.

Special advices to Bradstreet's from regions affected by the floods point to an aggregate loss in five States of $22,000,000, which includes the loss in real property, destruction of or damage to levees, to farm buildings, machinery, live stock and crops, as well as loss of other property."

The number of deaths in this city last week was 404; which is 28 less than last week and 20 more than the corresponding week of last year. Of this whole number, 214 were males and 190 females; 58 died of consumption; 35 of diseases of the heart; 33 of pneumonia; 25 of diphtheria; 18 of scarlet fever; 15 of old age; 15 of Bright's disease; 14 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 13 of cholera infantum; 13 of nephritis; 12 of infantile; 11 of convulsions and 10 of apoplexy.

FOREIGN.—The Belfast Telegraph publishes the promised plan of resistance to the mandates of an Irish Parliament, should such a body be established. The article was written by a prominent Irish Unionist. It says that the men of Ulster will not allow elections to occur. The election writs will be publicly burned by the sheriffs of counties and the Mayor of Belfast immediately when they are received. Judges and Magistrates taking their commissions from the new Executive will not be recognized. The police force will be reorganized with special constables sworn to replace the regular police. The Queen's taxes will be paid, but taxes levied by the Dublin Parliament will not be paid. The Custom House will be seized and held until the question is settled. Continuing, the article says:

"In the event of war the North will be in a better position, both as regards credit and geographical position, than the South. Belfast is unassailable, while Dublin is open to direct and immediate attack."

The fruit crops in the south of England have been greatly damaged, if not destroyed, by a terrific storm that passed over that section. The rain fell in torrents, and was accompanied by one of the worst hail storms ever seen in that part of the country. Many fruit trees were in bloom, and the hailstones—thousands of which were as large as a bantam's egg—threshed off the blossoms and tore the leaves to shreds. In many cases large stretches of woods were completely ruined, the tremendously heavy rains washing the earth away from the roots, while the hailstones cut them to pieces.

Spain has concluded a copyright treaty with the United States.

The King of Portugal has accepted the resignation of the minister of cabinet, and has charged Minister Ferreira to form another Cabinet.

On the 24th ult. a decree was published in Brussels containing a declaration that the King of Belgium approves of the resolution recently adopted by the Senate and Chamber of Deputies providing for revision of the Constitution.

There are several articles of the Constitution that it is proposed to revise. The most important of these is Article 47, which opens up the question of universal suffrage, and Article 26, under which there is a project for introducing the referendum system. This latter question is held to be more important to Belgium than the extension of the franchise. It consists in submitting to the popular vote important questions concerning the country whether they have been passed upon by Parliament or not.

The prohibition against the entry of Russian Jews into Germany has been withdrawn.

DIVINE PROTECTION.

The opposition of some of the people of Tanna to a change in their religious worship was so great, that they endeavored to murder J. G. Paton, who was stationed there as a missionary, and plundered his dwelling. He very narrowly escaped, by taking refuge in a neighboring village, and from thence followed a friendly chief named Faimungo, who lived on the way to the house of another missionary, which was his place of refuge. They had gone part of the way, when they were met by a body of armed men, who had been sent to intercept them. Of the manner in which he escaped these people, he says:

"They encircled us in a deadly ring, and one kept urging another to strike the first blow or fire the first shot. My heart rose up to fire the Lord Jesus; I saw Him watching the scene. My peace came back to me like a wave from God. I realized that I was immortal till my Master's work with me was done. The assurance came to me, as if a voice out of heaven had spoken, that not a musket would be fired to wound us, not a club prevail to strike us, not a spear leave the hand in which it was held vibrating to be thrown, not an arrow leave the bow, or a killing-stone the fingers, without the permission of Jesus Christ, whose is all power in heaven and on earth. He rules all nature, animate and inanimate, and restrains even the savage of the South Seas." In that awful hour I saw his own words, as if carved in letters of fire upon the clouds of heaven: "Seek, and ye shall find. Whosoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son." I could understand how Stephen and John saw the glorified Saviour as they gazed up through suffering and persecution to the Heavenly Throne! Yet I never could say that on such occasions I was entirely without fear. Nay, I have felt my reason reeling, my sight coming and going, and my knees smiting together, when thus brought close to a violent death, but mostly under the solemn thought of being ushered into eternity and appearing before God. Still, I was never left without hearing that promise in all its consoling and supporting power coming up through the darkness and the anguish, 'Lo, I am with you always!

And with Paul I could say, even in this dread moment and crisis of being, 'I am persuaded that neither death nor life * * * nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.'

"Faimungo and others now urged us to go on in the path. I said, 'Faimungo, why are we to leave you? My God heard your promise not to betray me. He knows now what is in your heart and in mine. I will not leave you; and if I am to die, I will die by your side.'

"He replied, 'Now, I go on before; Missi, keep close to me.'

"His men had gone, and I persuaded my Aneityemese to follow them. At last, with a bound, Faimungo started after them. I followed, keeping as near him as I could, pleading with Jesus to protect me or to take me home to glory. The host of armed men also ran along on each side with their weapons ready; but leaving everything to Jesus, I ran on as if they were my escort, or as if I saw them not. If any reader wonders how they were restrained, much more would I, unless I believed that the same Hand that restrained the lions from touching Daniel held back these savages from hurting me. We came to a stream crossing our path. With a bound all my party cleared it, ran up the bank opposite, and disappeared in the bush.

"Faint yet pursuing, I also tried the leap, but I struck the bank and slid back on my hands and knees towards the stream. At this moment I heard a crash above my head amongst the branches of an overhanging tree, and I knew that a killing-stone had been thrown, and that that branch had saved me. Praising my God, I scrambled up on the other side, and followed the track of my party into the bush. The savages gazed after me for a little in silence, but no one crossed the stream; and I saw them separate into two, one portion returning to the village and another pressing inland. With what gratitude did I recognize the Invisible One who brought their counsels to confusion."

My enemies seldom slackened their hateful desigus against my life, however calmed or baffled for the moment. On one occasion, when natives in large numbers were assembled at my house, a man furiously rushed on me with his axe; but a Kaserumini chief snatched a spade with which I had been working, and dexterously defended me from instant death. Life in such circumstances led me to cling very near to the Lord Jesus; I knew not, for one brief hour, when or how attack might be made; and yet, with my trembling hand clasped in the hand once nailed on Calvary and now swaying the sceptre of the universe, calmness and peace and resignation abode in my soul.

Next day, a wild chief followed me about for four hours with his loaded musket, and, though often directed towards me, God restrained his hand. I spoke kindly to him, and attended to my work as if he had not been there, fully persuaded that my God had placed me there, and would protect me till my allotted task was finished. Looking up in unceasing prayer to our dear Lord Jesus, I left all in his hands, and felt immortal till my work was done. Trials and hair-breadth escapes strengthened my faith, and seemed only to nerve me for more to follow; and they did tread swiftly upon each other's heels. Without that abiding consciousness of the presence and power of my dear Lord and Saviour, nothing else in all the world could have preserved me from losing my reason and perishing miserably. His words, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world," became to me so real that it would not have startled me to behold Him, as Stephen did, gazing down upon the scene. I felt his supporting power, as did St. Paul, when he cried, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." It is the sober truth, and it comes back to me sweetly after twenty years, that I had my nearest and dearest glimpses of the face and smile of my blessed Lord in those dread moments when musket, club or spear was being levelled at my life. Oh the bliss of living and enduring, as seeing "Him who is invisible."

S. C. Spurr in The Baptist relates the following remarkable instance of the care of the Lord over one of his servants, an aged woman, a Quakeress, and a true Christian:

At one period of her life she resided with one of her brothers who owned a large silk mill. Her house was removed some distance from his works, and stood in its own grounds. Adjoining the mill was a large untenanted house, and my friend would insist upon sleeping in this house in preference to remaining at her brother's. Nobody knew exactly why she insisted upon this, but those who knew her most intimately guessed that she selected this lonely spot in order that she might spend quiet hours in communion with her Lord. In this house she also kept a number of her valuables, and other rooms were used by her brother to store certain of his goods. Friends often remonstrated with her, and said that surely she would be murdered some night, and her brother ordered the rope of the mill to be connected with her bedroom in case of danger. Her only reply to these remarks was this: "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty;" and "There shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling. For He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways."

One night she retired to rest as usual, and, after committing herself to God, fell asleep. Then God spoke to her in a vision of the night. She often assured us that a voice said distinctly to her, "My child, rise and go to the window." Instantly she awoke, and getting out of bed went to the window and drew aside the blind. The moon was shining brightly, and there in the moonlight, right under her window, stood a man of villainous countenance, gazing up into her window. Their eyes met, and for a minute the gaze was continued. Here was mischief—this man meant no good—what should she do? No house was within half a mile. At hand lay the bell-rope. Should she pull it? Then her favorite text came, "He shall give his angels charge over thee to keep thee in all thy ways." Releasing the blind, she stood for a moment, and then turned to God with this prayer, "Lord, thy child trusts thee alone—give me rest, O Lord." With this she re-entered her bed, and instantly fell asleep. Upon hearing this story, her friends demanded that she should leave the mill-house, and to meet their wishes she complied. The very night she left, the mill was robbed. But the most singular thing was that, while the robbers ransacked the house and burst open doors and riddled locks, not one article of hers was touched. Two umbrellas had been left together—a new silk one belonging to her, and a shabby one belonging to her brother—the shabby one was missing, while the new one lay untouched.

Soon afterwards the robbers were apprehended and transported. A few years later her brother was in Australia, when a man stopped him in a large factory and said:

"Are you not Mr. C—, of M—?"

"Yes," was the reply.

"Then I have a confession to make to you. I was transported here for the robbery of your mill, and one thing in connection with it is on my mind, and I must relieve myself by telling you of it. I had prepared to rob the mill for some time before I succeeded, and one night I went there with the full intention of murdering your sister, and afterwards spoiling the place; but as I stood in the moonlight gazing up into her window I was startled to see the blind move, and to see her face gazing into mine. For a moment or two I could not move, and when I recovered from my astonishment I was compelled to go away without effecting my purpose."

The man then asked for forgiveness.

Many persons will say this is a singular story and exceptional. Perhaps so; but God would do more for us if we would allow Him.

DEBT (National)—mortgaging the property of our posterity, that we may be better enabled to destroy our contemporaries. It may be questionable, whether any community has a moral right to discount the future, for the purpose of tormenting or corrupting the present; to exhaust the resources of many ages, that it may render the pugnacity and ambition of its own more extensively mischievous. Is there no limit to this right, or, rather, wrong; no check, but the frightful one of a national bankruptcy? If Parliament, for instance, for the purpose of raising a large loan, were to sell all our unborn children into slavery, would our offspring be legally bound to submit to bondage. To a certain extent, the latter includes the former; for the person is often fettered where the purse is crippled and straitened.

Well is it that these questions should be discussed, for the universal discontinuance of the funding system would be an incalculable blessing to the world, by cutting the sinews of war. While it lasts, however, let its engagements be sacredly observed.

The injurious persons who maintain that the weight of our debt gives solidity to our political institutions, and that its increase only adds to our security, remind one of the sapient Justice, who, finding the ice begin to crack, as he was crossing the frozen Thames, cried out to his servant, "John, there seems to be some danger here; so, for our mutual safety, do pry thee help me over on your back."

Icebergs.

Ensign Hugh Rodman, of the United States Navy, who went to Newfoundland a few months ago for the Hydrographic Bureau, explains many interesting things about glaciers and bergs, in a report he has just made on "Ice and Ice Movements in the North Atlantic Ocean." He says: "Once the glacier extends into deep water, pieces are broken off by their buoyancy, aided possibly by the currents and the brittleness of the ice. This process is called calving. The size of the pieces set adrift varies greatly, but a berg from 60 to 100 feet to the top of its walls, whose spires or pinnacles may reach from 200 to 250 feet in height, and from 300 to 500 yards in length, is considered an average sized berg in the Arctic. These measurements apply to the part above the water, which is about one-eighth or one-ninth of the whole mass. Many authors give the depth under water as being from eight to nine times the height above: this is incorrect, and measurements above and below water should be referred to mass and not to height. It is even possible to have a berg as high out of water as it is deep below the surface, for if we imagine a large, solid lump, of any regular shape, which has a very small, sharp, high pinnacle in the centre, the height above water can easily be equal to the depth below. An authentic case on record is that of a berg grounded in the Strait of Belle Isle in sixteen fathoms of water, that had a thin spire about one hundred feet in height."

INTERESTING OBSERVATIONS.

Observations made on a typical Greenland glacier shows that its breadth was 18,400 feet, depth 940 feet, and advance per day 47 feet during the summer season. This would give about 200,000,000 cubic feet a year as the product of an average sized ice fjord, which, allowing five pounds a day to each person in the United States, would last over one hundred years. This particular glacier, it will be seen, is very much larger than the great Muir Glacier, of Alaska, whose annual output is some 51,100,000 cubic feet a year.

Each glacier in Greenland, so far as any estimate has been made, gives birth each year to from 10 to 100 icebergs. When these bergs are plunged into the Arctic Sea, they are picked up by the Arctic current and begin their journey to the North Atlantic. But there are thousands of them afloat; they crowd and rub against each other, and frequently they break into smaller masses. Many go aground in the Arctic basin, others get to the shores of Labrador, where from one end to the other they continually ground and float. Some disappear there, while others get safely past and reach the Grand Banks. * * If bergs as soon as they are born, at once moved to the south and met with no obstructions, their journey of about 1200 to 1500 miles would occupy from four to five months. This is on the supposition that the Arctic current sweeps along ten miles a day, which is perhaps really less than its actual progress.

If bergs were liberated principally in July and August, they should reach trans-Atlantic routes in December and January; but this is a rare exception. Bergs are generally most plentiful in the late spring and the late summer months off the banks of Newfoundland. When they are first set free on the west Greenland shore, they take some months to find their way out of Davis Strait. And yet once in a great while a single berg will at once drift into the southerly current, and move unobstructed until it is devoured in the Gulf Stream. The difference in time of two bergs reaching a low latitude, which were set adrift on the same day, may be from one to two years.

Besides the counter currents and the influence of some of the shore lines, field ice also presents an obstruction to the passage of bergs. A close season in the Arctic may prevent their escape very largely, though because icebergs extend deep into the water, they act as ice ploughs and aid materially in breaking up the vast fields which so often shut up the Arctic basin. Bergs are blown by the wind more than they are moved by ocean currents, and will often be noticed forcing their way through immense fields of ice and going directly to windward. Advantage of this is taken by vessels in ice fields which often moor to bergs and are towed for miles through heavy ice, through which they could not otherwise make any headway. This is accomplished by sinking an ice anchor into them and using a strong tow line, and as the berg advances open water is left to the leeward, while the loose ice float past on both sides.

BRITTLINESS OF THE ICE.

Ensign Rodman says that the ice in bergs is especially brittle. "A blow of an axe will at times split them," he writes, "and the report of a gun, by concussion, will accomplish the same end. They are more apt to break up in warm weather than in cold, and whalers and sealers note this before landing on them when an anchor is to be planted or fresh water to be obtained. On the coast of Labrador, in July and August, when it is packed with bergs, the noise of rupture is often deafening, and those experienced in ice give them a wide berth. When they are frozen the temperature is very low, so that when their surface is exposed to a thawing temperature the tension of the exterior and interior is very different, making them not unlike a Prince Rupert's drop. Then, too, during the day, water made by melting finds its way into the crevices, freezes and hence expands, and, acting like a wedge, forces the berg into fragments. Much of the ice encountered at sea is discolored, and often full of dirt and gravel, while not infrequently stones are found imbedded in it.

Along the shores of Labrador, where there is a large rise and fall in the tide, ice is brought into contact with the bottom, and mud and seaweed are frozen in with it, while at times land slides precipitate large quantities of dirt and stones on its surface. As the ice leaves the coast and comes to the southward, it brings these burdens with it, which are deposited on the ocean bottom when the ice melts. As this melting occurs to a great extent over the Grand Banks, it would seem that the deposit from the field ice would be greater than that from bergs. It is hard to understand why bergs should have foreign substances frozen into them, as they are formed from snow deposited on the frozen surfaces in the interior of Greenland, and hence their thickness is added to from their upper surface. It is possible that in their journey south in the Arctic current they accumulate more or less foreign matter by having it ground into their bottoms; but this does not seem probable, as it is hard to force gravel into ice and give it a permanent hold, while mud accumulated in this way would soon be washed out. Then, too, the largest bergs find their way round the edges of the Banks, and do not cross, on account of their draught, for only an average sized berg crosses the Banks."

Of course to see icebergs in their greatest glory one must go to the far north, to the very country where they are grown. Arctic ice is frozen and refrozen for years, and finally becomes very hard, while the color of the old ice is often of a bluish tint or of the clearest white. As to the shapes of bergs, Esuign Rodman says they assume the greatest variety, from those approximating to some regular geometric figure to others crowned with spires, domes, minarets and peaks, while others are pierced by deep indentations or caves. "Small cataracts precipitate themselves from the large bergs," reports the Hydrographic Bureau observer, while from many icicles hang in clusters from every projecting ledge. They frequently have outlying spurs under water, which are as dangerous as any other sunken reefs. For this reason it is advisable for vessels to give them a wide berth, for there are a number of cases on record where vessels were seriously damaged by striking when apparently clear of the berg. Among these is that of the British steamship Nessmore, which ran into a berg in latitude 41° 50' N., longitude 52° W., and stove in her bows. On docking her a long score was found extending from abreast her fore rigging all of the way aft, just above her keel. Four frames were broken, and the plates were almost cut through. The ship evidently struck a projecting spur after her helm had been put over, as there was clear water between her and the berg after the first collision."—N. Y. Sun.

Footprints That Help.

"Footprints that perhaps another, Seeing, shall take heart again"

—LONGFELLOW.

My saintly grandmother was born among the Friends, but moving away early in life she married outside of the Society and never afterwards lived within the radius of a Quaker community. She retained an attachment for the peculiar people, and unquestionably her life was lastingly and beautifully engraven with impressions received from them in childhood and deepening with her years. I used often to see in her hands a book with mottled cover and saffron leaves, written over a hundred years before, prefaced by testimonies from Friends of Ireland and the Monthly Meeting of Providence, R. I., and probably printed in Dublin. When grandmother died, this little volume—dear because she had loved it, precious because it had been worn by her faithful fingers and lingered over by her gentle eyes—came into my hands and found a place among my other books. It was a dingily-dressed companion to Shakespeare and Emerson, trapped out in green and gold, and nobody thought it worth more than a passing and indifferent notice from one year's end to another. But it came to pass in the Lord's wise leading that I, who have never sat in a Friend's Meeting nor seen a Quaker garb, yet hungering for simpler bread and thirsting for purer waters than I had discovered along the beaten paths of literature, took down the tarnished Journal of Job Scott, and found much food therein. I have selected scattering from its contents for the possible benefit of those who are unacquainted with this sturdy Quaker author of a century ago.

"There is nothing in this world worth being enjoyed outside of the Divine will. * * * Our help is only in God; but then it is near us, it is in us—a force superior to all possible opposition—a force that never was nor can be foiled. * * * I do not believe a man can go aside and sit down alone, merely to see what the consequence of sitting in silence will be, without a real hunger and heart-felt travail; and therein be favored with the flowings of the holy oil.

Men nuzzle and blind their own understandings by running into abstruse and metaphysical inquiries, wherein they are scarce ever the better satisfied. * * * Violence being done to clear conviction in the mind, death takes place, as on Adam in the day he ate forbidden fruit. * * * Let none dispute the ground with Omnipotence, nor confer with flesh and blood; lest therein despising the day of small things they fall little by little. * * * The way remains, as ever of old, a narrow way, a way of self-denial.

A plain decent dress, a plain house, furniture and fire, will become the humble follower of the humble Saviour; plainness and simplicity of language will best adorn a real Christian. * * * A little straining beyond our circumstances may embarrass us through life, keep us upon the toil and discompose our minds. * * * O thou traveller Zionward! flee, flee for thy life from all these allurements; take God for thy portion and his holy law for thy limitation. Be content with what is convenient for thee. * * * Oh, with what ardency of desire did my prayers ascend before Him, that He would rebuke the proud Luciferian spirit and appoint my dwelling in the low valley where the grass is green, and fragrant flowers give forth a pleasant smell."

It was while dwelling in that valley he wrote:

"A thankful heart I feel,
In peace my mind is staid;
Balsamic ointments heal
The wounds by sorrow made.

"Thou outward war and strife
Prevail from sea to sea,
I've peace in inward life
And that sufficeth me."

In an exegetical vein, he writes:
"The natural man not only does not but cannot know. * * * When the disciples asked why He spake in parables, He informed them it was because it was given to them but not to others to know these things. It was not given to them to the exclusion of any in the same state of inward seeking, docility and child-like simplicity. God's design then was and ever will be to hide these things from all such as are striving to know them by their own mere natural powers. * * * Thousands pass the time of their sojourning here below, hoodwinked and muffled up in darkness, under the baleful influence of this kind of theological knowledge or speculation, falsely called divinity. But in the midst of all this learned ignorance and acquired blindness which overruns the nations, the God of grace is not wanting in the extension of his own immediate rays upon the minds of men. * * * When things open in the light, give up to the heavenly vision. The path, though narrow, may yet be travelled in. It is a way where in all true wayfaring men, though fools, may walk and not err; but then, they must carefully attend to the light. * * * never once beginning to think of taking less heed to it, or that now, after much experience, they can do pretty well with less clearness and less bright shining than heretofore. For alas, this is a mistake and a dangerous delusion, and he that continues to give way to it will soon walk in darkness. * * * But thou whose eye is kept carefully single and attentive to the light, shall witness thy whole body to be full of light, and shall journey forward safely, until thou arrivest at that city that needs not the light of the sun nor the moon, for the Lord God doth lighten it and the Lamb is the light thereof."

He has much sound matter in behalf of the children, in the line of the following:

"I have been renewedly confirmed in the great advantages to families and even to small children, that result from sitting down in solemn silence and therein waiting upon God. I have seen children much broken and tendered in such seasons, so that, even when there had not been a word spoken, the tears have rolled down their cheeks and their looks have been evidently expressive of heart-felt sensations. The practice also teaches them silence and subjection; it curbs their wills and habituates them to restraint and a patient waiting for the parents' permission to engage in their little diversions."

He who said: "The savor of life is still fresh within me," and when dying declared: "My soul seems deeply anchored in God," has left on the record of his life these two brief, self-abandoning prayers:

"Lord God Almighty, carry on thy great work in my soul, bow every exalted imagination, and lay all that is not of thine own immediate begettings in me level with the dust, that I may altogether and at all times hate my own life with perfect hatred."

"O Lord, hold me fast forever—keep my soul alive to the end—make of me and do with me what and as thou pleasest—I am thine. This is my rejoicing. I wish ever to remain thine; and if ever my own will, my own corrupt inclinations presume to rend me from thee, O my gracious Father, be thou pleased to interpose and to lift up a standard against all that may rise up against me for evil."

In closing the volume there come to my mind the words of Lowell, that may well point to this ancient apostle Job:

"It may be glorious to write
Thoughts that shall glad the two or three High souls, like those far stars that come in sight
Once in a century.

"But better far it is to speak
One simple word * * *

* * * one earnest word or line
Which, seeking not the praise of art,
Shall make a clearer faith * * * in the untutored heart."

DISSENTER.—One who refuses the communion of the English Church, under the fantastical notion that Christianity may exist without a state religion, an enormously endowed priestly nobility, wealthy spiritual sinecures, pluralities and non-residence, overpaid drones, hunger-pinched workers, and all the other advantages that so happily characterize our established Church. Really these non-conformists are the most unreasonable people upon earth! Who but a captious puritan would, for such trifling objections as these, undertake the burthen of supporting two churches, split himself out from all the tempting flesh-pots of Egypt, from benefices, dignities, rich revenues, college education, professorships, and the innumerable fat things, that may be scrambled for within the golden pale of episcopacy? For such a perverse self-denial there is but one way of accounting; the man who practices it must be neither more nor less than—conscientious!—The Tin Trumpet.

SELECTED.
PREFERENCES AND TREASURES.

I'd rather drink cold water from the brook
Than quaff excitement from a golden chalice;
I'd rather sleep on the straw of a shepherd's hut,
Than lie awake and restless in a palace.

I'd rather earn dry bread in lusty health,
And eat it with a sense of wholesome pleasure,
Than feed without the zest of appetite
Off gorgeous plate, and unavailing treasure.

I'd rather have one loved, unfading friend
Than fifty parasites crowd my bounty;
And one poor lass who trusted me for myself
Than one without a heart who owned a county.

Nature is kind if our desire is pure,
And stress rich blessings everywhere around us;
While fortune, if we pant in her pursuit,
Too often grants her favors to confound us.

Fresh air and sunshine, flowers and health and love,
These are endowments if we learn to prize them;
The wise man's treasures, better worth than gold,
And one but fools and wicked men despise them.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

TO J. E. R. AND S. M.

Speed ye, our brothers, in all your devotion
To the cause of your God in the isles of the ocean,
Warmly we glow with a heartfelt emotion,

As thus on our thresholds we bid you adieu;
Speed in the work that your Master has given,
In the power of his might be the gospel sword driven,
From many sad hearts be the sin-fetters riven,
Through messages borne o'er the waters by you.

Not now is the pathway encompassed with danger,
As when the brave "Freeling," a storm-beaten stranger
From island to island became a sea ranger

To bear unto thousands the Light of his Word,
More open and trodden the highway before you,
No longer unknown is the nation that bore you,
The fields with the whiteness of harvest implore you
To gather their sheaves for your crucified Lord.

His ways are in secret: his promises spoken
Through prophets aforesaid, are sure and unbroken,
We cherish your call as a beautiful token

His work shall "revive in the midst of the years,"
The Power that on Sinai's mountain descended—
In flames of fire upon Carmel attended,
Has never been shortened, will never be ended,
But guide thro' the roll of eternity's spheres.

He goeth before, and the soil is preparing
To treasure and nurture the seed you are bearing—
With some the same household of faith you are sharing,

Whose hope in your coming is earnest and strong,
Refreshed by the sermons and teaching—
Strengthened the souls that are fainting and yearning,
With burdens laid down, may your joy in returning
Be as the gladness of Miriam's song.

Go—may the Infinite Presence attend you—
By land and by sea cause a host to befriend you—
From trouble and trial his armor defend you,

And bring you again to the haven of home,
Only in prayer, our spirits, outreaching,
Can lift unto Heaven their silent beseeching,
That He who has gifted us blessed with his teaching
Will crown in the end when your labor is done.

"I stood on the beach looking off up the sea, and there was a strong wind blowing, and I noticed some of the vessels were going that way and other vessels were going another way. I said to myself: 'How is it that the same wind blows one vessel in one direction, and the other in another direction?' I found out by looking that it was the different way they had the sails set. And so does trouble come to this world.
Some men it drives into the harbor of heaven, and other men it drives on the rocks. It depends upon the way you have your sails set.
All the Atlantic and Pacific oceans of surging sorrow cannot sink a soul that has asked for God's pilotage."—Talmage.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

William Ridgway,

Soon he was to be aided again by instrumental means, in the holy resolves that this last affliction had afresh created. Deborah Darby and Rebecca Young, two ministers in the Society of Friends, were then in America. They had just been in New York, where their powerful preaching had, among others, awakened the youthful Stephen Grellet. He had been set on the heavenward path largely through their messages of warning and love. Had their toil for their Master's sake been rewarded by no other converts than the ardent and saintly Grellet, they would not have visited America in vain. But their work of love was soon directed to strengthen another young man, and help start him permanently on a life of devotion and active service for his oft-times forgiving Lord. Wm. Ridgway speaks thus of this occasion:

"About this time Deborah Darby and Rebecca Young, two ministering Friends from England, were visiting the meetings around about Moores-town; and, thinking they were done with Jersey, set out from thence to go to Philadelphia. When on the road, Rebecca became engaged in silent meditation; Deborah observed it, and her mind became also retired inward. They ordered the carriage to be stopped, and after being awhile in silence, Rebecca said she felt her mind drawn towards Burlington; and Deborah having a similar concern, they requested the driver to turn and take them to Burlington, not knowing what they might have to do there. But after attending a meeting, they found they must enter upon a family visit. When the visit was paid to our family, Rebecca began; and she had been favored to see so fully through me, and to know me, and so pointedly to set before me my real state and condition, that I was broken to pieces, and seemed to myself to be undone forever. But after she had done, Deborah began, and she soon brought bone to bone again, and so built me up, that I felt new resolves formed in my mind, and a confidence that strength would be given now to make a full stand, and power to take up my daily cross. I understood by one of the Friends who accompanied them in the visit to my family, that they said after they got out, that if they got nothing more, this visit was enough to pay them for turning back to Burlington. Such was the goodness and mercy of Israel's Shepherd to me, when I was in danger of faltering, to send his messengers and instruments to awaken, warn, strengthen and build up a poor backslider. After this I became more watchful and jealous over myself; and gave up fully to follow the inward manifestations of truth; diligently attending meetings for worship, associating with religious people, and carefully avoiding the company of such as I had reason to think would be hurtful to my best life.

"I have omitted many things in this narrative; particularly much of my improper conduct. One remarkable instance of Divine regard I find is omitted in its proper place, which I think worthy to be noted. While living on my farm, I was one day at work by myself, when my mind became so illuminated, and my heart so filled with Divine love, that my natural strength almost left me. I had to sit down, and could say with the patriarch, surely the Lord is in this place. It was truly a marvellous visitation, although often disregarded; yet still often adverted to and remembered by me. And now whilst I write this account, I can see the spot where it occurred, and have some remaining view of the light that then shone round about me.

"And now by giving diligent attention to that measure of light and grace that was made manifest within me, I was strengthened in my resolutions to walk in that pathway which Infinite goodness was casting up for me, in order for my full redemption from iniquity. And according to my faithfulness therein, so was my peace. But the old inhabitants being not entirely cast out, they would be popping up here and there, and continue to annoy me; from which cause I found it needful frequently to rally to the standard, and not only keep on, but brighten up my armor, and contend for the faith."

William Ridgway's remarks about "the old inhabitants" are somewhat amusing, yet full of deep meaning. There are very few who endeavor to tread the Christian's pathway, who do not, it even may be after many years, find some of the old passions and weaknesses "popping up" every once in a while. This tendency to yield to temptations will always annoy the sincere followers of Christ, just as it annoyed him. But such have to do as he did—"frequently rally to the standard," and often after repentance and prayer "brighten up the armor;" and start in afresh, as he did, to "contend for the faith."

We now conclude his interesting memorandum: "I kept steady to religious meetings, in which practice I found my spiritual strength renewed; and was after a while constrained to bear public testimony to the excellency of that power, which had often so marvelously and mercifully preserved me. And as I felt an engagement from time to time to express a few words in our meetings, my friends, thinking I was authorized so to do, I was thus introduced into the meeting for ministers and elders.

"And now having written nearly all I had in prospect, I may add, that I believe there is no station or situation whilst inhabiting these tabernacles of clay, that is safe or secure, any longer than while a vigilant watch is maintained. Our adversary is never weary; he is ever ready to take advantage of our halting or relaxing from the watch. But whilst we stand on the watch, he hath no power to approach or wound us, our watch-tower being a sure place of defence."

We have many excellent accounts of the religious experiences and labors of ministers in our denomination, but comparatively few have so fully told of their early life, as has William Ridgway. His concern in writing was evidently not so much to tell of his labors in the cause of Christ, as to narrate his youthful experiences, and to show how Divine love forgave, and how Grace helped and delivered him from his early temptations and troubles. No doubt he did well to write as he did; yet it would be interesting to know more of the story of his maturer years.

We do know, however, that his middle life and old age were passed in spiritual and temporal prosperity and usefulness. He became a successful merchant; and after all his previous losses, was able to retire from business with a comfortable fortune, as fortunes were reckoned in his day. He was a minister who possessed the love and regard of his brethren in the Church. He lived to a good old age, and then laid down his head in peace.

His last illness continued for five weeks, and was a very suffering one. An account of it written by one of his daughters, reveals a choice and ripe, yet humble old Christian, going with holy confidence into the presence of his God.

One day his friend Samuel Atkinson called to see him; and in the course of conversation he said, "I know my early life was a very unsettled one, but the mercy of the Lord has been extended to me, and I know I am still in his hands, and I trust He will not forsake me." Another time he spoke of his younger days, and said, "he would have been landed in perdition, had it not been for the goodness of Providence to him;" adding, "the goodness of Providence towards me has been beyond description." He had the full possession of all his faculties to a very end, and often was engaged in prayer and praise.

Speaking one day of his children, he said, "I have endeavored to be an example to them, and to train them up in the fear of the Almighty; and I now feel my reward." In the midst of his great sufferings he once remarked, "I have suffered much beyond the power of language to express; but I think I have seen there is nothing so calculated to bring the soul home to its God, as severe suffering." A few days later he said to one of his visitors, "I have passed through great suffering, and in the forepart of the time was almost ready to question why it must be so; but now I am well satisfied that I have not suffered one unnecessary pain." So patient was he under his afflictions!

Not long before the end, he prayed, "Oh, Heavenly Father! be pleased to continue thy loving kindness, and have compassion on this poor tabernacle; thou hast been merciful, thou hast been gracious; if there are any sins yet to be repented of, be pleased to give me a place of repentance." Often he would intercede in broken accents, "Oh, Heavenly Father, be pleased to cut the thread." His last weeks were weeks of prayer; and the final invocation uttered by him ended with the language, "not my will, but Thine be done." In this devotional spirit his life concluded; and near the end of the year 1833, his purified soul entered into the joys of immortality.

One of his children, commenting upon the conspicuous attitude of his mind during his last years, remarks, that connected therewith they often dwelt upon the words of the poet—

"Prayer is the Christian's vital breath,
The Christian's native air—

His watchword at the gates of death;
He enters heaven with prayer."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Educating Into the War Spirit.

A correspondent of THE FRIEND, a few weeks ago, writing, I think, from Canada, expressed a good deal of concern regarding the spread of the military teaching and drill in schools, and hoped that the educational institutions of our religious Society would not become permeated by this spirit. This caution, I believe, is a well-grounded one. The Third Month number of the London Herald of Peace expresses great regret that that generally useful organization, the "Religions Tract Society," should continue, as it has done for years, to make the Army and Navy so specially attractive for the young. It cites the fact that in the Society's publication, the "Boys' Own Annual," of 1891, "there are about fifty papers dealing with military and naval topics, both in prose and verse, and illustrated with exciting pictures of battles and fighting."

In that generally excellent family paper, the Illustrated Christian Weekly, from whose columns it has often been a pleasure to quote with approval, I regretted to see last winter, about the time that the Chilian difficulty was concluded, an article contributed by a military man, which seemed somehow to be very much out of place.

"The arts of peace," said this teacher, "are better than the arts of war; but the arts of peace can only obtain their noblest fruition in a land where the arts of war are widely understood and comprehended. The one is the coordinate of the other. A glorious with no high military traditions—no glorious legends—no lofty exemplars—no great national sentiment—no warm pulse of national honor—is like a huge body without the vitalizing presence of a brave and contented soul. The surest and best way to have peace, perpetually, is to be ready to fight for it at a moment's notice. Hence we need an army large enough to serve as a nucleus around which the patriotic men of the nation can rally from all parts of this land of ours in case we are threatened with invasion or it becomes necessary for us to seek foreign fields and contest for our rights in the enemy's territory. The motto of every patriot should be, 'My country, if right, but right or wrong, my country.'"

The writer of the above quotation would appear to be a disciple of Von Moltke, for the sentiments expressed are a pretty close reiteration of those which I have seen credited to Germany's doughty warrior. Happily, the number of people is on the increase who believe that it is no longer necessary to stab and shoot people in order to create inspiring traditions for the annals of one's country. The life histories of John Howard, Elizabeth Fry, Pastor Oberlin, Titus Coan, or Dorothea Dix, are surely not less helpfully animating—are they not far more so?—than are those of a Sir Francis Drake, a Duke of Wellington, or a John Paul Jones.

In connection with the last-named fighter, I may pertinently introduce a matter which relates to the subject we are now considering. Looking over a recent number of that widely circulated and ably compiled educational monthly, The Chautauquan, I read a biographical sketch, but more particularly the naval career, of the enterprising commander I allude to. In his well-known engagement with the British ship "Serapis," (an illustration of which is given), mention is made of the fact that of the 370 men under Jones' command, on the "Bon Homme Richard," all but 70 were either killed or wounded in the awful fight. Presumably, this sea captain was contending for liberty and republican institutions, yet he rejoiced to be made by the French king a chevalier of the Order of military merit, and later, to accept an appointment in the Russian service, under an autocrat, in fighting against the Tarks. He went thence to Paris, where he died in 1792.

The youths of America may be taught to study this career as one that appertains to "our glorious legends," but how much better and safer a model for emulation is the biography and self-sacrificing work unto death of Howard, the reformer in prison discipline and the visitor of the sick and dying in hospitals! Taken prisoner by a French privateer, such as Jones commanded, he suffered many hardships, and, later, when at Kherson, in the South of Russia, contracted an infection from a fevered patient for whom he had prescribed, and died there in 1790.

Which lesson, it is appropriate to ask, is the best to be learnt by our sons and daughters? To teach them to feel the "warm pulse of national honor," by following the "glorious" career of one who loved the soldier's service so well that he fought not only for his country, but for the autocrat of a distant empire, against a non-Christian people who never did him any harm, or to point them to the humble, pitying endeavors of one who went about, and laid down his life at last, in behalf of the sick, the famishing, and the inmates of prisons? Is not this the kind of service that prevents wars among the nations, inclining the peoples to honor, bless and pray for each other, rather than to quarrel, curse and war together?

Again, shall we look for "lofty exemplars" in the six hundred at Balaklava, who rode to death in the "Charge of the Light Brigade," victims of a war that has been repeatedly condemned as both a blunder and a crime; or, shall we not rather be shown the Christian way of doing good to the enemy, in the mission of the benevolent bearers of money, clothing and food to the burnt and bombarded towns immediately after that war? Do not we and the people of England in this present year do better to send shiploads of wheat and corn to famine sufferers in Russia than to despatch thither our warships to help them drive the Turks into the Bosphorus? The Bible way, is it not, "to contest for our rights in the enemy's territory?"

Relative to The Chautauquan, I believe it is under denominational—perhaps chiefly Methodist—control, so that it would seem to be of the first importance that the teaching imparted to its student readers be consonant with that which is so clearly laid down in the Sermon on the Mount, that it exhibit its unity with Wesley's pointed inquiry: "Shall Christians assist the Prince of Hell, who was a murderer from his beginning, by telling the world of the benefit of war?" The outspoken testimony of a Methodist pastor, W. B. Osborne, of the Training-School in Brooklyn, written last month from London to the Christian Standard of Philadelphia, is of a sort that The Chautauquan might beneficially apply, as a corrective of a great deal that finds its way into the periodical literature of the day that is at variance with Christ's teachings upon this matter. Our witness writes:

"For, one, I am weary of this horrible science of war, and never more so than since I have been in London, where the great cathedrals and parks and public places are filled with statues and monuments of the great captains and heroes in the numberless wars that England has waged on every sea and land beneath the sun for more than a thousand years, some of them for the most infamous purposes, such as forcing the opium curse on China. Let us have done with this worship of the god of war."

But the world will not be done with the iniquity, until the professing Church of Christ livingly testifies against it. There is a glimmer of hope in the consideration given to the subject by the general Assembly of the Southern Presbyterian Church held last summer at Asheville, North Carolina, and in their sending out an overture to all the other religious bodies, asking them to unite in a petition to the governments of all nations, professing to be Christian, that they substitute arbitration for war in the settlement of international disputes.

CUSTOM.—Most shrewd and discreet was the advice of the old lady, who, on her first settlement at Constantinople, advised her children to conform strictly to the manners and customs of the inhabitants, adding, "When people are in Turkey, they should live as turkeys live."—The Tin Trumpet.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Hippopotamus.—This animal abounds in the upper waters of the Nile, and in many places as many as a hundred are found together. They are very dangerous to the boats which traverse the river by night, and in my explorations, when it was necessary to proceed by night, I used to keep them at a distance by the light of a lantern.

It is one of the principal articles of food of the natives, but its flesh is spongy, hard and tasteless. A piece of the meat is placed to cook in a saucepan without any water; as soon as it is warm, so much fat is melted as to fill the saucepan, and the meat after boiling four or five hours, is reduced to the tenth part of its former bulk. A hippopotamus would furnish in fat 50 to 60 per cent. of its own weight.

The female hippopotamus is fierce and terrible when she has her young ones, and then becomes very dangerous to the natives who hunt her, for she attacks the boats furiously and upsets them.—Gess's Soudan.

Guinea Worm.—I intended to make an excursion, when I began to feel acute pain in my left ankle. Supposing that I had sprained it, I paid no attention, but the pain increased and changed its position, feeling like needle-pricks in the sole of my foot, which was very much swollen, so that I was obliged to go to bed. The pain brought on strong fever, and I was at last convinced that I was attacked by the guinea-worm. I had always heard that one got it by walking in mud or water, but, in spite of every precaution, it was impossible to avoid marching in the water. After thirty-three days of suffering and sleeplessness, a blister like that arising from a burn was formed; I made an opening, and there issued water mixed with blood, and a guinea-worm as thick as a violin-string. But unfortunately the worm retreated again, and the wound closed, so that it is probable it will seek another issue.—Gess's Soudan.

A Woman's Encounter with a Tiger.—Lucinda Q. Gore, of Lackharabad, India, is a school teacher. Not long ago she was standing at her blackboard, when, turning around, she saw in the doorway the glaring eyes of a tiger. With a woman's instinct she seized a broom and drove it in the tiger's face, brush foremost. One of the straws entered the tiger's eyes, and he drew back with a howl of pain to make a spring, when she slammed the door in his face. The door was heavy, but the supports were frail. While the tiger banged the door with his head, L. Gore lowered the largest of the little fellows out of the window to alarm the neighborhood. When the brave little fellow was safely off, she took her broom and went back to defend the door, which the tiger was still assaulting. At length—and it seemed ages—there were shots, cheers and a terrible cry. Then the door opened, the crowd rushed in.—N. Y. Evening Sun.

Migration of the Tsetse Fly.—All white men who visit regions in Africa infested by the tsetse fly have much to say about it. There is now evidence that the tsetse is moving gradually to more northern regions, and the cause is supposed to be that South Africa is depleted of its large game, much of which is moving northward to get away from hunters, and the tsetse fly goes with it.

The insect is only a little larger than the ordinary house-fly, and it resembles the honey-bee. Its sting is hardly so annoying as that of the mosquito, but near the base of its proboscis is a little bag which contains its poison. It lives on the blood of animals and only a few species are fatally affected by its bite. Cattle, horses and dogs, however, can not live when bitten by the tsetse fly. Natives who herd cattle, and travellers who depend on horses or oxen must avoid the fly regions or lose their stock. For human beings its bite has no serious consequences.

Swan, a missionary in Katanga, near the western headwaters of the Congo, says that recently the buffaloes of South Africa, which differ from those of the Congo, have been moving northward into the Katanga country. It is to the buffalo that the English missionary attributes the prevalence of the tsetse in Katanga. When Lieut. LeMarinel went to Katanga, more than a year ago, he took a dozen head of cattle, intending to leave them at the station there and raise a large herd. The tsetse was too much for them, however, and in a short time only two of the cattle remained.

Sometimes the poison kills the victim in a week or ten days. At other times the animal lingers along for several months. The symptoms are those of blood-poisoning. White men in Africa express the opinion that with the gradual disappearance of large game the tsetse will vanish. If it does not, it will be impossible to carry on many enterprises that would certainly thrive in some regions now infested by the fly.—N. Y. Sun.

The Bumble Bee in New Zealand.—The introduction of the bumble bee into New Zealand a few years ago to secure the fertilization of the red clover, and the remarkable success of this venture, are matters of record. In a recent paper in the "New Zealand Journal of Science," noticed in the "Entomologist's Monthly Magazine," George M. Thomson, F. L. S., presents an interesting article on the introduced Bombi in New Zealand, giving also a list of the plants and flowers which are visited by these bees. He makes the interesting statement that, with a few exceptions, he has never heard of these bees visiting the flowers of indigenous plants, but states that they have become so extraordinarily abundant that the question has even arisen in his mind as to whether they would not become as serious a pest to the apiarist as the rabbits have proved to the farmer and cultivator, on account of their absorbing so much of the nectar of the flowers. He also points out the remarkable fact in connection with the life of the bumble bee in New Zealand that in many parts of the colony it does not seem to hibernate at all, but is to be seen daily on flowers all the year round.—Insect Life.

Teak.—The teak, which has passed into proverb as the best material for ship building, is superior to all other woods, from the fact that it contains an essential oil which prevents spikes and nails driven into it from rusting. This property is not possessed by any other wood in the world, and furnishes an explanation of the fact that ships built of teak are practically indestructible. Some have been known to last for 150 years, and when broken up their beams were as sound as when first put together.

ONCE heard John Simpson say, he did not believe that any people would ever raise up and testify against us and our principles as our first Friends did against others. But, he said, there might a people rise up and walk more consistent with our principles and profession, than we, in the present day, in too general a way, do.—John Hunt.

The Attitude of the European Churches.—Through the Middle Ages and down to the commencement of the present century both cloister and parsonage were the chief manufactories of liquor, priest and parson being their dispensers as well as consumers. To this day some of the most sought-for liquors come from French monasteries. Transition to a better state of things has been slow; even now, only here and there, particularly in the Scandinavian countries and Great Britain, are the churches awakening to their responsibilities in this matter for still the great bulk of the European churches—Catholics (Greek and Roman) and Protestants—either combat or ignore the abstinence cause.

The condition in our country affords an astounding contrast. Here the churches are practically unanimous that the drink is one of the most powerful hindrances to the coming of Christ's kingdom on earth, and that all more or less consistently and definitely demand the removal of this huge stumbling-block.

To understand the backward state of Europe we must know something of the relation between Church and State. In Europe, in contradistinction to America, union and independence are the rule for the Church and State, separation the exception, although here in the United States the principal revenue from the drink-traffic. The State has been supported by the State as servants of the State. If the Church fought the drink-traffic how could it expect the protection of the State? Hence a terrible alliance—not the less deplorable if we regard it as involuntary, exists between the Church and the drink. To illustrate: It is, for instance, no uncommon sight in Sweden to find a dicesonary, or a member of the clergy, of the rank of a Sainly bishop, are the stoutest drink champions. Recently Skane's Evening News related the following incident: "During an official visit, Bishop Billing, not seeing any brandy on the side-table at dinner, asked, 'Don't you have any brandy in this house?' The host, red in the face, and with stammering voice, replied, 'No, Mr. Bishop; but if you desire it—' 'Of course, I want a little appetizer,' said the bishop, 'and a hot toddy, and a hot toddy with a brandy bottle and one glass.' 'Well, pastor,' said the bishop, looking seriously at his host, 'don't you possess more than one brandy glass?' 'I—I can get more, but I thought—' 'Well, well,' interrupted the bishop, 'get us a few more; it may be (casting an encouraging look at the surrounding clergyman) that there are others here who want a little drop.' It is stated the brandy bottle was consequently emptied!"

As regards Great Britain, the Church is in organic alliance with the drink-traffic. Not only does it draw large revenues from hundreds of public-houses on Church property, but when the great Church House, now in course of erection in London is finished it is to have a bar, and, as the license for this must be applied for in the name of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Primate of the Church of England (Dr. Johnson) will, of course, virtually become a licensed victualler. While the Bishop of Manchester (Dr. Moorhouse) is engaged with the subject of how to improve public-houses, the Bishop of Chester (Dr. Jayne) announces it as his ambition to own and manage a public-house, and the Bishop of Salford (Dr. Vaughan) graces liquor-dealers' dinners, praising their beer, and hoping that they will brew "beer" that will be drunk by every body; and Rev. Mr. Clutterbuck, of Abingdon, sits on the board of a brewery company.

Connected with the Church Congress Fair at Rhy! were three beer-booths for the refreshment of the clergy. These can no doubt be considered as extreme examples, but it may not be wisely forgotten that the extreme example is in itself a portion of a general significance, and that the same is made by the absence of general protest and the toleration of the Church. Assuredly there are many earnest workers against the drink-evil among the Church of England clergy; but if they had the courage of their convictions would they not denounce such a state of affairs? and if this proved vain would they not leave the Church? The Church of England Temperance Society is but consistent with its double basis of abstinence and drink in fraternizing with brewers, and holding annual meetings in brewers' grounds; and liquor-sellers have actually been known to pass round the collection plate at church, gathering in the funds for this society.—A. Gustafson in the Independent.

John Owen of Detroit.—The Michigan Christian Advocate publishes the following incident related by E. A. Blades: "In the terrible crisis of 1857, when distress prevailed throughout the State, John Owen's pastor. He came to me and said, 'I wish you would see if any members of our society are in need. Don't let any man, woman, or child belong to our church go hungry or cold, but relieve their necessities, and come to me for money.' I expended over $1,200 for J. Owen in that winter. But the condition on which he gave the money was that I should never tell any recipient of his charity who the giver was, nor ever tell, during his lifetime, of his having given the money."

John Owen's partner in business, A. McVittie, furnished the following reminiscences of this worthy man:

"Mr. Owen was very much absorbed in the welfare of his employees. In critical times when we had no contracts to build vessels he was troubled. 'Mac,' he would say to me finally, 'the men cannot afford to be idle; we must build.' And we went to work building a new boat on our own account and always came out all right. * * * He was very much opposed to Sunday work. The steamer E. N. Rice, which we had built for the Cleveland line, was to be launched on a Saturday afternoon, but she got stuck on the ways and we could not get her off. Her captain was anxious to have her launched the next day, Sunday, but Mr. Owen, who was also President of the Cleveland Line, would not hear of it. The captain continued to urge him, when finally Mr. Owen settled the matter by saying, 'Sir, I would rather retain my interest in her on land for longer than own ten vessels like her that were put into the water on Sunday.'"

Gambling.—A considerable proportion of failures in business and 90 per cent. of the defalcations and thefts and ruin of youth among people who are employed in places of trust are due directly to gambling. It is the one vice which seems to destroy immediately the moral sense and to obliterate that absolutely essential quality in employer and employee, in the custodian and his cash, in the trustee and his estate, in the son and his mother's or sister's property, fidelity to the trust, the violation of which destroys the violator and ruins the people who confide in him. I have seen in my vast employment so much misery from the head of the family neglecting its support and squandering his earnings in the lottery or the policy shop, and the young men led astray in a small way and finally becoming fugitives or landing in the criminal dock, that I have come to believe that the community which licenses and tolerates public gambling cannot have prosperity in business, religion in its churches or morality among its people.—Chauncey M. Depew.

Newsboys.—Even the roughest New York street urchin has a tender spot, if circumstances shape themselves in such a manner as to appeal to his better nature. The boys of the street have their own battles to fight, and they are quick to sympathize with a helpless creature who is really in hard straits. The other day I saw a group of Italian peddler, pushing his hand-cart along Printing House square, struck a stone and upset his vehicle, which was piled high with apples and ears. In a twinkling the golden spheres were rolling in all directions, and a score of newsboys were after them. The Italian stood, in hopeless despair, wrung his hands and burst into tears. The astonished newsboys at first laughed, and then, when they saw how the other day they had so unobtrusively and emptied their well-filled pockets into the cart. Then they pitched in vigorously and helped the now encouraged Italian to gather up the fallen fruit. The apples and pears were soon back in the cart with not one missing, and the Italian felt so thankful to the gamins that he mediately presented each one of them with a grape apple. The boys laughed merrily this time, and soon disappeared in the crowd. The Italian continued his journey with a beaming face and a much better opinion of New York newsboys than he had ever had before.—New York Times.

Paid Pastors.—The last number of the British Friend contains several articles expressive of the uneasiness felt in England with the course pursued by the Friends' Home Mission Committee, especially in the appointment of paid pastors to carry on religious work. The belief is expressed that the ultimate outcome of the present system will be the permanent establishment of a paid Ministry among Friends, with all the evil consequences that follow from it. And the statement is made that the controversy on this subject is rapidly dividing the Society into two camps.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

This is the season of the year when many leave their homes for a time, and a desire has been felt that our members (especially our younger Friends) should supply themselves with Tracts from Friend's Book Store, and distribute them, as way opens for it. There are many ways of doing good, and even a single tract, may, through the Divine blessing, be instrumental in turning the mind to higher and better things than this world can give. An instance of this kind may be mentioned as an encouragement to faithfulness. Calling to see a woman, on her sick, and, as it proved to be, her dying bed, a tract was given her, "What Shall We do to be Saved," next time, on visiting her, she said, "Oh! that tract, you gave me, I never read anything like it before," and asked to have a chapter from the Bible read, and her attention turned to the "One thing needful," and gave advice to those around her; and we may believe, through Infinite love and mercy, was prepared for the solemn change.

May it be our endeavor, whether at home or abroad, to adorn our profession, by our example, keeping watch over our words and actions, and thereby draw others into the straight and narrow way. Our blessed Saviour said, "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold; then also, I must bring, and they shall hear my voice, and there shall be one fold and one Shepherd."

Laying Up.

For those with narrow incomes, laying up is about synonymous with going without. One can't have his cake and eat it, too. If one who has $100 a week spends $100 a week, what is there left to put in bank? The great fortunes in this country have been begun on small savings. The fortune-makers weck without a great many things that their fellows indulged in.

Not very long ago a young man married and set up his own home. He had a good income from his profession, and could live in modest elegance; but the temptation to spend kept growing week by week, and he found that at the end of the year there would be nothing laid aside for a rainy day. So he and his wife had a consultation, and decided that so much should be put in bank every month, and they would live on the remainder. Of course, this meant inexpensive excursions on holidays, non-indulgence in high-priced amusements, plain clothes, a plain table, and cheap luxuries. It meant, also, that they should find their friends, so far as possible, not among those for whom during one, two, or three life-times somebody had been laying up. It meant that they should find their greatest happiness in each other, in their home, and in such recreations as could be had without any large pecuniary outlay.

Of course, it required courage to decide upon such a scheme of living, and it required persistence to the point of obstinacy to carry out the scheme; but they were sure the position they had taken was sound and sensible, and one never to be reviewed or regretted, and they held to it steadily.

Wise investments of their savings enabled them after a few years to live in a house of their own; but the scale of living was not increased. The simple habits they had formed were sufficient for their happiness, and had preserved them in health and vigor; and they looked forward to declining years without apprehensions of having to work beyond their strength or of going without necessary comforts.

"HE LEADETH ME BESIDE THE STILL WATERS."—I take the reference as not to the waters themselves, but to the flocks resting quiet and undisturbed for a while round the well, after their midday draught. Not only does the shepherd thus lead his flock, but he carries the young lambs which are too tender to keep up with the rest. I have often seen a shepherd carrying a lamb under each arm, and two or three more in the hood of his cloak, as he led the flock. If the abundant imagery of Scripture, taken from pastoral life, contains so many allusions foreign to what we see in the tending of flocks in our own country, how much more difficult must these allusions be to those who know nothing of flocks, and never saw a sheep? I felt this last year, when in Ceylon, I was addressing, through an interpreter, a large congregation of native Christians, and unfortunately chose the subject of the good shepherd. My interpreter told me afterwards that not one of my hearers had ever seen a sheep, or knew what it was. "How, then did you explain what I said?" I asked. "Oh," he replied, "I turned it into a buffalo that had lost its calf, and went into the jungle to find it."

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 11, 1892.

We have received a communication from a Friend residing in Indianapolis, Indiana, who thinks the Society of Friends in the present day is suffering loss from two causes—one is the want of that aggressive zeal which marked the early members of our Society; and the other the adoption of revivalist practices, in which all resemblance to our former manner of worship is lost.

We can unite with our friend in both of these statements, yet some explanation is needed to prevent misunderstanding. The "aggressive zeal" of early Friends was the effect of devotion to the cause of Christ, which resulted from a deep sense of the importance of their own salvation, and of the necessity of a thorough submission to the leadings of the Spirit of Christ. Hence they were ready to go wherever they were sent by their Divine Master; and to perform his biddings, even if prisons or blows should be the reward of their faithfulness. Blessings were abundantly bestowed upon their labors.

In proportion as righteous zeal decays, and the members of the Church come to seek their own ease, comfort and worldly advantages, the Head of the Church withdraws from it his living power and presence, on which depends all ability to baptize others into the Spirit of the Redeemer; and a slothful and lifeless condition follows, in which little spiritual progress is possible.

But the caution is needed here, lest those who see the Church to be in a torpid state should think that a reformation can be effected by entering into active labors, without being sensible of a Divine call, so to labor. This course has led to that departure from our former manner of worship which our correspondent deplors. William Penn says of the Gospel laborers in his days: "These experimental preachers of glad tidings of God's truth and kingdom could not run when they list, or preach or pray when they pleased, but as Christ their Redeemer prepared and moved them by his own blessed Spirit, for which they waited in their services and meetings."

William Penn further says, "Without this secret Divine power, there is no quickening and regenerating of dead souls"—so that the first step in a true reformation must be personal submission to its work on the heart, producing repentance for sin and amendment of life, and thus preparing him who experiences it to be used in such service as the Lord may call him unto. We have no doubt that in the Divine ordering, one may be called to live a godly life in much seclusion, and be as acceptable a servant in the sight of our common Father, as howevers duty it is to proclaim to thousands the tidings of salvation. Yet we would not ignore or undervalue the importance of a living ministry in the Church. Paul exhorted the Corinthians: "Brethren, speak to prophesy." And in the same Epistle he speaks of teaching as among the Divine gifts bestowed on the Church.

The earnest exhortations of William Penn to those professors who had but little concern on their spirits for the glory of the Lord in the prosperity of his truth in the earth, is applicable to many in this day:—"Behold how white the fields are unto harvest, and how few able and faithful laborers there are to work therein! Does nothing lie at your door? Search and see, and lose no time, I beseech you, for the Lord is at hand. Ponder your ways, and see if God has nothing more for you to do; and if you find yourself short in your account with Him, then wait for his preparation, and be ready to receive the word of command."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement shows a decrease of $890,149 during last month.

On the 6th inst., in the U. S. House of Representatives, a bill was passed under suspension of the rules admitting New Mexico as a State, the year being 167, the days 3. The rules were similarly suspended and a bill was passed admitting Arizona as a State—year, 171, days 32.

On the 4th inst. James G. Blaine sent his resignation as Secretary of State to President Harrison, requesting that it be accepted immediately. The President replied within an hour, accepting the resignation. Both the President and J. G. Blaine declined to say anything in explanation of the resignation correspondence.

The one hundred anniversary of the admission of Kentucky into the Union was celebrated at Lexington on the 31st of last month.

The Mayor of Omaha, Nebraska, has signed an ordinance fixing a tax on gambling houses, and providing that all gambling shall be run openly and not behind closed doors. The ordinance is a direct violation of the State statute which became a law four years ago, and which closed all the gambling houses in Omaha. But if liquor saloons are to be licensed, why not gambling saloons, and lotteries and all other places of vice and immorality?

At a mass meeting of colored people, at Columbia, South Carolina, on the 31st of last month, resolutions were adopted setting forth the evil of lynchings, and calling on the colored men "to desist from crimes that stain the name and the race, to frown mobs down, and let the law take its course."

The oil regions in this State were visited on the 5th inst. by a disaster of fire and flood. The section where the loss of life was greatest was largely occupied by foreigners. No one knows their names, and it may be impossible to ever learn just how many are missing. In Titusville it is estimated that fully one hundred persons have been either drowned or burned to death.

The property loss will reach into the millions. At Titusville the loss is estimated at $1,500,000; Oil City, $1,500,000; Corry, $600,000; Meadville, $150,000, and surrounding country probably a million more. The constant rains covered all the small streams into raging torrents, so that with a moderate wind the streams were soon beyond their boundaries. Fire followed the floods, the burning oil from the tanks causing as much disaster and ruin as the water.

The number of deaths in this city last week was 362; which is 42 less than last week and 49 less than the corresponding week of that with a total number 191 were males and 171 females; 41 died of consumption; 27 of diseases of the heart; 23 of old age; 21 of diphtheria; 19 of measles; 17 of pneumonia; 16 of convulsions; 16 of apoplexy; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 12 of casualties; 11 of cholera infantum; 10 of cholera; 10 of smallpox; 10 of scarlet fever and 8 of Bright's disease.

FOREIGN.—It is generally acknowledged that Parliament will be dissolved some time this month, and both parties are already electing members for a majority in the House of Commons. England is widely ascribed to the result. The following from the New York Times, gives a general view of the situation:

"Of English boroughs as they stand the Tories and Unionists now hold 161 and the Liberals 70. Of the county divisions in England the Tories and Unionists hold 100 and the Liberals 75; that is to say, the anti-Irish coalition now has a majority of 175 over the Liberals in England's 465 seats. This majority the Gladstonian leaders believe firmly they can pull down to 15, or at most 25.

"If they do that, it will mark one of the most tremendous reversals of political representation England has known since the Reform Bill. It is often possible, particularly if London verifies the present opinion, that the Liberals may have an absolute majority of the English seats. But this can only be done if the campaign starts off well and the country catches the notion of the flowing tide with Gladstone.

"The Liberals will lose nothing in Wales. They will probably gain seven or eight seats in Scotland. In other words, these three countries will be morally certain to return a net majority of members pledged to give Ireland Home Rule. Only one thing can happen to prevent this; that is if the Irish themselves seem to say their race has lost interest in having Home Rule."

A most terrific tornado passed over Blakeney, in Gloucestershire, on the 31st ult. The wind was accompanied by heavy thunder and lightning and a remarkable down-pour of rain. The streets were flooded in a few minutes, and the water was so high that it went through them, carrying off everything that would float. So deep was the water that many of the lower floors of the houses were flooded, and chairs, tables, &c. went adrift. The roofs of other houses were blown down, and the torrents of rain destroyed almost every tree and hundreds of trees were blown down, and it is feared that the farmers will suffer heavily less through the damage to their crops. All movable property in the town was destroyed.

A dispatch from Marseilles dated the 1st inst., says, the mails which have just arrived from Mauritius confirm the statement that 1,200 persons were killed and 4,000 injured in the recent hurricane. The hurricane was preceded by a violent magnetic disturbance. The sea rose nine feet, the highest level since the cyclone of 1818. Scarcely a house in the colony escaped damage.

The last week has been one of the hottest ever known in Berlin. The mercury rose to 93 degrees in the shade at times, and was rarely below 50. A large number of persons were sunstruck. Violent thunder storms, followed by disastrous floods, occurred in various parts of the country.

A dispatch dated the 3d inst., from Prague, says: Owing to the great excitement that prevailed when it was known that the fire that broke out on the night of the 31st ult. in the Birkenberg silver mine, near Prazibram, had caused the death of a number of the miners, many contradictory statements were made as to the number of those who had perished. One of the first reports had it that 1,200 persons had died. Now, however, that the excitement has died out to a great extent, it is estimated that fully 400 of the employes lost their lives in the disaster.

The Russian Government Grain Committee has decided to permit the general exportation of oats, barley and wheat.

A dispatch to the Times from Calcutta, on the 3d inst., says that thus far there have been over 3,000 deaths from cholera at Serinagar. The whole population of the city has been only 51,000. All the Europeans in the place became alarmed some time ago at the fearful ravages of the disease and left the city.

SARAH A. BACON,
SARAH NICHOLSON.

Haddonfield, N. J.

DIED, at her home near Nauvoo, Iowa, Fifth Month 15, 1892, SARAH BLACKBURN, wife of Thomas Blackburn, in the 67th year of her age. A beloved member of Cook Creek Monthly and Particular Meetings of Friends, Iowa. This dear friend bore a long and severe illness with great patience and resignation, not one murmur being allowed to escape her lips. On being told that her physician thought her time in this world would be short, she very quietly for a while and then spoke very impressively to her husband and daughter, saying, "I believe I will be enabled to do more for you by my death than I could by my life." At another time, her husband sitting by her bed, she said, "I have committed myself over into his keeping. He is able to do just what He sees best with me." Her relatives and friends were a well-grounded hope that she has entered one of those mansions prepared for those that strive to follow the Master in the way of his leading.

MARRIED, in Friends' Meeting House, at Hopewell, Linn County, Iowa, on Third-day, Fifth Month 24th, 1892, SAMUEL, son of William and Mary T. HALL, former deceased, of Harrisville, Harrison County, Ohio, to ANNA, daughter of Richard and Sarah MOTT, of the former place.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 261.

"He that being often reproved, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy." Among the many illustrations of the truth of this statement is the following narrative, which was published in a Washington and Georgetown newspaper, dated Tenth Month 28, 1801:

Not many years ago several young men in a certain part of this country, who had for some time been associated together in literary pursuits, mutually agreed to give their serious attention to religious topics and freely communicate their sentiments to each other. After proceeding awhile in conformity to this agreement one of them at last avowed infidel principles, declaring his disbelief, not only of the Bible, but even the existence of a God. His virtuous companions, though astonished and exceedingly shocked by this declaration, assiduously endeavored to convince and reclaim him, but he treated their kind endeavors with scorn, upbraiding them with superstitious weaknesses, and manifested a furious zeal in favor of infidelity. Thus finding him irreclaimable they withdrew from his society, and still persisting in their serious inquiries, grew more and more confirmed in the all important truths of religion, according to which they carefully regulated their lives. On the other hand, the unhappy youth who had left their company made them the subjects of his daily derision and profane scoffs, and acted according to the tendency of his infidel principles, he eagerly plunged into the vortex of dissipation and vice, and seemingly gloried in being immeasurably wicked. But his career was short; suddenly struck by the hand of God with a sickness, which in its very commencement appeared evidently to be the harbinger of death, his mind was at the same time struck with indescribable horrors. Positively declaring that he should die and inevitably sink to the regions of woe, he utterly refused both medicine and consolation, but at the same time earnestly requested to see his former companions; when they had arrived they kindly began to attempt soothing his distress, but he instantly forbade any efforts of the kind; and then addressed them in the following manner: "You behold me," said he, "an awful monument of Heaven's justice. I lately told you there was no God. I now know that there is a God. I feel the weight of his displeasure, which is a thousand times more intolerable than the pains of my body. I lately told you that there was no state of punishment for the wicked. I now awfully experience the contrary. I feel hell in my own breast and know that I am now sinking into that abyss of woe and destruction." Almost immediately after uttering these sentiments he expired.

In the life of John G. Paton, who afterwards spent many years laboring among the inhabitants of the New Hebrides, an account is given of an infidel whose wife was a Roman Catholic, who became unwell and gradually sank under great suffering and agony. His blasphemies against God were known and shuddered at by all the neighbors. J. G. Paton says: "His wife plead with me to visit him. She refused, at my suggestion, to call her own priest, so I accompanied her at last. The man refused to hear one word about spiritual things, when I mentioned the name of Jesus. 'The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him!' There is a wisdom which is at best earthly, and at worst 'sensual and devilish.' His wife asked me to take care of the little money they had, as she would not entrust it to her own priest. I visited the poor man daily, but his enmity to God and his sufferings together seemed to drive him mad. His yells gathered crowds on the street. He tore to pieces his very bed-clothes, till they had to bind him on the iron bed where he lay, foaming and blaspheming. Towards the end I plead with him even then to look to the Lord Jesus, and asked if I might pray with him? With all his remaining strength he shouted at me—

"'Pray for me to the devil!'

"Reminding him how he had always denied that there was any devil, I suggested that he must surely believe in one now, else he would scarcely make such a request, even in mockery. In great rage he cried—

"'Yes, I believe there is a devil, and a God, and a just God, too, but I have hated Him in life, and I hate Him in death!'

"With these awful words, he wriggled into eternity, but his shocking death produced a very serious impression for good, especially amongst young men, in the district where his character was known."

Such narratives are very sad, but there are many cheering proofs of the truth of the Scripture declaration, that the goodness of God leadeth men to repentance, and that there is mercy for those who turn from the evil of their ways. The following instances of this are described by J. G. Paton:

How different was the case of that doctor who also had been an unbeliever as well as a drunkard! Highly educated, skilful, and gifted above most in his profession, he was taken into consultation for specially dangerous cases, whenever they could find him tolerably sober. After one of his excessive "bouts," he had a dreadful attack of delirium tremens. At one time, wife and watchers had a fierce struggle to dash from his lips a draught of prussic acid, at another, they detected the silver-hafted lancet concealed in his shirt, as he lay down, to bleed himself to death. His aunt came and plead with me to visit him. My heart bled for his poor young wife and two beautiful little children. Visiting him twice daily, and sometimes even more frequently, I found the way somehow into his heart, and he would do almost anything for me and longed for my visits. When again the fit of self-destruction seized him, they sent for me; he held out his hand eagerly, and grasping mine, said—

"Put all these people out of the room, remain you with me; I will be quiet, I will do everything you ask."

I got them all to leave, but whispered to one in passing to "keep near the door."

Alone I sat beside him, my hand in his, and kept up a quiet conversation for several hours. After we had talked of everything that I could think of, and it was now far into the morning, I said—

"If you had a Bible here, we might read a chapter, verse about." He said, dreamily, "There was once a Bible above you press; if you can get up to it, you might find it there yet."

Getting it, dusting it, and laying it on a small table which I drew near to the sofa on which we sat, we read this and then a chapter together. After that, I said, "Now, shall we pray?"

He replied heartily, "Yes."

I having removed the little table, we knelt down together at the sofa; and after a solemn pause, I whispered, "You pray first."

He replied, "I curse, I cannot pray; would you have me curse God to his face?"

I answered, "You promised to do all that I asked; you must pray, or try to pray, and let me hear that you cannot."

He said, "I cannot curse God on my knees; let me stand, and I will curse Him, I cannot pray."

I gently held him on his knees, saying, "Just try to pray, and let me hear you cannot."

Instantly he cried out, "O Lord, thou knowest I cannot pray," and was going to say something dreadful as he strove to rise up. But I just took the words he had uttered as if they had been my own, and continued the prayer, pleading for him and his dear ones as we knelt there together, till he showed that he was completely subdued and lying low at the feet of God. On rising from our knees he was manifestly greatly impressed, and I said—

"Now, as I must be at college by daybreak and must return to my lodging for my books and an hour's rest, will you do one thing more for me before I go?"

"Yes," was his reply.

"Then," said I, "it is long since you had a refreshing sleep; now, will you lie down, and I will sit by you till you fall asleep?"

He lay down, and was soon fast asleep. After commending him to the care and blessing of the Lord, I quietly slipped out, and his wife returned to watch by his side. When I came back later in the day, after my classes were over, he, on hearing my footstep and voice, came running to meet me, and clasping me in his arms, cried—

"Thank God, I can pray now! I rose this morning refreshed from sleep, and prayed with my wife and children for the first time in my life, and now I shall serve God while I live, who hath dealt in so great mercy with me."

After delightful conversation, he promised to go with me to Dr. Symington's church. There he took sittings beside me; at next half-yearly communion he and his wife were received into membership, and from that day till his death he led a devoted and most Christian life. Henceforth, as a medical man he delighted to attend all poor and destitute cases which we brought under his care, he ministered to them for Jesus' sake, and spoke to them of their blessed Saviour. When he came across cases that were hopeless, he sent for me to visit them, too, being as anxious for their souls as for their bodies. He died, years after this, of consumption, partly at least the fruit of early excesses; but he was assuredly prepared for death, and happy in the serene hope of eternal blessedness with Christ. He sleeps in Jesus, and I do believe that I shall meet him in glory as a trophy of redeeming grace and love.

"Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."

On reading several articles in the British Friend lately on Friends' Schools, and the want of success there is in training children up as Friends, so as to attach them to the Society in after life, many solemn feelings have attended my mind. I have been led to reflect on various ancient advices issued by the Society of Friends in former times on this subject, one of which is as follows:—"It is our Christian and earnest advice and counsel to all Friends concerned (so far as they are able, or may be capable) to provide schoolmasters and mistresses, who are faithful Friends, to teach and instruct their children, and not to send them to such schools where they are taught the corrupt ways, manners, fashions and language of the world, and of the heathen in their authors, and names of the heathenish gods and goddesses; tending greatly to corrupt the minds of children into an averseness or opposition against the Truth, and the simplicity of it; but to take care that you train up your children in the good nurture, admonition and fear of the Lord, in that plainness and language which becomes Truth. And parents and masters, etc., to be good examples to them, in a sober and godly conversation, and plainness of speech, and not to use the word you or ye to a child or servant, etc., nor suffer your substance to be bestowed on your children to furnish them with such things as tend to pride, and to lift them up in vanity, or to affect them with the vain fashions of the world. 1690." Such was the deep concern of our worthy forefathers to train up their children according to the mind of Truth, and they were in great measure prospered and blessed therein. We are told that when the parents were imprisoned for Truth's sake, the children still met and kept up their meetings to worship God.

Archibald Geikie's First Geological Excursion.

When a school boy in Scotland some of his comrades had visited a limestone quarry a few miles from his residence and brought back a collection of the fossils which abounded there. His imagination was greatly excited over these remains of antiquity, and an excursion to this scene of wonders was planned for the following Seventh-day afternoon, a portion of the week when all school lessons are consigned to oblivion.

On reaching the quarry, they made for a heap of broken stones, and there, truly, on every block and every fragment the fossils met our eye, sometimes so thickly grouped together that we could barely see the stone on which they lay. I bent over the mound, and the first fragment that turned up (my first-found fossil) was one that excited the deepest interest. The commander-in-chief, of the first excursion, who was regarded (perhaps as much from his bodily stature, as for any other reason) an authority on these questions, pronounced my treasure-trove to be unmistakably and unequivocally, a fish. True, it seemed to lack head and tail and fins; and the liveliest fancy amongst us hesitated as to which were the scales; and in after years I learned that it was really a vegetable—the sea-cod or catkin of a large extinct kind of clubmoss; but, in the meantime, Tom had declared it to be a fish, and a fish it must assuredly be.

The halo that broke forth from the Wizard's tomb, when William of Deloraine and the Monk of St. Mary's heaved at midnight the ponderous stone was surely not brighter, certainly not so benign in its results, as the light that now seemed to stream into my whole being, as I disinterred from their stony folds these wondrous relics. Like other school boys, I had, of course, had my lesson on geology in the usual meagre, cut-and-dry form in which physical science was then taught in our school. I could repeat a "Table of Formations," and remembered the pictures of some uncouth monsters on the pages of our text-books—one with goggle eyes, no neck, and a preposterous tail; another with an unwieldy body, and no tail at all, for which latter defect I had endeavored to compensate by inserting a long pipe into his mouth, receiving from our master (Ironsides we called him) a hearty rap across the knuckles, as a recompense for my attention to the creature's comfort. But the notion that these pictures were the representations of actual, though now extinct monsters, that the matter-of-fact details of our text-books really symbolized living truths, and were not invented solely to distract the brains and endanger the palms of school boys; nay, that the statements which seemed so dry and unintelligible in print were such as could be actually verified by our own eyes in nature, that beneath and beyond the present creation, in the glories of which we revelled, there lay around us the memorials of other creations not less glorious, and infinitely older, and thus that we, immensely more, than our books or our teachers taught us could be learnt by looking at nature for ourselves—all this was strange to me. It came now for the first time like a new revelation, one that has gladdened my life ever since.

We worked on industriously at the rubbish-heap, and found an untold sum of wonders. The human mind in its earlier stages dwells on resemblances, rather than on differences. We identified what we found in the stones with that to which it most nearly approached in existing nature, and though many an organism turned up to which we could think of no analogue, we took no trouble to discriminate wherein it differed from others. Hence to our imagination, the plants, insects, shells, and fishes of our rambles met us again in the rock. There was little that some one of the party could not explain, and thus our limestone became a more extraordinary conglomeration of organic remains, I will venture to say, than ever perturbed the brain of a geologist. It did not occur at the time to any of us to inquire why a perch came to be embalmed among ivy and rose leaves, why a sea-shore whelk lay entwined in the arms of a butterfly; or why a beetle should seem to have been doing his utmost to dance a pirouette round the tooth of a fish. These questions came all to be asked afterwards, and then I saw how egregiously erroneous had been our boyish identifications. But, in the meantime, knowing little of the subject, I believed everything, and with implicit faith piled up dragon-fles, ferns, fishes, beetle-shadows, violets, sea-weeds, and shells.

The shades of twilight had begun to fall while we still bent eagerly over the stones. The sun, with a fiery glare, had sunk behind the distant hills, and the long lines of ruddy light that mottled the sky as he went down had crept slowly after him, and left the clouds to come trooping up from the east, cold, lifeless, and gray. The chill of evening now began to fall over everything, save the spirits of the treasure-seekers. And yet they too in the end succumbed. The ring of the hammer became less frequent, and the shout that announced the discovery of each fresh marvel seldom broke the stillness of the scene. And as the moanings of the night wind swept across the fields, and rustled fitfully among the withered weeds of the quarry, it was wisely resolved that we should all go home.

Then came the packing up. Each had amassed a pile of specimens, well-nigh as large as himself, and it was of course impossible to carry everything away. A rapid selection had therefore to be made. And oh! with how much reluctance were we compelled to relinquish many of the stones, the discovery whereof had made the opposite cavern ring again with our jubilee.

Not one of us had had the foresight to provide himself with a bag, so we stowed away the treasures in our pockets. Surely practical geometry offers not a more perplexing problem than to gauge the capacity of these parts of a school boy's dress. So we loaded ourselves to the full, and marched along with the fossils crowded into every available corner.

Despite our loads, we left the quarry in high glee. Arranging ourselves instinctively into a concave phalanx, with the speaker in the centre, we resumed a tale of thrilling interest, that had come to its most tragic part just as we arrived at the quarry several hours before. It lasted all the way back, beguiling the tedious, darkness, and chill of the four miles that lay between the lime-works and our homes; and the final consummation of the story was artfully reached just as we came to the door of the first party who had to wish us good-night.

Such was my first geological excursion—a simple event enough, and yet the turning point in my life. Thenceforward the rocks and their fossil treasures formed the chief subject of my every-day thoughts. That day stamped my fate, and I became a geologist.

THAT worthy minister, Thomas Scattergood, said, it seemed sometimes as if he could run from one end of the continent to the other, to tell what the Lord had done for his soul.

FROM "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER AND JOURNAL."

The Society of Friends in the Island of Tortola.

Any account of Friends in the West Indies commences at a date but little after the rise of the Society in England. The island of Barbadoes, early settled by Englishmen, some of them Friends, was a fertile field when, in 1655, Mary Fisher and Anne Austin reached it on their way to New England. Many were convinced through their labors and by those of other Friends who soon followed.

Some meetings were also established in the British islands of Jamaica, Nevis, and Antigua, each island forming a separate yearly meeting. George Fox and the Friends who accompanied him to America in 1672 visited Barbadoes and Jamaica.

The Society, however, lost ground, and it was not long until the only settled meetings were in Barbadoes, the healthiest and most important British Island at that time. In Jamaica many Friends perished, and the meeting-house was destroyed when Port Royal was engulfed by the great earthquake of 1692. The only Friends saved were those attending a Monthly Meeting fourteen miles away. A meeting-house was afterwards erected in Kingston, but in 1728 only one faithful member, John Reynell, remained, and although alone he attended meeting regularly until his removal to Philadelphia.

Several hundred miles northwest of Barbadoes and just east of Porto Rico, is a little group discovered by Columbus on his second voyage in 1494, and called by him the Virgin Islands. But few of the islands have any commercial value, and for years they were the haunts of "buccaners," and the hiding places of slave stealers. In the center of the group is Tortola. But ten miles in length, by three and a half in width, with a very irregular outline, it was yet one of the most important. Its surface is rough and mountainous; Mt. Sago rises to an elevation of over eleven hundred feet. The harbor is on the southeast coast, with Roadstown, the principal settlement, at the head of the bay. Six miles away, on the southern coast, is Fat Hog Bay, a considerable indentation.

In 1666 the English seized Tortola from its Dutch proprietor, who on his own responsibility was ruling over a little kingdom of eighty whites and as many slaves. The slaves were carried off and an Englishman left in charge.

The development of the Island was slow. In 1720 the population had increased to 2,500 of which number more than half were slaves. One governor succeeded another, until 1738 found John Pickering occupying this position, assisted in the administration of justice by a council.

It was not until 1739, long after the Society of Friends was practically extinct in the other islands with the exception of Barbadoes, that the minds of the islanders were turned to Quakerism. We can only speculate as to the cause of this movement. Whatever conviction there was seems to have been the result of inward conviction and not of outward or ministerial effort. The governor, John Pickering, encouraged the movement, and his wife and her sister were among the first to bear public testimony. The governorship of Tortola was subordinate to that of Antigua, and when the latter officer heard that the people of Tortola had "turned Quakers" he sent for all their warlike weapons saying "as Quakers they would have no need for them," and that he should want them in Antigua. Naturally those not Friends raised a great outcry and appealed to Antigua for John Pickering's removal. This appeal was refused, much to the mortification of the war element, who were informed that while the governor liked his own religion best, at the same time, "a good Quaker stood fairer for heaven than a bad churchman."

Meetings were now held regularly twice a week at John Pickering's home on Fat Hog Bay, sometimes at William Thomas's home in Roadstown, and at the home of Thomas Humphreys on the mountain. Small at first, they continued to grow. Dorothy Thomas, wife of William, came forward in the ministry and soon after Jeremiah Martin, a young man. Many were convinced, both in Tortola and the surrounding small islands. About this time John Pickering gave a piece of land, about a quarter of a mile from his home, and a meeting-house was erected. Mention is also made of another meeting-house being built in another part of the island.

Up to this time Tortola Friends had received no outside encouragement. John Pickering, on one of the trading voyages of his sloop, the John, to Philadelphia, sent letters with information of the rise of the Society on the island, and these letters at once turned attention to this little spot of light in the West Indian darkness. The first to respond to the implied call for assistance and encouragement was Thomas Chalkley who reached Tortola on the 12th of Eighth month, 1741. Through his testimony many more were added to the little flock. Meetings were held in various parts of the island, some of them the largest gatherings of any kind that had ever been seen there. He also suggested meetings for discipline, which were held alternately at Fat Hog Bay and Roadstown, the latter accommodating Friends from the neighboring islands. Here a temporary shed was erected for shelter, as no building could be found large enough to seat all who now attended. After three weeks of constant labor he was taken sick with the fever, died Ninth month 4th, and was buried in Friends' burying ground at the meeting-house.

The two meetings, now fully established, increased in strength and became two faithful bodies full of love and zeal. The next year, on the 8th of Ninth month, arrived John Estauigh who had previously addressed a letter to "The Newly Gathered Little Flock at Tortola," but he had not found it sufficient to release him from the concern he felt to visit them. He embarked in company with John Cadwallader of Abington, both having received certificates for the service.

John and Dorcas Pickering welcomed the strangers on the shore of the bay and took them to their home. They at once engaged acceptably in the labors of their visit, but were not, however, to escape the fatal fever. John Cadwallader, who had been unwell on the voyage, soon sickened, and died on the 26th of Ninth month, being buried by the side of Thomas Chalkley. Those attending the funeral, including John Estauigh, were caught in a shower, from the effects of which John was taken ill; though unwell he held several meetings afterwards, but finally died at the house of William Thomas, in Roadstown, and was buried near his companion.

Through his advice a women's meeting for business was settled soon after his death, and Dorcas Powell was appointed clerk. About a year after, Dorcas Powell, then a widow, remarried against the advice of the meeting. Her husband not being in sympathy with Friends would not permit her to attend. She was visited by Friends, but at her request was now [not disowned. She afterwards removed to the island of St. Croix, and after her husband's death was instrumental in establishing a meeting there.

The Tortola Meeting in 1743 addressed an epistle of love and sympathy to the Yearly Meeting of London, and continued to do so each year with but few omissions up to 1764. It was one characteristic of the meetings in West Indies that each island, no matter how small its number of Friends, constituted a separate yearly meeting. This was a great element of weakness, for that outside encouragement and assistance which a body composed of distinct and separated meetings could give, was lacking. It was in this yearly meeting capacity that the epistles were addressed to the London Meeting.

In 1748 Daniel Stanton, accompanied by Samuel Nottingham, who afterwards became a resident of the island, came to Tortola from Philadelphia, by way of Barbadoes. They remained some time after their labors were concluded, being unable to obtain passage to England whither they were bound. James Beckett of Lancashire, England, is recorded as having made Tortola several visits, and to have given them much encouragement, but the dates of his missions are not known. Phebe Smith, a minister from Buckingham Monthly Meeting, Pa., reached Tortola early in 1750. She held several meetings, some in the neighboring islands, and was given a certificate expressing much unity with her visit. The same year arrived Peter Fearon on his second visit, having previously been there in 1746, the first after John Cadwallader and John Estauigh. This time he was accompanied by Thomas Lancaster of Richland, (Bucks County, Pa.). They performed their service to the satisfaction of Friends, and were granted a numerous signed certificate. Thomas Lancaster was taken sick on the way home, died, and was buried at sea.

These were the last visits to the island of which there is record. Within a few years the meetings commenced to weaken. In such an unhealthy climate the mortality was great and, too, as Friends were drawn nearer the light, the iniquity of slavery became more apparent, and some left the island on this account. Samuel and Mary Nottingham manumitted their slaves, gave them their estate, and removed to England, where they continued to take a warm interest in the welfare of their former servants and the affairs of the island. John Pickering, a faithful member, died, and his family returned to England. Terrific hurricanes, such as are common in tropical countries, frequently swept over Tortola, buildings were demolished and their occupants killed. The meeting-house was destroyed in one of these storms. In 1770 Friends were reduced to a scant dozen members in all. Meetings were still faithfully held, but by 1780 they were entirely discontinued.

In 1840 three visitors from Pennsylvania visited Tortola. They found the little estate of the Nottinghams still occupied by the descendants of the manumitted slaves, happy and contented, their plantation yielding them a comfortable subsistence. They still retained an affectionate remembrance of Friends. A short distance away was the crumbling ruin of the meeting-house, the wood work gone, its foundations broken and decayed. Now, just a hundred years after its erection they found the prickly acacia finding lodgment in its broken walls and in the doorway, marking the years then flown, tall century plants were blooming. Near by were a few neglected graves, where were buried those who so hopefully came to give the light and who so willingly surrendered their lives in the service of Truth. Their lowly graves will perhaps be the final and only monument to the Society of Friends in Toronto.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

KEEP ROOM FOR THE GUEST.

It was so passing sweet—the heavenly dove,
Which came into my heart;
And so, with accents, thrilled with love,
I said—"Pray, not depart!"

The Spirit's eye was turned upon me,
With a burning glance,
And with a tenderness, which it was joy to see,
Said—"Child, thou must advance."

"Thy Saviour's head, has often whitened grown,
With dew and hoary frost,
And whilst thou thought thou toiled alone,
His heavenly peace was lost.

"Yes, He has knocked, and pleaded, and his love,
Which waited long for thy responsive thrill,
With drooping pinions, as a wounded dove,
Turned sadly back—'No room there still.'

"Sometimes it was thy daily household cares,
Which kept his presence dark,
All these are lawful, and his Spirit shares
With honest labor in their track.

"Be thou but faithful and his light will shine
Upon thee in their daily rounds,
And with a joy that ne'er before was thine,
Thy heart shall answer—"Love o'er all abounds."

"Sometimes the friendships of this fleeting world
Have choked the growth of that diviner one,
Thy spirit lost, as after these, 'twas daily hurled,
The presence of the Father, Holy Ghost and Son.

"Thy Saviour first. Then all true Friends in every land,
As rivers running clear and bright,
Will be a strength and joy, as hand in hand,
Your spirits touch the Spirit of the Infinite.

"The Master loves to come to hearts made pure
By sorrow, pain and strife;
He loves to teach, 'tis noble to endure
Calmly for his sake, the discipline of life.

"And e'en the intellectual gifts, which, in the mind
Of man,
So richly rise o'er all;
If bounded not by Grace, between the Lord and man,
May rise a darkened human wall.

"Be this thy watchword. As hands they oft may be,
To grapple with the realm of thought;
But for thy soul's deep doubt and mystery,
Seek first that Light within, so dearly bought.

"The Saviour died—that it might be in every soul,
'A Light Divine, a heavenly ray,
To guide man on from earth's deep gloom to heaven's goal,
From world's dark night to heavenly day."

"And so, if thou dost have his presence stay,
Which thou dost know is sweetly blest,
In peace or care, in grief or joy, in work or play,
Keep room, at all times, for the Guest."

The quiet hour was passed. My spirit blushed
At imperfections, lo! a countless band!
But as new toils loomed up, its pulse was hushed
By a low voice—"Take thou my hand."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

HEAVEN-BOUND.

We've had New England's Snow-Bound,
We've had Ohio's Ice,

We've had our Kansas Rain-Bound,
And Love-Bound, very nice.

Why not we have another Bound,

One from the Hoosier State,

And if more topics yet be found,

Let others them relate.

The reading of those pretty lays
Awakened thoughts in me,
By bringing back my youthful days
In close proximity;
It seemed a fire to infuse
As in the days of yore,
When I at times would woo the Muse,
Some fifty years before.

I feel incompetent to trace
My musings as they've strayed,
And fear my theme may disgrace,
Or do more harm than good.
My theme's our pilgrimage through life,
Our Heaven-Bound journey through,
Where trials are so very rife,
And troubles not a few.

But in searching for the Lord,
Our thoughts will most turn in,
And strictly heed that heaven-born Word
That leads away from sin.
It's those that heed this heavenly Word,
Their duties to fulfill;

Not always those that's crying, "Lord,"
But those that do his will;
That are so precious in his sight,
And resting so secure
In inward peace, both day and night,
While in this love so pure.

Although life's sea be sometimes dark
With billows rolling high,
They have an anchor for their larque,
They have a Captain in warfare
Though Christian life be warfare
From infancy to age,
Maintained through watchfulness and prayer
And in that spirit waged.
There's not a year, a month, or week,
Or e'en a day or hour,
But we continually must seek
To know his guiding power.

For sore temptations ne'er assail
When not expected to,
And if not on the watch we fail
Sometimes to struggle through.
We must have faith, we must have will,
And energy to strive.
Our every duty to fulfill
And keep our souls alive.

Our blessed Saviour said his Grace
Sufficient was for all
Who heed it, and with joy embrace
His tender, loving call.
My prayer goes out for every soul,
For every soul is dear,
That all may come into the fold
Of Christ's true pilgrims here.
O, be persuaded, pilgrims all,
To heed this Light within
And mind our heavenly Shepherd's call,
And come away from sin;
And all the snares of this vain world,
In gaudy colored pilgrims here,
And keep our Heaven-Bound sails unfurld
And steer our passage through.
For we shall certainly be found
Within the sphere we move,
So let our course be Heaven-Bound

AND, INDIANA, Fifth Mo., 18, 1892.

ACCORDING to the teaching of our Saviour and his Apostles, it is essentially necessary in order to Salvation, that man should be conformed to the Divine will. We must deny ourselves, take up the cross and follow Christ—we must experience that great change which is spoken of as being born again; we must learn to be not conformed to this world, but to be transformed in the spirit of our minds; we must set our affections on heavenly things, and seek first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness.

All this would be impossible, were it not for the loving mercy of God, who sent his Son Jesus Christ into the world to save sinners, and who resides the same Saviour into our hearts to give us the will and the power to obey his commands.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Adam Where Art Thou?

When Adam heard the voice of the Lord God calling him in the garden he was ready to hide himself for fear.

He could not face Him from whom his own act of disobedience had severed his communion. Since then, every child of humanity has to come to a knowledge of the forgiveness of sin before he can be accepted as an heir of glory. The question then is a vital one to each one of us—Child of Adam where art thou? Art thou yet in the state of an alien from God, or hast thou said within thy heart and put thy resolution in force, "I will arise and go to my Father," and say unto him, "Father I have sinned."

The appeal comes home to us now, each one, Art thou a child of God? Art thou a Christian? Does any one say—"I am a regular attendant at Divine worship, my name is on the roll of church membership, I am an upright, sober citizen." That is well, but does not answer the great question between thy God and thy soul—"All have sinned and come short of the glory of God," and all must come to Him, if they are saved in the end in his own appointed way.

Art thou then a child of his now or art thou not? Thou art either in the way of peace that leads to endless life, or thou art going in the opposite direction with thy back toward heaven and home. If thou art in the right way a sense of forgiven sin must at some time have been thine, and we are promised the witness of the Spirit as we journey, and the continued cleansing of the blood of Jesus, as the "washing of water by the Word." If we have had the sense of his presence, as the Convictor only and not as the Comforter, we cannot say we are his. Reader, let the Searcher of all hearts search thine and show thee where thou art. Son of Adam where art thou?

Do not think thou canst grow out of thy sinful state by a gradual improvement of the old nature. The old man must be slain, the old heart taken away, with all its bad and evil thoughts and desires, and a new heart given. Thou canst not grow into the Divine life for this life is the gift of God.

It is the grace of God which hath appeared unto all men, and to as many as receive Him to them He becomes the power of God and the wisdom of God, and enables them to grow in grace from the stature of a child to that of a strong man in the Lord. First the blade, then the ear, and after that the full corn in the ear, is the experience of those only who have known the old man to be slain and who have put on the new man Christ Jesus, the heart of stone being taken away and the heart of flesh given whereby they can walk with and acceptably follow their Master. These are they who having forsaken the old paths of sin and rebellion, now walk with Him in newness of life. Reader thou must seek to know this to be done and the holy Spirit will witness to thee that the great change has been wrought, and that henceforth it is thy blessed privilege to grow in his grace and saving knowledge.

Seek then for a sense of forgiven sin, seek to know thy past sins to have been washed away, and Divine love that hath done this for thee will lead thee, as thou art ready and willing, in "paths of righteousness" and "by the still waters."

Moral worth, a quiet and peaceable life are all well in themselves, but to the soul's salvation they are nothing unless they are the outcome of conversion to God and the fruit of Christ's

FROM THE "BRITISH FRIEND."

What is the True Preparation for the Ministry.

A WORD FROM AMERICA.

Iowa Yearly Meeting proposes the establishment of a Biblical Institute for the special training of Ministers.

It must be no small surprise to those who are acquainted with our history to find this urged as a legitimate out-growth of that conception of the Christian Ministry which has always been held by the Society of Friends.

The surprise will not be lessened when that primitive conception is defined by one of the strongest advocates of the measure in such clear terms as these:—

"One must have been called to the distinct work of the Ministry, and prepared by a special spiritual anointing for his work."

"In the continued exercise of his gift he must, on every particular occasion, be under the immediate and direct guidance of the Holy Spirit."

These sentences give in few words the very doctrine of Friends from George Fox downwards.

"But what, it is asked, is it that is to be anointed? And the answer is given; "It is the man himself, with all his faculties, intellect, heart and will, that is to be anointed and guided."

All this may be fully conceded. Then where is the point of difference, for difference there unquestionably is, between the conclusion arrived at by the writer above quoted, and the whole teaching of the early Friends on the subject.

It will be found in the theory which is made manifest by some modifying words joined with the foregoing clear statements,—by the practical development of the Pastoral system in the Yearly Meeting, and the readiness of so many Ministers to take upon themselves the charge of conducting regular services in Meetings for Worship,—that the anointing so abides upon those called to the Ministry that they are prepared, or may prepare themselves to preach at any time, and may engage to do so, as they might to do any other work.

With this theory a Theological training is not only desirable, but necessary, as has been found by all those Churches which have stated forms of Worship. Our untrained Ministers have to exhibit a very different equipment for what they are undertaking, when they assume the place of salaried pastors.

Here is the very point at issue. Does the enlightenment of the intellect, the renewing of the affections, and the training of the will by the Holy Spirit impart this liberty, or this power to preach?

Certainly, not to all. The accepted doctrinal treatises, the affirmations and re-affirmations of the Yearly Meetings, and the experience of almost every Minister of whose life we have written record in the Society, bear one united and unequivocal testimony on this point.

Without confining ourselves, however, to denominational bounds, let us look at this question in the fullest light shed upon it.

The Gospel is a gift. The commission to preach it is from a super-human source.

How is the commission conveyed to the servant of God? Is it simply the dictate of a judgment formed by the action of his natural faculties, or a distinct impression of the Holy Spirit upon the passive soul? Is it a sanction put upon his activity, or a voice heard in his silence?

Does he need only a faith in the immanence of God influencing the natural powers, or ever add above this, the seal of a conviction of his transcendence commanding from above, inspiring a certain message, and showing the path of service?

Surely to many, the latter has been necessary, when they have been made sensible of a Divine call to the work, for which all within them has pleaded insufficiency and unfitness.

Our Lord chose his first Apostles, not from the trained minds of the Schools of Hillel and Gamaliel (the best of that day), but of those called "unlearned and ignorant men." He prepared them by companionship with Himself. He commissioned them by his own word. He empowered them by his own Spirit.

And, as if to impress upon the Church for all time, both the necessity and the sufficiency of his own call and qualification, the one more highly educated Apostle was careful to "certify that the Gospel which he preached was not after man, nor from man, neither was he taught it, but by revelation of Jesus Christ;" and that his "preaching was not with words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power."

It is the same Gospel that is still to be preached, and the same preparation for it is still needed.

It has been the peculiarity of Friends in this conception of the Christian Ministry, so to depend on interior direction, that they dare not commit themselves to an outward re-arrangement, requiring them at stated times, or in response to a brother's call, to engage in public preaching or prayer. Christ is present in every meeting gathered in his name; present as head of the Church, to direct the exercises, so far as we allow Him. There may be many present entrusted with his gifts. Only by Spiritual guidance can it be known whom He would move to speak in his name. He may impart or withhold the impulse to speak. He may command silence or words. How can one presume beforehand on the qualification and authority to minister to the states and needs of an audience?

Does the Divine Promise assure a help in this sacred service, that we may at any time command?

The answer of Friends to such questions as these has distinguished them from the first among the Churches. It is the characteristic testimony of their manner of worship.

But now, under the Pastoral Arrangement which Friends in America are adopting, one is selected and employed to conduct the service of the meetings for worship.

And it is to provide for this system that a Biblical Institute is proposed.

A system of this kind needs it.

Quakerism, as originally promulgated, has no need and no place for it.

It is not a question of education. On that there is no difference under discussion.

It is not a question as to the importance of the diligent perusal and study of the Holy Scriptures. That is urged upon all classes of our membership.

But it is a question as to the special training that best fits a minister to preach the Gospel.

It is a question as to where he should resort for the interpretation of the truth of Revelation contained in the Bible.

It is a question whether he should seek it in the study of the conflicting creeds of Christendom; in the confusing disagreements of Scripture Exegesis, and the divided councils of human life within us. The Apostle Peter says, "Make your calling and election sure." Many of us have a goodly heritage in our environments, but it will avail us nothing unless we use it to our advantage in the better part which no man can take from us. "Choose ye then this day whom you will serve," and let there be nothing indefinite about it. They that seek Him with the whole heart are the ones who find Him.

Each one must exercise a choice for himself. Our Divine Master stands ready and the Holy Spirit pleads with us, but the will of man must be given over to Him before He can perform his perfect work within us. When this is done and old things become new to us, then how changed is our life and feelings. We begin to have new hopes, new desires, and gladly we forsake the old paths and enter upon the service of our King. I feel that this may meet the eye of some one who perhaps has been or may be somewhat indifferent concerning this great change. Ah! is it not true that Satan is better satisfied with a lukewarm church-member than with an out-and-out sinner. The last mentioned knows he is away from God and without hope unless he repents, but the former, in his lukewarmness and uncertainty, thinks and hopes he is all right, and here the enemy of all righteousness lulls him to ease. I feel it with me to say to some, "Awake thou that sleepest, arise from the dead and Christ shall give thee life."

It was not to the most outspoken sinners but to those who hoped it was well with them, that our Saviour used the solemn language, "Except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish."

Ah! then, son or daughter of Adam, where art thou? Art thou yet without the gate of mercy? Hast thou never yet entered the open door by clasping the extended hand of thy Lord and Master? Art thou one who has never earnestly sought to know a sense of his forgiving love?

Perhaps thou may be one who has once tasted the good Word of Life, and through forgetfulness or disobedience hast lost thy communion with Him who was at one time so dear to thy soul. Oh! when the voice of our loving Lord comes to us at any time of our pilgrimage, may we be so clothed upon with grace and the sense of his blessed promise, that to the question—Child where art thou?—there may come from us the glad answer, "Here am I, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do." NEW YORK CITY, Fifth Month, 1892.

A BAND OF MERCY BOY.—A short time ago as I was crossing Market Street, near Twenty-second street, a boy, not over ten years old, who had been walking just before me, ran into the street and picked up a broken glass pitcher. I supposed he intended the pieces, as missiles, since the desire to throw something seems instinct in every boy. Consequently, I was much surprised when he tossed the pieces into a vacant lot at the corner and walked quietly on. As he passed me, whistling, I said:

"Why did you pick up that pitcher?"

"I was afraid it might cut some horse's foot," he replied.

"My next question was a natural one:

"Are you a Band of Mercy boy?"

He smiled as he said:

"O, yes; that's why I did it."

The bands of mercy were drawn very closely around the dear little fellow's heart, I am sure.—School and Home.

authority; or rather apart from these, with the Master alone.

This is not written to disparage the knowledge of any of these things, nor to discourage the study of them.

The history of the Church and Christianity, and the best thoughts of all the ages, are themes for delightful and profitable study by every Christian.

But what place should be given them as sources of a ministry inspired by the Holy Spirit?

If such knowledge is needful to make a fitter instrument for the Lord to use in his work (as is claimed), it seems unaccountable that He should from the first have chosen his ministers from the unlearned as well as the learned, from herdmen and fishermen, from farmers and mechanics, as well as from the schools.

The fitness for service (as for salvation), on which our Lord's peculiar favor is everywhere pronounced, seems ever to depend on spiritual condition, never on mental attainments.

A Bible Institute may be a necessary adjunct of the Pastoral System, which relegates the Ministry to a class, or clergy, from which those in ordinary occupations must be practically excluded, and which George Fox himself could not have entered.

But it is difficult to see how such a transformation can take place in the Society of Friends without a total change of base, and the tacit confession that Quakerism itself has been a mistake. JOEL BEAN.

Reasons Why We Should Not Read "Fiction."

It is a waste of time. It destroys a religion for more substantial reading. It weakens the mind. It often holds immoral characters as heroes, and in other ways exerts an evil influence over the heart and mind. It arouses feelings that ought not to be aroused, and in moments, when we would gladly think of something better, how such reading fills the mind with trifling thoughts, which no effort of ours alone can keep out, and when the taste for such literature is once acquired, (as it soon is) we know not where it will end, or how fearful the consequences may be.

Even such books, as are said to have a good moral in them, may have a far more hurtful tendency than many are aware of. Those who are in the constant habit of reading works of fiction are generally languid, with minds less clear, and I fear, hearts less pure, than before the habit was formed; they cannot see so much beauty in nature, and miss much of the real enjoyment of life.

Some may think they can read such things without being hurt by them and be unconscious of the evil influence it is exerting, it may be, over a whole life. Let us, therefore, shun everything of the kind, as we would a baneful poison; earnestly desiring to be made and kept pure in heart and mind and true to Him who made us."

"Deeply did I lament that any of my precious time had been spent in perusing publications of an unprofitable tendency, such as plays and romances, and I was made sensible that nothing I had ever been in the practice of had so much alienated my mind from the love and fear of God, or led me so far from the simplicity of the pure Truth, as books of this kind.

How often did I wish I could warn the whole world of their pernicious effect, and especially, the young people in our Society."

Mules.—In digging the famous Sutro tunnel, it was found necessary to use mules instead of horses for removing the debris, because, when anything touched a horse's ears it would throw its head upwards and be apt to injure itself; while a mule under the same circumstances would wisely dig its head.

Electric Phenomenon.—Adolph Sutro in a lecture on his tunnel says, "In the dry atmosphere of Nevada electricity accumulated very rapidly in the human body, and I could, first walking on the carpet, on almost any day, with my fingers light the gas. This was the cause of several accidents. We had a special house for the storage of electric exploders, and two men in charge of this house were terribly injured at different times through touching the wires of these exploders with their naked fingers, which caused several thousand of them to explode together. One accident occurred notwithstanding the precaution had been taken to make the men wet their shoes before entering the exploding house.

Explosion in a Sunken Steamer.—In the summer of 1890 a steamer loaded with tea, oil, seeds, rice, etc., was sunk by accident in the Hooghly at Calcutta. About eighteen months afterwards the wreck was struck by another vessel, and a rushing sound was heard. A man went with a light to examine into the cause of this, and a violent explosion ensued, which caused the death of nine of her crew. This is believed to have been due to the light carburetted hydrogen or marsh gas, which is produced by the decomposition of vegetable organic substances such as the wreck was laden with. This gas, mixed with air, makes a violently explosive compound which requires the touch of only a point of flame to set it off.

Kansas Salt.—Anciently there were extensive lagoons and land-locked lakes in Kansas. The mineral substances contained in their waters were necessarily deposited as the water evaporated. One of these minerals was sulphate of lime, which formed the beds of Gypsum or Plaster of Paris, which are now worked in different places. There are several salt marshes in Kansas which were formerly resorted to by great herds of bison, as well as deer, antelope, elk, and other creatures, whose bones have been abundantly found along their margins. In Southern-central Kansas there is a region of about 130 miles in diameter, underlaid by beds of rock salt, which vary from a few inches to several hundred feet in thickness.

About 700,000 barrels of salt are now annually manufactured in Kansas from salt wells.

African Mud-fish.—As a detachment of the Cameron expedition in Africa was exploring the dried beds of one of the affluents of the Nile the explorers found numerous balls of dried mud strewn about. On breaking open one of these, a live fish-like animal fell out and floundered on the sand. On the approach of the dry season, the animal rolls itself into a ball of mud—in this condition it breathes by the aid of lungs, although in the water it uses gills.

The Christian Union of 14th of Fifth Month, contains a communication from an Eastern Christian, residing at Broussa, Turkey, which asks two questions:

First, Whether every highly educated Christian has not arrived at his views of divinity through the Bible?

Second, Would not constant Bible reading be regarded as an absolute necessity for Christians just beginning their journey, for their progress in holiness?

It contains also a reply to these questions, which calls attention to the life of grace and power shown by the example of our blessed Redeemer, and "fed directly from the eternal springs of his own Father's life." "Every act of power, every word of grace, every disposition of unearthly beauty, were but utterances of the Father, who dwelt in the Son and was one with him."

"We, too, are the sons of God. We, too, take our life by direct contact from the Father of our spirits. Men lived this life of oneness with the Father before the Bible was written. Men have lived the life who have never seen the Bible. And we who have the Bible in our hands do not take our life from the book, but from Him who is the author of life, in whom we live and move and have our being.

The Bible is a record of God's wondrous dealings with his children. It is "profitable to us sons of God, 'for reproof, for correction,' for inspiration. It is one of the means which the Father uses for the education of his children, for the 'perfecting of his saints in righteousness.'"

"We do not know God, through the Bible, but through our own souls. All Spiritual life and grace come to us by vital contact with Him. But as a means of Spiritual education we love the Bible, study it, and long to give it to them who are without."

Gambling.—Captain Kennedy, late of the White Star steamship "Germanic," was asked why gambling is permitted on ocean steamers. He replied: "All Atlantic steamers are furnished with a large supply of wines and liquors, which are not included in the price of passage. Men who gamble drink, and largely, too. The profits derived from the sale of these wines and liquors during the travel, I may say during the gambling season, are so great that it is not to the interest of the steamship companies to abolish gambling or to interfere in any way with the comfort and enjoyment of a class of passengers who so materially add to their income."—Christian Statesman.

Christian Missions in Morocco.—The Sultan of Morocco has issued special orders forbidding intercourse between the Moorish women and the ladies attached to Christian missions. This will affect especially the workers of the North Africa Society, a large number of whom are women, and who have made a special effort to reach the women of the country in their homes. The Sultan's action is supposed to have been taken on the representation of his advisers to the effect that communications between the Moorish and English women threatened innovation in the laws and the corruption of religion, offenses which may be visited with the penalty of death in the case of renegades refusing to repent in a given time.

Confemration of Idiots.—At a recent confirmation service held by the Bishop of Exeter, in England, twenty-two male and sixteen female inmates of the Idiot Asylum were presented and confirmed. This has raised considerable discussion in the English papers with regard to the wisdom of such action. In reply the Bishop defends himself, claiming that the minds of the imbeciles are often far more receptive of religious truth than of secular learning; that the story of Christ subdued them; and even though they may not be able to repeat the Lord's Prayer or the Ten Commandments, or answer the questions in the Church Catechism there is no doubt that they are open to spiritual influences, as is testified to by those who have been charged with their instruction.

Dublin Yearly Meeting, at its meeting Fourth Month 29th, adopted a Minute to be inserted as a reference in the epistles to American Yearly Meetings, expressing regret that any of them should have expressed the title "The Religions Society of Friends" to that of "Friends Church." The Minute says: "We feel that the use of the latter title (Friends Church) may tend to promote the adoption of practices and systems which are at variance with our well-known testimony to the freedom of all who are in His Church, and to the pre-eminence of Christ in His Church, and to the pre-eminence of the Holy Scriptures. We should therefore have been glad had the title by which we have been known the world over, been maintained by all the Yearly Meetings, and that the daily life of our members should show to the world that, as Christ's friends, we are part of His Church, and truly a religious Society. We regret such a marked change should have been adopted without conferring with sister Yearly Meetings."

The Presbyterian General Assembly.—At the meeting of this important body at Omaha, a report from a committee declared the buying, selling, reading and advertising in what are called "Sunday papers" is pernicious from beginning to end.

It recommended all citizens to abstain in any way from patronizing the World's Fair, if the gates are open on the First-day of the week.

In the report on temperance approving reference was made to the use of the unfermented juice of the grape in what is called "the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper." An unsuccessful proposition was made to strike out this reference, on the ground that it implied a reflection on those congregations which used fermented wine on such occasions. A statement that no political party has the right to expect the support of Christian men, so long as that party stands committed to the license policy, was also assailed, but supported by the Assembly.

FROM "THE AMERICAN MESSENGER."

The Pirates' Case.

Capt. S—, of W—, Massachusetts, relates that on a voyage to Brazil, in the spring of 1833, while sailing near Cape St. Roque, he espied one morning in the distance a suspicious looking vessel, under a press of canvas, standing towards him. From several circumstances he was led to imagine that she was occupied by pirates, who were advancing to plunder and murder. Still, not being certain of the fact, he concluded to keep his vessel on her course. The suspicious schooner continued to gain upon him, and soon, by the help of the lass, he saw her deck covered with men, and a long eighteen-pounder on a swivel. She was evidently a much faster sailer than his own vessel; he concluded, therefore, that if he turned out of his course he would at length be over-aken, and from the pirates, excited and exasperated by a long chase, little mercy could be expected.

The captain was a Christian, a strong believer in the providence of God, and emphatically a man of peace. Instead of fighting with carnal weapons, he determined to fight with spiritual ones. Having religious tracts aboard, he determined, as soon as the schooner came alongside, to go on board and present his tracts to the captain and crew, and preach to them, in a bold but affectionate manner, appropriate truths on the gospel of Christ. He ordered all hands to go below but the man at the helm. His aid partly to keep them from being intimidated and from agitating his own mind, and partly to do away with all appearance of opposition against the approaching foe. Then, committing himself and his men to God, he patiently waited the pirate's arrival. The schooner came nearer and nearer, till at length the figures of the men could be distinctly seen by the naked eye. A fearful crisis was fast closing; but the captain never shrank nor veered from his course for a moment. Suddenly the pirates altered their course, hauled the vessel upon a wind, and stood away as rapidly as sail and surge could carry them. From the fact that they saw no men on board but Capt. S— and the helmsman, and no manifestation of fear, the pirates might have been led to suspect that there was a large armed force below, or some other decoy prepared; and thus concluded it dangerous to attempt their hostile designs.

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 18, 1892.

LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

The meeting on Ministry and Oversight convened on the 16th of Fifth month. A discussion on the condition and needs of the ministry among Friends elicited remarks from several of the members. One thought there was abundance of it in many meetings, but it needed to be living, endowed with power from on high.

Another thought that a Scriptural ministry is needed—and a complete study of the Bible as a whole should be cherished by our ministers. This speaker seemed (from the condensed report in the British Friend) not to realize the fact that there can be no ministry in the sense recognized by the Society of Friends unconnected with the Divine Gift, and the fresh extension of heavenly help. Far more satisfactory was the sentiment expressed by another Friend, that "the ministry we need and the world needs, is of and from the Truth, a willing and obedient channel that the streams of life may pass through."

In the general Yearly Meeting, when the subject of preparing replies to epistles from other Yearly Meetings came up, some uneasiness was manifested with the manner in which this correspondence was carried on, but finally a committee was appointed as usual.

The mention in the epistle from Iowa that two of its Quarterly Meetings proposed to form the new Yearly Meeting of Oregon, led to considerable discussion. Several Friends objected to recognizing a Yearly Meeting of which they knew so little, and of which, the information that had been received was not altogether satisfactory. But these objections were overruled.

The number of meetings was reported to be 340, and of members 16,102, an increase of 142 over the previous year. The number received by conviction was 282. It is to be hoped that but few of these cases of conviction are like those mentioned in a recent letter from a friend in Scotland, who says:—"Additions to our numbers have of late been made, but I am unable to find much therein to rejoice [at], for I fear we are in no condition to be helpful in the higher sense to those added to us; and they, on their part, are in too rudimentary a condition to be a lever among us to raise us from the low estate I feel we are in."

The summary of the reports of the Quarterly Meetings on Ministry and Oversight were read and the meeting entered on the consideration of the state of the Society. One Friend remarked that while it had never been more needful that the Society of Friends should be a distinct and a peculiar people; yet they were getting away from those restraining influences that had marked us out as a distinct and peculiar people; he saw no reason why the expression "Sunday-schools" should be substituted for "First-day schools." It was felt that there was need of care that the standard of Truth should not be lowered amongst us.

During the consideration of the Russian Famine Fund, some interesting information was communicated by the Friend who had visited Russia to distribute that fund. Besides the relief it afforded, it had had an effect in stimulating the Russian government to increased exertions, and had tended to create a feeling of unity between the two nations.

One of the most important discussions during the Yearly Meeting was that over the report of the Home Mission Committee. It is evident that there is an increasing uneasiness among English Friends, lest the practice of supporting ministers by the Committee to labor in different localities, should gradually lead to the establishment of a paid pastoral system, as has been done in some parts of America. This uneasiness was plainly expressed by some of those who spoke on this occasion. Among others, Wm. Robinson stated that some years ago he travelled through Iowa Yearly Meeting. If any Friends had suggested to him in those days the possibility that every meeting in that Yearly Meeting would in less than 25 years be supplied with its paid pastor, he would not have believed it. Yet it had come about, and among the causes was the action of London Home Mission Committee.

The conclusion finally arrived at was to reappoint the Committee for one year, and to request the Quarterly Meetings to appoint men and women Friends as representatives to a conference to be held in the autumn, and consider whether means could not be found to relieve the minds of Friends of the uneasiness which so many felt, and at the same time carry forward the work.

THE Editor requests that the Friend who sent him the account of John Audland, which was printed a few weeks since, will kindly send her name and address.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The total values of the exports of domestic breadstuffs from the United States during the eleven months ended Fifth Month 31, 1892, were $272,470,023, as compared with $109,956,084 during the corresponding period of the preceding year.

On the 10th inst. the Republican Convention, in session at Minneapolis, re-nominated Benjamin Harrison as their candidate for President of the United States, and Whitlaw Reid, editor of the New York Tribune, for Vice-President.

The platform declares for Protection, Reciprocity, Bimetalsm, a Free Ballot; opposition to union of Church and State, and trusts, and favorable to the earliest practicable admission of the remaining Territories. It also professes to sympathize "with all wise and legitimate efforts to lessen and prevent the evils of inter-ference and to promote freedom."

Colonel L. Polk, President of the National Farmers' Alliance, died in Washington on the 11th inst.

On the 13th inst. in the House a bill was passed providing that Indian children shall be declared to be citizens when they have reached the age of twenty-one years, and shall thereafter receive no support from the Government, until such time that they have had ten years of industrial training.

Representative Peele, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported to the House on the same day a bill ratifying an agreement for the cession to the United States of lands in the Cherokee outlet. The amount of the land to be immediately thrown open to settlement by the operations of the bill if it becomes a law aggregates over 6,000,000 acres.

A telegram from Chamberlain, South Dakota, says that more than half of the Indians belonging to the Lower Brule Agency surprised the authorities on the 13th, by leaving their reservation and going to Rosebud Reservation, where they will insist on remaining for several years. Their action is in opposition to the authorities. They are peaceably inclined, and removed quietly to what they say will be their new home."

A cotton crop report issued by the Agricultural Department, states that the average percentage of area in cotton with the actual acreage of last year is 83.5, compared with the average of the preceding years. The average condition of the crop was 85.9—the lowest average, with one exception, since 1874.

A bulletin issued by the Department of Agriculture states the acreage of winter wheat to be 99.9 per cent. of the actual area of last year; spring wheat, 100.3 per cent.; rye, 99.2 per cent. of last year's breadth, and oats, 99.2 per cent.

Fifth Month 24th was the ninth anniversary of the opening of the Brooklyn bridge. Persons travelling over the bridge have averaged 40,000,000 a year.

A rich body of lead, containing a portion of silver ore, has been struck at Ash Grove, Missouri, at a depth of 90 feet.

A flowing well of strong salt brine, accompanied by a flow of natural gas, has been struck at Troy, Pa.

A new rich ore body has been discovered in the Midnight Mine, at Ouray, Colorado.

The Ship St. Leo sailed from Brooklyn on the 11th inst. with a cargo of breadstuffs, meats and infants' food, in addition to 3,500 tons of flour, for the starving Russian peasants.

The members of the Relief Committee at Titusville state that fifty-nine bodies have been buried, and that several persons are still missing, but they do not need to help those who have lost by the fire and flood, and to repair the destruction to property.

The number of deaths in this city last week was 375; which is 13 more than last week and 63 more than the corresponding week last year. Of the whole number, 49 died of consumption; 26 of disease of the heart; 25 of pneumonia; 21 of diphtheria; 20 of convulsions; 20 of cholera infantum; 15 of marasmus; 13 of apoplexy; 12 of bronchitis; 12 of old age; 10 of Bright's disease and 10 of scarlet fever.

FOREIGN.—On the 8th inst. the New Oriental Bank, in London, suspended. A circular issued by the Directors gives the liabilities as £7,250,000 and the un-called capital as £900,000. The Directors recommended the depositors to withdraw only 20 per cent. of their deposits in order to meet the obligations of the bank. The suspension is largely due to the depreciation in the value of silver, to the consequent increasing distrust in Great Britain of investments in foreign countries, and to the withdrawal of capital in the East, coupled with the unprecedented condition of trade in Japan and the consequent losses incurred throughout the hurricane at Mauritius.

The International Miners' Congress has resolved, by a vote of 64 to 9, that preparations must be made for an international strike if the various Governments do not give the demand for an eight-hour working day. Such uncertainty is felt on the Continent. How far the cause of a festival in progress at Nancy, at which President Carnot is in attendance. The correspondent of the New York Tribune says: The second fact takes us all the way to Nancy, and the sudden appearance at the New Festival of the Grand Duke Constantine. That he went by the czar's train is uncertain. How far his coming was expected by President Carnot is uncertain. Nor does it greatly matter. What does matter, what is in fact of higher concern to the peace and policy of Europe than any recent event is the Grand Duke's presence on such an occasion. It is the most positive expression of the Czar's good will to France that has yet been given. It means that the Grand Duke belongs not to the czar's court, but to France. There has always been a doubt how far the Russian Emperor and Russia herself responded to the eagerness of France for a serious political understanding between the two countries. It may be still doubtful. But what is clear is that the Czar signifies thus publicly to Germany and to Europe that he has taken the step of coming from his friendship, whatever it be, for France.

A dispatch from Meshed, in Northeast Persia, says that all the Europeans in that city have escaped safely from the cholera, which is ravishing Meshed and the province of Khorassan, in which the city is located. Among the natives the death has reached 250 daily. The disease is of a most violent type.

The meeting between the Czar and Emperor William at Kiel has been the leading topic of conversation during the week. The comments of the newspapers in Berlin show that it is generally felt that there is little reason for congratulation over the result of the meeting, which had too much the appearance of the Emperor running after the Czar, while the ostentatious visit of the Grand Duke Constantine to Nancy, at the express instructions of the Czar, dispelled any idea that political importance can be attached to the Kiel meeting.

A dispatch from Madras to the effect that the well-known showers have ceased in the Presidency and have improved the pasturage. The showers were not of the regular monsoon type, and were not sufficient to supply the needs of agriculture. The dispatch further says that a heavy rain has greatly benefited crops in Bengal. The development of the monsoon is watched anxiously. It appears to have taken at Bombay. A signal hoisted at Calcutta denotes the approach of a dangerous cyclone.

Kate Marsden, who is interested in a project to establish a leper colony in Siberia, has arrived from St. Petersburg en route to the United States. In an interview, she gave a graphic description of her six weeks' tour of the leper colonies of the island of Sumatra. It soon as any other colony of the disease, the victim is at once driven into the depths of the forest, there to live upon tree bark and upon rotten fish. This food is furnished by relatives, who deposit it at a distance from the miserable and filthy huts of the victims.

The huts are one-half underground for the sake of water, and are built in such a manner that supervision is impossible. Kate Marsden and thirty guides were obliged to cut a path for themselves through the undergrowth of the forests and to proceed in single file. They found the lepers ill-clad and living in indescribable filth and dirt, dragging out a horrible existence for years and years. They said they did not feel that it was coming so loathsome that they have lost all semblance to humanity. K. Marsden says that there has been found in Yakutsk a plant that is reputed to cure leprosy, but she has not been able to test it as yet. She intends to return to Yakutsk to establish a colony at Ylenk.

Large numbers of trees and dead animals and much debris of wrecked bridges and houses are floating down the rivers of Austria, proving the awful destruction caused by the floods. Several bridges are known to have been destroyed, and a number of lives have been lost. The market town of Pulkana has been partially destroyed. A miner named Hayekka has confessed that he caused the fire in the Prizlam mines. His two brothers were among the dead. He says that he intended to keep his secret, but his resolution began to fail him after he saw the scores of dead bodies brought up from the pit. He regretted that he could not escape the associations which constantly remind him of the terrible catastrophe. He got a place in a factory at Beraun eventually, but after remaining there two days, was unable to keep his attention to work longer, and started out again on his wanderings. He could not sleep and he could not begotten food to satisfy his hunger. He feared that he would go mad if he did not return to his home, and so therefore went to a priest in Milan two days ago and confessed what he had done. The priest told him he must return to Prizlam and tell his story. He is under arrest.

An eruption of Mount Vesuvius continues. At about the middle of the Atride del Cielo, the deep sickle-shaped valley which separated Monte Somma from Vesuvius proper, a small cone has appeared, from which two streams of lava are flowing. A shower of small stones and scoriae is being ejected from this cone, and which dense clouds are lowering. Stones are also being ejected from the principal crater. The phenomenon is accompanied by prolonged and ominous subterranean rumblings. The director of the meteorological observatory thinks that the eruption will cease at the next full moon.

"HEAVING COALS OF FIRE."

There is something very suggestive and instructive in the following touching narrative, which we find in The Herald of Peace credited to the Speaker.

It is just six years ago that I first visited the Cornish coast at Gorran Haven.

Since then I have visited in fair weather and foul; and in time, perhaps, shall rival the coast-guardsmen, who can walk it blindfold. But to this day it remains in my recollection, the coast I trod, without companion, during four dark days in December. It was a rude introduction. The wind blew in my face, with scuds of cold rain; a leaden mist hung low on the left, and rolled slowly up Channel. Now and then it thinned enough to reveal a white zigzag of breakers in front, and a blur of land; or, far below, a cluster of dripping rocks, with the sea crawling between and hitting their weed. But for the most part I saw only the furze-bushes beside the path, each powdered with fine raindrops, that in the aggregate resembled a coat of gray frieze, and the puffs of spray that shot up over the cliff's lip and drenched me.

Just beyond the headland, where the path dipped steeply, a bright space disengaged itself from the mist as I passed, and around it, the looming outline of a cottage, between the footpath and the sea. A habitation more desolate than this odd angle of the coast could hardly have been chosen; on the other hand, the glow of the firelight within the kitchen window was almost an invitation. It seemed worth my while to ask for a drink of milk there, and find out that manner of folk were the inmates. An old woman answered my knock. She was tall, with a slight stoop, and a tinge of yellow pervading her face, as if some of the complexion had run into her teeth and the whites of her eyes. A lean white cap, tied under the chin with tape, concealed all but the edge of her gray locks. She wore a violet turnover, a large wrapper, a brown stuff gown that hardly reached her knees, and thick worsted stockings, but no shoes. "A drink o' milk? Why not a dish o' ea?" "That will be troubling you," said I, "it ashamed for feeling so little in want of subsistence. "Few they be that troubles us, my dear. Too few by land, an' too many by sea, rest their dear souls! Step inside by the fire. There's only my old man here, an' you needn't stand 'pon ceremony wi' hee: for he's stone-deaf an' totelin'. Isaac, you poor deaf haddock, here's a strange body for 'ee to look at; tho' you'm past all stir but huryn', I reckon." She sighed as I stepped past into the warmth. 'The man she called Isaac was huddled and nodding in a chair, before the bluish blaze of a wreck-wood fire. He met me with an incurious stare, and began to dose again. He was clearly in the last decline of manhood, the stage of utter child-ness and mere oblivion; and sat there with his faculties collapsed, waiting for release.

My mired boots played havoc with the neatly sanded floor; but the old woman dusted a chair for me as carefully as if I had worn robes of state, and set it on the other side of the hearth. Then she put the kettle to boil, and unhitching a cup from the dresser, took a key from it, and opened a small cupboard between the fireplace and the wall. That which she sought stood on the top shelf, and she had to climb on a chair to reach it. I offered my help; but no—she would get it herself. It proved to be a small green canister. The tea that came from this canister I wish I could describe. No sooner did the boiling water touch it than the room was filled with fragrance. The dotard in the chair drew a long breath through his nostrils, as though the aroma touched some quick centre in his moribund brain. The woman poured out a cup, and I sipped it. "Smuggled," I decided; for indeed you cannot get such tea in London if you pay fifty shillings a pound. "You like it?" she asked. Before I could answer, a small table stood at my elbow, and she was loading it with delicacies from the cupboard. The contents of that cupboard! Caviare came from it, and a small ambrosial cheese; dried figs and guava jelly; olives, cherries in brandy, wonderful filberts glazed with sugar; biscuits and all manner of queer Russian sweets. I lean back with wide eyes. "Feodor sends us these," said the old woman, bringing a dish of Cornish cream and a home-made loaf to give the feast a basis. "Who's Feodor?" "Feodor Himkoff." She paused a moment, and added, "He is mate on a Russian vessel." "A friend?"

The question went unnoted. "Is there any you fancy?" she asked. "Some o't may be outlandish eatin'." "Do you like these things?" I looked from her to the caviare. "I don't know. I never tried." "We keeps 'em, my man an' I, for all poor come-by-chance folks that knocks." "But these are dainties for rich men's tables." "May be. I've never tasted—they'd stick in our gozels if we tried."

I wanted to ask a dozen questions, but thought it politer to accept this strange hospitality in silence. Glancing up presently, however, I saw her eyes still fixed on me, and laid down my knife. "I can't help it," I said, "I want to know about Feodor Himkoff." "There's no secret," she answered. "Leastways, there was one, but either God has condemned or forgiven afore now. Look at my man there; he's done all the repentin' he's likely to do." After a few seconds' hesitation she went on—"I had a boy, you must know—oh! a straight young man—that went for a soldier, an' was killed at Inker-man by the Rooshians. Take another look at his father here; you think 'en a bundle o' frailties, I dessey. Well, when the news was brought us, this poor worm lifts his fist up to the sun an' says, 'God do so to me an' more also,' he says, 'if ever I falls across a Rooshian!' An' 'God send me a Rooshian—just one!' he says, meanin' that Rooshians don't grow on brambles hereabouts. Now the boy was our only flesh.

"Well, sir, nigh sixteen year' went by, an' we two were sittin', one quakin' night, beside this very fire, hearkenin' to the bellian outside of: for 'twas the big storm in 'Seventy, an' even indoors we must shut to make ourselves heard. About ten, as we was thinkin' to go to bed, there comes a bangin' on the door, an' Isaac gets up an' lets the bar down, singin' out, 'Who is it?' There was a big young man 'twixt the doorposts, drippin' wet, wi' smears o' blood on his face, an' white teeth showin' when he talked. 'Twas a half-furrin talk, an' he spoke a bit faint too, but fairly grinned for joy to see our warm fire, an' his teeth were white as pearl. 'Ah, sir,' he cried, 'you will help? Our barque is ashore below—fifteen poor brothers! You will send for help?—you will aid? Then Isaac stepped back, and spoke very slow—'What nation?' he asked. She is Russ—we are all Russ; sixteen poor brothers from Archangel, said the young man, as soon as he took in the question. My man slewed round on his heel, and walked to the hearth here; but the sailor stretched out his hands, an' I saw the middle finger of his right hand was gone. 'You will aid, eh? Ah, yes, you will aid. They are clingin'—so—fifteen poor brothers, and many have wives.' But Isaac said, 'Thank Thee, God, and picked up a log from the hearth here. 'Take 'em this message,' said he, facin' round; an', runnin' on the sailor, who was faint and swayin', beat him forth wi' the burnin' stick, and bolted the door upon him. After that we sat quiet, he an' I, all the night through, never takin' our clothes off. An' at daybreak Isaac walked down to the shore. There was nothin' to see but two bodies, an' he buried them an' waited for more. 'That evenin' another came in, an' next day, two; an' so on, for a se'n night. Ten bodies in all he picked up and buried 't the meadow below. An' on the fourth day he picked up a body wi' one finger missin', under the headland. 'Twas the young man he had driven forth, who had wandered there an' broke his neck. Isaac buried him too. An' that was all, except two that the coastguard found an' held an inquest over an' carried off to churchyard.

"So it befall; an' for five year' neither Isaac nor me opened mouth 'pon it, not to each other even. An' then, one moonday, a sailor knocks at the door; an' goin' out, I see he was a furrier wi' great white teeth showin' dro' his beard. 'I be come to see Mister Isaac Lenine,' he says in his outlandish English. So I called Isaac out; an' his stranger grips 'en by the hand, an' kisses 'em sayin', 'Little father, take me to thy graves. My name is Feodor Hinkoff, an' my brother Dmitry was among the crew of the "Viatica." You would know his body, if you buried it, for the second finger was gone from his right hand. I myself—wretched one!—chopped it by bad luck when we were boys, an' played at wood cuttin' w' our father's axe. I have heard how they perished, far from aid, and how you gave 'em burial in your own field; and I pray to all the saints for you," he says. So Isaac led 'en to the field and showed 'en the grave that was staked off 'long w' the rest. God help my poor man! he was too big a coward to speak. "So the man stayed w' us till sundown, an' kissed us 'pon both cheeks, an' went his way, blessin' us. God forgie 'us—God forgie 'us! An' ever since he's been breaking our heads d'or the post-office w' suchlike precious balms as these here. She broke off to settle Isaac more comfortably in his chair. "Tis all we can do to get rid of 'em, on poor tramping fellows, same as yourself."

It may well be hoped that our merciful Father in Heaven may have forgiven these Cornish people, for their inhumanity to the poor sailors wrecked on their stormy coast. But who can number the sad thoughts which the remembrance of their cruelty must have awakened in their minds during the long years which they survived; or measure the depth of their mental distress, aggravated by the undeserved gratitude manifested by the bereaved brother of the perished Dmitrie. Feodor Hinkoff little knew how burning were the coals of fire which he was heaping on the heads of this wretched couple, as he continued from time to time to send them tokens of his grateful remembrance.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Model Ranch.

The often popular idea regarding a western ranch, is that the rancher lives in a hut or a dug-out, that the ranch consists of 160 acres or more of rolling prairie, the stock is made up of anywhere from five to five thousand wild and long horned cattle; and that when the rancher wants a meal, he goes out with a lasso and captures his breakfast on a run. But as a matter of fact, some of our western ranchers live in luxury in the cities adjacent to their possessions, their broad fields are cultivated for miles in extent, they own the finest registered cattle, whilst their ranches are complete with the accoutrements of modern scientific farming. I visited such a ranch a few days ago, and will try to describe a little of what I saw. Some of my farmer readers will pardon me if I make any errors in this little account; for the writer is a sadly poor farmer.

This ranch lies near the foot-hills of the Rocky Mountains. It is over three thousand acres in extent. Originally it was almost without water, and the land was nothing but a barren, rolling prairie, whose big waves would be called hills if not contrasted with the towering mountains that bar the western sky. Occasionally a curious outcropping of a strange stone formation, makes a naturally sheltered spot, where barns and corrals can be placed. With this exception, the soil is as sandy as one would find on a South Jersey farm, and is as black and rich looking as if it had just come out of a green-house.

It takes a whole day to get over this ranch. The first part of the description is easily disposed of. There are 450 acres planted with corn. A Pennsylvania farmer would be happy to work his corn field like the Colorado rancher does. The latter just runs his harrow through the soft, stoneless loam, and drills the seed right in, without any ploughing. There are 200 acres of rye, 150 acres of oats, 100 of alfalfa, and 50 acres each of wheat and millet. Besides there is the truck-patch, consisting of 25 acres, where, thanks to an excellent system of irrigation, crops are grown, which for productiveness, would make the eyes of many farmers open wide with astonishment. The remaining 2,000 acres are principally devoted to grazing.

At one end of this big farm, right near the truck-patch, two hills circle around the spot where the houses, barns, sheds, and corrals are situated. By the way, I should state, that a corral is what is known in most places as a barn-yard,—the Spanish word for the idea conveyed, is certainly much the more beautiful of the two.

The buildings in this group are very numerous. First we note the boarding-house, where the 25 men employed on the ranch are provided for. This establishment is presided over by two cooks. Then there is the bunk-house, where the men sleep. Close by, are the large barns, the two largest being for the Holstein and Jersey cows. All these barns are kept just as clean as if they were not being constantly used.

Right near the barns are the three silos, each of which holds 400 tons of corn ensilage; thus making an aggregate accommodation of 1,200 tons. Into these silos, the corn after it has been cut up, husk, cob, and all, is packed for future use. In course of time it slightly ferments, and thereby constitutes a food that supplies all the needed qualities for the best milk producing. The milk given by cows kept during the winter on corn ensilage, is as rich and abundant as if they were being fed on the finest pasturage.

One of the most interesting buildings is the Creamery. The machinery is run by a 20 horse-power engine. Prominent amongst the appliances of this place, is the Butter Extractor. It is a wonderful contrivance, which by a skillful application of centrifugal force, and by attaining a speed of 8,000 revolutions per minute, separates the cream from the skim-milk, and the new milk from the butter in a few minutes. The butter falls from the Extractor in little globules. The Creamery is right at the base of a steep declivity, at the top of which are the foundations of a large barn. When this barn is completed, it will be possible to milk the cows, pour the milk into a pipe in the barn that feeds the Butter Extractor in the Creamery, and so have butter made in five or ten minutes after milking the cows.

Another new contrivance is the Milk-test, which shows the number of pounds of butter that can be extracted from a given number of pounds of milk. By means of it, the milk producing qualities of the cows can be ascertained at any time, and so an accurate record be kept which will establish the value and yield of the different animals. How these various machines work, I dare not attempt to describe; for they were new mysteries to my wondering and unscientific mind.

Of course this ranch has extensive stables for horses, sheds, ice-houses, corn-cribs, hog-pens, and all the other adjuncts of a large farm. Some of the buildings are particularly interesting. For instance, the big calf-house is calculated to excite attention. It is divided up into different pens, where the sleek little beauties are sorted according to their ages. The day after birth the poor little things are taken from their mothers, and put into the nursery, where they are fed by patent feeding apparatus. When large enough to nibble at hay or straw, they are placed in other apartments. Here they caper around, and butt each other's heads together and learn the lessons that are considered necessary to complete the education of modern, high-born, civilized calves. The cute little Jerseys have mild eyes, and pretty heads, which remind one of trustful deer.

Another building and attached corral, constitute the hospital. It is situated away from the noise and excitement of cattle life. In it the sick or "run down" cows, horses, dogs, or chickens, are placed and carefully nursed, until a full recovery is effected.

The big corn-cribs have along side of them, sheds which cover the boilers, engines, and fodder mills, wherewith to cut up the corn and oats on the spot. The blacksmith and carpenter shops are very important if not conspicuous buildings.

The bees and chickens have outfits according to their needs. The hog-pens and pig-houses are built upon the most improved methods, and are inhabited by fine bred, but squint-eyed and long-nosed porkers. Pigs always will look ugly except in the shape of pork.

There are 125 hot-houses, in addition to a few green-houses. In the latter, some of the early spring vegetables including tomatoes, and rhubarb, are raised during the winter with good success, and the price received for them warrants the extra cost of doing so. The mushroom-cellar is built in the side of a hill, and is about 75 feet, by 30 feet in size. In the autumn potatoes are stored in it; but during the late winter and early spring months, a fine crop of mushrooms is grown in its sombre precincts; for this delicacy commands a good price in the adjacent markets.

After all, the cattle are the most interesting part of the ranch. Among them are about 250 thorough-breds. Some of the finest registered stock in the country are included in the herd. "Lady Baker," a gentle, stout old Holstein, has made 34 lbs. and 6 oz. of butter from one week's yield of milk. Near her stall is that of "Natsy," who has made 34 lbs. and 9 oz. in one week. Close by is a fine, two-year old Holstein, that has a record of 200 pounds of butter in 90 days. She is fondly looked upon by her owner as the coming cow. "Maggie Cliflen," one of the younger animals, has given 102 pounds of milk in one day. There are in the herd twenty-five cows, each of which has given over 16,000 pounds of milk in ten months. For each cow, this equals a yield of milk for ten consecutive months, of more than their own weight per month.

These cattle are finely cared for, and the same thought and business methods are applied to the work that a careful merchant would devote to his business interests. The result proves that as in any other occupation, it pays to use brains, thought, and enterprise in farming. For instance, an accurate record is kept of the yield of each individual cow; and what she gives at each milking is put down on the book immediately afterward, by the man who has milked her. Thus the animals that are not paying, are soon known, and they are sold off. All these cattle are carried every day. They are also daily washed out with water introduced by hydrants in all the barns.

Hydrants are all around the various buildings and corals. A magnificent pressure is obtained, and a stream of water can be thrown over the highest flagstaff on the barn tops. A regular fire brigade is maintained, which is made up of employees; and frequent drills tend to keep up discipline in that department.

The water used for domestic purposes, and for irrigating the truck-patch, is obtained in a way that would amaze a farmer who is accustomed to babbling brooks and frequent rain storms. Not far from the corals there is a "dry creek,"—a sort of cleft in the bottom of the meadow,—with nothing in it but sand. But beneath this sand is a fine underflow of water. By a system of engineering, this water is gathered and brought to the surface, and from thence pumped up to two tanks on a neighboring hill-top. These tanks have a capacity of 32,000 gallons; and the extent of "seepage" from the underground creek amounts to the large sum of 200,000 gallons per day. It is enough to irrigate many acres of truckage, and is distributed over the land by 4 and 6 inch pipes.

Many hundreds of acres of this ranch are "under ditch" as we call it; which means that the ground is watered by a series of ditches and laterals, that conduct the precious fluid from the reservoirs, where it has been accumulated during the rainy seasons. The warm sunshine combined with water, just when wanted, and applied in the needed quantities, results in crops that no other conditions could admit of.

This extensive plant has grown up and been put on a paying basis within the past three years. It was established and has been conducted by men who came to Colorado on account of their health; who practically knew nothing about agriculture previous to this effort; but who being business men of excellent abilities, have made the thing a success. Thirty years since, the site on this ranch was a favorite winter resort for thousands of Cheyenne Indians, and up to fifteen years ago, they were in the locality where now the peaceful pursuits of the white man are successfully followed.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"I delight in the Law of God after the inward man."

This was the experience of a man after God's own heart—endorsed by an Apostle under the new dispensation who said, "I know that in me, that is, in my flesh dwelleth no good thing; for to will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not. O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" This related not only to his own experience, but having a thorough knowledge of human nature, he spoke to others of that, which while under the Law of Sin they knew not, except, in an inward cry for deliverance from the Body of Sin—a lack of knowledge being betrayed with regard to the alone one to whom the cry was to be directed. Paul said, "It pleased God—who called me by His Grace,"— "To reveal his Son in me, that I might preach him among the heathen." The poet said, "He is the free man whom the Truth makes free, and all are slaves beside."

How plain it is rendered, that provision for the flesh is not to be made in a call to preach Christ to the heathen. "Immediately, said Paul, I conferred not with flesh and blood." What complete mastery over the flesh he obtained; when, with the victor's palm he could say, "I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord."

His ministry freed from the entanglements of the flesh and from the willings and runnings of the Creature was in the demonstration of the Spirit and with power. Oh, that we had more of such preaching in these last days. Then, would there be a revival of good in the Church and in the world—such as would shake neighborhoods many miles around.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"I Know That My Redeemer Liveth."

A peaceful and happy assurance given by the grace of God to the lowly follower of a once crucified but now risen and glorified Redeemer. An inheritance that is the portion of the child of God and which I believe might be witnessed more fully, to the uplifting of our minds above the toils and cares of life, if there were but a greater willingness to live loose to the world and nearer to God in spirit, by abiding in Christ, which can only be realized by his Spirit having place in us to the exclusion of all that is contrary thereto.

To know an undivided heart in the fear and love of God, by which willing and ready services rendered to the behests of this holy mind and will as revealed by Christ through his Spirit in the secret of the heart and mind, is the blessed experience of those who, through following on to know the Lord, have the assurance granted unto them of the keeping power of God, and by holding nothing back which He calls for from them, are made willing to deny themselves, even of what may appear lawful gratifications, in order to answer the sense they have of his holy will concerning them, in order that they may become chastened in spirit toward God.

They, therefore, who desire above all to know union of soul with God through Christ Jesus and the indwelling of his Spirit, will but lightly esteem the pleasures and profits of earth, lest in anywise these should come between their souls and their God.

Tender are the dealings of God, their Father, with these his children, who count nothing too near or too dear to part with in order that they may know conformity with and unto all things his holy mind and will, and precious that communion into which they are led by his Spirit, that enables them to realize in good degree, the life that they now live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved them and gave himself for them.

It is thus that the condition of purity of heart is arrived at to which the blessing is attached of seeing God.

How many there are who are content with a name to live, while dead to the reality of union with God, poor unstable souls are these, filled with a multitude of cares and anxieties, and knowing little of the sweetness of consolation by Christ. Borne down by crosses, but still without the saving knowledge of the cross of Christ by which we are to become crucified unto the world and the world unto us.

Such know little of the rich pleasure of child-like, whole-hearted obedience to the Father's will, hence know little of communion in secret with God through Christ and of assurance that springs with abiding in Him.

The child of God seeks continually help and counsel, guidance and preservation, knowing that it is from the Lord they have safety and safe-keeping, and that He alone can lead them along aright and can keep them in quietness and peace, amid the conflicts, temptation and trials of time. So that day by day they seek renewal of strength from on high. Truly as the eye of the maid is to the hand of her mistress so do the eyes of these wait upon the Lord.

Whatever their position among their fellows they are pre-eminently the servants of God, holding nothing as their own but as stewards in trust with God's gifts they hold them at his disposal. Be they intrusted with little or with much of the treasures of earth their sense of responsibility is the same. One is their Master, even Christ and they are brethren. Therefore, to Him they must look continually, if they would continue to know the daily manifestation of his will to them and concerning them in the right ordering and disposal of themselves and their all. To be among the poor and despised of earth is often still a great favor, for among these the Lord often plants his peculiar blessings and enriches such in an especial manner with a continued sense of his love, goodness, and unceasing care. It is not the possession or non-possession of the enrichments of earth, either mental or material, that can or doth make the child of God, but the hidden treasure in the heart and in spirit by which the possession of true riches is known. Nevertheless great possessions are often a great snare to the possessor; while, on the other hand, being among those little accounted of, according to this world's estimate, saves from many a snare those who are so positioned, but who are whole-hearted in their seeking and in their service of their Lord and Master. And these, in the fulfilment of their duty, know of the promise, "I will never leave thee or forsake thee."

To be possessors of this heavenly treasure is the highest blessing that can attend us, and to retain and be wise users thereof, doth show greatest wisdom. While they who are negligent and luke-warm are the unwise and the foolish in slighting that in which is bound-up their trust peace and happiness in time as well as the assurance of hope of eternal bliss.

Some in their passage through life have very much more to contend with than others, both as to their struggles with evil in themselves and external to themselves. These, when obedient to the Heavenly Visitant, are not unfrequently made to rejoice in the still greater abounding of the Lord's goodness towards them, and know of the experience "My cup runneth over," and in the fulness of the sense thereof, are led to exclaim, "Thy goodness and mercy will surely follow me all the days of my life, and my dwelling shall be with thee forever."

To such as these there is no lack of quiet peaceful assurance and certainty by which they can say,— "I know that my Redeemer liveth." Their many provings and overturnings by the hand of the Lord upon them, but tend to their greater settlement and establishment on the solid rock of Truth, Christ Jesus. As they grow in grace so they grow in Divine favour and are brought into closer communion with God thereby. Nothing is too near or too dear to part with in order to answer the will of their Father in Heaven.

I feel but to add,—O that the number of these dedicated ones might be multiplied many fold.

THE WAITING GUEST.

BY MARY BRADLEY.

"Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him."—REV. 3: 20.

If to mine outward sense this message came,
My heart would kindle like a leaping flame;
My flying feet, my outstretched hands would bring,
O Master dear, what rapturous welcome!

Not Martha's zeal, nor Mary's pure desire,
More love, more earnest service, could inspire.
All that I have, all that I am, would be
The least that I could count enough for thee.

Yet, O my Master! many and many a day
Thou hast stood here, and I have turned away;
Pardblind, and dull of soul, and deaf, and dumb;
I have not seen, I have not heard thee come.

What wilt thou do, alas! and say to him
Who does not hear thy voice, whose eyes are dim,
Who, senseless, leaves thee standing at his door?
Oh! wilt thou go from hence, and come no more?

Nay, Master,—else thy blood were shed in vain.
Knock at my cautious heart, and knock again,
I'll lift its inmost room an open wide,
Then enter thou, and evermore abide!

—Brooklyn, N. Y.

"How should they know me? My soul is a maze,
Where I wander alone, and lonely;
Never a foothold there was here,
Never a mortal hand has stirred
The silence-curtain that hangs between Outer and inner, nor eye hath seen
What is only and ever my own.

"They have entered, indeed, the vestibule,
For its gate is opened wide,
High as the roof; and I welcome all
Who will visit my warm reception hall,
And utter a long and loving call
To some who are yet outside.

"But they do not know, and cannot see
That strong-hinged, low-arched door,
Though I am passing in and out,
From gloom within to light without,
Or from gloom without to light within;
None can ever an entrance win,
None! forevermore."

THE MOTHER'S PRAYER.

Starting forth on life's rough way,

Father, guide them;

Oh! we know not what of harm

May befall them;

'Neath the shadow of Thy wing,

Father, hide them;

Waking, sleeping, Lord, we pray,

Go beside them.

When in prayer they cry to Thee,

Do Thou hear them;

From the stains of sin and shame

Do Thou clear them;

Mid the quicksands and the rocks,

Do Thou steer them;

In temptation, trial, grief,

Be Thou near them.

Unto Thee we give them up,

Lord, receive them;

In the world we know must be

Much to grieve them,—

Many striving out and strong

To deceive them;

Trustful, in Thy hands of love

We must leave them.

—William Cullen Bryant.

A man can do all that he ought to do, although he cannot do all that he would like to do. It may, indeed, be that a man could have done more than he is now able to do, if he had been more earnest and faithful in the days that are gone. But, with things as they are, whatever it is a man's duty to do he can have power to do. God never gives responsibility without being ready to bestow strength and grace for its discharge.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Rural Excursion.

During a walk on a winter afternoon, I think on the 12th Month last, I noticed some bunches of mistletoe on an old Sour Gum Tree, which stood on the road side. The leaves on the Gum Tree had all fallen and this left the branches of this parasitic plant more visible to the passer by. It had sent forth many twigs of a dull green color tinged with yellow. The stems and leaves were much alike in appearance, the latter small in outline and thick. In the axils of the leaves were some small spikes of flowers of the same color, sufficiently developed to enable one with a magnifying glass to distinguish their parts. The fruit which ripens very early in the spring is a white berry, the pulp of which is sticky.

When one of these berries or the enclosed seed is conveyed to a tree adapted to support its growth, it soon germinates, and its roots pierce the bark of its host, and absorb nourishment from the sap that circulates in the new wood under the bark. From this practice is derived the botanical name of our American mistletoe (Phoradendron flavescens), which implies a thiefish plant, because they steal their food from the trees they grow upon.

Although this plant belongs to a different genus from the true Mistletoe of Europe (Viscum), it is closely allied to it. It does not seem to be abundant in our neighborhood, for I have not met with any specimens of it, except in this one locality. An intelligent farmer of my acquaintance informed me that some years ago, it was much more common, but that after the breaking out of the Civil War in 1861, there was a great demand for Sour Gum timber for the manufacture of army wagons; for the hubs of which it is peculiarly suited, because the fibres of the wood instead of running in parallel lines are so crossed and interlaced, that it is almost impossible to split a piece of it. With the sour gum trees the mistletoe disappeared.

It is much more abundant in the Southern States, where it grows on various kinds of trees. I have counted from 30 to 40 bunches of it on a single apple tree, and some of these were clusters of twigs that would have filled an ordinary basket such as our farmers use in sending their fruits and vegetables to market in the United States.

Although we have in the United States but the one species, and there is but one found growing in England, yet the natural order to which they belong contains more than 400 known species, most of them parasites, and living in the tropics. Many of them have showy flowers.

The Mistletoe of Europe grows on various kinds of trees, particularly apple, pear and allied species. The berries are a favorite food of the robin. This plant was intimately connected with many of the superstitions of the ancient Germans and of the British Druids. That which grew on the oak was thought to possess magical virtues.

It is a well-known fact that many plants are partially dependent on the visits of insects to their blossoms, for the power of fertilizing their seeds. In flowering plants,—the essential construction of a flower is a germ containing the embryo seeds and terminated by a projection from which the covering or skin has been removed so that it is in favorable condition to receive and retain what may be brought into contact with it. Around this germ are placed the organs termed stamens which produce, when mature a yellowish powder, called pollen, which when it falls on the naked part the germ adheres to it, and sends out a cell which penetrates substance, reaches the embryo seeds and by some mysterious power enables them to grow and perfect. The germ and the stamens are the essential parts of the flower, the colored leaves which surround them are the envelopes which protect them.

In some plants these organs are so situated the pollen cannot well reach the germ without outside help. The all-wise Creator has provided this help by the formation of insects, especially bees, which enter the flower in pursuit of the nectar they secrete, become more or less coated with pollen as they brush past the stamens and deposit it on the germs.

The common white clover is a favorite with the honey bee, and when abundant yields to it a large supply of beautiful and delicious honey. But the red clover of our grass fields has a flower tube so deep that the honey bee cannot reach to the bottom where the honey is found; and so it leaves that supply untouched. But its place is taken there by the wild bumble bee—a much larger insect, which obtains food for itself and in the same operation fertilizes the seeds by the transference of the pollen to the germs.

Some of my readers may have been interested in the statement that the colonists of Australia and New Zealand, finding that red clover would not mature its seeds in those countries, for want of this insect help; introduced some colonies of bumble bees, which have greatly multiplied, and proved efficient workers for the purpose intended.

Being in Chester County, Pa., in the early spring, several of the farmers there spoke of the difficulty they had in raising clover seed—owing to the small number of bumble bees that were left to effect the fertilizing—they stated that these insects had become comparatively scarce of latter years, and were disposed to attribute this decrease to the attacks of the raccoons and polecats, which dug up their nests and devoured the grubs and honey they contained.

That their honey is attractive many of the farmer's boys can testify, with whom it used to be a favorite amusement to attack the nests with leafy branches of shrubs, and after beating off the insects, to plunder the nests and eat the honey which was stored in oval or rounded waxen cells, of the size of a cherry. These nests were generally found slightly buried in the ground in low-lying meadows.

The case of the bumble bee is an interesting illustration of that balance of nature, which is gradually acquired when the destructive and reproductive forces are left to work out the problems of life without human interference. The abundance offered encourages the multiplication of the animals which devour it; and thus there are mutual checks.

When rabbits were introduced into Australia, there was little to check their growth, and they became so numerous as to be a great injury to the sheep by devouring the pasture. To diminish their numbers foxes have been introduced. An Australian journal says that foxes have already spread over a wide area, and are most destructive both to lambs and poultry. They attain greater size and strength in Australia than in England, and the mild climate is highly favorable to the increase of their numbers. "It must be very disheartening," says the writer, "to all who have stock of any kind to lose, to find themselves confronted by some new enemy introduced by thoughtless or selfish persons. If some energetic steps are not soon taken nothing can prevent the spread of foxes over the whole continent."

In the West India Islands, the fields of sugar cane were infested with a poisonous snake of an aggressive disposition, which often struck the laborers. A premium was offered for their heads, and some idea of the number killed may be formed from the incident, that when some of the heads were wanted for examination at the Academy of Natural Sciences in Philadelphia, a correspondent in the West Indies sent a cask of whiskey with 3,000 snake heads in it. These snakes fed largely on rats which multiplied greatly when their natural enemy was withdrawn, and became very destructive to the sugar cane. To combat the rats, the Mongoose, a small carnivorous animal was introduced. After eating the rats this has become so numerous that it attacks young animals and birds of all kinds, and needs something to keep it within bounds.

[Our beloved and ancient friend, Joseph Morris, of Cardington, Ohio, has sent for publication in THE FRIEND, a few lines in reference to the late Yearly Meeting held in Philadelphia.

He feels very much as if his journey of life in this world had nearly been performed, but he maintains an exercise of mind on behalf of those members of our Society who are concerned to adhere to its original principles and testimonies—especially of those who are located in meetings where favor is shown to proceedings inconsistent therewith.

Whilst it is a comfort to believe that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting as a body, retains its allegiance to the principles promulgated by George Fox and his fellow laborers, yet many of its members are quite conscious of the weakness that exists within its borders—and that constant watchfulness and the extension of Divine help are needed to preserve it from erring in some direction or other from the path of safety.—ED.]

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting convened on the 18th of Fourth Month, 1892, which we are informed was a comfortable and edifying season through the most of the meeting, and in which were maintained without compromise the primitive usages and doctrines of our Christian Society which has characterized it from its formation to the present time. The minutes of the meeting read thus: "We have been favored at times during the sessions of the meetings with the solemnizing presence of our Holy Head awakening desires and a measure of hope that he would so visit his people with a fresh outpouring of his Holy Spirit that they would be brought individually into closer communion with him and thus be led to walk in humble obedience to his will and be enabled to labor effectually for the promotion of his blessed cause of Truth and Righteousness"

Such reasons of Spiritual refreshment should increase our faith in the teaching of the Holy Spirit and lead us to seek for Divine assistance to fill our allotted places in the Church and in the world, through the aid of that grace of God which visits every individual, and for obedience to which we all are accountable.

This Yearly Meeting continues to hold its allegiance to the principles promulgated by George Fox and his fellow laborers. Well may Ohio, New England, Iowa, Kansas, Western, and Canada Yearly Meetings in this great conflict through which the church is passing, recognize Philadelphia Yearly Meeting as a fellow laborer in the effort to support the faith once delivered to the saints. The late Yearly Meeting must have been to the rightly concerned, a time of comfort and the holding up of each other's hands. Others who were not at the meeting, have also been comforted and strengthened by reading its minutes, of humble thankfulness to the great head of the Church Christ Jesus, our blessed Lord and word of life.

Extinct Birds.—Students of natural history are much interested in the recent discovery in New Zealand of an extensive deposit of the remains of the gigantic extinct birds called moas.

The discovery was made in plowing through a slight depression in the field, where a bog containing several springs had evidently once existed. Here, buried in a deposit of peat, at a depth of three or four feet, the skeletons of eight or nine hundred moas were found, packed and intertwined together in a remarkable manner.

It was evident that these great birds, which were much larger than the modern ostrich, varying in height from ten to fourteen feet, had perished there by wholesale. An enormous quantity of smooth quartz pebbles, which they had carried in their crops, was found with the skeletons. There were also found the remains of extinct species of other large birds.

Various explanations have been suggested to account for the destruction of such an army of powerful birds. One theory is that they were overwhelmed by a great storm, and that their remains were heaped together by the combined action of wind and water. What renders the question still more puzzling is the fact that collections of moas skeletons, mingled with those of other giant birds, have been found in similar situations elsewhere in New Zealand.

Students of geology are aware that evidence is sometimes found in rocks of the sudden destruction of great numbers of animals that formerly existed on the earth, and the resemblance of such cases to this of the New Zealand moas is interesting.

We are thus continually reminded of the perils that have beset the inhabitants of the globe, on every side, of the very beginning of its history.—Youths' Companion.

Air Pressure at the Cannon's Mouth.—Experiments, our Berlin correspondent says, were made during the last trial trip of the armed cruiser Beowulf to determine the air-pressure at the mouth of a gun at the moment of discharge. Rabbits were placed near the muzzles of the guns, and shots fired. In every case the animals fell dead at once. In order to test the probable effects of the enormous displacement of air upon human beings, figures made of straw were used. These were torn to pieces in every instance. The trials were made with long-bored twenty-four centimetre ring guns.—London Daily News.

How the Cow saved her Calf.—Col. McDonald, of Columbia City, Indiana, had bought a lot of stock, including a cow and a calf. The cow and calf drove along with the other cattle until a deep stream was reached. There was no bridge, and near the ford in the river was a deep step-off of a good many inches. The current in the stream at that time was very swift. When the cattle plunged in they were swept off their feet into deep water, and a good many of them disappeared for a moment. When the cow came up her first thought was for her calf. She held her head up out of the water and looked about in all directions. She did not at first see her calf, because it had been swept several rods down stream and was struggling in the water. The mother at length observed this with dismay. Instead of making for the opposite shore, as all the other animals had done, she turned down toward her offspring, swam below her calf, and the current drove the young animal up against the protecting bulk of the mother. Then the mother started for the shore, the calf swimming along side of her in comparatively calm water. Some progress was made in this way, but about the middle of the stream, the current striking the calf in the fore quarter, swept it aft of the cow and floundering down stream. The mother once more went to the rescue. She had to swim clear around to the other side of her calf, and in this done she had to steady herself in the stream, until the calf was once more safely against her side. Instead of following former tactics, the mother cow actually spoke to her calf. Seeming to squat low in the water, she gave a low bellow, which was comprehended by the young animal. At any rate the calf sprang upon its mother's back, and the veteran animal then swam to shore, and deposited her offspring in safety on dry land.

Gardens in the Desert.—At El Oued (an oasis in the Sahara) the gardens are all dug out of the sand. Some of them are as much as forty-five feet deep, and they contain hundreds and thousands of palm-trees. The sole industry of the entire population, including camels and donkeys, is directed toward one thing, and is summed up in one operation; namely, that of scraping out the sand and carrying it up from the gardens. All day long and all their life long, the inhabitants do nothing else. One week's neglect would render these wonderful gardens useless, for the insidious sand is ever encroaching; and, more relentless even than the ocean around Holland; it invades from the air as well as from the land. The palm trees growing at the bottom of these sunk gardens and rearing their green crests high into the sunlight, when seen from afar, present the singular appearance of being flat bunches of verdure lying on the sand. In some abandoned gardens were observed the derelict palms still struggling valiantly for their lives, buried up to their throat in sand, like some gallant swimmer in a wide sea. But, like the swimmer, the palms were doomed unless man came to give them a helping hand.—Christian Union.

Alloys of Gold.—Some of the alloys of gold with aluminum have most brilliant colors of ruby and purple tints.

Horse Flesh.—The use of this article for food has much increased in France and Holland.

BE HONEST.—The motto of Dr. Cuyler ought to be written in letters of gold—"No one was ever lost on a straight road." It is the crooked road that leads men into trouble. Honesty in business makes a soft bed to sleep on. A dying man referring to his property, said, "It is not much, but there is not a dirty shilling in it." Men have made piles of money, but how much dirty money will judgment find in it? Is your money clean money? "He that walketh uprightly walketh surely." The man that cheats and defrauds and takes short cuts will sooner or later come to grief, and he ought to.—Selected.

A Word for the Friend.

I was comforted in reading the address of Mary Ann Kely in THE FRIEND of Third Month 12th.

The things which are past, when brought fresh to mind in the Spirit and life in which they were written, reach to the witness in our own hearts, kindling the spark of life that may lie somewhat dormant. How quickly it arises when touched by the sound of the voice of the Lord.

The voice of the Lord crieth aloud to us to be ambassadors of his glory; will He spare not his tender chastening until every heart is touched with the deep baptizing influence of his love, that the water of everlasting life may cover every heart. And that we who profess to be followers of the Lamb of God may be enabled to journey before Him in true humility and with the reverence due unto his Holy name.

I desire to be counted in with that little select company of the chosen servants of the Lord who are covered with the mantle of heavenly love. Here and there are persons, hid from the gaze of the lofty and high-minded, abiding near their Lord and Master in deep humility of spirit, where the word of the Lord goes forth with life and faith to the overflowing of the Father's love. Such as these need not words to express their feelings one to another; for like will mingle with like, through the spirit of all life, even that spirit of love, that proceeds from the great Head of the Church, Christ Jesus, the Lamb of God. Then there are a few names gathered together here and there in this wilderness of time enjoying sweet communion with the Spirit of the ransomed and redeemed of the Lord. But when the veil is a little removed, and the eye rests on the large space that surrounds on every hand, deep sorrow covers my mind, and a desire arises unto the Lord who has placed us here to be messengers of his love.

Behold the broken-down hedge that now surrounds our once favored Society! The time will come when the broken-down hedge will be repaired by the great power of God our Saviour, and the walls thereof will be rebuilt by ready hands, and willing hearts, that are filled with wisdom and the love of God.

Great is the Holy Spirit that reigns in the hearts of the faithful servants of the Lord. The Children of Israel were preserved, fed, and clothed, in the wilderness. "The cloud covered them by day, and the appearance of fire by night." All things are possible with God, to-day as well as formerly. So let us as a Society raise our hearts, bowing low before God in humble subjection to his every command, that the outpouring of the Holy Spirit of God may be our help and strength day by day, that we may fill up our mission here on earth, and be enabled to join that innumerable company of Angels, that surround the Throne of God. Then let us be of good cheer and press forward overcoming through best help every barrier that is set in our way, that the Crown may be sure at the end of our earthly race.

Worldliness in the Church.—An article appeared in The Christian Advocate of Fifth Month 19th, defending the wisdom of the restrictions placed by the Methodist Church on certain forms of amusement—such as the theatre, dancing, &c. It says, "The greatest impediment in the way of the progress of our Church to-day is its own worldliness."

Rabbi Lichtenstein.—The Hebrew Christian relates the manner in which this man, who for forty years had performed the duties of an orthodox Jewish Rabbi, became convinced of the truth of Christianity. He had often spoken against the New Testament, a copy of which in Hebrew he had taken from one of the teachers in his congregational school. This book had lain unread for over twenty years in his study, till one evening, being troubled with the unreligious state of many of his brethren, he opened and read it. The effect, he thus describes: "I felt myself strongly, wonderfully fascinated; a brightness, a flash of lightning passed through my soul. As though an electric shock had opened my blind eyes, I gazed with astonishment into the future."

He published in quick succession three pamphlets in German; and in consequence a fierce storm of persecution broke out against him. The Synod of the Rabbies in Budapest called on him to withdraw his statement regarding Christ and the New Testament, or to be baptized and thus leave his congregation. Failing in this, they tried, unsuccessfully, to induce his congregation to dismiss him.

He considers it as his main work, to remove the prejudices and ignorance of the Jews, which prevent them from reading the New Testament, and coming to a knowledge of Christ.

Gambling.—Repeated complaints having been received at the New York Post Office of the loss of letters, occasioned investigation and the conviction of Robert L. Klune, a man of thirty years of age, who had been in the Post Office three years. The amount is not known, but he confessed to having stolen a large number of letters. The use to which the money was put was made evident by the finding upon his person of racing cards for entries at Gutenberg and Gloucester, together with a large number of pool tickets.—New York Evening Post.

During one week the Oakland (Cal.) police seized one thousand Louisiana lottery tickets, and they were still in the possession of the police when the monthly drawing took place. Not one of the thousand drew a prize, not even an approximation.—Oakland Enquirer.

W. K. Spencer, pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Adrian, Mich., announced to his congregation, that on the previous evening he had made the round of the principal saloons and gambling places of the city disguised, and at each had found members of his congregation.—New York Sun.

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 25, 1892.

OUR valued Friend John S. Stokes, who for more than twenty-five years acted as publishing agent for THE FRIEND, having been removed from earth, and gone, as we reverently believe, to inhabit one of those mansions in heaven prepared by the Saviour for those who have been his disciples on earth. The contributors to THE FRIEND have appointed in his place our Friend Edwin P. Sellow, to whom, hereafter, all moneys due the paper, and all communications connected with its business concerns may be forwarded.

Articles designed for insertion in its columns, and other correspondence relating to the editorial management should be sent to the Editor, Joseph Walton, Moorestown, Burlington Co., N. J., or, at the option of the sender, may be left at the city office, No. 116 N. Fourth Street, Philadelphia.

The editor of a paper like "THE FRIEND" has frequent opportunities of observing the different impressions which the same events or the same expressions produce on different minds—a difference partly due to the different mental characteristics of individuals, and partly to the differences in their experience and surroundings.

As an illustration of this, we refer to a description of a Trappist Monastery in Iowa which appeared in "THE FRIEND" of Third Month 5th, of the present volume. The editor admitted it to our columns because he thought it would convey interesting information to some of its readers, but without any intention of endorsing the unnatural and (as he believes) unwholesome system of discipline therein described. A Friend whom he greatly esteems has since expressed some uneasiness with the article, thinking it conveyed some commendation of the monkish system. If there are any others who have regarded it in the same light, we desire to assure these, that we have no sympathy with a system which so largely ignores the natural gifts and attributes of man; cuts off its inmates from the opportunities of doing good to others; and by its systematic and absurdly-prolonged religious exercises tends to create an undue dependence on them.

The effort to shut out Satan by enclosing monks and nuns in cloisters will never be successful. If these are exempted from some temptations, they are exposed in a greater degree to others peculiar to their situation, for the Enemy of man knows how to adapt his snares to every state in life, and there is no safety but in feeling the power of God preserving us from evil and guiding in the way of peace.

Again, in the narrative of the proceedings of our late Yearly Meeting published in THE FRIEND, the sentence occurs—"Religion is not founded on the Bible but upon the revelation of the Spirit of Christ, by the aid of which holy men of old wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."

An esteemed Friend, while endorsing the truth of the statement, has expressed to the editor, a feeling of uneasiness, lest it should be so understood by persons of other denominations as to convey to them an erroneous impression of the high value set upon the Holy Scriptures by the Society of Friends.

There would seem to be little danger of such an effect being produced amongst our own members, for the Discipline and Advice of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting sufficiently show the esteem in which we hold the Bible.

The sense in which the word "religion" is used in the sentence criticised, is the primary one, defined by Worcester as follows: "An acknowledgment of our obligation to God as our Creator, with a feeling of reverence and love, and consequent duty or obedience to Him; duty to God and to his creatures; practical piety; godliness; devotion; devoutness; holiness." In the elaborate "Cyclopedia of Religious Knowledge," edited by Philip Schaff and founded on the German work of Herzog and others, a similar definition of the word is given—"Religion means the conscious relation between man and God, and the expression of that relation in human conduct."

Worcester gives as a secondary meaning of the word—"A particular system of faith and worship"—as when we speak of the Hindu religion, the Jewish religion, &c.

We suppose there is no well-informed Friend who would deny the truth of the assertion, that "the heart-changing power of Divine Grace, which is a revelation of the Spirit of Christ to the soul, is the foundation of religion, in its primary sense—the sense in which the Apostle James used the word when he said, “Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world.”

GEORGE FOX, in describing the experiences by which he was prepared for the service to which he was called, mentions the leading doctrines of Christianity of which he was convinced, and adds: “These things I did not see by the help of man, nor by the letter [of the Bible], though they are written in the letter; but I saw them in the light of the Lord Jesus Christ, and by his immediate Spirit and power, as did the holy men of God by whom the Holy Scriptures were written.”

So William Penn declares—“the unmortified Christian and the heathen are of the same religion.” Isaac Pennington constantly uses the term with the same meaning. In a letter to Nathaniel Stoner, he says—“There was no true religion in the Apostle’s days, without turning to the inward light, and to that the true ministry was sent to turn men; nor is there any true religion now, without being inwardly turned to, and walking in the same light.”

In another letter he uses this language—“The sum and substance of true religion doth not stand in getting a notion of Christ’s righteousness, but in feeling the power of the endless life, receiving the power, and being changed by the power.”

On another occasion he writes—“This is our religion: to feel that which God begets in our hearts, preserved alive by God; to be taught by Him to know Him, to worship and live to Him, in the leadings and by the power of his Spirit.”

In the 72d letter of the edition published by John Barclay, I. P. says—“I freely confess, all my religion stands in waiting on the Lord for the riches of his Spirit, and in returning back to the Lord [by his own Spirit, and in the virtue of his own life], that which He pleaseth to bestow on me. And I have no faith, no love, no hope, no peace, no joy, no ability to anything, no refreshment in anything, but as I find his living breath beginning, his living breath continuing, his living breath answering and performing what it calls for.”

Perhaps these illustrations may be sufficient to show that it is in accordance with both the Scripture and Quaker precedents to speak of religion as “founded on the revelation of the Spirit of Christ.” But we can go further, and express our belief that a true understanding and knowledge of the doctrines of Christianity must come from the same source, and not from the intellectual study of the Scriptures. William Penn declares that “the Light of Christ within, as God’s gift for man’s salvation, is as the root of the godly tree of doctrine [held by Friends] that grew and branched out from it.” And Robert Barclay, in describing the manner in which he came to be convinced of the truth of the doctrines held by Friends, says it was not “by strength of arguments, or by a particular disquisition of each doctrine, and conviction of my understanding thereby;” but by being secretly reached by the life [of God]; for when I came into the silent assemblies of God’s people, I felt a secret power among them, which touched my heart, and as I gave way unto it, I found the evil weakening in me, and the good raised up, and so I became thus knit and united into them, hungering more and more after the increase of this power and life, whereby I might feel myself perfectly redeemed. And indeed this is the surest way to become a Christian, to whom afterwards the knowledge and understanding of principles will not be wanting, but will grow up so much as is needful, as the natural fruit of this good root.”

So, also, Isaac Pennington bears testimony against depending on that outward knowledge of the Scriptures which the natural understanding can gather and grow rich by; and he said to the professors of his time—“Ye must come out of the knowledge and wisdom ye have gathered from the Scriptures, into a feeling of the thing there written of.”

A man may gather from the Bible certain notions about conviction for sin, repentance, forgiveness, peace, &c.; but until he has had some practical experience in himself of these processes, he has no real knowledge of what the words mean. But when the power of God comes into his soul, and makes him feel his sinful and miserable condition; and under this Divine influence a sincere cry is awakened of “God be merciful to me a sinner;” and this is followed by a sweet sense of forgiveness and peace; then he has some practical knowledge of religion. Before that, his reasonings on the subject are like those of a blind man arguing on the nature of light.

LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

When the subject of American Correspondence was before the meeting the Clerk referred to the unwillingness manifested by some Friends to serve on the Epistle Committee. In the remarks made by several of those who spoke on the subject, it appeared that one ground of the objection was, that by sending Epistles to certain Yearly Meetings and not to others, London Yearly Meeting practically passed judgment on the position of bodies, without sufficient knowledge of the circumstances of the different cases. An extract from the editorial in The British Friend says:—

“The late Yearly Meeting was, in its very early days, brought once more face to face with what may be called the Epistle difficulty. Probably a considerable majority of the Friends in England object to the present method of conducting and maintaining correspondence with certain Yearly Meetings, for various weighty reasons. Among others, it is often felt to be formal and attended with little life. Further than that, the plan is felt to be invidious, since we do not correspond with many bodies of Friends with whose religious views and practices we are in far closer sympathy than with some to whom we now send regular Epistles.”

“Some Friends who have visited America give us to understand that there is another reason that weighs strongly with some American meetings, in desiring that we should maintain this correspondence on the present lines. It is said to be valued for the status that it gives among the various bodies in America, who call themselves Friends. London Yearly Meeting thus becomes in a sense the guarantee of the Quaker orthodoxy of those bodies with which we correspond. We venture to say, a stronger reason for discontinuing the practice could scarcely be found. London Yearly Meeting has many duties and responsibilities, but it is not called upon to give its pledge for the genuineness and consistency of what is called Quakerism in America.”

Many Friends desired a change in the practice of the Yearly Meeting in reference to correspondence, and some suggested that a single Epistle, with perhaps short added paragraphs appropriate to the state of the different meetings, should be sent to all. But after considerable discussion the Clerk decided that there was not enough unanimity to warrant the adoption of that plan, and the former custom was pursued.

The Ulster conference of oppositoinists to Home Rule at Belfast, was the great event of the past week. Its success is admitted by everyone. It was of course more or less of an electioneering movement, but it was admirably managed. The volcanic energy of Mount Vesuvius shows no sign of abatement. A most magnificent sight is presented in the Arrio del Cavallo, the valley between the two summits. Monte Somma and Vesuvius project the lava ejected has formed an immense bridge across the valley and it is constantly gaining fresh access. The lava glows with a white heat and at night the bridge is magnificently beautiful. Hundreds of persons from Naples daily ascend the mountain by means of the railway to look at this fiery spectacle. A new explosive mouth has opened on Monte Somma. The centre of the principal crater shows increased activity and huge masses of lava are frequently ejected.

A dispatch from London says: The mortality from cholera at Meshed, Persia, has reached four hundred daily. Business is completely suspended. The Persian Government has ordered that a military cordon be placed around Teheran at a distance of forty miles from the city. The Russian Government is taking rigorous and extensive measures to prevent the entry of cholera into Russia, and has persuaded the Amerer of Bokhara to cleanse his capital and put it in a sanitary condition. The sanitary operations nearly caused a native revolt, and the Amerer had to threaten beheading as the penalty for non-compliance with the new regulations.

What is believed to be the largest arctite ever known to have fallen is lying in the Caspian Sea, a short distance from the Peninsula of Apsheron. The arctite made a terrific noise as it rushed through the air with incredible speed, and the white hot mass made a light that illuminated the country and sea about for a great distance. Those who saw it, says a cable dispatch, were struck dumb with consternation. When it struck the water immense clouds of steam rose up, and the hissing sound heard for a great distance. Huge masses of water were thrown upward, and the sight to those who were not frightened was a most beautiful one. So enormous is the arctite that it projects twelve feet above the water, and save for its black crust, which gives it the appearance of being one of the usual rocky formations met with along the coast. Scientists are deeply interested in the phenomenon, and a number of them are making preparations to visit the peninsula to examine the arctite.

WANTED—A teacher, man or woman, as Principal of Haddonfield Monthly Meeting School. The locality is thought a promising one for an energetic teacher.

Application may be made to
S. SAMUEL A. BACON,
SARAH NICHOLSON,
Haddonfield, N. J.

—, on Fifth Month 10th, 1892, at the residence of her brother Joseph H. Branson, Media, Delaware County, Pa., MARY E. BRANSON, in the thirty-sixth year of her age, a member of Haddonfield Monthly Meeting, Ohio. She bore a lingering and suffering illness with much patience and resignation, and her relatives and friends have the comforting belief that she was prepared for the final summons.

DIED, Second Month 10th, 1892, MARY J. CALLEY, wife of her age, a beloved member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Western District. The family of her grandfather, Elias Jarrell, residing in the neighborhood of Motherkill Meeting-house, Delaware, was the only one remaining steadfast with Friends after the separation of 1827. She was in her youth accustomed to worship in the meetings gathered in his house, and has often spoken of them as precious seasons which have benefited her soul. Being very early convinced in early life, she was led to take up the cross and yield her will in obedience to her heavenly Father. Many times she has been heard to say, "Earth has no happiness in comparison with that of a soul filled with the love of God." The many trials which she has borne, her pathway are alluring temptations which have been met by her prayer. "Pray to your heavenly Father to make you good children. You must die, and may at any time." After her marriage she would sit with her little family on First-days for worship and would gather the children to the neighborhood that they might learn the Christian religion. Her father, who was a school grew up under her care, which knowledge by her father was a blessing to their lives.

Having removed from Wilmington to Philadelphia a few years since, she continued steadfast in the doctrines and testimonies of Friends. Through her last suffering illness she was enabled to maintain that Christ-like spirit which characterized her life. "Keep to the simple faith," she would say, "for there is a recompense of reward in that." Among her last sayings she told her family "not to grieve, rather rejoice. All is well. Praise the Lord." Having asked once more to see the beautiful sunset, she passed quietly away while the sun was shining brightly.

—, suddenly, on the 7th of Sixth Month, 1892, at his residence, from an injury received by the fall of a piece of timber from a cart, DANIEL M. MOTT, a beloved member and minister of Plymouth Particular and Monthly Meeting of Friends at Washington Court, Ohio, in the seventieth year of his age. This dear Friend manifested from early life a religious concern for the support of the doctrines, principles and testimonies of our religious society, and by submitting to the heart-changing power of Divine grace, a gift in the ministry was conferred upon him in the year of 1851. In the exercise of this gift he continued faithful, being acceptably engaged, both in testimony and supplication at the last meeting he attended, three days before his death, earnestly pressing upon his hearers the necessity of being prepared for death if it should come upon them in the night. He labored to minister in the ability which God giveth. And although so suddenly called away we reverently believe that through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus he has entered into everlasting rest.

—, at her residence in Chesterfield, Ohio, on the morning of the 15th of Third Month, 1892. ANN SMITH, a beloved Elder and member of Chesterfield Monthly and Particular Meeting of Friends. This dear Friend manifested an earnest concern for the welfare of our beloved Society, and while health permitted, was diligent in the attendance at all our meetings and although unable to converse during her last illness, from some remarks previously made by her, it is thought that death was not an unlooked for messenger, and there is comfort in believing that she has been gathered as a shock of corn full ripe into the heavenly garner.

—, a resident of Woodland, Northampton County, N. C., on the 14th of Second Month, 1892, THOMAS S. HOLLOWELL, aged fifty-five years, a member and Elder of Rich Square Monthly, and Cedar Grove Preparative Meetings. This dear Friend was a regular attender of meetings, and loved the principles set forth by our early Friends. He was during a greater part of his life, a resident of Wayne County, but moved with his family to Northampton just six years before his death, and settled close to his meeting, and seemed to enjoy both Friends and Meeting, and would exhort to his family that it felt the need of a Quaker Meeting. His religious and progressive spirit is attested by a letter which he had written at Cedar Grove as it had at some Meetings. He had been in delicate health for two years, caused by prevailing influenza, which resulted in consumption, but he had great hopes of his recovery until a week of his departure, when he remarked to his wife that he felt his work was nearly done, and his wife that he felt how he felt about his future, he replied that he felt nothing in his way; would be willing to live for her sake. He breathe it his last as quietly as he had lived, without sign of pain, and we believe our loss is his eternal gain.

CONVERSION.

The Christian never wearies of tracing the hand of the Lord in that wonderful process, in which man is turned from death unto life, and from the power of Satan to the power of God. Whatever outward means may be employed, the love of God is the moving cause, and his omnipotent power is that which effects the transformation of apostate man from a state of nature to a state of grace.

In the autobiography of William G. Schauffer, there is a curious and instructive narrative of the conversion of a man who resided at Odessa on the Black Sea. W. G. S. says:—

"He was a hard drinker, noted for his physical strength, acknowledged to have no match among the rowdies of Odessa. If in a quarrel among drunken fellows he took hold and interfered, friends and foes cleared out, for there was no telling whom he would fling against the wall, or upon whose head he would smash a chair or a bench. I remember distinctly, how once, as I stood behind my table, holding the meeting in my brother's house, Alber came in. I was astonished. That man I never expected to see there. But he came again, and appeared immediately and wonderfully changed. The very next time he brought his wife with him, and both of them continued to enter right into the fellowship of the brethren and sisters, and are now bright examples of sterling, honest, active, piety, and a blessing to thousands in South Russia.

But what brought him to the meeting? There was at Odessa an impostor, professing in a secret, private way, to know how to disenchant hidden treasures. On the shores of the Black Sea, between Odessa and the village of Lustdorf, there are deep caverns, and that impostor succeeded in making several men believe that there were hidden in one of these caverns a thousand little sacks of gold. They had been hidden there by three souls now in purgatory, and their affections being set on this gold, they could not leave purgatory, unless redeemed by the saying of certain prayers. While they were thus bound and tormented in purgatory, a black dog, in reality the devil, was lying upon the gold, and thus the gold was enchanted; but as soon as these souls were released, the devil would be obliged to leave the money, and then it could be taken by any one. Ideas of this kind were not uncommon even among the Protestant Germans, in some places, and there exists a book of prayers by which ghosts can be laid, and hidden treasures which they guard can be taken.

Now the dupes of that impostor joined him in going out into one of those caves, in the inner depths of which the money was supposed to be, and there, by the light of consecrated tapers, they read those prayers for days, while all that time the impostor sponged from them as much money as he could. At last, when the game could no longer be continued in that way, he said, "Well, now we are very near our object, now we must have another man to join us; but it must be one who is not afraid of the devil." They consulted among themselves who to invite, and concluded if there was a man in Odessa who was not afraid of the devil it was Alber. One of these dupes of the impostor came to him quite privately, and confided to him what they were about, and that they were near accomplishing the thing, and needed a man who was not afraid of the evil one. A few more prayers were to be read, and then they must go into the inner cave and drive away the black dog, who would, perhaps, go with but ill grace, and the money could be taken. A share in a thousand bags of gold was an attraction to Alber, who was always in trouble about money. Ignorant enough in religious matters, he was ready to believe the whole story. "Afraid of the devil I am not," he said, "but I don't know about it; I don't like the thing." The other one urged the matter, and finally Alber consented to go, and they went.

The reading of disenchanting prayers was now resumed, but somehow there was always some reason, why the thing did not succeed. When urged for a reason, the manager of the enterprise declared that some of those engaged in it must have sins on their souls that were not yet cleared away, and so he would collect more money from them, promising to have masses said for their benefit. While all this was going on, the man who first invited Alber came to him. "Alber," he said, "I have been thinking of a thing that might do us good in our undertakings; there is Schauffer, you know, who has meetings in his house twice a week, and his brother who is a missionary, has come from Constantinople, and he holds the meetings now, and I thought we might go there a few times, and then, perhaps, get rid of our sins." "Meeting?" Alber said. "What is that? What do they do there?" "Well, they read the Bible and sing and pray together, and the missionary explains the Bible to them. They are very nice, pious people; nothing bad is done there." "Well, I will go. You may come at the proper time and take me along," said Alber. At the appointed time the man called, and they came into the meeting, as previously stated. The other man I never identified. "I went off from the meeting," said Alber when afterwards telling about it, "without having understood a single word of all that was said, sung, or prayed, but I felt all over, that such a meeting was a right good thing, and that, anyhow, I should continue to go, and I said to my wife when I came home, 'Wife, those meetings are splendid things and the next time you must go along with me.' 'Very well,' she replied, carelessly." And to the very next meeting Alber brought his wife, and I noticed them as they came in.

But to bring the treasure story to a close. Their proceedings continued, even when Alber had begun to come to the meetings, where he was to get rid of his sins, and really did get rid of them. They read a few times more, and as the impostor saw he could hold his dupes no longer, he said, "The next time we shall finish." Once more they met. When the prayers were read, the impostor said, "Now, Alber, is your time; go and drive the black dog away from the treasure." And Alber went, void of fear, into the inner cave. "I went in," he said, "and all was desolate, waste dark; no gold, no dog was there. The feeling came over me that the whole was devilry, with which I must have nothing more to do." He went out to his fellows, who anxiously awaited him. He dashed the consecrated taper to the ground, and said, "I tell you, fellows, this whole business is of the devil, and I will have nothing more to do with it." And he started for the daylight.

Now conviction of sin took hold of the strong man, and so deep was his sense of guilt, that it threw this Samson helpless into his bed. His whole life passed before him in all its d-formity and guilt. While in this deep inward conflict the man who had induced him to take part in the treasure-digging enterprise called, in order, if possible, to get him back; for, as men once fairly caught in these delusions never get disabused, so these men continued their incantations. "No," said Alber, "never again; the thing is wrong, and, besides, I am quite ill." "But what is the matter with you, Alber?" "What is the matter?" do you ask? Don't you know what sort of a life I have led? Isn't that enough to sink a man to hell?" "Oh, now, you are superstitious; you have got into those strange religious notions; you see those people up there at Schauffer's are crazy about these things, and they have really turned your head, it seems; but this is all nonsense, No, no! Cheer up, Alber, and join us again, for we shall yet have the thing, no doubt, and we will laugh at those fools when we have got it." Now Alber's wrath was kindled. "What! you came to me when you wanted me to go there for your wicked object, and told me they were excellent, pious people, and all that, and now you come here to tell me that they are superstitious, crazy, and the like; if you don't clear out in a hurry, I shall get up from my bed and pitch you out of my house head foremost."

The fellow left, and was seen in Alber's house no more; but poor Alber sank back upon his pillow, overwhelmed with guilt. "Is this my repentance," he groaned, "thus to fly into a passion just in the old way? Woe is me, for I am undone."

I heard of Alber's sickness, and went to see him. It was easy to perceive what was the matter. He was cut down in deep contrition, but the gentleness of the lamb was already perceptible amid the dying agonies of the lion. He was soon relieved, peaceful, happy, gentle. It was delightful to see him.

From the "BRITISH FRIEND."

Thomas Lawson.

Among the very earliest converts to the doctrines preached by George Fox, the name of Thomas Lawson must not be forgotten. He became noted, not only for his scholarly writings and learned gifts, but attained to no mean reputation as a botanist and herbalist. A certain amount of mystery seems to hang over Lawson's parentage and place of birth; but amongst his descendants in the female line (his only son not surviving him, but dying at the age of fourteen), there rests a tradition, which probably is well founded, though unfortunately it is not actually authenticated, that he was the younger son of Sir Thomas, and Ruth, Lady Lawson, of what dwelling-place we are not told.

He was undoubtedly a member of a family of good position and influence in the Established Church, who, doubtless, were much inflamed against him for his secession from their ranks; and it is not to be wondered at that he himself has left no record of or any member of, or circumstance relating to his former circle of friends. The veil between us so effectually held that we know not even where Lawson was born, or where any of his family lived.

He was born, we can state with a certain amount of surety, on the 10th of Tenth Month, 1630, and was educated at Cambridge, where he became an excellent scholar in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. In 1650 the Parliamentary Commissioners reported that the district of Rampside, in Lancashire, had no maintenance and no minister, and the inhabitants humbly petitioned to have a parish. Lawson was appointed rector of the place, in either that year or the year following; for in 1652 we find him, at the age of twenty-two, firmly established in his work. In Fox's Journal he relates that, being at Ulverston, he heard of Lawson as a "high sort of preacher," meaning by that, we take it, a man of high attainments and repute. George Fox went therefore to Rampside, on a "First-day," and he says that Lawson "very lovingly acquainted his people in the morning of my coming in the afternoon, by which means many were gathered together. When I came, I saw there was no place so convenient as the chapel, and therefore I went into the chapel, and all was quiet. Thomas Lawson went not up into his pulpit, but left all the time to me." It was not long after this notable service, that Lawson became convinced of the unlawfulness of preaching for hire; and at the sacrifice of all his prospects in life, and the entire friendship of his family, he left the church altogether. This determination, and his connection with G. Fox, brought him directly under the notice of the large-hearted and influential lady of Swarthmore Hall. The following letter to her, copied from the Devonshire House Collection of Swarthmore MSS., and written only a year after his conviction, shows how readily Lawson had adopted the distinct and expressive Quaker phraseology of the time. It is endorsed 1653.

DEAR HEART.—There is a pure and heavenly longing in me to dwell out of all willing and running. When I am kept still and quietly in this feeling I find joy and peace; but the enemy envies this peace, and is still tempting till he broken and my mind gone where the snares of the fowler lie. I cannot conceal from thee that herein doth the enemy prevail against me in thoughts and imaginations, in images, pictures, and likenesses—idols which he subtly sets up in my mind, and would have me bow down unto. But the Lord, in His endless love, still cries after me, witnessing against this spiritual idolatry, crying within me "not to have any fellowship with strangers, nor to enter into covenant with the inhabitants of the land;" then the Lord burneth in me. But this subtle serpent envies, willing I be anywhere but in the Light which lays open his wiles.

Dear heart, pray for me unto thy Father, that I may be kept in His counsel, in His holy fear unto eternal life.

Fare thee well, who art beloved of the Lord with everlasting love.

THOMAS LAWSON.

Margaret Fell employed Lawson to teach her daughters botany and the use of herbs, studies which every young woman of position was supposed at that time to know something about; and in the Swarthmore account-book, now preserved at Devonshire House, various items attest to the faithful performance of this duty. In the meantime, the young man made good use of the books of his new friends, for his tastes were strongly literary, and he had voluntarily cut himself off from all his early sources of culture. The next letter to Margaret Fell, betrays the eager desire of Lawson for more opportunities of learning, as well as the pinch of poverty which holds him, since he has relinquished his comfortable living. He writes from Swarthmore to Margaret Fell:—

When I was at Newcastle I had some conference with a man, something related to me in the outward, and whom I mentioned to thee formerly, and who outstrips all I have spoken with in relation to Hebrew. I inquired of the stationers concerning a Hebrew Lexicon, but they had it not, and then it was sent for to London, but not procured. So I ordered of a man, if he had one, and he had, and shewed it me. I was desirous to buy it, but he said he was not willing to part with it, not knowing how to procure another; yet if I sought after that language he would let me have it, for he so much loved any who sought to study it. Now I had little money left, so I borrowed ten shillings of Thomas Turner, and bought the Lexicon. If thou see how it may be had out of the general fund, I would gladly have it paid to Thomas Turner if he would gladly have it. In the hands of Edward G. I found a book, which is for the Greek Testament, as the other is for the Hebrew Bible. He let me have it for five shillings, which it cost him, and he would spare me for the money a while. If it please the Lord to give me an abode on the earth I know I may do service therewith.

The project which Lawson had here in his mind, and which he successfully carried out, was the establishment of a higher school for the sons of gentlemen. Great Strickland, in Westmoreland, afterwards became his home; and on the 24th of Fifth Month, 1659, he married Frances Wilkinson of that place. A copy of the Register at the Friends' Meeting-house, Kendal, is now before me, in which he is described as "of Naby Stones," but his occupation, parents' names and abodes are left blank. His school appears to have prospered well, being patronized by all the influential families of the neighborhood, who were able, in some instances, to prevent his being impoverished, although it is probable (see Besse's Supplies, Vol. 1, p. 176) that he was at least once incarcerated for non-payment of tithes.

The neighborhood of Great Strickland was favorable also to Lawson's pursuit of botany; and he shortly became acquainted with Ray, the naturalist, and other men of science. In Pulteney's Sketches of the Progress of Botany in England, London, 1790, it is stated that Lawson supplied the Botanical part of Robinson's Essay on the Natural History of Westmoreland and Cumberland, and that "several English plants were first introduced into notice by him." A species of Hieracium was named after him—Hieracium Lawsonii. Vill. Ray speaks of him as "a diligent, industrious, and skilful botanist;" and in his Preface to the Synopsis Stirpium acknowledges his great indebtedness to his friend, in whose hands he had placed the MSS. for criticism. To another work of Ray's, the Synopsis Methodica Insectorum, Lawson also contributed a share of assistance, though the work was not published until after his death.

It was probably during the intervals of teaching, that Lawson found time to travel extensively through England, in pursuit of his botanical observations. He left numerous MS. notes of these walking tours, now in the possession of a descendant; and it has been stated that the same plants are to be found in the self-same places as were recorded more than two hundred years ago. From these notes, as well as from letters written by Lawson to Ray, Richardson, and others, it is to be seen that he visited various districts in Yorkshire, Durham and Oxfordshire, as well as Newcastle, Clapham, Snydenham, Hackney, Blackheath, Bristol, Salisbury Plain, and the Isle of Man. "The longest journey was undertaken in 1677.

Lawson's only son, Jonah, was a pious and clever youth, who wrote verses and excelled in Latin, and who died at the age of fourteen. His father commemorated him in a pamphlet entitled, "The Serious Remembrancer," which bears on its title page the following motto:—

Non misere quisquam qui bene vixit obit.

O, be wise-hearted, knowing that beneath

We always sail towards the port of Death.

THOMAS LAWSON.

The enthusiastic botanist pursued his investigations until very near the end of his life. He died a year after Fox, and his wife survived him only two years. After her death, a former pupil, who had, at Lawson's request, given the piece of ground used as a Friends' burial-place at Great Strickland, erected a tomb, in which the remains of husband, wife, and son were deposited. This is noteworthy as being one of the very few monuments raised in the early days of Friends. An engraving of the spot, by Birket Foster is to be found in Maria Webb's book, "The Fells of Swarthmore." The Latin inscription upon the flat surface is now almost effaced; but we learn from it that Lawson died on the 2nd of Eleventh Month, 1691, in the sixty first year of his age.

He was a copious writer; amongst the titles of his books occur the following:—"A Brief Discovery of a three-fold Estate, etc." "An Untaught Teacher Witnessed against, etc." "The Lip of Truth opened against a Dawber with Untempered Mortar, etc." "An Appeal to the Parliament concerning the Pecc, that there may not be a Beggar in England." "A Treatise concerning Baptisms." "Dagon's Fall before the Ark, or the Smoak of the Bottomless Pit scoured away by the Breath of the Lord's Mouth, and by the Brightness of His Coming." "A Mite into the Treasury, etc." and "Adam Anatomized." This piece has never been printed: the original MS. of it, in Lawson's scholarly and distinct handwriting, is now preserved at Devonshire House.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Burlington Notes.

During a recent visit to Burlington, at the time of holding the Quarterly Meeting, attention was called to two very fine specimens of the Buttonwood, Sycamore, or Plane tree, (Platanus Occidentalis) situated in the graveyard, a little south of the Meeting-house. The larger of the two was 16 feet 3 inches in circuit about 4 feet from the ground, which is equivalent to a diameter of about 5 feet 2 inches. On inquiring as to its probable age, I was told that the tradition was, that these two trees were remnants of the primitive forest, and were there when the first meeting-house was built in 1683. On the Delaware bank at Burlington, there are also several Buttonwoods, one of them nearly or quite as large as its venerable relative in the graveyard. To this, it is said, in early times, vessels were fastened for security.

Amelia Mott Gummere in her narrative of Friends in Burlington says, the graveyard trees are more than two hundred years old.

There is on the main street in Moorestown, N. J., a large Buttonwood planted by a grandfather of the late Hannah Warrington, who died a few months since in the ninety-ninth year of her age. We do not know with accuracy when this was planted, but it is probably 150 years of age. Its measure, a few feet from the ground, is about 14 feet 9 inches,—so that it is about 5 inches in diameter less than the one at Burlington. If the rate of growth of the two trees was the same, the age of the Burlington Buttonwood must be somewhat overestimated—but the data are too uncertain to draw any positive conclusions from them.

The largest Buttonwood I ever saw was in the alluvial soil on the banks of the Ohio River below Cincinnati. A few feet from the ground it branched into three trunks. The whole circumference at the height of 5 or 6 feet was 35 feet. The circumference of the middle trunk alone was 26 feet 6 inches.

The Buttonwood is a common tree on the banks of our Western Rivers—and is remarkable for its white bark which separates in thin, brittle plates. To this feature in its appearance, Micah P. Flint alludes in his beautiful lines on the death of an infant sister, who was born and died as the family were descending the Mississippi:

"On yonder shore, on yonder shore,
Now verdant with the depth of shade,
Beneath the white-armed Sycamore,
There is a little infant laid.
Forgive the tear—a brother weeps—
'Tis there the faded flower sleeps."

There are five or six species of the genus Platanus; natives of Europe, Asia, North Africa, and the temperate parts of North America. They closely resemble each other being lofty trees with massive trunks, and the bark scales off annually leaving a smooth surface.

The Sycamore of England is a species of maple, which although abundant there and readily propagating itself by seed, is believed to have been introduced from Europe in the 14th century. Its wood is especially valued for fuel. The oldest recorded tree of this species is one that in the time of Charles II. was known as the "big tree." In Scotland, some of the most remarkable of these trees were called dool, or grief trees, because they were used by the powerful barons in the Western part of the country, for hanging their enemies and refractory vassals upon. One of these dool trees is said to be still standing on the banks of the river Doon, near the old castle of Cassilis. One of the most celebrated of the Sycamores is one in Switzerland, believed to be about 500 years old, under whose shadows the deputies of the country sord to free themselves from the yoke of their lords. In 1835 it measured 26½ feet in circumference at 18 inches from the ground.

The Sycamore mentioned in the Bible is still more remote (botanically speaking) from our American Buttonwood. It is a species of Fig, (Ficus Sycamorus), grows abundantly in Egypt, Syria and the East. It produces red figs about the size of an egg, but almost quite insipid. They are eaten fresh, for when dried they are tasteless, unpleasant and full of seeds. Wine and vinegar are made from the fermented fruit; and the wood has been employed from great antiquity in making mummy cases.

Burlington, N. J., is an interesting place to Friends as being the seat of one of the early settlements of our members in this county. In America, there is a decided flavor of antiquity about a community 200 years old—and the earliest minute of the Monthly Meeting established by Friends at Burlington dates in 1678. Some of the early English proprietors of New Jersey were members of our Society, and this probably turned towards the new province the attention of some of their fellow members who were desirous of emigrating from England and securing a home, even if in the wilderness, where they could be free from the annoyances and persecutions to which their religious belief exposed them in the mother country. Accordingly in 1677 a body of them, numbering 230, set sail from London in the ship Kent, and after meeting with some difficulties, entered the capes at the mouth of the Delaware, sailed up that river and settled on the meadow land below the mouth of the Assisconk Creek, and divided among themselves the land which they had purchased from its Indian owners. This settlement at first called New Beverly, afterwards changed its name to Burlington, which it still retains.

In 1681 a Yearly Meeting was established, which included not only those Friends settled in western New Jersey, but those also residing in the adjacent parts of Pennsylvania. After Philadelphia was founded by William Penn, and its population increased, the Yearly Meeting was held alternately at Burlington and Philadelphia for many years, and in 1760 it was transferred permanently to the latter place.

In looking over the graveyard I was shown the low mound beneath which was laid the earthly tabernacle once inhabited by Stephen Grellett. The remains of many other worthies have been deposited in this ground. The meeting, once large, now has but few members, and not one in the station of a minister to hold up a testimony to those gospel truths so freely proclaimed by its members in former days. The old inhabitants have finished their course and past away, and the younger generation have removed to other localities where more openings for business presented. But the same Divine power which prepared and commissioned them for the work of their day, is still able to raise up other instruments to carry on his gracious designs, for the Lord's hand is not shortened that he cannot save, nor his ear grown heavy that he cannot hear. J. W.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Extract of a Letter from John Barclay to Thos. Shillitoe.

The subjects to which thou wast concerned to call the serious attention of Friends of the last Yearly Meeting, have been deeply felt by me; and I may truly say, that nearly as long as I have been privileged by an acquaintance with the houses and families of Friends, which, though I was born a member, is not long, I have at times almost mourned at the great relaxation from Gospel strictness, and simplicity of living, so evident amongst us.

Surely I have thought if we were to cast out the crowd of opinions, which have got the first place in our minds,—opinions founded or cherished by custom, example, and education in the good, and by vanity, or something worse, in the bad; and if we were coolly and calmly to listen to the silent dictates of best wisdom, we should clearly see, that the holy principle which we profess, (to use the words of John Woolman) inevitably "leads those, who faithfully follow it, to apply all the gifts of Divine Providence to the purposes for which they were intended."

I venture to say we should then find a greater necessity laid upon us to exercise self-denial in what we are apt to think little matters, than is now often thought of; we should have such a testimony to bear against superfluity, extravagance, ostentation, inconsistency, and the unreasonable use of those things which perish with the using, as we now profess to have against the more flagrantly foolish customs and fashions of the world. Whatever some may think in regard to these things, I feel assured, that he, who in his outward appearance or behavior, bears any remnant of a testimony against the customs and fashions of the world, ought to be ashamed of himself, if he belies his avowed sentiments, by a departure from simplicity in the furniture of his house and way of living.

Will thou excuse my saying a little more, Dear Friend, on so important a subject as this has long felt to me?

I have been almost ready to blush for some, at whose houses I have been, where pier-glasses with a profusion of gilt carving and ornament about them, delicately papered rooms with rich borders, damask table-cloths curiously worked and figured extremely fine, expensive cut glass, and gay carpets of many colors, are neither spared or scrupled at.

Some indeed seem to be desirous of disguising and excusing their violation of the simplicity which their better feelings convince them they should practice, by saying, that this or the other new or fashionable vanity is an improvement on the old article,—that this gay and gaudy trumpery will wear and keep its color better than a plainer one, or that this precious bauble was given them by their relations. Thus are they endeavoring to satisfy the inquiries of those who have wise consistent plainness, and to silence that uneasy inmate, the unflattering Witness which is following them.

I have been much exercised and troubled on my own account, and on that of others, as to these matters; and have been very desirous that we may all keep clear of these departures.

THE ASSESSOR'S VISIT.

On a summer evening in ninety-two,
When the tasks of the long dull day were through;
There came an assessor from out of the town
To number our blessings and take them down.
So he questioned the farmer about his crops,
And about his lands, and 't'out at all the stops
And all the turns in the wheels of life,
From the new-born babe to the grave of his wife.
But when he got through and about to go
In came our neighbor, and he wanted to know
If he owned houses and stocks and lands,
Or crops, or products of brain and hands,
And whether of ships that sailed the seas,
Or of cargoes that rested in sheltered leas,
Or moneys and credits the wild wind brought through
He owned not any, or whether a few;
But our neighbor answered to each and all
"No, ah, no, for my treasure is small."
Then the man of the pencil commenced anew
With his list of questions and asked a few
And what was the Assessor's pride and joy
When he found our neighbor had one small boy!
His name was Rollen, and that he took
And put as carefully down in his book
As if he had been the grandest gift
That had ever dropped from the unseen rift
In the sundered skies, or that he had been
The most opulent cargo that ever came in
To the godliest port of the ocean wide
Or ever was wafted by wind and tide.
And the man was right for who knows the joy
That is landed up in a baby boy!

THE STREET CALLED "BY AND BY."

The street called "By and By" is smooth,
And down a hill it windeth;
And he who starts its crooked way,
Must cause for it his findeth.
For at the entrance is a sign—
"Here put away Endeavor;
And down the street called 'By and By,'
You reach the house called 'Never!'"

The house called "Never" stands below
A grim and ghastly tower,
Whose broken windows, shattered roof,
And rained turrets lower,
While from the casket gaunt Despair
A warning shrieks forever—
"Take heed! The street called 'By and By' Leads to the house called 'Never!'"

What matter though the way be fair,
And flowers tempt my straying,
Thou' strife be hard, and rest be sweet,
And easy the delaying;
If, at the end, I sorely find
That Hope and I must sever,
When down the street called "By and By"
I reach the house called "Never!"

THE LICHEN.

BY CLINTON SCOLLARD.

Unflinching, firm, upon the wrinkled rock
The lichen clings, the skies he void of ruth;
If thou wouldst meet uncouth life's warfare-shock,
Thus must thou cling to Truth!

—The Independent.

HABIT is a chain composed of continuous and endless links. Once formed, it resist a giant's strength. Its formation is slow, but sure, insensible, but steady. The sculptor fashions slowly the human face. The mould is not an instantaneous creation. It is a series of acts. It is the product of pain and toil. Its rough-cast costs a myriad of blows. The chisel is applied in a thousand different ways before it is polished and perfected—before it receives the requisite expression, beauty and finish. Days and months are consumed in the execution, but finally the countenance stands forth complete in limelight and indelibly graven in the solid marble. After a similar fashion every man is, either under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, or under the direction of Satan, a carver of his own moral likeness. Not a day passes but he adds some touch to the work. As Oxenden has it, "A thousand acts of thought, and will, and deed shape the features and expression of the soul—habits of malice and uncleanliness, silently mould and fashion it till at length it wears the likeness of God, or the image and superstructure of the Evil One." A consideration like this renders life solemn, and starts the inquiry, What kind of character am I habitually forming for time and for eternity?

Scripture Illustration.

"THE LORD IS MY SHEPHERD."—The illustration from the Eastern shepherd is drawn from the psalmist's own experience. We can scarcely realize its force, so very different are the conditions of pastoral life in our enclosed and cultivated farms. We can only fully grasp its force if we think of the deep solitudes in which the Eastern shepherd feeds his flocks. We drive them; we make them do the shepherd's bidding by the command of his dog; we leave them securely in the field at night. In the East the dogs protect, but never drive the flocks; there the shepherd goes before them, and they follow him, come to his call, and crowd round him for safety if danger threatens. There, there is perpetual danger from sudden torrents, from wolves and robbers; there are but rare and scanty streams, and the flocks often suffer from parching thirst. The shepherd never leaves them. When night approaches, they follow him to some safe fold,—a cave in the hill-side. Surrounded by his watchful dogs, the guardian, "keeping watch over his flock by night," makes his bed in front of the cave, on a pile of twigs and brushwood, collected within a circle of stones, to protect him from the damp, and rushes heaped upon them to give warmth. When morning comes, the sheep are counted as they pass out of the cave, and then follow the shepherd to the green pasturage belonging to the village or tribe; for these wide hills and downs are all common lands, though carefully partitioned by many a well-known landmark, between the different little neighboring communities. The shepherd will look out on the hillside for the scanty patches of green herbage, and call the flocks to partake of them. I once watched a shepherd playing with his flock. He pretended to run away; the sheep ran after him and surrounded him; then to climb the rocks; the goats pursued him; and finally all the flock formed in a circle, gamboling round him. "Thou leddest thy people like a flock, by the hand of Moses and Aaron."

Natural, History, Science etc.

Fleas in Ecuador. When E. Whymper was travelling among the great Andes of Ecuador, he found the fleas very abundant in some places. Of one apartment he remarks, "When rays of sunlight streamed in through the windows, a sort of haze was seen extending about a foot above the floor, caused by myriads of them leaping to and fro."

Volcanic Dust. It is a troublesome peculiarity of volcanic dust, that it will penetrate anywhere. The extreme fineness of the more minute particles permits it to get into places which might be deemed inaccessible. It floats in the air, travels round corners, and insinuates itself through cracks into sheltered places, and when settled in them is secure against disturbance by wind.—Whymper's Andes.

Volcanic Steam. Steam unquestionably plays a leading part in the operations of Cotopaxi, and sometimes the quantity that issues is enormous. One morning, when encamped at the distance of about sixty miles, just after day-break, we saw Cotopaxi pouring out a prodigious volume of steam, which boiled up a few hundred feet above the rim of its crater, and then was borne towards the North-east. The bottom of the cloud was about 5,000 feet above us; it rose at least a mile high, and spread over a width of several miles. I estimate that on this occasion we saw a continuous body of not less than sixty cubic miles of cloud formed from steam. If this vast volume, instead of issuing from a free vent, had found its passage barred, itself imprisoned, Cotopaxi on that morning might have been effaced, and the whole continent might have quivered under an explosion rivaling or surpassing the mighty catastrophe at Krakatoa.—Whymper's Andes.

Elephant's Sagacity.—A work describing the Tinnevely Missions gives an amusing account of an elephant acting as detective. An attendant was in charge of a trained elephant, which was used to draw in timber for the erection of buildings at the station. This man was suspected of stealing grain, but nothing could be positively proved against him, and he strenuously rebutted every accusation. But on one occasion his employer's wife felt sure that the rice given out for the elephant's food was deficient in quantity, and she charged the keeper with the theft. He was loud and emphatic in his disclaimers. But he meekly stood too near his intelligent beast of burden. Suddenly the elephant extended his trunk, and, before the man was aware, his baggy waist cloth was unfastened and a shower of rice fell to the ground. In the very middle of his protestations of innocence he was fatally incriminated.—Cassell's Saturday Journal.

Field Mice.—The plague of field-mice in the south-eastern counties of Scotland is increasing in extent, and is assuming such proportions that the farmers are holding public meetings to devise new plans for fighting the enemy. In some places there is not a trace of vegetation to be found in hundreds of acres, every root and blade of grass having been devoured. Around Hawick the farmers set all their hands to work killing the mice without being able to make any appreciable impression upon their numbers. The vermin increase at a rate which seems to defy all known measures of extermination. Now, that it is too late, the farmers have resolved to kill no more owls, having learned at least one salutary lesson from their misfortune. At their latest meeting in Edinburgh they demanded the appointment of an expert commission to investigate the whole subject and devise means of relief. Mr. Chaplin, President of the British Board of Agriculture, has promised to give the matter his most earnest consideration.

Venerable Trees. A very interesting work is in course of publication by M. Gadean de Keruille on the ancient trees of Normandy. The most remarkable trees yet described are two yews of La Haye de Routot in the department of Eure. They are, respectively, about 31 and 27 feet in circumference at the base of the trunks, and about 57½ and 47½ feet high. Their ages are estimated by the author to be not less than 1500 years. A chapel has been constructed in the hollow trunk of one of these trees, about 10 feet high and 6½ feet deep.—Popular Science Monthly.

Eucalyptus Oil.—Eucalyptus oil has come into such demand that over 20,000 pounds were sent to England from California last year, the tree having been planted in immense quantities in that State. General Stratton planted fifty-five acres near Haywards in 1869, chiefly for timber purposes. In 1883 it was discovered that a decoction of the leaves would remove the incrustated scales from boilers. While the engineers were preparing the liquid they imagined the odor cured one of bronchitis, and the other of asthma, and they started a factory to extract the oil at San Lorenzo, which is said to have been the beginning of this industry.

Roofs in Syria.

The Syria of to-day is a poor land. The people are poor, and cannot send all over the earth to bring whatever they need from other lands. So they use very few nails in building houses, and almost no sawed lumber. Dirt is cheaper and easier to obtain than quarried stone; so they use dirt in making the walls and roofs.

The ordinary way here in Zahleh is to build only one, or at most two, walls of stone, and all the rest of mud bricks. The reason for one or two stone walls is that the mud bricks will not stand the winter storms. They build the south and west walls of stone, since the heavy storms always come from the south and west. If you looked at Zahleh from the west, you would see a well-built town of stone houses; but when you came round to the east, you would see nearly all mud walls, which are much poorer and more untidy. Yet the people say the mud walls are safer when earthquakes come. Our house has only one stone wall. The room in which I am writing has four mud walls, and is badly cracked in several places.

When all things are ready, and the walls are up, they go about making the roof in this way. The long poplar beams are cut in proper lengths, and lifted up by many men to their places, being ranged about two feet apart. If the beams are long and the room large, they usually put a very large beam for a girder, and support this by a stone or wooden post in the center of the room. After the beams are up, they fill in between the ends with mud and stones to keep them steady. Then they bring the branches, or split pieces, and arrange them as closely as possible, in order to keep the clay and dirt from falling down into the house. If the roof is to be a very good one, you must bring thousands of dry reeds, and place them the opposite way of the small branches or split pieces, and these help to hold the clay. Next comes the piling on of the thorns, and the trampling down to make them pack closely; and after this the roof is ready for the clay and earth. The first layer is usually wet before being put on, so as to mat more closely with the thorns. I am sorry to say that people usually choose a Sunday to do the remaining work on the roof. People are then standing round with not much to do, so the man who is building the house invites all his friends to come and help to finish the roof. They come, fifteen or twenty of them, and, with great noise and singing, they carry or draw the clay up in baskets, and trample it down by dancing over it, all the while singing and shouting. When they have put on a foot of closely pressed clay, the roof is done, and it needs only the rain and the roller to make it ready for winter. The owner of the house buys a stone roller about two and a half feet long and a foot thick, and weighing about two or three hundred pounds. To this is fitted a rough handle; and when the first rain comes, he must be very industrious by night and by day, and go up to trundle that roller back and forth many hundred times, pressing down the damp earth until it becomes very hard, and able to shed the water.

Now, the passing of this roller over the roof is like thunder, and corresponding to the rain is a showering of dust and fine clay; and this continues for years in all except the very best roofs. In many cases water comes down also, but never very clean. For when the roofs are wet and soaking, if a cold night comes, and freezes the water, it tears up the clay at a great rate. When the sun softens the frost and ice, then the roller must be used; and it is like squeezing water from a sponge.

This rolling must be done every time it rains, and it is a curious sight when the first shower comes after sunset. There is a noise of shouting, and on every roof is seen a lantern or lamp which looks like a firefly. The wooden handles creak and groan, and the people shout to each other in sport. This sometimes takes place at two o'clock after midnight, and then there is very little sleep for any one the remainder of the night.

These roofs require constant care all through the winter, and, whenever the snow falls, it must be shovelled off, and the roof given an extra rolling. The weight of the snow and the wet earth is enough to break the timbers; and not a winter passes without such calamities, in which men, women, and children lose their lives.

Nearly every roof leaks. I have seen water dropping in fifty places at once in our bedroom, at three o'clock in the morning; so that at length, at great cost and trouble, we bought tiles and covered one side of our house, so that now four rooms are under tiles, and four rooms are not. In winter we live largely in the four tile-covered rooms, and leave the others to leak, having covered the furniture with quilts and rubber blankets.

Of course, such roofs are flat, with only slope enough to carry the water off. And the uses to which these roofs are put are varied. You can easily understand how they tore up the roof in the house where Christ was, to let the sick man down. All such houses have only one story, and there is always an easy way to reach the roof. If the house is on a hillside, there is a path leading up, and the roof is accessible to chickens, goats, sheep, and children. Boys go to the roofs to fly kites. When anything happens, like a wedding or funeral, people all run up to the roofs to see what is going on. In New York, a cat on the roof is confined to one block; but in a city like Sidom a cat can go from one side of the city to the other on the roofs. The result is, many cats, many fights, many concerts, and many cats visiting your house. People use the roofs also for drying everything, such as wheat, raisins, figs, onions, and whatever needs the sun. In summer they carry up their beds, and sleep there; and it is an amusing sight to look at the town at day-break on a warm summer morning.

Any one walking over a village roof sends down a shower of dust and mud. I lived two summers in a village named Jezzin, and one of my duties before sleep every night was to shake and brush the dry mud out of my bed.

I had another experience in the same village which came near costing me many dollars. I then owned a favorite horse named Rob Roy. He was a beauty, and very tractable and gentle; but he had one fault,—he would slip his halter and go wandering away. One warm August day he rubbed his halter off, and went walking out of the yard, and, before he knew it, was on the roof of a neighbor's house. I wonder if you ever saw a horse on the roof of a house. Well, this particular roof was old and rotten, and before Mr. Rob had gone very far, his hind legs went through, and he was in a bad plight. Little boys came running and shouting, and frightened him all the more. No one came to tell me; and so poor Rob could only kick and plunge until he had made a hole so large that he dropped through into the man's house below. There never was a worse frightened horse than Rob Roy was that day. I came running to the rescue after he had disappeared, and when I ran to the door I expected to find him with broken back or legs; but there he was, standing safe, and looking as ashamed and sheepish as any horse could. Fortunately for him, he landed on a pile of clippings of grape-vines, which the owner of the house had brought from his vineyard for winter fuel. Now, if a horse could so easily get up on a roof, and so easily and safely descend to the house below, we can see how easy it was for those who will let the sick man down to where Jesus was.—Sunday School Times.

FROM THE "INDEPENDENT."

Tom: a Sketch From Life.

BY THE LATE THOMAS HILL.

After Tim's death, I was forced for awhile to try any man whom I could pick up. But I very soon settled upon Tom as always to be my first choice; and if he was engaged, then I would put up with John; they were both Irishmen; but neither of them had what are usually considered the characteristics of their nation. No wit, no humor, no exuberance of fancy or of rhetoric to lead them into bulls, or to inspire them with eloquence; and neither of them with any considerable stock of proverbs or bright sayings, or folklore of the old country.

But Tom had what was worth more, a character that won your hearty respect. He was a reverent, God-fearing Catholic; honest and incorruptible, with a high sense of honor; faithful and thorough in all that he undertook; intelligent and skillful in doing everything in the neatest and most expeditious way; with a strong personal attachment toward those who had once done him kindness. There was a farmer in our town who had the general reputation of being extremely stingy. But if anything disparaging to his character was said in Tom's presence, Tom always defended him, in temperate language, but with earnestness; and told of his own arrival in this country, and, on his first day's search for work, finding this farmer on a salt meadow gathering hay. He hired Tom, took him and his wife six or eight miles, from the salt meadow to his farm, and there gave them house room rent free for many months, and paid Tom good wages for his work besides. "He cannot be the big-gard," Tom would add, "that he is said to be."

Two little anecdotes will show the difference between Tom and John. I left both men at work in my garden one day, but had engaged Tom alone to come the next day. The following morning when I went into the garden, he met me with a sorrowful face, and led me to a flower border held clean of every kind of plant, and smoothly raked.

"I found John doing this yesterday afternoon, and I says, 'What are you doing that for?' Don't you see that those are foxgloves? And says he, 'Of course I see they're foxgloves; that's the very reason I am hoeing them up.' And ye have been in this country fourteen years," says I, "and don't ye know yet that a foxglove is a flower in this country, and not a weed, as it is in the old country? Then foxgloves is the pride of Mr. Hill's garden."

On one occasion John worked alone for me one day, and Tom alone was engaged for the next. When I went out to give him directions I found him looking with great indignation at a tall clothes-post on the edge of a grass plot. "Who set this post?" I answered that John did. "He ought to be ashamed of himself; see here," said Tom, and taking hold of the post, easily swayed it about, showing that the earth had only been rammed at the surface, leaving the foot of the pole with a play of a half inch or more in every direction. Without another word from either of us, Tom dug up the post and set it over, firm and immovable.

His regard for my foxgloves was equalled by his care for my Apocia. I confess to a great weakness for Apocia tuberosa, both on account of historic associations and of its own charms. I had abundance of it in a hedge near the house and about trellises and a piazza. It was also growing neglected in the furthest corner of my garden beyond and behind the barn. When Tom was spading up the earth in that corner, he laid every Apocia tuber which he chanced to turn up, carefully in the shade, and when the half day was over, brought them to the house, always saying: "Here are some of them paraties that I thought Mr. Hill would like to be planting nearer the house."

Only twice, as far as I can remember, did I ever get from him a glimpse of Irish proverbs, or Irish superstitions. A black cat came and took up her abode with us. There was another invalid in my family confined to the house, to whom a cat was an object of instinctive aversion; and when this strange cat glided noiselessly into the room the nervous shock of the surprise at the invasion was not only disagreeable, but very painful. I felt that the cat must go. I took him one morning in my arms and was walking out behind the barn with him, when Tom, judging, I presume, from the sad but stern expression of my face what my intention was, said: "Mr. Hill, I wouldn't kill him; I have heard old people say, 'I haven't heard very old people say, that it is not particularly lucky to kill a cat. Drive off with him two or three miles, drop him by the roadside, and drive on. Give him a chance for his life.'" I did so, and feared for weeks that he would come back; but he never did.

One day Tom asked leave to go an hour before the usual time; his nephew had broken out with St. Anthony's fire, and he wanted to take him to Pat Welch's to be cured. The next day I asked after the boy, and Tom answered that Pat Welch had said it was not St. Anthony's fire at all, but just poison from the poison ivy; so his blood would do it no good. "His blood!" I exclaimed.

"Yes," said Tom; "I am knowing to the fact that Pat Welch's blood will cure Anthony's fire; but, of course, it might do no good to the poison vine."

I asked how the blood was used; he said Welch pricked himself with a needle and smeared a drop of the blood on the eruption, and that cured it. "But," said I, "why Pat Welch's blood more than any other man's?"

Tom said he didn't know; he supposed it might run in families—the same as curing a cow that had swallowed a dribb. "Sure, he added, "I don't know if ye have the dribb in this country?"

I said, yes, plenty of them; but I never knew of a cow being hurt by swallowing one.

"Well, in the old country, if a cow is sick, and they think she has swallowed a dribb, they send for any member of one of these families, even if it is a child of only two years old; and he washes his hands and his wrists in a basin of fair water, and they give it to the cow to drink; and if it is a dribb that she has swallowed, it cures her right away; but if it is not a dribb that ails her, of course it does her no good."

Let me add to my sketch one anecdote, to show his nice sense of honor. I left the town in December, 1871, and returned from the Hassler voyage around South America in October, 1872. During my absence I left a favorite cousin, Miss C., in charge of the place and the family. In the summer she asked Tom if he could not find some one who would cut and carry off the grass, and take the grass for payment. Tom found a friend, and after they had inspected the grass, they announced that they would undertake it on those terms. Some days after the grass had been carted off Tom came to Miss C. and handed her three dollars.

"What is this for?" she asked.

"For the grass, ma'am."

"But I told you, you could have the grass for the cutting of it and clearing it away."

"Yes, ma'am; but when we got the hay made, we found there was more of it and it was better than we thought; and it is worth three dollars more than all the labor we put upon it."

"Well, Tom, you can have those three dollars. I made the bargain and I will stand by it."

"Naw, naw, Miss C.," said Tom; "that would not be right toward him that's away."

"Yes," she answered—"yes, it would, for he gave me full authority to act for him, and my bargain was thus his bargain."

But she could not induce the faithful fellow to touch the money; he shook his head, and went off saying again and again: "Naw, naw, that would not be right toward him that's away."

Faithful, honorable fellow! Would that I could feel that I had been as true to my greater light, as he to his lesser illumination. He illustrated for me in a remarkable manner a saying of my venerable and beloved teacher, Dr. James Walker, that "piety in a man of native good sense is equivalent to a liberal education."

We are strangely silent toward our best beloved. We go in and out before them, and rarely give expression to the deep love and trust which we truly feel. Some day we look upon faces that do not smile back upon. The flush of pleasure, the kindling eye, that once we could call forth by a loving caress, an appreciative word, has given way to a calm, white repose which no word of ours can break, no repentant anguish penetrate. Then we begin to cherish the memory of every happy smile, every trustful glance, every caressing word, which ever came at our bidding. Why, oh! why, do we not surround our heart's dearest with such an atmosphere of love and tenderness that, when they pass out of sight, they go only to live again more vividly in every moment of our wakeful hours,—nay, even in our dreams,—through the consecrating touch of Death? Silence toward loved ones is "golden" only when it shields from pain. Could they but know how dear they are to us! Why do we leave them to guess at it or take it for granted, when a word, a touch, a smile, would make them

"Proud to heart's content,
That all this wealth of heart and soul" is theirs, and theirs alone?

"Better Not Do It."—There are a great many persons connected with the Christian Church who if they were to put into words their experience would say something like this: "I am a consistent card-playing, wine-bibbing, dancing, theatre-going Christian."

What is worse, there are some ministers whose indorsement, both in theory and practice, they could claim for such a statement; ministers who know that they do these things, and so speak and look when the subject is mentioned as to encourage them therein. Such is the man who is constantly saying that "he would like to go to the theatre, but hardly thinks it would do in view of his profession."

Some religious papers of wide circulation speak about these things in such a way that their subscribers might curl from the papers and carry with them separate paragraphs in favor of every thing not absolutely vicious which the united sense and judgment of the spiritual churches has condemned.

An intelligent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church from the country, visiting a relative of his by marriage in one of the sea-board cities of large population, was equally astonished at what he did not see, and at what he did see. Meeting an old friend of his boyhood he said to him:

"Is Brother So-and-so a consistent old-fashioned Methodist?"

O, yes; he is a pillar in the church. Why do you ask such a question?"

"Well, he does not have family prayer, he does not attend class-meeting or prayer-meeting, he does not work in the Sunday-school, he does not do any thing but go to church once on Sunday; and he does play cards, dance, take a little wine, and go to the theatre."

There are some to whom the "does nots" of the friend from the rural district will not apply, but the affirmative side will. It is a question whether these card-playing, wine-bibbing, dancing, theatre-going Christians ever manifest any thoroughly deep piety in persuading men to come to Christ, or so testify to a personal experience as to produce in their hearers that solemn earnestness without which there is no conviction of sin. Their eyes may fill with tears at thoughts of heaven and references to Jesus and declarations of love for Christ, but unless there be a marked element of self-denial and an equally clear renunciation of the world these feelings seem as evanescent as those of the man who at 9 P. M. delivered what to the superficial seemed a thrilling appeal to sinners, then seized his hat and hurried out, saying to his wife: "Now make quick time, or the ball will be half over before we get there!"

One of the young men who had just heard him was so thrown back by this transition that he concluded that religion was after all as he expressed it, a theatrical performance.

If we should go so far as to admit that there are persons in churches where they were never taught to deny themselves in these matters, who enjoy a deep spiritual life, the case is very different with those who have had a conscience thereupon and lost it. It is not possible for one to undergo that transition he will be terribly handicapped. In view of the conspicuousness of their actions in these particulars, the opinion of them held by the world, and the natural unobtrusiveness of most of the Christian virtues, may be taken for granted that the card-playing, wine-bibbing, and the theatre-going, etc., will be known by a multitude, while the qualities that distinguish the Christian from the world will be seen by comparatively few.

There is reason to fear that the Master at the end will have many of his professed disciples. "Thou hast not been altogether with Me, therefore wast thou against Me."

It is impossible to have one foot in the strait and narrow way that leadeth unto life, and the other in the broad road that leadeth to destruction. —Selected.

Syriac Services.—An illustration of the cosmopolitan character of New York is found in the fact that a Syriac service is held every First-day afternoon at No 142 West Twenty-first Street. Most of the service is in the Syriac language, but some of the prayers are offered in Turkish. Among those who attend are Rabi Baba, a Nestorian, now in this country seeking to secure the publication of a Syriac dictionary on which he has been engaged for many years, and who was for twenty-eight years a teacher and preacher in Urumia; another is Deacon Moses, for many years also a teacher and preacher in Urumia; three others are engaged in the printing of the Syriac Old Testament at the Bible House, Astor Place. One of these latter is a Mohammedan who was converted to Christianity and obliged to flee from Urumia to Constantinople, and who now has found his way to this country.

First-day Papers.—The Law and Order League, of Pittsburgh, Pa., have been making an effort to top the sale of what are known as "Sunday papers" in that city, and have secured a decision of the court in their favor.

From a circular letter we have received; it appears that some of the papers there have determined to continue the sale on the first-day of the week of their publications, in defiance of the laws and the orders of the courts.

The circular letter referred to is an appeal to those papers not to prostitute their influence by setting an example of lawlessness to the masses. Obedience to law lies at the foundation of civil society and of civil liberty, and he who deliberately encourages its violation is one of the worst enemies of our institutions.

The Cost of War.—It appears, according to the estimates of French and German statisticians, there have perished in the wars of the last thirty years 2,500,000 men, while there has been expended to carry them on, no less than 4,000,000,000 francs, or $13,000,000,000. Of this amount France has paid nearly $3,500,000,000 as the cost of the war with Prussia, while her loss in men is placed at 55,000. Of these 80,000 were killed on the field of battle, 36,000 died of sickness, accidents, or suicide, and 20,000 in German prisons, while there died from other causes enough to bring the number up to the given aggregate. The sick and wounded amounted to 47,000,000. In the last thirty years the number of deaths has undoubtedly been shortened by their illness or injuries. According to Dr. Roth, a German authority, the Germans lost during the war 60,000 men killed or registered invalid, and $600,000,000 in money, this being the excess of expenditures or of material losses over $1,250,000,000 paid by France by way of indemnity. Dr. Engel, another German statistician, gives the following as the approximate cost of the principal wars of the last thirty years: Crimean war, $2,000,000,000; Italian war of 1859, $300,000,000; Prusso-Danish war of 1864, $35,000,000; war of the Rebellion—North 5,100,000,000, South $2,500,000,000; Prusso-Austrian war of 1866, $330,000,000; Russo-Turkish war, $25,000,000; South African wars, $8,770,000; African war, $12,150,000; Servo-Bulgarian, $176,000,000. All these wars were murderous in the extreme. The Crimean war, in which few battles were fought, cost 750,000 lives, only 50,000 less than were killed or died of their wounds. North and South, during the war of the Rebellion. The figures, it must be remembered, are German, and might not agree precisely with the American estimates. The Mexican and Chinese expeditions cost 200,000,000 and 65,000,000 lives. There were 250,000 killed and mortally wounded during the Russo-Turkish war of 1877, and 45,000 each in the Italian war of 1859 and the war between Prussia and Austria. In other wars the loss of life was relatively less which did not make either the men or money easier to part with in the more limited areas where they occurred. And this is but a part of the accounting, since it does not include the millions expended during the last twenty years in maintaining the vast armaments of the European powers, the losses caused by stoppage of commerce and manufactures, and the continual derangement of industries by the abstraction from useful employment of so many millions of persons held for military service extending from three to five years. —The New York Times.

The Race Course in England.—It is needless to speak of the train of blacklegging sharpers, ruffians and blackguards of all kinds that the turf now breeds and supports. If, in this wild whirligig of British politics power should ever come into the hands of a Cromwellian dictator he could not do the country a greater service than by passing the plow over the race-courses. He would risk his life in doing so as much as he would by turning out the House of Commons; but he would extinguish infinite vice and misery without destroying anything that was healthy, manly, or even truly national. —Selected.

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 2, 1892.

The most striking feature in the religious views of the early members of the Society of Friends (and it continues to be the case with their faithful successors) was their Spirituality—their dependence on the manifestations of Divine Life to their souls, or the power of Christ inwardly revealed,—and their redemption from trusting to any outward forms or ceremonies, or to anything which man can do by his unassisted natural powers to secure his salvation. They realized the force of those Scripture declarations, "This is life eternal, to know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." And again,—"If we walk in the Light, as God is in the Light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son, cleanse us from all sin."

We believe professing Christendom sustains a great loss, from the extent to which it has been led to regard certain forms and ceremonies as being of essential necessity to the Christian religion. The tendency of this is to lead many to depend on these outward observances, and to think they are safe, if they have been sprinkled with or dipped into water by a priest, have submitted to other ceremonies prescribed by the church organization to which they belong, have attended their places of worship, partaken of the bread and wine, and refrained from gross vices. All this and more may be done, and yet the individual never have experienced that thorough transformation through the work of Divine Grace, which our Saviour described as being born again of the Spirit, and without which we cannot enter the Kingdom of Heaven.

We by no means wish to convey the impression that Friends are the only people who are convinced of the spiritual nature of vital religion—For the "Grace of God which bringeth salvation hath appeared unto all men" and this Grace teaches its obedient recipients that is needful for them to know. But it is a favor for which we have cause to be thankful, that our education and surroundings tend to draw our attention away from merely outward things and fix it on essential truths and vital principles of religion.

We were much interested recently in a conversation with a man of education and intelligence, who had been educated in another form of religious profession, and had been convinced of the truth of the principles held by Friends, by reading Barclay's Apology. When he felt disposed to attend our meetings, one of his acquaintance endeavored to discourage him, by telling him that though the Quakers were "decent folks," they had no religion—evidently confounding in his mind, religion with rites and ceremonies, and concluding, that because we discarded the forms practiced by others, we must be destitute of religion itself. An educated man, to whom he gave a copy of Barclay's Apology to read, admitted the soundness of the views contained therein, but said, that the religion of R. Barclay was an ideal system, not practical, because a man could not live up to the standard therein laid down. This disposition, to lower the standard of religion to the average state of the people, instead of endeavoring to elevate them to the requirements of our Saviour, is often shown, and its fruits are evil. It is rebuked by William Penn in his "No Cross, no Crown." After quoting the declaration of Paul, "His servants you are whom you obey;" and John's warning, "Let no man deceive you; he that committeth sin is of the devil," he says of the false Christians, if a man ask them, "Is Christ your Lord?" they will cry, "God forbid else; yes, He is our Lord." Very well, but do you keep his commandments? "No. How should we? It is impossible; what! would you have us keep his commandments? No man can." "Thus it is," he adds, "That with Judas they call Him Master, but take part with the evil of the world to betray him."

William Penn further says,—"That common apprehension, that persons may be children of God while in a state of disobedience to his holy commandments; and disciples of Jesus, though they revolt from his cross; and members of his true church, which is without spot or wrinkle, notwithstanding their lives are full of spots and wrinkles; is, of all other deceptions upon themselves, the most pernicious to their eternal condition. For they are at peace in sin, and under a security in their transgression."

The Psalmist, in enumerating the qualities of the man who shall abide in the Lord's tabernacle, mentions among others, that in his eyes "a vile person is contemned, but he honoreth them that fear the Lord." This expression implies, that our estimation of that which is worthy of respect and imitation should be founded on its conformity to the Divine will.

In 1659, Edward Burrough, accompanied by Samuel Fisher, paid a religious visit to Dunkirk, in France, a Catholic town, at that time in possession of England and garrisoned by English troops. His principal concern seems to have been to labor with the Jesuits, priests and friars of that benighted city. This he did in several interviews with some of those highest in position—and also spread some writings among them, in which he expresses his "dear love to their immortal souls," and tells them that they and their church "are the peoples, the multitudes, and the kindreds, that the Beast hath received power over, and the Where hath sat upon, and the false prophets deceived."

He adds, that forcing and compelling of persons by any outward law and authority to be of such and such a religion, and to conform to such a way of worship, is the worship of the Beast and not the worship of God; and to kill and persecute persons for the exercise of conscience, and because they will not be of such a religion, and cannot conform to such worship, is of the Devil and Dragon, and not of God, nor according to him; and persons so made conformable by force and violent laws, to such a religion and worship are but twofold more the children of the Devil, and are not at all converted to God thereby.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The National Democratic Convention in session at Chicago, last week, chose E. C. Grever Cleveland for their candidate for President of the United States, and Adlai E. Stevenson of Illinois, for Vice-President. The platform denounces the effort of the last Republican Congress to place all Federal elections under the direct control of Federal authority—declares for a tariff for revenue only; ("the tariff is the only source of revenue for the Government") and for equal intrinsic and exchangeable value."

A letter has been sent to the Senate by Secretary Noble which indicates that he regards the act providing for the payment and adjudication of Indian depredations to be as amended as to leave it discretionary with the Secretary to determine whether or not in his last annual report, we shall find ourselves involved in trouble with the Indians, to settle which will cost the Government an immense sum of money. That recommendation which he renews in his letter, was that the bill be amended so as to leave it discretionary with the Secretary to determine whether or not the financial condition of any tribe against which judgment is obtained will justify the reduction of tribal money of the Indian funds to the judgment. The Indians, the Secretary thinks, are not yet far enough advanced in civilization to be able to be entirely self-supporting, and he does not think that, until they are, the moneys they have to their credit should be taken from them to meet these payments. In connection with his letter the Secretary transmits a list of claims numbering 7985, and amounting to $28,589,000, filed up to the time his last annual report was sent to Congress.

The Court of Claims at Washington, has given judgment for $104,620 in favor of the Pottawatomie Indians in their suit to recover $804,000 for lands.

Director Leech, of the United States Mint, says that the draft of the bill is made which authorizes the issue of a new coin of the same denomination as the coin of the Columbian Exposition next year. A design for the coin is now with the engraver, and a proof will soon be struck. The coin is to be of silver, and will be made from old silver dollars instead of bullion. The design as now thought of will be on the one side, the Administration, and on the other, the portrait of the discoverer, now hanging in the Queen's Library at Madrid.

The directors of the Westinghouse Air Brake Company, at Pittsburgh, have declared the regular 5 per cent. quarterly dividend of 5 per cent. each, making 10 per cent. in all, payable on the 10th proximo. The dividends amount to $500,000. This makes three extra dividends of 5 per cent. each, and two quarterly dividends of 5 per cent. each, or 25 per cent. in all for the first six months of the current year, which is a contribution of $1,250,000 to stockholders during that time.

According to the census made by the Moravian missionaries at Bethel, in Alaska, not less than 50 per cent. of the people are afflicted with chronic disease. Affections of the lungs take one-half of this 50 per cent., followed by rheumatism, scrofula, and heart disease. Two-thirds of the children born do not live, or rather, do not outlive their parents.

The Manufacturers' Record of Baltimore, says that during the second quarter of this year there have been organized in the South 761 new industrial enterprises, making a total of the first half of the year of 1502.

Indications point to a settlement of the granite troubles in New England.

There are said to be more bee-hives in the United States, where there are 2,500,000, than in any other country in the world.

The policy of the Gladstonians would give these men control of a helpless minority whose only crimes are their religion and their color; and would begin, and not end, serious trouble."

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 264.

A RULING OBJECT.

The Journal of Stephen Grellet contains an interesting illustration of the well-known fact that a strong and overpowering impulse so absorbs the mind that other things have for the time but little place in it.

When in Italy in 1819, after a visit to Naples, he says:—"I feel now as if I must hasten to Rome; various objects under other circumstances, might claim a few days of my time; Vesuvius displays a grand sight; in the day thick columns of smoke rise up to a considerable height; at night, they are blazing pillars. At a short distance from here are excavations made into the streets of Herculaneum and Pompeii, long buried under beds of lava, on which vineyards are now planted; but, though as a man I should be greatly interested in visiting them, they are not the objects for which my great and blessed Master has sent me to these nations. With singleness of heart I must prosecute the business to which He has called me. My bonds for Rome also feel so heavy, that I could not have any pleasure in those things, which, were I differently circumstanced, would interest me so much. It has indeed been so with me for years past. Though in the course of my travels I am among or pass near objects of great curiosity; and I have from early life taken great interest in such things, yet the discipline under which the Lord has kept me, and the weight of the religious service to which he has called me, have been such that I have not felt at liberty to turn out of my way in travelling, or to tarry longer in any place, merely to gratify myself."

William Taylor in his autobiography, gives a remarkable instance of this devotion to the work set before him, in a man whom he met with in San Francisco in 1850. It was a period especially trying on account of storms, scarcity of food and an attack of Asiatic cholera. Taylor writes:—

"In those days there came a man to that coast who seemed to belong to the old prophetic age. He was a friend indeed to all in need. He had nothing but the clothes he wore; he was a hard worker, but worked for nothing, yet he lacked nothing; and nothing was really needed, of human resources, by any sufferer in the city, that he was not ready promptly to supply.

"As quickly as a vulture could scent a carcass, that strange man would find every sick person in town, and minister to his needs, whether of soul or body. If he needed a blanket, the stranger, who was known to everybody, went at once to some merchant who had blankets to sell, and procured the gift of one for the needy man; so for the need of any article of clothing; or even a bowl of soup, he would bring it hot from the galley of some soupmaker. He was soon known as a direct express almoner, working most efficiently along the lines of human demand and supply.

"His appearance impressed me profoundly at first sight. It was one Sabbath morning after preaching in my little church on Powell Street, that I was met at the door by a tall man, wearing a well-worn suit of gray jeans, and a slouch white wool hat with a broad brim. He was lean and bony; he was sallow from exposure to the sun, and his features were strikingly expressive of love, sympathy, patience and cheerfulness. He grasped my hand and held it and wept, as though he had met a long-absent brother.

"I took him home with me and heard his story. He was a native of Central New York State. He was then about thirty-five years old, and had been devoted to the work of God among the poor, quietly, unofficially, and without pay, from his youth. He had spent many years instructing Indians in the far West, and was recognized and honored as a chief among them. Once, when his tribe was overwhelmed, and driven from their homes by a more powerful war tribe, the white chief refused to run, but hastened to meet the advancing warriors, and commanded a hearing, and dissuaded them from the further execution of their murderous purpose.

"He had great sympathy for the suffering slaves of the South, and cried to God for the overthrow of slavery. He had spent much of his time for the relief of the blacks in our large cities. When overworked in sick rooms, he would plant and cultivate a field of corn, and thus recover strength, and acquire independent means of subsistence.

"During the year 1849 and the beginning of 1850, he was laboring among the sick and needy people, white and colored, of Washington, D. C. One night, while thus engaged at the capital, the Lord, in a vision showed him San Francisco. The city of tents was mapped out before him in minute detail. He noted its topography, its few houses and many tents, and saw the hundreds of sick men as they lay in their tents and in the hospital, and saw a tall young man busily engaged in ministering to them, and the Lord said: 'Arise, arise, go to San Francisco, and help that man in his work.'

"Next morning I arose and went by early train to New York, and took passage for San Francisco. I spent, said he, 'many weeks among the sick and dying at the Isthmus of Panama, and thence got a passage in a Pacific steamer, which anchored in San Francisco harbor this morning. From the deck of the ship I recognized the city just as I saw it in vision, thousands of miles away. I knew that my man from his appearance, was a Gospel minister, and set out at once, as soon as I got ashore, to find him in some pulpit in the city. I went to four chapels before I reached yours, and waited till the minister of each came in, and I said of each, as he entered his pulpit: 'No, he is not the man I seek.' It was late when I reached your chapel. You were well on in your discourse. The house being crowded, I stood at the door and said: 'That is the man whom God showed me in vision, away in Washington City.' This is my apology for the unceremonious hearty greeting I gave you as you came out of the door at the close of the service.'

"That was my friend Alfred Roberts, the most unselfish man I ever knew. Day and night he ministered to the sick and dying of that city for many months, as only he could do.

"Then he went to Sacramento City, and devoted many months, extending in the spring of 1851, doing everything within the possibilities of human agency, for the relief of the cholera patients in the first and only visitation of that plague known in California.

"In that campaign Roberts broke down his health, and returned to San Francisco a helpless wreck of his former standard of noble manhood. I gave him shelter, and all the help he was willing to receive, and nursed him till he was able to walk round at will. Then he said: 'My work in California is done.' So two members of my church bought for him a first-class passage to New York for three hundred dollars, and he bade us a final farewell.

"After his departure I heard nothing from him for nearly three years, when I received a letter from his own hand, written in Jerusalem, Palestine. In that letter he gave me an outline of his labors during the intervening years. He said he returned to his old field of labor in Washington, but suffering the disability of poor health, he devoted some months to manual labor on a farm in his native State, and recovered the health and strength of former years.

"Then he went to England, and spent a few months in London among the sick and destitute folk. He then went to Italy, and besides the bodily relief he gave to many, he distributed among the common people a thousand Bibles and testaments. As such labors were not tolerated in those days, he was pursued and greatly annoyed by the police; but the Lord was with him, and delivered him from the hands of the oppressors.

"He went to Jerusalem, where he was still laboring among the Turks.

"When I visited Jerusalem in the spring of 1863, I made the acquaintance of Bishop Gobat, resident Bishop then under the joint auspices of England and Prussia.

"Bishop Gobat gave me a detailed account of the labors of 'that remarkable man,' Alfred Roberts, in Jerusalem. Besides relieving the sick he spent much of his time in the instruction of Mohammedan pilgrims.

"The Bishop said: 'Roberts knew no language outside of his mother tongue, but he came frequently to our book depository and got us to select the most interesting and instructive portions of the Arabic Bible and other books, and mark the pages with the beginning and ending of each stirring portion, and went with these tracts for distribution. He knew the import of every tract. He had such a remarkable insight into the character of men by a glance of his eye, that in a crowd of a thousand Turkish pilgrims he could select his orator for the occasion and enlist him, and show him how to read and proclaim to the people, and so, day by day, he had great crowds of attentive listeners. He finally worked himself down, and it was clearly manifest that his constitution was broken, and that his work was done. We all loved him as a man of God and a brother in Christ, and I fitted up for him a comfortable room in our college building on Mt. Zion, and my own daughters waited on him daily, in cheerful sympathy for him, during a lingering illness of two years, when he died in peace, and we buried him on Mt. Zion, but a few yards from the tomb of King David."

Exercises of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting Respecting Intoxicating Liquors.

Having had occasion to examine the records of our Yearly Meeting on the subject of Intoxicants, I have thought the readers of THE FRIEND would feel interested in knowing the great concern that has been felt and the advices issued and labor bestowed by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, from the early settlement of the country continuously until the present. We will find that Friends were at times under a degree of discouragement at what seemed to be a scarcely perceptible advance attending the efforts to disentangle our members from complicity in the manufacture, importation, vending, personal use, giving to others or encouraging in whatever way, the consumption of a class of beverages which at this time, occasion more crime and misery than any other cause. Yet on looking backward for a term of years, we will also find a steady improvement and real advance in the desired direction. It is probable that we do not now have a single member who manufactures, imports or vends any intoxicating liquor as a beverage; or if there be any exceptions they will be of such a manufacture or trade in cider only, giving the encouraging belief, that as we continue wisely and patiently to labor as ability is afforded, the time will come when those who may be on the stage of action, will see the skirts of the Society here, clear of a practice that the Yearly Meeting in 1777 declared at that time, "tended to the corruption and depravity of the morals of mankind, thereby increasing guilt on our country." E. M.

1687.—"It being recommended to us by the Quarterly Meeting at Philadelphia the great evil and bad effects that has appeared by selling the Indians rum or other strong liquors, and a paper being by them presented which was read amongst us relating therunto, which upon due consideration was approved of and in concurrence therewith, give forth this following testimony, being deeply sensible and heartily grieved with the abuses of this nature, that is too frequent up and down amongst us, especially in some that goes under the profession of Truth (whom it was expected should have been better examples), we fear is not wholly clear of it, and therefore we give forth this our sense, that the practice of selling rum or other strong liquors to the Indians directly or indirectly, or exchanging rum or other strong liquors for any goods or merchandises with them, considering the abuses they make of it, is a thing contrary to the mind of the Lord, and great grief and burthen to his people, and a great reflection and dishonor to the Truth, so far as any professing it are concerned, and for the more effectually preventing this evil practice as aforesaid, we advise that this our testimony may be entered in every Monthly Meeting Book, and every Friend belonging to the said meeting to subscribe the same."

In the year 1694, the Yearly Meeting adopted an Epistle to Friends, with the title, "A general testimony against all looseness and vanity in youth and others, etc." from which the following is extracted:

"We are willing and free for the good of all and for the opening the understandings of Youth, to give a Hint of Some Things that we know by our own Experience, that Truth's Testimony is against.

"As challenging each other to Run Races, Wrestling, Laying of Wagers, Pitching Barrs, Drinking to one another, Riding or going from House to House, to drink Rum or other strong Liquors to Excess; to Jest or talk Idly."

1706.—"That none accustom themselves to vain and Idle Company, Sipping and tipping of Drams and strong Drink, in Inns or elsewhere. For though such as use that evil practice may not suddenly be so far prevailed upon as to be Drunk to the greatest Degree, yet they often inflame themselves thereby, so as to become like grounds fitted for the seeds of the Greatest Transgressions, and some that have had the Example of Virtuous Parents, have from such beginnings in Corners, arrived to a shameless Excess, to the Ruin of themselves, their wives and Families, and scandal of the Holy Name by which they have been called."

1721.—"Inasmuch as peoples being hurt and disguised by strong Drink seems to be a prevailing evil, therefore when any amongst us are overtaken therewith, they should be early admonished and dealt with as disorderly persons, and it becomes the concern of this meeting to advise and caution all of our profession carefully to watch against this evil, when it begins to prevail upon them, in a general manner or more particularly at occasional times of taking it, the frequent use whereof especially Drams, being a dangerous Inlet, the repetition and increase of them insensibly stealing upon the unwary, by wantonness in the young, and the false and deceitful heat it seems to supply the aged with, so that by long habit, when the true warmth of Nature becomes thereby weakened and supplanted, the stomach seems to crave those strong spirits even to supply what they have destroyed.

"Therefore it is hoped that a due care and watchfulness against the intemperate use of Drams, and other strong liquors, will in a good measure prevent that Depravity, as also an imprudent, noisy and indecent behavior in the markets and other public places, which we earnestly advise and caution Friends to beware of, for it is degrading to us as men of civility and greatly unbecoming the professors of Christianity, the awful, prudent and watchful conduct of our Friends in early days did, and such always will preach loudly, and extend silently to the notice of the many."

In 1722 the testimony in reference to selling rum to Indians is quoted, and the following minute of advice added:

"And although this Testimony hath been since renewed by several Yearly Meetings, it is yet too notorious that the same hath been duly observed by some persons, and therefore it is become the weighty concern of this meeting earnestly to recommend the said Testimony to the strict observance of all Friends, and where any under our profession shall act contrary therunto, let them be speedily dealt with and censured for such their evil practice."

1726.—Minute of advice in Epistle:

"Likewise it having been observed that a pernicious custom has prevailed upon People, of giving Rum and other strong Liquors, to excite such as bid at vendues, and provoke them to every bidding to advance the Price, which, besides the injustice of the artifice, is very scandalous and leads to great intemperance and Disorder. Therefore it is the unanimous sense of this meeting to caution Friends against the same, and if any under our profession, do fall into this Evil Practice, or do by any means encourage the same by giving or taking Drams or Strong Liquors at Vendues or other noisy revelling gatherings, they should be speedily dealt withal as Disorderly persons."

1728.—In the Epistle to the members it is recommended to "the care of Friends that they observe Decency and Moderation in their Interments, that the becoming solemnity may not appear as a Noisy Festival, and when Wine or other Strong Liquors are served (which many sober minded amongst us think Needless), that it be but once."

1736.—"This meeting repeats the Caution of last year, against the frequent use of Drams or other Strong Drink in Families and Elsewhere, and particularly to be cautious of giving them to children, and thereby accustoming them to the Habit of Drinking such Strong Liquors."

1737.—"We tenderly caution all Friends constantly to watch against the indecent and pernicious use of Strong Drink which sometimes prevails unexpectedly, and as we cannot but observe with grief and sorrow the frequent instances of its destructive effects, not only to men's persons and estates, but also to the ruin of their children and Families, we fervently pray that all Friends may be careful not to give way to the gratifying an inordinate appetite for any kind of Drams or other Spirituous Liquors."

1739.—"This meeting also find themselves concerned to repeat their caution against the excessive use of Spirituous Liquors, and to desire the Care of the Overseers may be continued to admonish such as may be guilty of this pernicious and growing Evil."

1743.—"Twelve queries were adopted, the 2d of which reads: "Do Friends keep clear of Excess either in drinking Drams or other strong Drink?"

THE seed of grace in every man, is one in nature with the fulness that dwelt in Christ; and as this seed springs in any of us, and grows to strength and stature, it makes us conformable to his image. The more grace any man hath, the more humble, meek and merciful he is; the more light any of us have, the greater discovery it makes of what is amiss in ourselves and others; the more truth dwells in us, the less fraud and deceit is wrought by us.

SELECTED.

Travels among the Great Andes of the Equator.

Several years ago, Edward Whymper, of England, who has long been known as an enthusiastic mountaineer who had reached the summit of many of the mountains of the earth, determined to investigate more thoroughly the nature and peculiar characters of what is termed "Mountain Sickness"—a malady from which many persons have suffered—who have ascended to elevations of 15-16,000 feet. In pursuance of this resolve, he engaged two experienced Swiss mountaineers and went to Ecuador in South America, about the commencement of the year 1880.

Neither E. W. Whymper nor his Swiss helpers the Carrels had ever been affected with mountain sickness before, but in ascending Chimboraço, they encamped over night at an elevation of more than 16,000 feet. About an hour after reaching the camp, he says, "I found myself lying on my back, along with both the Carrels, placed hors de combat, and incapable of making the least exertion. We knew that the enemy was upon us, and that we were experiencing our first attack of mountain sickness.

We were feverish, had intense headaches, and were unable to satisfy our desire for air, except by breathing with open mouths. This naturally parched the throat, and produced a craving for drink, which we were unable to satisfy, partly from the difficulty in obtaining it, and partly from trouble in swallowing it. When we got enough, we could only sip, and not to save our lives could we have taken a quarter of a pint at a draught. Before a mouthful was down, we were obliged to breathe and gasp again, until our throats were as dry as ever. Besides having our normal rate of breathing largely accelerated, we found it impossible to sustain life without every now and then giving spasmodic gulps, just like fishes when taken out of water. Of course there was no inclination to eat; but wished to smoke, and found that our pipes almost refused to burn, for they, like ourselves, wanted more oxygen."

"This attack, which came upon us so suddenly, passed away very gradually, by such infinitesimal degrees that I am unable to say when we entirely recovered from it. It seemed to arrive at a maximum quickly, to remain equally intense for several hours, and it then died away imperceptibly. While it lasted, there was feverishness, marked acceleration in the rate of the pulse, and rise in body temperature. Twenty-four hours after its commencement there was a distinct improvement in the condition of the Carrels; the intensity of their headaches had diminished, and the indescribable feeling of illness had disappeared. Twelve hours earlier than this it was possible to satisfy our wants for air by breathing through the nostrils alone. At 1 P. M., Dec. 28th, I was able to keep my mouth shut during the ten minutes requisite for taking my temperature.

Thirty-six hours after the commencement of the attack, the Carrels were much better, and became eager to continue exploration. Anticipating that they might be adversely affected upon sustaining further diminution in pressure, I directed them not to endeavor to reach a great elevation, but gave no reasons for the instruction; and they, imagining that the ascent of the mountain was the first consideration, made a push for the summit. They were away nearly twelve hours, and during this time experienced reduction in pressure from 16,500 to about 15,100 inches, while ascending from 16,864 to 19,300 feet. Upon return, their condition closely approached complete exhaustion. They staggered like men in an advanced state of intoxication, and threw themselves down and went to sleep without either eating or drinking.

In reviewing the whole of our experiences, two different sets of effects could be distinguished; namely, those which were transitory, and those which were permanent,—that is to say, permanent as long as we remained at low pressures.

The transitory effects were acceleration of the circulation of the blood, increase of the temperature of the body, and pressure on the blood vessels. The permanent ones were augmentation of the rate of breathing and disturbance of the habitual manner of respiration, indisposition to take food, and lessening of muscular power. The whole of these, doubtless, were due to diminution in pressure, but the transitory ones, presumably, were produced by some cause which was itself only temporary. There are strong grounds for believing that they are due to the expansion (under diminution of external pressure) of gaseous matter within the body; which seeks to be liberated, and causes an internal pressure that strongly affects the blood vessels. While equilibrium was being restored between the internal and external pressure, the indescribable feeling of illness gradually disappeared, and headache died away; and it may be reasonably expected that these acute troubles can be escaped by taking pains to avoid abrupt diminution of pressure.

From the permanent effects there is no escape. The large increase in the rate of respiration and the compulsory breathing through open mouths were caused by involuntary efforts to make up for the decrease in the density of the air by imbibing a greater volume. It was possible without any great effort, at a pressure of 14,750 inches (19,600 feet), to sustain life, while at rest, by increasing the volume of air inspired, and thus in some measure to compensate for the reduction in its density (which was then half that of air at the level of the sea.) But when in movement it became difficult to enlarge the breathing capacity to the extent necessary to meet the further demand for air, which was the result of muscular exertion; and, notwithstanding the increased efforts which we put forth to meet this demand, there was, in all probability, a considerable deficiency in the weight and value of the amount which was imbibed."

The relation of free institutions to the moral sentiments which pervade the community is a fact worthy of much meditation. Like every other precious thing, our government of the people by the people rests on the foundation of the unseen and the impalpable. It is because men are worthy of trust that they trust each other. It is because they trust each other that they can dispense with the perpetual presence of the soldier and the policeman, and with the ceaseless interference of government with the freedom of the citizen. In Japan they have been trying to copy the free system without having attained to the free spirit, and the result may be disastrous. A native paper, devoted to the defense of the Shinto religion, says: "We have imported a constitutional machine; but we forgot to buy at the same time some moral oil to make it run." A country can make no worse blunder than to import the flowers and fruits of a free civilization, but leave the roots at home.

A Christian Invitation.

Reader: Whoever thou art and whatever may be thy present circumstance, listen for a few moments to the invitation of a fellow pilgrim, and turning from all outward things, endeavor to have thy mind fixed upon the teachings of the Spirit of Christ in the secret of thy heart. Thou art, perhaps, unaccustomed to the exercise of silent mental waiting upon God, who by his spirit speaks to the children of men in the still chambers of the abstracted soul; but it is of more importance to thee than thou canst well imagine that the ear of thy mind should be turned in listening stillness to hear, from day to day and from hour to hour the gentle admonitions of this heavenly Monitor. No situation in life, however humble or however exalted, no circumstances however chequered with joy or sorrow, can render this practice otherwise than salutary to thy soul; for in either case thou art coming to Him who alone knows the secrets of thy heart, and who will administer just that degree of encouragement or of reproof which is suited to thy condition.

Reader: dost thou doubt whether this is indeed the Spirit of Christ which thus strives with thee? Turn then to thy Bible and in the first chapter of John, ninth verse, thou wilt find that "The Word which was with God, and which was God, and by whom all things were made; is declared to be the True Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." And in the fourteenth verse of the same chapter, it is added that "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father) full of grace and truth." Now seeing that the Scriptures were written under the influence of Divine inspiration, we have here a clear and indubitable proof that this Word which was God and became flesh in the person of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, is also the True Light which lighteth every man. Doubt no longer, therefore, candid reader, the essential divinity of this spiritual light of whom it is said in the twelfth verse that "To as many as received Him, He gave power to become the sons of God," but in good earnest apply thyself every day of thy life,—and even in the midst of thy outward and lawful cares,—to this Divine, Omnipresent and Omniscient Guide. Leaving then all inferior teachers, listen with reverence of soul to the gentle whispers of this blessed Spirit; wait for its manifestations with all humility and patience, and it will from time to time reveal to thee, the will of thy Heavenly Father,—will show thee what things in thy conduct and conversation are displeasing to Him, and contrary to that purity of soul which the Christian must possess before he can enter the Kingdom of Heaven; and if thou art attentive to its reproofs, and faithfully conformest thy life to its discoveries as they are made known unto thee, it will assuredly guide thee into all Truth, as our Holy Redeemer has declared in John xvi. 13. "Howbeit when He the Spirit of Truth is come, He will guide you into all Truth, etc."

It will not, perhaps, reveal to thee all at once, the whole designs of infinite wisdom concerning thee, yet, as thou art able to bear it, and art faithful to the light already received, thou wilt receive more light; and bringing thus all thy deeds and all thy opinions to this Divine test, thou wilt be led into soundness both of doctrine and practice. "If any man will do his will said our Lord Jesus (speaking of the Father) John

vii. 17 he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God, etc."

Trouble not thyself, therefore, dear reader, with critical distinctions or verbal subtleties, only come in true faith to this Spiritual Instructor, and receive nothing implicitly as Divine Truth but that which is in accordance with Holy Writ and is sealed upon thy conscience by this unerring witness for God. Thus shalt thou be gathered from the Lo, here is Christ! or Lo, He is there! which aboundeth in the world. And sitting down under the immortal teachings of His Spirit who still teaches as never man taught,—thou shalt know an advancement in the way to Zion until thy feet are established upon Him as the Rock of Ages, the only door of access to the true fold. Continuing thus to walk before the Lord blameless, thou wilt be fed with the heavenly manna, and be privileged, during the remainder of thy earthly pilgrimage to participate with other disciples of our crucified and risen Saviour, in that gracious legacy which He bequeathed to his followers. "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you, not as the world giveth give I unto you." Compared with this sweet enriching peace, all earthly pleasures are insignificant. Happy indeed are all those who obtain this blissful portion which to the highest enjoyment of the life which is now, is adds the promise also of that, which is to come.

STRENGTH FOR TO-DAY.

Strength for to-day is all that we need,
As there never will be a to-morrow;
For to-morrow will prove but another to-day,
With its measure of joy and sorrow.

Then why forecast the trials of life
With much sad and grave persistence,
And wait and watch for a crowd of ills
That as yet have no existence?

Strength for to-day—what a precious boon
For earnest souls who labor!
For the willing hands that minister
To the needy friend and neighbor!

Strength for to-day! that the hearts
In the battle for right may quiet,
And the eye bedimmed by bitter tears
In their search for light may fail not.

Strength for to-day on the down-hill track
For the travellers near the valley,
That up, far up, on the other side,
Ere long, they may safely rally.

Strength for to-day, that our precious youth
May happily shun temptation,
And build, from the rise to the set of sun,
On a strong and sure foundation.

Strength for to-day, in house and home,
To practice forbearance sweetly;
To scatter kind words and loving deeds;
Still trusting in God completely.

Strength for to-day is all that we need,
As there never will be a to-morrow;
For to-morrow will prove but another to-day
With its measure of joy and sorrow.

MY LOVE.

BY JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

Not as all other women are
I see that to my soul is dear;
Her glorious fancy comes from far
Beneath the silver evening star,
And yet her heart is ever near.

Great feelings hath she of her own,
Which lesser souls may never know;
Her gifts to them to be alone,
And sweet they are as any tone
Wherewith the wind may cease to blow.

Yet in herself she dwelleth not.

Although no home were half so fair;
No simplest duty is forgot,
Life hath no dim and lowly spot
That doth not in her sunshine share.

She doeth little kindnesses,
Which most leave undone or despise;
For naught that sets one's heart at ease,
And giveth happiness or peace,
Is low esteemed in her eyes.

She hath no scorn of common things;
And though she seem of other birth,
Round us her heart entwines and clings,
And patiently she folds her wings
To tread the humble paths of earth.

Blessing she is, God made her so,
And deeds of week-day holiness
Fall from her noiseless as the snow;
Nor hath she ever chance to know
That ought were easier than to bless.

She is most fair, and thenceforth
Her life doth rightly harmonize;
Feeling or thought that was not true
Ne'er made less beautiful the life
Unclouded heaven of her eyes.

She is a woman—one in whom
The spring-time of her childish years
Hath never lost its fresh perfume
Though knowing well that life hath room
For many blights and many tears.

I love her with a love as still
As a broad river's peaceful might,
Which, by high tower and lowly mill,
Goes wandering at its own will,
And yet doth ever flow aright.

And on its full, deep beddrest serene,
Like quiet lilies my duties lie;
It flows around them and between,
And makes them fair and fresh and green,
Sweet homes wherein to live and die.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Plants and Insects.

My early botanical collecting was principally done in Delaware and Chester Counties, Pa., where the soil was formed in its place, from the decomposed gneiss or mica schist rocks. Later in life, when my habitation was among the sands, loams and clays of eastern New Jersey, which had all been water worn and deposited in strata by the action of the waves of a primeval ocean, I found that many of the plants with which I had formerly been familiar were not to be found in my new locality; and that their place was taken by species, which a Pennsylvania explorer rarely met with—although there were very many which were common to both situations.

Not only is this remark true in a general way, but in a careful examination of any neighborhood, the botanist will find in successive seasons, plants which in former years he had overlooked, either because they were but few in number, or confined to certain narrow limits. It was not till the present season that I met with the beautiful little dwarf ginseng (Arabis triflora) in our Jersey woods—but having put on a pair of stout overalls, which gave me courage to leave the beaten path and to encounter bushes and green briars, I explored a piece of woodland, through which I had passed in former years, without discovering that there was an abundant growth of this charming little plant.

In a low-lying spot in another piece of woods, were numerous specimens of the beautiful little star flower, (Trientalis Americana); but so particular is this plant in its likes and dislikes, that it is confined to a space not larger than a large room.

The Liverwort (Hepatica triloba) whose leaves survive the winter—and which very early in the spring puts forth its pale blue flowers, I have never found but in one limited locality, although it is abundant in the woods of Pennsylvania.

Another plant common in Pennsylvania but seldom met with in our neighborhood is the Blood root, (Sanguinaria Canadensis). The root stock is charged with a red-orange colored juice, from which it gets its name. It sends up in the early spring a large leaf and a one-flowered stalk. The flower is white and large, but soon falls. I remember when a child at school in Chester County, Pa., digging up the roots and pressing out the juice to obtain a red ink; but from want of conveniences it was mostly expended in staining the hands—I know of but one locality near Moorestown, where it grows, and there it is not abundant.

On the 22d of Fifth Month, being at the house of a friend, whose parterre was ornamented by a vine of the Glycine in full bloom, he called my attention to the number of bumble bees lying on the ground beneath it. The flowers of this plant seem to exercise a stupefying effect on the bees which frequent it. Many of those which fall to the ground lie there and perish. Others seem after a time to revive, but are apt, like the drunkard, to return to the intoxicating repast.

The life history of the bumble bee, (Bombus) although not so wonderful as that of the hive bees is yet full of interest. During summer, the nest contains the female or Queen Bee, the males or Drones, and the working bees, on the approach of cold weather they all die except a few of the females which hide themselves in sheltered spots where they survive the winter, and become the parents of the next summer's bees. The queen bee selects a place suitable for her future home, either by digging into the ground, or going under a stump, or taking possession of the abandoned nest of a field mouse. She collects a small amount of pollen mixed with honey, and in this deposits from seven to fourteen eggs, gradually adding to the pollen mass. When the eggs hatch, the larvæ eat the pollen that surrounds them, and in process of time come forth perfect bees—prepared to take their part in the labors of the nest. Thus the swarm continues to increase in numbers and the nest in size. It is composed of leaves of grass and other vegetable fibres, and in some of the species (for there are in America many species of the genus Bombus) it is placed at some distance below the surface.

Besides boys and polecats (mentioned in a previous article) bees find an enemy in the field mice which devour their combs. The naturalist, Darwin, thus alludes to this fact:—"We may infer as highly probable, that were the whole genus of bumble bees to become extinct or very rare in England the heart's-ease and red clover (which they fertilize by carrying pollen from flower to flower), would become very rare or wholly disappear. The number of bumble bees in any district depends in a great degree on the number of field mice which destroy their combs and nests; and Colonel Newman, who has long attended to the habits of bumble bees, believes that more than two-thirds of them are thus destroyed all over England. Near villages and small towns he has found the nests of bumble bees more numerous than elsewhere—a fact which he attributes to the number of cats which destroy the mice. Hence it is quite credible that the presence of a feline animal in large numbers in a district might determine, through the intervention, first of mice, and then of bees, the frequency of certain flowers in a district."

The humble bee or humble bee must be ranked among the insects useful to man; but there are many others against whose increase he is compelled to war. A few days ago I dined with a friend who is an owner of cranberry bogs and raises annually many hundred bushels of that fruit. He said one of the requisites to its successful culture was to have the bog so situated that it could be floated when desired. After the fruit is gathered in the fall, the water is turned on and covers it during the winter. This prevents the growth of weeds, but does not kill the eggs of a small moth or miller, which have been laid on the vines. In the spring the water is withdrawn for a few days, and the eggs hatch. The instinct of the worms leads them to attack the young cranberry shoots, which produce the fruit—But before they have time to do much damage, the water is again made to cover the plants, and the worms are drowned. It is then withdrawn and the vines are allowed to grow, and produce flowers and fruit. J. W.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Memoranda of William Kennard.

William Kennard was a valuable minister of the Gospel of Christ, who was born in 1787, and died in 1862. His early life was passed in Bucks County, Pennsylvania, and he afterwards removed to Ohio, where he continued to reside during the remainder of his life. He was often from home on religious visits in different parts of the United States. The portion of his memoranda which has come into the possession of the Friend who furnishes them for insertion in THE FRIEND, commence in 1837, while he was travelling in New England in company with Huldah Hoag. Under date of Seventh Month 12th, he speaks of their being united:—

"In travail of spirit for those who are on the back ground, whose day's work is not going on in the day time; who have hid their talent in the earth; have become callous to a right feeling; dead and buried in sin and iniquity. They were feelingly and powerfully called upon to awaken, to arise, and shake themselves from the dust of the earth, put on the beautiful garment of righteousness, that they might bring forth fruits, and that their fruit might remain."

Another class were watered and refreshed who hunger and thirst; who go mourning on their way "for the slain of the daughter of my people."

My mind being brought under the baptizing power of Truth, was drawn forth in supplication in a very reaching and powerful manner, appealing to the throne of grace on behalf of the different states there present. And after I arose [from my knees], I was followed by my dear friend, H. H., in again addressing the throne of grace, acknowledging the favors and returning of thanks to the God of all goodness, who had been pleased to be near, and to be as mouth and wisdom, tongue and utterance; a very solemn season in which my soul rejoiced, and praised the Lord who had wrought for a sense of so marvellous a manner.

My kind friend Prince Gifford took me sixteen miles through a poor sandy country, part of the way thickly settled, and many miles without an inhabitant; a land covered with barren oak and small pines, and landed at Zeno Kelley's at Yarmouth, Cape Cod, and lodged.

Thirteenth of Seventh Month, had a meeting at this place to satisfaction, although not so evidently in the demonstration of the Spirit as at some other places.

At six o'clock, had a meeting amongst the Presbyterians the other side of the Bay or Inlet, appointed by our aged friend, Huldah Hoag; on proposing of this, the elders consulting together, threw in discouragement, thought it was not likely a meeting could be obtained amongst them, and gave many reasons. Huldah told them she was willing to leave it with them.

I let them know my mind, that it was right in the first place to know whether it was of the Lord's requiring, and if so, these obstacles would be removed out of the way; and as for my own part, if I was not mistaken, I had seen that it was owned; and so it was, thanks be to the Lord, who gave us a large meeting, and much favored; the people quiet and attentive; and at the close, very loving; two ministers present; a Presbyterian and a Methodist, with a Justice of the Peace. These and others inviting us, saying they would be happy for us to call at their house and take tea. We acknowledged their kindness and left them.

Returned over to Yarmouth again; lodged at Zeno Kelley's.

It [is] now the 14th of the month, and this morning we part with dear aged friends, J. and H. Hoag; thirty miles from Yarmouth to Falmouth, most of the way through a barren and uncultivated land; lodged again at Mel-tier Gifford's.

Fifteenth, went to visit a couple of young Friends; a man and his wife; both confined to the house, and laboring under disease and affliction of body, but comfortable in mind; a very satisfactory time, in which sweet counsel flowed freely for their encouragement. On leaving them, my mind was clothed with peace and thankfulness unto the Lord for his manifold blessings toward me—a poor unworthy worm of the dust.

First-day morning, 16th of Seventh Month. Attended Falmouth Meeting, which was large; and waiting for the arising of the pure spirit in our hearts, having no might, nor power of our own, I felt a little, I trust, of that water which issues out from under the threshold of the house of God, which increased so as to become a river to swim in; a river that could not be passed over; blessed be the name of the Lord forever!

From here to Sandwich, fourteen miles, through a poor, barren, rocky, hilly country; eight miles without a dwelling house; this wilderness, twenty or thirty miles in length. Lodged at Paul and Ebenezer Wing's.

Seventh Month 17th. Set out this morning for Pembroke, about thirty-seven miles; passed through a very uneven, broken, barren and rocky country; lodged at Samuel Brown's.

On the 18th, had an appointed meeting, which was small, but owned by the great head of the Church, in which I had considerable service to good satisfaction, feeling sweet peace of mind; Friend's minds being tendered by a sense of the Master's presence and favor, were loving and kind.

From here we pursued our course with a pilot, which always has been our favor in this eastern country, through a land much like what we have passed, until coming toward a town called Quincy, beautifully situated; and passing through Boston, a city of about eighty thousand inhabitants, reached Lynn, a city of about ten thousand inhabitants, eight o'clock in the evening. Lodged at our kind friend, Nathan Breed's.

Fourth day morning, 19th of the Month. Friends' Meeting of course comes on at 11 o'clock this morning. O Lord! wilt thou be pleased to keep me low, humble, attentive and obedient to thy word, whether it be in suffering with the suffering seed, or to rejoice with those that reign with the Lamb.

Attended the above said meeting of Lynn, which was to me a time of suffering, in which I dare not open my mouth to speak a word; but toward the close, it came into my mind that when the meeting should be broke, to propose to Moses H. Beede, a meeting at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, which he informed the company, then present, and that they should inform their neighbors. The meeting accordingly assembled. Still a suffering time; the seed oppressed; my lot was to suffer with it, until near the close of the meeting; I was drawn forth in supplication in a few words, but to no relief, which was a close, proving time.

Within the course of this day, called to see the family of William Bassett, who had lately been bereaved of two of their children by death. [It] proved to be a time of instruction. Also made a visit to Hannah the widow of Micajah Collins, an agreeable Friend; and also went to see a minister by the name of Avis Keen, and took tea with her, where many Friends came in to see us, and spent the evening. Again lodged at Nathan Breed's.

Fifth day morning, 20th; set out with Moses H. Beede for our pilot to go to Salem Meeting, which was held this day, and public notice was sent, the distance about six miles. Called at Jonathan Nichols'. Attended meeting; had to regret in seeing so few assembled in such a populous place, especially on the men's side of the house; but the Good Shepherd of Israel was pleased to be near, and strengthened me to relieve my mind amongst them. After which I felt sweet peace, and a thankful heart to the Lord. "Oh! that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!" Dined at Jonathan Nichols', after which, several of us went to see a young woman by the [name of] Sally Purbeck, about twenty-six years of age, who joined the Baptist Society in her thirteenth or fourteenth year; had always been of an orderly life, and respected by those who knew her. She was seized about or near six years ago with a nervous complaint which threw her into violent spasms, which succeeded each other almost momentarily, and the effects upon her indescribable. The like has not been known in Europe or America; as a general inquiry by the physicians has been made, and no such a case to be found on the pages of history.

When seized by the spasms, her hands and arms dart almost with the swiftness of lightning in all directions, beating her breast, gasping wide her mouth; her jaws are constantly jerked together with such force that her teeth make a loud cracking, whilst she springs forward until her head strikes upon her knees, from whence she throws herself back; her head striking with such force as if her neck would break; and these motions are constantly repeated with such violence as to shake the house; that the sound is to be heard in the adjoining houses and shops, while she lays in an upper chamber, takes very little nourishment more than cold water.

At one time her jaws were set twenty-five days; the whole of which time, she took nothing but a little cold water, and at some times a little lime juice mixed with it, put into her mouth with a teaspoon where a tooth had been taken out; and at the time when her mouth was opened, a female friend who was present told me, she reached her arm around her neck and kissed her; her first words was to express how good the Lord was to her, that He had opened her mouth again, so that she could speak to her dear friends again; and as far as can be discerned, is always resigned, and never murmurs, or says it is hard; and is supported under all her great suffering.

There are moments of some relief in which she can whisper two or three words; and in a moment again thrown into all the before mentioned racking of body and limbs.

In one of those intervals she told me that the Lord supported her; that when she was young in years, she was under great exercise before the Lord, and willing to endure all that He would be pleased to lay upon her, so that she might be favored with an evidence of his all-sustaining power and presence, which she now enjoys, and is always filled with his love; love to all people; acknowledged her thankfulness for our visit.

Is fully convinced of Friends' principles; corresponds with some young Friends; particularly a young woman living about fifty miles from here, who is confined, laboring under a consumption; this she does by inditing whilst another writes, speaking a word or two at a time; and then is broken off by the violence of the disorder for a considerable time, and again resumes the subject, and again broken off; and in this way she sends extraordinary letters.

I was told by those who wait upon her, that for three years she was not known to sleep. I was also informed that as we saw her, so she was held all the time, day and night, but more violent in the evening, which leaves no time for sleep; and all she takes is but little more than water, and can swallow but a few drops at a time; and through all this she is supported, and her days lengthened out to the admiration and wonder of hundreds of people, as well as of herself.

I have been ready to believe, and impressed with a sense, that all this suffering, which this dear child undergoes, is not on her own account, but there is a wise purpose in it, by an Overruling Power; a loud and awakening call to the benighted sons and daughters of men for whom she suffers; which also is her impression.

From Salem we had the very agreeable company of Jonathan Nichols and Henry Chase for our pilots; (the latter a minister), to Westbury, a distance of about twenty-three miles, through a country of many villages, the farms in a high state of cultivation, although the country mostly very rocky. Lodged at our agreeable and kind friends, Robert Brown and family.

21st. Had a meeting at Westbury Meeting House; the life of true religion at a low ebb; a few honest-hearted who were encouraged; the lukewarm, and those who were buried in the earth in sin and transgression, warned of their deplorable condition; after which I was drawn forth in spirit to supplicate, and call on the great and holy name of him who is from of old, and from everlasting to everlasting, to support and sustain his humble and dependent children, and to give them the victory, by and through his only begotten Son, the Lamb Immaculate, over the world, the flesh and the devil; and so coming out of great tribulation, having their garments washed in the blood of the Lamb, and palms in their hands, and so to be prepared for endless glory and happiness, to join the heavenly host in songs of glory and hallelujah unto Him that sits upon the throne and unto the Lamb forever; also that He might be pleased to spare a little longer those fruitless fig trees and dig about them, also raise them thence into life, even out of their graves from whence they are buried. Felt peace of mind. Had another meeting in the afternoon, at Amesbury, a distance of about five miles; a poor, low time in which I labored, but to little relief; at this place, it seems to me, that the "whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint." Lodged at _____ Jones'.

"The Heavenly Vision."

[It is refreshing to meet with such evidences of an appreciation of the Spiritual nature of religion, and of the reality of the Divine manifestations to the soul of man, as are contained in the following article, condensed from an editorial in the Sunday-School Times.—Ed.]

* * * * *

The word "vision" means simply a "seeing." Yet we limit it to some kinds of seeing. * * *

Vision is the sight of truth and of spiritual fact which comes to us in hours of spiritual exaltation. Some would confine the word to very extraordinary experiences, and to people who were extraordinarily favored of God. They recognize the presence of the vision in the lives of the great servants of God, of whom the Bible tells us. * * *

But they put such things far away from our modern life, and see in the word "visionary" only a word of reproach. In view of the sickly and unwholesome stuff which has past for visions in later days, there is some excuse for this. It has been found quite possible to mistake the products of nervous excitability for the touch of the Divine enlightenment. * * *

The first note of the false visionary is the hankering after signs, seeking the strange and the extraordinary. The true vision of Divine things is always supernatural in the proper sense, but never unnatural. It seldom has in it anything of the startling or the unusual. It is the enlightenment of God's Spirit shining into the heart, without any extraordinary circumstances either within or without us. * * *

It was the substance of Paul's experience on the way to Damascus. The blinding light, the prostration on the highway, the voice of rebuke from the spiritual heavens—these were not the essential thing, however necessary they might be to him in his circumstances. The essential thing was that God apprehended, laid hold of him, so that henceforth he lived to lay hold of God.

All such experiences are the heavenly vision for us. They are the hours of clear shining after rain, when the human spirit realizes a little its nearness to God, and God's helpfulness to it. * * *

Then the heart warms and love grows bold, and faith seems to become sight,—as, indeed, it is a better and truer kind of seeing, a heavenly vision of Divine relations and mercies. Then, indeed, our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son, through the Spirit taking what is Christ's and showing it to us. We have no right to belittle such experiences by regarding them as mere elevations of the human spirit, to which there was no correspondent reality on God's side. * * *

A second test of the true vision is that indicated by the Apostle's words when he tells Agrippa, "I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision." The true vision is always something to be obeyed. It never ministers merely to curiosity or to enjoyment. Satan, it is said, once disguised himself as Christ, and presented himself to a good man at his devotions. But the cheat was at once detected, because he could not counterfeit the scars left by the crown of thorns on the brow, and by the nails in the palms. The Christ of the heavenly vision is He who was obedient to the death, and who died for us that we might not live to ourselves. So, when the true vision comes to us, it is as a call to a more Christ-like life, to more faithful following of the Master. Such was the purpose of all the visions recorded in the Scriptures. They generally came to strengthen the recipient for a life of service and self-denial. They were not a luxury, to be enjoyed, but a call to be obeyed. The Apostle connects his whole subsequent life with that hour of vision on the road to Damascus. "I was not disobedient" is the key to his abounding labors, his restless zeal, his manifold endurance, his renunciation of all that makes ordinary life pleasant and cheerful. * * *

Obedience to a vision is not just what we conceive of obedience as being. We think of it rather as compliance with a law, as acceptance of some well-defined line of conduct. A vision is about the last thing we should think of as disclosing the law of our lives to us. But, after all, the law acquires its power over us through the vision. It is weak, through the weakness of sinful flesh, until the Son of God is disclosed to us in it, and his authority is felt. Then are we made willing to obey, because that personal influence, which is the highest spiritual force, has reached us. God is disclosed to us, not as power to crush our spirits, but as gracious and winning authority, such as was seen in his Son in his intercourse with his brethren. It is on this side of the revelation of Christ to him that the apostle loved to dwell, as it was this that won him to Christ. The gentleness, the "sweet reasonableness," of Christ, flashed upon him in the moment of the disclosure of his infinite majesty. To obey such a Master was a privilege, a joy. All things were but loss that could come between Paul's spirit and this Master. The vision suffused all duty with new light and joy.

In dealing with the Scriptures we need the help of this heavenly vision. External evidences of their worth go but a little way to get us into the heart of them. It is when light shines out of chapter or verse that we are satisfied and helped. It is just in so far as we have had this blessed experience that they are truly and practically the word of God to us. Much of them probably lies in the shadow. We have had no vision of a Divine light playing over these parts. We have heard no call to obedience from them. But so it was once with parts which now are bright with gracious memories, eloquent with spiritual associations. So it was with the passages which now seem as if they were written just to meet our needs and guide our feet. We can trust, as regards the rest, that they will be opened to us some day.—Sunday-School Times.

God knows what He wants us to be and to do. He will shape and use us, if we will submit ourselves to Him trustfully. Martin Luther calls attention to the fact that the invitation in the Psalms, "Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for Him," is, in the Hebrew, "Be silent to God—let Him mold thee." If we are not what we ought to be, it is because we resist God's effort to make us so, and prefer our plans to his.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Perils of Mountain Climbing.—As Edward Whymper was exploring some of the mountains of Ecuador, in company with two assistants, their route led them across a glacier. As a precaution, all three were tied to a rope. He says, "we were near home, striding along at our best pace, about fifteen feet apart, keeping step as we walked. In the twinkling of an eye the surface of the snow gave way, and I shot down as I were through a trap-door, nearly pulling both men over; and in the next second found myself dangling between two varnished walls of glaciers, which met seventy feet beneath.

The voices of the cousins were nearly inaudible, for the hole was no bigger than my body, and they could not venture to approach it. With slow and anxious pulls they hauled away, fearing that the rope would be severed by the glassy edges, but before my head touched the bridge, more of the brittle structure yielded, and I went down again. This was repeated several times, and then Jean Antoine, seeing that their efforts must be ineffectual so long as they were on opposite sides, leaped the chasm; and with united pulls the two cousins landed me with a jerk, through the frozen vault and its pendant icicles, on to the surface, poorer by a cap, though not otherwise the worse for the immersion."

Food of Pre-historic Man in Europe.—The wild horses that roamed over Europe in immense herds appear to have furnished the chief food of early man in Europe. Enormous refuse heaps, consisting mainly of the bones of wild horses, have been found outside of the caves, as in those at the foot of Mount Pellegrino, near Palermo, where the floor is formed of a magma of the bones of wild horses, which were either stalked with spears, driven by the hunters into pitfalls, or chased over the cliffs. Similar deposits have been found at the cave of Thäyngen, in Switzerland, and in front of the rock shelter at Solutré, near Macon, where there is a vast deposit, the relics of the feasts of these savages, nearly 10 feet in thickness, and more than 300 feet in length, composed entirely of the bones of horses, and comprising the remains of from 20,000 to 40,000 individuals.

EDUCATION OF THE YOUTH.—A deep interest in the welfare of the rising generation being awakened in our deliberations on this subject, the meeting earnestly desires that parents and heads of families may be fervently engaged to seek for Divine ability to train them up both by precept and example, in a religious life and conversation, in reading frequently the Holy Scriptures, and in an acquaintance with our precious doctrines and testimonies, subjecting them in early life to the restraints of the cross, to a quiet and orderly demeanor, and to that simplicity in dress, language, and conduct, which Truth will ever lead into. In this way only can parents acquit themselves of the solemn responsibility which rests upon them, or discharge the duty which they owe beloved offspring; and as they are concerned, through Divine assistance, thus to carry on the important work of a religious and guarded education AT HOME, they will also feel the great importance of sending their children to schools where they may be under the care of religiously minded teachers, members of our own Society, and be preserved, as far as practicable, from the corrupting influences of evil example, and from whatever might counteract the pious care extended over them under the parental roof, or lessen their attachment to our holy profession. It is also the concern of this meeting, that Friends may be willing to use strenuous efforts, and to make every reasonable sacrifice, in order to establish and support schools taught by members, and under the care of Monthly or Preparative meetings, and that they avoid sending their children to district schools. Minutes of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, 1843.

How easy it is to throw suspicion on a good name by a sneer or a question! How great a wrong is done by such a course, when no public necessity demands it as an imperative duty! "Do you know that man?" asks one person of another. "Why, I know something about him," is the response. "Yes, but do you know him through and through?" is the second question. "Of course I do not," comes the reply. "Well, I tell you he's no better than he should be," is the concluding comment on a man who has not been convicted of, or publicly charged with, any serious crime, yet who is practically branded in this way as though there were no limit to his infamy. "No better than he should be!" Well, who is? It can be said with absolute truth of any man living, that he is no better than he should be; yet to say this of any man is to suggest the thought that he is as bad as he could be. And this is a very common and a very wicked way of making the truth lie, and of making one's self a lying truth-teller.

Treatment of the Indians.—Senator Perkins in speaking of the attitude of the Administration toward the Indians, says:—"Treaties and agreements are more faithfully observed, and payments are more promptly made; schools are more numerous and carefully conducted, and the rights of the Indians are more scrupulously observed. The good people of the country never had so much occasion to rejoice at a just and humane system of treating the wards of the nation."

"Moral Saloons."—A clergyman in New York named Rainsford, has recently startled many people by proposing, apparently seriously, the change and creation of saloons to reform the saloons by opening places where people may obtain beer, wine and the lighter grades of intoxicants, with associations free from the more disreputable and hurtful influences of ordinary liquor saloons. If there should be an attempt to put this proposal in practice, we believe it would be a delusion and a snare, like the corresponding effort to create and maintain a "moral" theatre.

The Independent in commenting on Rainsford's proposals says, "It is hard to deal with them patiently. They are based, as it seems to us, on a misconception of the nature both of the Church and the Churchman. The only irreconcilable foes. The Church must fight the saloon to the bitter end. There is no possibility of compromise with it, any more than there is with idolatry, infidelity and prostitution. A saloon under the patronage of the Church might wear the "livery of Heaven," but it would only be to "serve the devil in." A Church in the saloon business, open six days of the week and not created entirely to reform the saloon by opening a Church as his Satanic majesty would willingly be archbishop of. We denounce the saloon in its business and in its whole influence, and we denounce the new and astonishing proposition of Dr. Rainsford as one which would surely result in evil to the Church and to the World.

Disestablishment.—Scotch disestablishment has failed again in Parliament by the narrowest kind of a margin. It would be wise for English Churchmen to remember the wisdom of "Æneas who thought it time to run when the house next door was on fire." But there are always fools who hasten on the cause which they attack, and such a one is the Vicar of Coventry, who has ordered distraint proceedings for the collection of tithes due by three hundred people, Non-conformists and unbelievers, in his parish. The feeling against him has been so strong that he has been mobbed, imprisoned in his church, and only escaped by the help of the police. It is by such measures as this that the disestablishment feeling has gained such headway in Wales.

Proposed Religious Congress at Chicago.—It is significant that at just this time comes the proposal for a parliament of religions in connection with the Columbian Exposition at Chicago, next year. What effect it may have cannot easily be told. One thing is certain. Christianity will be on trial as never before. From every quarter of the world there will come men to see for themselves the results of the religion of our missionaries, in a land where it has had every advantage. The reading of papers, the discussions of a few hours will be of comparatively little value beside the great object lesson of a Christian nation. We have sent out our heralds to proclaim the Gospel. Whose those to whom they have gone will condemn, judge for themselves as to our sincerity in sending them.

A manifestation of Christian life here will do more to move the masses there than all the sermons of our preachers. A conviction forced upon these representatives from the Eastern world that we ourselves care little for the truth that we preach to them, may set back the cause of missions many years. Let us see to it that at this time when so much is at stake abroad we will be not found wanting at home.—The Independent.

Women in the Methodist Church.—At a Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church held at Westminster, Maryland, some opposition was made to the admission of four women delegates. The decision was in their favor. The Independent says: "This action changes no law in the church, but interprets the law to mean that women are eligible to ordination, and to fill the office of delegate to the General Conference."

The same Conference decided to strike out of the marriage service the word "obey," heretofore required to be promised by the wife.

ONE of the passages in the New Testament which has been somewhat differently rendered into English in the old and new version, is the 39th verse of the fifth chapter of John. The translators in the time of King James, (our common version) represent our Saviour as saying to the Jews:—"Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me. And ye will not come to me that ye might have life."

Robert Barclay in his Apology, lays down the principle that the Scriptures are a secondary rule of faith and practice, but are not to be placed before the Spirit which gave them forth, and which still operates on the hearts of men, showing them the path in which they should walk. To those who objected that this text is opposed to his position he replies:—"I answer, that the Scriptures ought to be searched, we do not at all deny; but are very willing to be tried by them; but the question is, Whether they be the only and principal rule? Which this is so far from proving, that it proves the contrary; for Christ checks them here for too high an esteem of the Scriptures, and neglecting Him that was to be preferred before them, and to whom they bore witness, as the following words declare; for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me; and ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life. Moreover, that place may be taken in the indicative

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 265.

A lesson in honesty is contained in an incident sent to the Richmond Dispatch by a Petersburg correspondent:

"In 1861, John McCoy, then a member of the Washington Artillery, of New Orleans, now a citizen of Texas, borrowed of John Mason, of Prince George County, the sum of $500 in gold. The precious metal had run up to a high premium, even at that early stage of the war—about eighty cents on the dollar. It was agreed by the borrower to pay this premium, and also interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum on the amount borrowed, and a note was given. The war went on, and was ended, and the surviving soldiers of the Confederacy returned to their homes to rebuild their ruined fortunes. Among the number was John McCoy. It came to pass, in the course of time, that both the borrower and the lender changed their places of residence. John McCoy moved to Texas, engaged in the cattle business, and prospered. John Mason came to Petersburg. Each wrote to the other frequently, sending their letters to the old post-office address. These letters, on this account, never reached the parties to whom they were addressed, and were returned to the writers through the mails.

A few days ago a stranger arrived at one of our city hotels, and made inquiries for John Mason, who was brought to the hotel and introduced to him. Twenty-nine years had made great changes in the appearance of both gentlemen, but after introduction and explanation, recognition followed. The stranger proved to be John McCoy, who, having failed to communicate with John Mason by letter, determined to come all the way to Petersburg to find him, if alive, or his heirs, and restore the money he had borrowed, and pay the interest thereon. He was glad to find John Mason himself, and to him he paid the principal and interest in full for all the years since 1861. During a great fire in this city, John Mason lost most of his personal effects, and among them the note John McCoy had given him for the borrowed money. When this was explained to the latter gentleman he made no objection, but promptly paid over the sum in question, and seemed to be rejoiced at the opportunity to do so.

Here is an instance which verifies the maxim that 'truth is stranger than fiction.' It is an instance, too, of an honesty and integrity of purpose which command the highest admiration. The note would long ago have been paid but for the misfortune which befell the borrower in his efforts to find his friend, through the failure of his letters to reach their destination."

Honesty and straightforward integrity are admirable qualities, which command the respect of almost every one. But there are many persons who, in some respects, fall short of the true standard of uprightness. One such instance is noted by a writer in the Gospel Messenger, under the heading of "Paying the Conductor." He says:

"Not long since we entered a passenger coach on one of our Western railroads. The car was not crowded, and we found a comfortable seat by an open window a few seats to the rear of the middle of the car. On the opposite side, a half dozen seats in front of us, sat two ladies, and in the seat next to them were two interesting looking children, aged probably eight and ten respectively. We noticed this group especially, and in a few minutes, as the conductor entered the car and commenced taking up tickets and collecting fares, our attention was called to them again. When he came to the seat occupied by the ladies, they handed him two tickets. He took these, and then, pointing to the children, said something which we did not hear. One of the ladies replied. Her face became flushed, and her appearance indicated excitement and anger. The conductor again spoke, apparently in courteous manner, but did not move away. The lady answered, speaking rapidly, with flushed face and angry tone of voice. We could hear her voice, but, owing to the rumbling noise made by the car wheels, could not distinguish a word that was said, but the faces told their own story. It all ended by the lady taking out her pocket-book and, with evident displeasure, handing the conductor some money, who gave her a receipt, and then quietly proceeded with his work.

We did not need any one to tell us that the unpleasantness which we had witnessed grew out of the fact that the lady did not want to pay fare for the children. The faces of the children themselves were a study while the controversy was being carried on, and we wondered what effect the lesson would have upon them. Would they learn from their mother, in this case, to be strictly honest, or would they get a lesson that would make them dishonest? It reminded us of an incident that came under our notice some years ago. A gentleman was travelling with his seven-year old boy, a bright-eyed little fellow. The conductor said, 'How old is your boy?' 'Oh,' said the father, 'about five.' 'Why, papa,' said the little fellow, his innocent eyes opening wide, 'I was seven years old last May.' The little fellow had learned his age, but had not yet learned the art of dissimulation that is practised on every hand these days.

After the conductor had gone through the car and taken up the tickets, he came and sat down by our side. We were acquainted with him, and asked him if he often had trouble of that kind with passengers. His reply was that it was almost a daily occurrence. 'Very few people,' he continued, 'who take their children with them when they travel, buy tickets for them, even if they are over five years old. The rule is to collect half fare for all children over five and under twelve. The children in front of us are both over age, and I only asked the lady to pay for one of them. She got very angry, and said that I was the only conductor that charged her for the children. Had I done my duty by the company that employs me I would have collected fare for both of them, but I only asked her to pay for the older one, who is ten years old. It seems singular to me that people, who appear honest enough at home, and who would be insulted if you were to charge them with dishonesty, will try to take the advantage of the railroad company in this way.'

Soon after this we came to the end of the division, and changed conductors, and we observed that the new conductor had about the same experience with the lady and her children that the first one did. A demand was made for the fare; an angry remonstrance was the reply, and the fare was paid very ungraciously.

These scenes, with what the conductor said, set us to thinking, and we wondered, too, why people try to take the advantage of a railroad company in this way. We recalled having heard many people speak of travelling with their children, and congratulating themselves upon the fact that, although they were over five years of age, they did not have to pay for them, and this was all said without any apparent sense of wrong-doing in it. Others have said: 'Well, it is the conductor's business to collect fare for the children, and if they do not ask for it, it is not our business to pay them.' We have heard these things from men and women who would not think of taking the advantage of their neighbors, who are counted as being honest in their dealings, and to whom you could offer no greater insult than to hint that they lacked in a high sense of honor.

Why is it that some of these people fall into dishonest practices when they come to deal with the conductor? We can only answer the question by presuming that it is owing to a kind of popular sentiment that all you get out of a railroad company you are welcome to. This sentiment has been carried so far that, as in the before-mentioned case, people get insulted and berate the conductor when he asks them to pay for their children who are over age. Children, who learn rapidly lessons of cupidity, are brought up in this way, and when they get old they do not depart from it.

We believe this sentiment is all wrong, and it is damaging to the personal honesty of those who entertain it. We want to look upon dishonest practices as being dishonest, no matter where they are practised. The railroad company has rules and regulations, and if we wish to enjoy the advantages they offer to us, we ought to be willing to pay the fare, especially since it is fixed by law, and we have no more right to take our children over the road without paying for them, according to the rules of the road, than we have to travel over the road ourselves without paying. Dishonest practices are dishonest, no matter if they are used in dealing with a corporation."

FROM THE "INDEPENDENT."

Clinical Experience as to Alcohol.

The debate in the fall of 1888, in the Patho-Payne, logical Society of London, led Dr. J. F. Dr. Lionel Beale and Dr. George Hay, to express very significant opinions, representing the best medical talent of London.

Dr. Payne spoke of alcohol in its terrible effect on the functions of organs, its poisonous and destructive work on tissue, and its interference with oxidation. He was fully supported by Dr. Harley, who claimed that "very moderate drinkers were in reality the most numerous class of alcoholic victims." Dr. Lionel Beale repeated and emphasized his well-known views. Since then Dr. Harley has given a series of lectures on the subject, which well represent the most thorough recent clinical beliefs as to the very restricted availability of alcohol in disease.

While exact clinical experiment and experience now narrows the sphere of alcohol, it regards it as available in sudden shock from injury, chiefly in the form of hypodermic injection with digitalis, as also for temporary use in sudden prostration until nutrients and other restoratives become preferable in its place, as is quickly the case. There is a narrow stage of fever and debility in which alcohol may be available; but it is to be borne in mind always that the stimulant effect is short and apt to be followed with depression, and that its chief effect is that of a neurotic. Since we have come to know the value of the various peptonoids and of their combination with beef, gluten, milk and flavoring oils or condiments, there is far less need for alcoholics. The appetizing effects of wines, etc. result full as much from flavors, developed in them from the acidity, as from the alcohol itself. The fattening effects of beer to some results from the malt, etc., which now has an excellent substitute in the syrupy malt extracts. Alcohol, as it comes to derange organs, especially the liver, has much the same effect as is produced by a forcing process upon the livers of geese, which become abnormal. The more such geese weigh, and the better they look, so much the worse for the geese. No doubt, by the clogging of organs, there may be retention of materials and pent-up secretions, which add slightly to the bulk or weight; but it is only a storage tending to disease, and not a storage of health.

B. W. Richardson, M.D., F.R.S., of London, a leading physiological and chemical scientist and experienced practitioner, speaks thus:

"I have learned, purely by experimental observation, that, in its action on the living body, this chemical substance, alcohol, deranges the constitution of the blood, unduly excites the heart and respiration, paralyzes the minute blood-vessels, increases and decreases according to the degree of its application, the functions of the digestive organs, of the liver and of the kidneys; disturbs the regularity of nervous action, lowers the animal temperature, and lessens the muscular power. Such, independently of any prejudice of party, or influence of sentiment, are the unanswerable teachings of the sternest of all evidences, the evidence of experiment, of natural fact revealed to man by experimental testing of natural phenomena."

Dr. N. S. Davis, an ex-President of an International Medical Congress, and for forty years and still an active practitioner in Chicago, says:

"There is no greater or more destructive error existing in the public mind than the belief that the use of fermented and distilled drinks does no harm so long as they do not intoxicate.

"It is not the temperate use, but the abuse of alcoholic drinks that does harm," is the oft-repeated popular phrase that embodies the error which helps to rob more than 100,000 persons of from five to twenty years of life in the United States, through the gradual development of chronic structural diseases induced by the daily use of beer, ale, wine or distilled spirits, in quantities so moderate as at no time to produce intoxication. No more true or important remark was made in the noted discussion in the London Pathological Society than the one by Dr. George Harley, that "for every drunkard there were fifty others who suffered from the effects of alcohol in one form or other."

Prof. William H. Draper, a leading practitioner of New York, in an address on alcohol, before the New York Academy of Medicine, November, 1886, says:

"That the effects of alcohol on nutrition are harmful and deteriorating to such a degree as to constitute the most powerful cause of physical degeneration at the present day, there can, I think, be no question."

The drift of professional opinion in this country and in Europe is surely tending toward the restriction of their use as articles of diet, and simply for the reason that they are the determining cause of many functional derangements and structural degenerations.

"Zaccheus, make haste, and come down; for to-day I must abide at thy house."

My heart goes out in love and tenderness for some—may I not say, many of us—that we may be willing to come down in humbleness and submission, even to that state where we may be enabled to sit, as it were, at the Master's feet, seeking to know his will concerning us. Oh! for a willingness to be brought into the childlike state, to be fashioned and formed as the blessed Saviour designs—for there is no other way to the Kingdom but by the way of the Cross. The truth is unchangeable; there is but one journey to take through life, and there is no coming back to make amends; but now, while time and opportunity are given, let the work be done while the day lasts, for the night cometh—the night of death—wherein no man can work. Then let each one see to it how it is with us. One formerly queried: "What lack I yet?" and it appears from the reply that he had not parted with all. So we must count nothing too dear to part with, for the whole heart is required, not a part. We must hold our possessions as if they were not ours, for the Master has the power to blast and bless at his pleasure. But, "the eye of the Lord is upon them that fear Him, upon them that hope in his mercy." So may there be more of a willingness to listen, and not turn a deaf ear to the little intimations that are felt within the secret of the heart, and not despise the day of small things. God is both able and willing to help all those that come to Him in sincerity of heart, and He is a rich rewarder to his faithful little ones.

Let none plead excuse for lack of knowledge in any way, because Christ said, "I am the door," and "He teacheth as never man taught," and as the will is given up and there is an abiding under his canopy, the understanding will be opened: "He maketh wise the simple." And such as are made willing to submit to his chastening rod will come to find that He is "Strength in weakness, riches in poverty, and a present helper in every needful time." So let there be an examination, and see whether the pleasures and things of this world are taking up too much of our time and thought, so that there is little room or place left for the all-important part. This is worthy of thought; there is nothing so certain as death. The Christian's path is not a gloomy one, but one in which may be found a place of safety and retreat, for comfort and consolation in the needful time. And let none be too much discouraged because of the times, neither be looking too much to others for examples, but simply keep a single eye to the dear Master, and He will be our leader and our guide; and as faithfulness is maintained, the sincere seeking ones will be shown what to do and what to leave undone. Wherefore, "To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts." For although our blessed Lord is very merciful, there are times when He ceases to strive. Truly awful would it be for any of us to experience this state when come to a death-bed, and if so, would the fault not be our own? O that the language may not be sounded in any of our ears! "How often would I have gathered you, and ye would not."

May the dear Master, who has all power, open the blind eyes and unstop the deaf ears, and lead into paths that have not been known, and that He would lead such as these on step by step, until they become valiant in the Lord's army and pillars in the Church, to go no more out. "Happy is that people whose God is the Lord." E. C. C.

Pa., Sixth Mo., 1892.

INFLUENCE.—"I am only one, and have no influence." Such is the plaintive wail, or sniffing cant, of hundreds of people calling themselves Christians, hence they do little or nothing in the line of Christian work. Reader! Are you one of them? If so, what are you thinking about, or do you think at all, or only dream along the pathway of life? "Only one." So it is, but always leave out one, and you will never get a hundred nor a thousand. Leave out the single grains, and there is no staid on the seashore. Leave out the single drops, and there is no rain, and leave out a single member, and the Church is not complete. So stop your whimpering and whining, get up, go to work, and do what you can, be it much or little—do what you can. That is required of you. Besides, you are either not sincere in what you say, or deceiving yourself. Suppose some brother were to answer you thus, "Yes, brother or sister, you are indeed a very poor critter, and have no influence!" How would you take it? Why, you'd get as mad as a hornet and quickly show you had some pride and some temper if you had no influence. But the whole thing is false on its face. Every man and woman who is not a born idiot has more or less influence over their fellow creatures, and they are under solemn obligations to use that influence for the benefit of others, and for this they must give account to God, and there will be no special pleading at his bar in the judgment day.—St. Louis Christian Advocate.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Exercises of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting Respecting Intoxicating Liquors.

1746.—In the Epistle to the members it is said: "And we think it necessary to renew our advice, not only to the young, but those of riper age, to avoid the keeping much company, and resorting to Taverns and ale-houses (when their necessary business does not call them), as great inconveniences attend this Practice, not only by subjecting yourselves to the Temptation of Drinking to Excess (The Prevalence and dismal Effects of which, in many who have long made Profession of the Truth, with deep concern we see and lament) but hereby an opportunity is offered for men of corrupt minds, to sow the evil seeds of loose principles perhaps to the calling in question the great Truths of Religion contained in the Holy Scriptures, and thereby striking at the Foundation of Godliness and Holy Living; the evil effects, we pray all that are concerned may lay to Heart in Time; and in order that those who are unhappily taken in those snares, or engaged in such dangerous conversation, may be induced to break off before it is too late, it is our Desire that the Elders and more considerate, show a disposition to admit them at times into their company, and treat them with Freedom and Kindness, which will very much make way for any advice or counsel they may give them in relation to their conduct; but if after all our Christian endeavors, there appear no fruits of amendment of what is amiss, then at last to proceed to a regular discharge of our Duty, by dealing with them according to the Gospel Order."

1750.—"That part of our Discipline relating to the practice of giving Drams and other strong Liquors at Vendues, being now considered and spoken to pretty fully, it is the sense of this meeting that the minute on this subject contained in the General Epistle from the Yearly Meeting in 1726, should be revived and enforced by the respective Monthly Meetings, and that such persons who transgress the same should be dealt with as disorderly Persons, and if they persist in justifying their conduct and refuse to give satisfaction for the same, they ought to be testified against. And likewise that Friends be concerned frequently to call upon the Overseers or other Friends appointed within their respective meetings to prevent the unnecessary use of Strong Drink at Buries."

1755.—The following was adopted as the 4th query:

"Are Friends careful to avoid the Excessive use of Spirituous Liquors, the unnecessary frequenting of Taverns and places of Diversion, and to keep to due Moderation and temperance on the account of Births, Marriages, Burials, and all other occasions?"

1777.—A Monthly Meeting in Philadelphia Quarterly sends the following Minute to the Yearly Meeting:

"Have observed with concern for many years past that some under Religious Profession with us, without due consideration of the injury arising to themselves and others, have undertaken to keep houses of Public entertainment, Beer-houses and Dram-shops, whereby the Reputation of Truth has greatly suffered, and in some instances, the children and families of such, have been brought into disgrace and ruin, notwithstanding the labor of Friends by advice and admonition, we therefore desire the Quarterly Meeting would consider whether it is not a matter of weight sufficient to bespeak the immediate attention of the Yearly Meeting in order that some means may be used to prevent more effectually the pernicious consequences of this growing evil."

Western Quarter brings up a concern on account of members destroying their Grain by distilling it into Spirituous Liqueur.

Minute of Yearly Meeting:

"Considering the difficulties and snares both to our young people and others, which are attendant on keeping Houses of public entertainment, Beer houses and Dram shops, whereby the reputation of Truth has greatly suffered, and in some places the children and families of persons concerned therein, have been brought into disgrace and ruin, both spiritually and temporally; it is the united sense and judgment of this meeting, that Friends ought not to give way to the desire of outward gain arising from such employment, but to keep themselves clear thereof by attending to the pointings of pure wisdom, which will lead us to seek for a way of supporting ourselves and our families in business more consistent with our holy profession, and not liable to such snares and dangers; and that all professing with us be strictly advised not to go into these practices, and that such as are already engaged therein, should be advised to decline them, as being opposite to the sense of this meeting, now expressed and given forth; and that Monthly and Quarterly Meetings keep this subject closely in view, and by no means neglect a proper care towards all such who are in danger of deviating in these respects, and make a clear report of their care in this matter to our next Yearly Meeting."

"And an increasing concern and exercise prevailed among Friends in several of our Quarterly Meetings, respecting the unnecessary use of spirituous liquors, which both greatly tended to the corruption and depravity of the morals of mankind, thereby increasing guilt on our country, under which consideration this meeting is engaged to exhort and admonish Friends to use great caution in that of distilling, or encouraging the distilling or using of distilled or spirituous liquors of any kind."

"And in regard to the practice of destroying grain by distilling spirits out of it, it is the sense and judgment of this meeting that the practice should be wholly discouraged and disused amongst Friends, and that Friends ought not to sell their grain for that purpose, nor to use or partake of liquors made out of grain, which this meeting directs the Monthly and Quarterly Meetings to take proper notice of and make report of their care to next Yearly Meeting, when this matter may be further considered."

1778.—"The accounts from the several Quarters (except Rahway), express a concern prevailing to fulfil the advice of last year, to discourage the keeping of Houses for Entertainment, the Distilling of Grain into Spirituous Liquors, or selling Grain for that purpose. And it appears that the care and labor extended on this account, has been serviceable in divers places, which affords encouragement for a continuance of the like attention to this necessary service."

1780.—"As it appears, that the Endeavors used to discourage the Distillation of Spirits from Grain, and the selling of Grain for that Purpose, and of any of our members keeping public houses, have been attended with some success, the care of Friends is desired to be continued in these matters, agreeable to the sense and judgment of the meeting the last year, and if any continue in those Practices, or others should undertake them, to send accounts thereof to the meeting next year."

1781.—Answer to 4th Query concludes:—"Whether an improvement herein at marriage Entertainments may not be necessary would be no unprofitable Enquiry."

1782.—"Excess in the use of Spirituous Liquors appears to be in the general avoided, as well as the unnecessary attendance of Taverns and Places of Diversion; but more circumspection herein is allowed to be necessary in some professing among us, and it is mentioned that some Friends find their minds so impressed with a sense thereof, that they wholly forbear the use of spirituous liquors."

1783.—"The subject recommended in the Report from Chester Quarter, to the solid attention of this meeting, weightily opened and considered at a preceding sitting, wherein many just and pertinent Remarks were communicated, clearly setting forth the corrupting, debasing and ruinous Effects consequent on the Importation and Retailing large quantities of distilled spirits, whereby the intemperate use of them is greatly aided and encouraged, & to the impoverishment of many, distemperring the Constitution and understandings of many more, and increasing all manner of Vice and Dissoluteness throughout the Land; whereby many religiously attentive minds have been long painfully burthened, being resumed: It is the united sense of the meeting that well concerned Friends in all Quarters be earnestly excited to suffer the affecting importance of this mighty Evil, religiously to impress their minds and animate them with a lively concern to exert honest endeavors both by Example and loving Entreaty, to caution and dissuade all our members from being concerned in the Importation or retailing distilled spirits or giving Countenance thereto."

1788.—Minute of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, presented to the Yearly Meeting:

"The subject of Spirituous Liquors has been kept under our close consideration, and revived from month to month in hope it may be a means of promoting a united concern for the advancement of our Testimony against importing, trading in, or visibly using an article attended with very undesirable pernicious effects on the morals and health of the people."

"Some labor having been extended toward those who keep houses for retailing it, and we hope and desire that this subject may become the further consideration of the succeeding Yearly Meeting, and such counsel given therein as the Wisdom of Truth may dictate and the reputation thereof require."

"A fervent concern attending respecting the melancholy fruits of a too unqualified love of lucre in promoting the intemperate use of spirituous liquors by importing, distilling and retailing them; and a sense of the mighty and extensive mischief produced thereby, being expressed with much weight and energy; the importance of which Evil, and promoting a remedy therefore, requiring deliberate care, as well as deep and faithful attention, the subject is referred to the more particular consideration of the following Friends, who are desired closely to attend thereto, and report to the meeting their sense of what this public grievance immediately calls for at the hands of our religious Society."

Forty-two Friends appointed on this Committee.

The above committee "reported that Quarterly and Monthly Meetings be excited and enjoined to appoint committees in visiting and treating with members concerned in importing Distilled Spirituous Liquors from the West India Islands and elsewhere either on their own account or as agents for others, and those who purchase and retail such liquors and also members engaged in distilling either in their own families, or encouraging or promoting it in others." Also, those who use spirits in their families as a medicine, keep in true moderation. Also, that "members in general refrain from using them in time of harvest or otherwise." Subordinate meetings to report there- after, accounts of their success to the Yearly Meeting annually.

FOR "THE FRIEND."
We Are Only Accountable for the Talents Which We Have Received.

BY C. S. COPE.

"Who does the best his circumstance allows, Does well, acts nobly, angel can no more."—
Dr. Young.

I know not how to thank the Lord
For blessings from his store;
His bounties fill my shallow cup
Till it is running o'er.

I feel my soul too narrow quite
To occupy his ways;
To swell a tide of thankfulness,
Or roll a wave of praise.

But let me strive to feel the force
That Heaven's kind breath shall send;
Co-operating in the life
That with it may attend.

The wavelet on the shallow pool;
The ripple on the stream;
The ocean's vast majestic roll,
To Him are all the same.

Niagara's strong exhaustless flood—
The little peaceful rill
Weeping unnoticed through the wood,
Alike his laws fulfill.

He hears alike the purling stream
Along its pebbly shore;
The voices of the mighty main,
And thundering cataract's roar.

He knows the length, He knows the breadth,
And He the depth can tell;
According as our volume is
So He accepts the well.

What'er my breadth, what'er my depth,
I'm measured by my span;
Then let me roll as deep a wave
Of praises as I can.

FOR "THE FRIEND."
Lines Written on the Sudden Death of Daniel Mott.

So soon, so sadly called,
From whence thou worked and loved and toiled,
From all earth's crystal ties—thy life
Snatched in a moment. From the cherished wife,
For whose sake many a year before,
Thou left the love of thy father's door,
And many other dear ones hast thou left behind,
Friends, loving brothers, and a daughter kind,
How many hearts are touched with this sad stroke!
Life's silver cord is loosed, and its golden bowl is broke!
When thou had learned how sweet it is to love and live;
How sweet it is to be forgiven and forgive,
When that best life within thee, in its bursting bloom,
Expanded to the earth, and ripened for the tomb;
When thou had grown so ready in the Master's eye,
For service in His Church, how strange that thou should die!

And we—thy fellow pilgrims—who, in former days,
Knew well thy manly form, and kindly ways,
And learned to look upon thee as a leader of our band,
And in a time of trouble grasp thy robed hand,
So freely given to the weakest and oppressed,
For in thy kindly counsel there was rest;
We too, feel the sad parting. Our ranks are being stripped,
Time after time, our hearts, as into Jordan dipped.

Oh! Lord, thy precious name be blest!
From our number it has been the ripest and the best.

To whom of late the solemn cry has come,
"Rise up to meet the heavenly harvest home."
While some of us, whose feet have wider strayed, Upon earth's barren mountains, and whose hearts have staid,
(Striving the while with thy sweet voice within),
Upon the meshes of some downward sin,

We still are granted in thy great mercy and thy love,
A little longer to prepare to meet thee up above;
Oh! touch our hearts at this sad vesper time.
Place thereupon an image and a superscription thine,
Make us to feel, as we ne'er have felt before,
That thou art a God to fear, love, honor and adore,
And oh! if some of us have wandered from thy fold,
In thy sweet mercy bring us back, and there our footsteps hold.

And ye, ye weeping ones, whose tear-dimmed eyes
Can scarce behold yon glory in the skies,
Can ye not feel around the vista of life's years,
That loving hand which wipes away all tears?
Can ye not feel that sympathy, which weeping stood
Where lay entombed best Martha's brotherhood?
Yea, He will come to us with healing oil and wine,
If we the prayer can offer up, "Thy precious will, not mine."

FOR "THE FRIEND."
Memoranda of William Kennard.

Twenty-second of Seventh Month. From here went to Seebrook, about eight miles. A small meeting of Friends; several who were not members, present. A satisfactory and edifying time, I trust, to many; for which I feel a thankful heart unto Him who gives a liberty and strength to do his will; Blessed be thy great and holy name, O Lord!

Dined at Edward Gove's, who with his wife are both ministers.

From here we went eighteen miles west, to Epping, and lodged at Benjamin Holson's.

First-day morning, 23rd of Seventh Month, attended Epping Meeting; and being brought myself under the baptizing power of the Holy Ghost and of fire, under which I had a sense of the state of the meeting, and the necessity of realizing this operating principle of Truth, which burns as a fire in an oven inwardly, and fervently, and consumes the chaff and the stubble, that it shall leave neither root nor branch; in those that "fear the name of the Lord, shall the Sun of Righteousness arise with healing in his wings." As my mind was kept close to the subject, there were Scripture openings, one thing after another, which connected together, as the links of a chain, impressing it upon the auditory in the authority of that power which "cut Rahab and wounded the Dragon," that it was of the utmost importance unto us, that we should believe and be baptized; that such as these should be saved, and he that believeth not, shall be damned; that in a state of unbelief, he cannot receive this purifying baptism, and that the hour of his judgment is come, who is glorified and sits upon the throne of his glory to judge the mount of Esau

—the first nature—"whose fan is in his hand, and He will thoroughly purge the floor, and gather the wheat into the heavenly garner, and the chaff He will burn with unquenchable fire; these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal."

My mind comfortable, having an evidence of the everlasting arms to be underneath.

From here we travelled about nine miles to Lee, having our kind friends John and Mehetable Holson for pilots.

Here we had a meeting at five o'clock, which was small and dull. Here I was also enabled to sound an alarm amongst them in the power of Truth to the humbling of my own mind. Oh! may all praise be ascribed unto Him who condescended to give the victory unto those who love Him.

Friends, very loving, kind and affectionate unto us.

Second-day morning, 24th of Seventh Month. From here we went to Dover, about four miles. Had a meeting at five o'clock, at Friends' Meeting House in the village, which contains about six thousand inhabitants. The people sat orderly, and appeared thoughtful. I sat through the meeting in much bodily suffering, having taken a cold a few days before; it settled on my breast, and brought on a rheumatic affection; however, I was enabled to appear in a short testimony, to the peace of my own mind, and to the tendering of many minds.

Was conducted to the house of our kind friend, John Brown, and lodged.

Twenty-fifth. Dined and wrote a letter to George M. Elkinton, Philadelphia; and in the afternoon went about fifteen miles in company with our kind friends, J. Brown and wife to Rochester Monthly Meeting.

Twenty-sixth. Attended the Monthly Meeting of Rochester, in which I labored much to stir up the pure mind by way of remembrance, to faithfulness and to obedience. Felt sweet peace of mind. Returned with our dear friend, J. B., and lodged.

Now 27th of Seventh Month. From here our said friend and his wife accompanied us to North Berwick Monthly Meeting, about eleven miles. Attended said meeting to pretty good satisfaction. Lodged at our kind friend, John D. Lang's.

Twenty-eighth. Had an appointed meeting at Oakwood; travelled eight miles. At this place I was favored to the humbling of my own heart, and the power of Truth rising into dominion over all opposing spirits, blessed be the name of the Lord! Returned again to J. D. L.'s and lodged.

Twenty-ninth. From Yarmouth we travelled about thirty-eight miles to Falmouth and lodged at Benjamin Winslow's, State of Maine.

First-day morning, 30th of Seventh Month. Attended Falmouth Meeting, which was rather a dull time, the "cloud resting upon the tabernacle" until near the close, when I arose with that subject, and kept to the opening which increased, and the meeting closed pretty comfortable. Here I met with a Friend by the name of Elijah Kennard. His great grandfather was from England and settled in Portsmouth, and had two sons; and one of them, when a small boy, took passage in a ship for England; the boy was never heard of after.

From here we went to Portland City, and were at meeting 3 o'clock, First-day afternoon. Lodged at the Widow Cabels.

Now Second-day morning, 31st of Seventh Month. From thence to Robert Pope's at Pow-nal, about twenty-two miles; had a small meeting at ten o'clock, in which I had good service, and [was] strengthened to relieve my mind, and left them with a peaceful heart.

From here we went to Durham about six miles. Had a meeting at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, which was largely attended by Friends and others; and as I sat waiting to feel the arising of the spring of life, I was enabled to stand up with a small opening, which as I kept to it increased from the ankle to the knees and unto the loins, in which my soul rejoiced in the opening and power of Truth that accompanied my mind, through a lengthy communication whilst addressing a large auditory, and closed in sweet and heavenly peace. Friends desired my stay until their meeting would come on of course; but I thought best to leave them in the hands of the Lord, after a favored opportunity; and we left in the morning of their meeting. At this place, W. F. had an uncommonly large meeting about thirty years ago, which was silent also.

Lodged at our kind friend, Thomas Jones's.

Fifth day of the week, and third of the Eighth Month, travelled twenty-three miles, and fell in with Litchfield Meeting of Friends in company with Joanna Meader; this also was a time of renewed favor; blessed be the Lord forever!

Whilst at Durham, lodged at Elisha Tuttle's; went to see the widow, late wife of Thomas Tuttle; also some aged and infirm people, and a young woman near to all appearance upon the confines of eternity, where many people were present, which proved through Divine help a humbling and a watering season, in which my soul rejoiced and praised the Lord for his goodness in continuing to go before, after that He put forth.

Fourth of Eighth Month, had another meeting by appointment at Litchfield, which was large and owned by the great head of the Church, in which I labored in testimony; after which I was drawn forth in supplication to the relief and peace of my own mind; blessed be the Lord forever!

Dined at Noah Farr's, where we lodged the night before. From here we went to Vassalborough, about twenty miles.

Lodged at Moses Starkey's.

Fifth Month Eighth. Had a meeting at Vassalborough on Seventh-day, which was a time of hard labor; the way seemed to be closing up fast, and I thereupon sat down; and after a time of waiting, the Divine Master condescended to pour out upon me the spirit of prayer and supplication, under which I was drawn forth publicly to address the throne of grace on behalf of the different situations present; after which, my mind was covered with sweet peace.

Dined at Moses Starkey's. In the afternoon went to see our dear friends, Valentine Meader and wife; also to visit a blind woman, a little way from there, which was a comfortable time, for which I felt thankful.

Five miles [to] East Vassalborough; lodged at Nathan Moore's, and was entertained by him relating a number of circumstances which occurred within the experience of David Sands.

Eighth Month Sixth. First day morning; had a meeting at East Vassalborough, which was silent, under which my mind was comfortable; also at five o'clock in the afternoon had a meeting [at a place] called The Neck, about five miles from the other. Here I had considerable service to pretty good satisfaction.

Lodged at James Jones's.

Seventh. Second-day; a good deal poorly. Went to see an aged Friend by the name of Benjamin Worth, in his eighty-ninth year, an approved minister, green in old age; his unaffected and judicious remarks were affecting; and among other things observed that the Lord had showed him whilst I sat by him that He had sent one of his servants unto their land to visit his flock; and thus imparted much good counsel to me.

He appeared near the Kingdom of Heaven and as a shock of corn fully ripe, only waiting his time to be gathered, which he also expressed.

From here we went about five miles and lodged at Daniel Tabers; where we met with our dear Friend, John Warren, who had come to see the Friend above named, who is to accompany him on a religious visit into Nova Scotia; a distance of about five or six hundred miles; to set out on their journey next week.

Third-day, made a visit to a family near the River Meeting on our way to Sidney Meeting, eight miles; lodged at Peter Paddock's.

Now Fourth-day morning; have an appointed meeting here to-day at 11 o'clock; very lame in my breast and shoulders with the rheumatism, which has been the case for several days, so as scarcely able to be about.

Yesterday received letters from home, which was grateful.

Attended said meeting in good satisfaction; a clear, open, and relieving opportunity; in which I felt sweet peace of mind, and a thankful heart unto the Lord for his manifold favors towards a poor unworthy worm of the dust.

Lodged at Edward Cook's.

Tenth of Eighth Month, rode about thirteen miles to East Vassalborough; attended Outlet Preparative Meeting; the life seemed to be at a low ebb; my mind, brought under an exercise and travail of spirit, that Zion might arise, arise, and shake herself from the dust of the earth; under which I stood up to communicate what was upon my mind; had hard work and close doctrine, and the way closing, I was obliged to sit down and to suffer with the suffering seed, and much oppressed, and almost ready to call in question the propriety of being at that meeting.

Dined at Nathan Moore's. From here went about fifteen miles, and lodged at John Warren's, a sweet spirited minister of the Gospel.

Eleventh of the month and 6th of the week, we rode eight miles to Unity Monthly Meeting, which was a precious time of heavenly favor; in which my soul rejoiced in drawing near unto Him of whom Moses in the Law and the Prophets did write "Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews." Had good service. At this meeting a young woman came by herself thirteen miles to be at a Friends' Meeting; it being the first that she ever attended, and was well satisfied; there also were three young men who came about fifteen or sixteen miles; two of whom had only attended one meeting of Friends before this, and were now satisfied to come under the care of Friends; informing of their desire of becoming members. There is much openness in the minds of many people in this eastern country towards Friends and the Truth as professed by them. Oh! may the Lord in the wisdom of his own counsel, hasten the day when his righteous knowledge "shall cover the earth, as the waters cover the seas."

Lodged at Clement Ratchiff's.

He who waits till all difficulties are removed, will never act.

Travels Among the Great Andes of the Equator.

The following passages are descriptive of the ascent of Chimborazo:

"At 7.30 A. M. we arrived at the foot of the lower series of the Southern Walls of Chimborazo, and the termination of the south-west ridge. Then the axes went to work, and the cliffs resounded with the strokes of the two powerful cousins, who lost no time in exploration, as they had already passed this place on Dec. 29th. The breach in the walls (for so it must be termed from want of a better expression), rose at an angle exceeding 50° and here, for the same reason as upon the arete we had quitted, snow could not accumulate to any depth and the major part of the daily fall slid away in streams, or tiny avalanches down to the less abrupt slopes beneath; while the residue, dissolved and refrozen, glazed the projecting rocks, and filled their interstices with solid ice. Thus far and no farther a man may go who is not a mountaineer. To our party it caused only a temporary check, for the work was enchanting to the Carrels after the uncommon labor in which they had been employed, and during a short term we made good progress—then, all at once, we were brought to a halt. Wind had been rising during the last half hour, and now commenced to blow furiously. It was certain we could not reach the summit on that day; so, getting down as quickly as possible, and depositing the instruments and baggage in crannies in the cliffs after reading the barometer, we fled for refuge to the tent, holding ourselves, however, in readiness to start again on the next morning.

"We again started from the third camp on Jan. 4th, at 5.40 A. M. The morning was fine and nearly cloudless, and profiting by the track made on the previous day we proceeded at first at a fair rate and finished the escalade of 'the breach' at about 8 o'clock. Then bearing away to the left, at first over snow and then over snow-covered glacier, we mounted in zig-zags, to ease the ascent. The great schrunds at the head of the Glacier de Thielmann were easily avoided; the smaller crevices were not troublesome; and the snow was in good order, though requiring steps to be cut in it. Jean-Antoine Carrel led, and my orders to him at starting were that we were to go slowly—the rest was left to his discretion.

"At about 11 A. M. the sky became overclouded, the wind rose, and we entered upon a track of exceedingly soft snow, which could not be traversed in the ordinary way. The leading man went in up to his neck, almost out of sight, and had to be hauled out by those behind. Imagining that we had got into a labyrinth of crevasses, we beat about right and left to try to extricate ourselves; and, after discovering that it was everywhere alike, we found the only possible way of proceeding was to flog every yard of it down, and then to crawl over it on all fours; and, even then one or another was frequently submerged, and almost disappeared.

"Needless to say, time flew rapidly. When we had been at this sort of work for three hours, without having accomplished half the remaining distance, I halted the men, pointed out the gravity of our situation, and asked them which they preferred, to turn or to go on. They talked together in patois, and then Jean-Antoine said, 'When you tell us to turn we will go back; until then we will go on.' I said, 'Go on,' although by no means feeling sure it

The only other charge made, during the whole time that the stock remains in the care of the company, is for feed. This is provided at the rate of $1.50 per cwt. for timothy hay, $1.00 per cwt. for prairie hay, and $1.00 per bushel for corn. For this the stock is loaded and unloaded, delivered to the pens, fed and watered, and the seller afforded direct facilities for communication with a hundred buyers."

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Columbus and Copenny.

A few weeks ago I spent a night at Columbus, N. J., a village which formerly went by the name of "encroaching corners," because one of the owners of the lots at the corners made by two cross roads, had built a house which protruded so far into the road that an offset had to be made in the public highway. The disagreeable name has been changed to Columbus, but the house still stands in its old position.

At the house of the friend, where I lodged, I was shown the old record book of the members of that Monthly Meeting—a well kept and very creditable record book it was. Among the names entered in it was that of Mary Black, who died in 1812 at the age of seven years. She was the little girl of whom William Williams, of Tennessee, relates such a remarkable anecdote in his journal.

He had been at her father's house in the course of a religious visit, and had had a sitting in the family. The little child was tendered, and she felt much attachment for him. A year or two afterwards he was again drawn to visit those parts, and when he got to the father's house, he says: "I soon looked for the little daughter, but I saw her not. I then asked for her, and saw the tears start in the eyes of her mother at the mention of her name. We sat awhile in solemn silence, and I spoke and said, "Is the child gone to rest?" She said, "She has," and then told me about her latter end. The child was taken sick, and in a little time afterwards told her mother that she should not live to get well again, but should die; and her mother asked her if she was willing to die. She said there was but one thing she wanted; that was to see that Friend who was from Tennessee: "If I could only see him once more, and hear him, I should be willing then to go to my heavenly Father, and leave all my dear friends behind," and thus she continued for many days. One day, as her mother was sitting by her bed with another friend, Mary lay still, as though she were asleep, for an hour or more; then she stirred, and her mother asked her if she wanted anything (meaning drink or any refreshment). She said no, and added, "I have wanted to see dear William Williams, but I shall not see him, but shall die; you will see him." "Oh, no, Mary," her mother said; "he lives a great way from here." "No matter for that; he is on his way now, and in time will be here, in this land, and thou wilt see him and hear him; and then give my love to him, and tell him I go to my Father, and his Father, there to wait his coming." So on the next day she quietly departed this life, when I was in Virginia, on my way to those parts."

During this same visit I had an opportunity of attending a meeting at the Friends' old Springfield meeting house, appointed on a First-day afternoon, at the request of a Friend who was paying a religious visit in that section of the country. This house is often spoken of as "Copenny," being situated on ground bordering on a creek of that name. The local history of Burlington Co., says of it: "The Friends' Meeting house at Copenny is nearly half a mile east of Jacksonville, beautifully situated in a grove upon the right bank of a sparkling little brook. This is one of the ancient historic landmarks of the latter century. Built of stone in 1775, during the Revolutionary War, it was used upon one or two occasions as a hospital; and tradition says that two or three severe skirmishes between the Yankees and the British took place near here."

The house is under the care of those who left us in the separation of 1827, but no regular meeting is now held in it. On the occasion now referred to it was pretty well filled, and a solemn quiet covered the assembly. Attention was called to the necessity of individual submission to the operations of Divine grace on the heart, and of obeying our Saviour's command to deny ourselves and take up the daily cross. The attention of those present was called to the inestimable value of the visitations of the grace of God, for even when his leadings were contrary to our natural inclinations, they were the means appointed by our heavenly Father to lead us to heaven and happiness.

Some years ago there was published in THE FRIEND a poetical description of the place, written by Dr. Joseph Pancoast, a distinguished surgeon, who removed from that neighborhood and settled in Philadelphia. J. W.

WHAT A man does now as his best work, is largely the outcome of what he has been getting ready to do for a long time before now. Long preparation is essential to high performance, even though the performance itself seem easily and quickly done. The flowering of a century-plant takes but a brief time finally; but long years of slow preparing were needful to make that plant ready for the work of those few days. Moses had the study of a generation in the world's greatest university, and the training of a generation in the practice school of the wilderness, to fit him for his work of bringing out, in a single night, the Hebrews from bondage into a new national life. And so it is with every man of God in every sphere; he must be trained for great service before great service is a possibility with him. Let no young man fear that he is losing time while he is filling up in anticipation of outgiving. Better service can often be done in one year by one who has been ten years in training for that service, than would be possible for that same person in twenty years without such preliminary training.

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 16, 1892.

In the Discipline of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, under the heading of "Births and Burials," occurs the following paragraph: "It is the sense of this meeting, that no monuments either of wood or stone be affixed to graves in any of our burial grounds." The date of this advice, 1706, shows that the testimony of the Society of Friends on this subject is one of ancient date. The word monument means something placed to preserve the memory of a person or event; one of its most common applications is to tombstones or other appendages to a grave inscribed with the name and other particulars respecting the deceased person, whose body was interred at the spot. In very ancient times heaps of stones were sometimes erected as monuments to preserve the remembrance of some incident or agreement. Thus in the 31st chapter of Genesis, it is related that when Jacob parted from his father-in-law Laban, they took stones and made an heap, which was to be a witness of the friendship that was between them. The custom of erecting piles of stones is still observed in some parts of Central Asia.

Among some of the nations of antiquity, especially the Egyptians, a remarkable degree of care was taken to preserve the inanimate forms of the dead; and their elaborate and hidden tombs are now objects of great curiosity. In explanation of this custom, it is stated, that it was an opinion of the ancient Egyptians, that after a lapse of many thousand years their souls would come to re inhabit their bodies if the latter were preserved entire.

A degree of a kindred belief, which I hope without offence to any, I may call superstition, has prevailed among many of the professors of Christianity; so that it has led them to regard the corpses of the dead, and the place of their interment with an excessive degree of reverence, as if those they had loved and honored during life were still in some manner present in the deserted tenement.

Abrose, one of the early Christian Fathers, in explaining why he honored the flesh of deceased martyrs says: "I honor the body, which with Christ shall reign in heaven." Similar views are expressed by several other of the ancient Christian writers.

But the Society of Friends, while firmly believing in the reality of a resurrection from the dead—that the souls of all who have lived must appear before the judgment seat of Christ to give an account of the deeds done in the body—yet have seen no sufficient Scripture testimony to lead them to adopt that theory, that these outward bodies of flesh and blood shall again be restored to physical life. The Apostle Paul writes to the Corinthians that it is a spiritual body that is raised from the dead—so when those we have loved pass from earth, we do not think of them as lying under the sod of the ground where their bodies were laid, but as enjoying a spiritual life—if they have submitted to the refining operations of grace—among saints and angels and the spirits of the just made perfect.

It is desirable that the body should be decently interred in such a manner that it may be speedily restored into its original elements without injuring the health of the living.

We believe the testimony of Friends against funeral monuments had a twofold bearing—one to discourage the unnecessary display which wealth and affection might prompt some to indulge in; and the other to bear a testimony to the spiritual views we hold as to the resurrection.

Thomas Clarkson in his "Portraiture of Quakerism," says: "It is to many an endearing thought, that they shall lie after their death near the remains of those whom they loved in life. But the Quakers in general have not thought it right or wise to indulge such feelings. They believe that all good men, however their bodies may be separated in their subterranean houses of clay, will assuredly meet at the resurrection of the just."

They reject also the fashions of the world in the use of tombstones and monumental inscriptions."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The People's Party Convention at Omaha, last week nominated James B. Weaver, of Iowa, as their candidate for President of the United States, and James G. Field, of Virginia, for Vice-President. In their platform, free and unlimited silver coinage is demanded; the abolition of banking corporations; the setting up of the San-Treasury loan office; the resumption of the income tax; a tariff for revenue only and the ownership and control of the railroads, telegraph and telephone by the Government.

On the 8th inst., in the House, under suspension of the rules, it being "suspension" day by a special order, the bills reducing the duty on tin plate, the Lead Ore bill, and the bill to limit the amount of wearing apparel which travellers may bring into this country free of duty, were all passed, after some little filibustering by the Republicans.

Details of the seizure of the British steamer Coquilum, dispatched by the Sealers' Association of Victoria, have been received by the State and Treasury Departments.

It appears that the Coquilum entered a harbor of the United States, not a port of entry, without a permit to land cargo, and after a short stay, she received cargo, in violation of the law, and engaged in towing within the jurisdiction of the United States, and has for these acts subjected herself and cargo to confiscation and her officers and crew to fine and imprisonment.

The officers of Victoria concede that the seizure is a blow which will cut off further sealing for this year, as only 12 of the large fleet of Canadian vessels had received their supplies before the Coquilum was taken in charge by the United States revenue cutter Corwin, and the remainder will be compelled to give up their trips and return home.

It is reported that the poachers have been unusually active; the weather has been favorable; the slaughter indiscriminate and unrestrained, and as a consequence of these circumstances, and of the unprecedentedly large fleet, the catch to date aggregates upwards of 24,000 seals, the largest ever made in the North Pacific.

The Advocate of this city says:—"The greatest religious convention that has ever assembled in this country is now in session in New York, and the spectacle is both impressive and significant. The 20,000 men and women who have come from every State in the Union and from many far distant lands as delegates to the International Convention of the Young People's Societies of Christian Endeavor in no wise resemble the riotous rabble of a quadrennial political gathering, but they represent the best thought and the strong, earnest, unbiased convictions of more than one million Christian people. The army of which they are the chosen standard-bearers wages no war against men or petty, ephemeral questions, but carries on an active fight against the undermining influences of scientific belief or unbelief." The Convention is what the Ledger correspondent calls "radical and uncompromising," on the subject of prohibition. John G. Winant in a speech said: "Vote so that I may not give the saloons stop," which was received with "cheers long continued."

Gustave Temple, of St. Louis, the first man to be tried on the charge of stealing electricity, was acquitted on the 9th inst. The Judge would not concede that it was a crime, and the jury, after a long deliberation, had to acquit. The jury had tapped an electric light wire to illuminate his store.

Terrible rioting occurred on the 6th inst., at the plants of the Carnegie Iron and Steel Company, at Homestead, near Pittsburg. A mob of 100 workmen objected to three hundred Pinkerton men, who were towed down the Monongahela River from Pittsburg, entering the works, and when they landed, a pitched battle took place and the Pinkerton men were driven back to their barges, where they were held overnight. In the afternoon, when they surrendered, leaving their arms in the barges, and were arrested and locked up. As far as could be ascertained at midnight, eleven workmen and nine Pinkerton men were killed, and 18 workmen and 21 Pinkerton men wounded in the battle. In addition to about 100 Pinkerton men, some 500 were held by the strikers while on their way to the jail after the surrender.

On the application of the Sheriff of Allegheny County and his representation that he had failed to secure a posse of deputies large enough to cope with the rioters, Governor Pattison has called out the entire National Guard of Pennsylvania, about 8,000 men; and the Guard had responded, and are now occupying the Carnegie works.

The Ledger of this city, although professing to believe that high license in this city is a success, notwithstanding that the consumption of liquors is increasing enormously, reports 322 arrests in 24 hours on the 4th inst. Editorially the Ledger says: Fire water was responsible for more serious hospital cases than any other cause of death in this city. Whatever differences of opinion there may be as to the right way of celebrating the National holiday it is generally agreed that the worst way of doing so is by getting drunk.

The number of deaths in this city last week was reported to be 470, which is 17 less than last week, and 22 more than the corresponding week last year. There were 178 children under one year of age; 217 were males and 258 females; 99 died of cholera infantum; 47 of consumption; 30 of diseases of the heart; 26 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 20 of marasmus; 16 of pneumonia; 15 of paralysis; 15 of diphtheria; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of inanition; 16 of puerperia and 11 of debility.

FOREIGN.—The English Parliamentary elections are absorbing public attention. While the contests so far exhibit a number of surprises, the confidence of Gladstone's friends that the Conservatives will be in a minority is not founded on reason. It is true, however, will be closer than the Liberals anticipated, and it may be that Gladstone will not have a majority excluding the Irish representatives. That the Liberal members will be less numerous than was claimed is largely due to the fact that the grand old man has not entirely lost the views of the Labor Party in his professions of English, and the further course that the squabbling of the Parnellites and anti-Parnellites has turned against Home Rule many Englishmen who otherwise would have backed up Gladstone's opinions.

A Paris dispatch to the London Exchange Telegraph Company, says: A secret convention has been signed by England, Spain and Italy for the partition of Morocco.

On the 10th inst fourteen deaths attributed to cholera were reported in Paris. Professor Peter, of the Necker Hospital, expresses the opinion that the prevailing malarial is true Asiatic cholera. On the other hand, Dr. Treutinger and other physicians who have had wide experience in the East, are equally positive that it is not Asiatic cholera.

Louis Pasteur, who is well known for the results he has achieved in inoculating persons to prevent hydrophobia, is ill at his residence at Garches, near St. Cloud, near Paris, and is expected to be long in bed. His friends are anxious concerning his condition. He is confined to his bed.

All arrivals at Spanish ports from Russia and other parts of Eastern Europe are subject to quarantine. Extraordinary precautions are taken at the French frontier, and the cargo is inspected and being prepared in Madrid and disinfectants are distributed freely. One million pesetas has been set apart to defray the expense of preventive measures.

On the 8th inst, 191 new cases of cholera and thirty-two deaths were reported in Astrakhan, sixty-three cases and six deaths in Saratoff, eighteen cases and thirty-seven deaths at Baku, six deaths in Tiflis, and nine new cases in Tarsin.

Three thousand emigrants from infected districts are reported at Astrakhan. They are in a miserable condition, being without medical attendance and food and not being scarce. The Caspian flotilla is seizing all vessels that try to evade quarantine. Large numbers of the inhabitants are fleeing from Astrakhan and Saratoff.

The Bulgarian Government is taking rigorous measures to prevent the importation of cholera into Bulgaria. All Russian arrivals at Bulgarian ports are subjected to a severe quarantine.

The Berlin Westdeutsche Zeitung publishes a history of the Bismarck crisis, wherein it says: "When the Emperor had twice summoned him to resign, Prince Bismarck refused, but sent instead a document containing the reasons for his refusal, and representing dangers that he saw menacing Germany in the future." The tenor of the article gives the impression that Prince Bismarck is about to publish the document referred to.

The representative of the Associated Press at Berlin reports that a series of disclosures giving the entire history of events from the time of Prince Bismarck's dismissal from the Chancellorship up to the present moment is now in progress of official preparation. The period of the publication of the work will depend upon Prince Bismarck's further utterances.

A further eruption of Mount Etna occurred on the 10th inst. The Mayor of Nicolosi declares that a triple eruption of this volcano is impending. The inhabitants of the city of Catania and the surrounding country are in a state of consternation.

Dr. Peters, the African explorer, has discovered enormous sulphate beds between Mount Kilima-Njaro and the volcano Donjo Ngai. The whole great territory between Kilima-Njaro and Donjo Ngai is reputed to be one great sulphate bed.

Yellow fever is reported to be raging in Vera Cruz, Mexico, and many deaths have already occurred. Many of the native families have removed to the City of Mexico and other places.

There is said to be a general panic at Victoria, British Columbia, over the epidemic of small-pox. Several of the leading hotels have been closed.

residence of Elder J. H. Smith, near Plymouth, Ohio, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. This dear Friend was firmly attached to the doctrines and testimonies of our religious Society as held by our worthy predecessors in the Truth. He was a diligent attendee of all our religious meetings as long as health permitted. He bore a long and painful illness, and his patient resignation to the Divine will, being blind for a considerable time before his death, and passed quietly away as one falling into a sweet sleep. His relatives and friends have a well-grounded hope that he has been permitted through adorable mercy to enter one of those heavenly mansions at Poplar Ridge, N. Incidents and Reflections.—No. 266.

DREAMS AND VISIONS.

There are many interesting and remarkable instances recorded in which persons have seen, or fancied they saw, often in dreams, scenes such as mortal eyes never gazed upon. Without presuming to penetrate hidden mysteries, we think, in most of these cases, the sensations of the brain have so affected the individual as to convey the impression that the objects supposed to be seen were actually present before them. But whatever the physical explanation may be, there is abundant evidence that the Almighty sometimes in this manner visits his children for the accomplishment of his own designs, and gives them warnings, encouragement or counsel, which are of great value.

A remarkable narrative of the kind is the account of a trance, or vision, of Sarah Alley, which happened on First-day evening, the twenty-fifth of Second Month, 1798, as taken from her own mouth the twenty-seventh of the same month, in the hearing of divers persons:

"I was in my usual health, sitting by the fireside, about six o'clock in the evening, when, without being sensible of pain or ail, I fell (as I was afterwards told) from my chair, and lay apparently lifeless for the space of four or five hours, notwithstanding every means and effort was used to restore me. As I fell, I suppose I left the body, and found a guide ready to take charge of and conduct me, which I knew to be an angel, and who conducted me throughout. He first took me to the borders of that lake and pit where there is continual weeping and lamentation. I went so near the sides and borders of it that it seemed as if I should have fallen therein had not my guide prevented by taking hold of me and steadying me along, and as I passed along the confines of this burning lake I beheld abundance of people who appeared to be in the utmost anxiety, distress and unutterable misery, sitting one above another, the flames of fire shooting up between them. I also saw the enemy and adversary of man's happiness; he seemed chained with a large and pretty long chain, and as I was passing along he endeavored to lay hold of me, making furiously toward me and advancing within the apparent space of a rod or two, but his chain prevented his reaching me. I also saw on the banks of this horrid pit many people that seemed going into it with the greatest rapidity, and, as it were, the fire flaming out of their mouths and eyes. One man that I saw I knew well, and on my asking him what was the occasion of his being in torment, he answered, "Not because I have not done justice between man and man, but I have not been faithful to my God." He desired me to go and warn his family and friends to do better than he had done, otherwise it would soon be too late to escape following after him.

I was then conducted by my guide to the place of happiness, where I saw Christ and the Holy Angels, around Him an abundance of people clothed in white robes; but I could not discern or distinguish one from another so as to know them, not being suffered to enter the Kingdom, though I desired the liberty of going in, my guide telling me I must return quickly to the world, for I could not have entrance here. He then conducted me to the body, in which I waked."

After her giving the above relation, the writer of this was informed by her parents that she appeared like one waking out of sleep, and there being several persons present she spoke considerable to them of what she had seen, etc., and pressingly advised them to take warning by her; and after continuing about three-quarters of an hour in this situation she was again apparently gone for about the space of three hours, and then appeared to come to, as one waking out of sleep. In regard to her latter vision she gave the following account, viz:

"I found my guide still with me; he conducted me immediately to the place of rest and happiness, seeing nothing of the burning lake as we passed along. Upon our arrival at the place of happiness I was very desirous to have an entrance, being so near that I saw many that I knew, and on conversing with them they entreated me to alter my way of life and conduct, and to walk in the strait and narrow path, and that by-and-by, if I continued to do so, I should enter there and be their companion. They appeared to be sitting, and in a situation of perfect peace and happiness, God sitting above them. My guide told me which he was, though He did not converse with me. I also saw Christ. He seemed a little before the rest, of whom I begged an entrance into that peaceful situation. I knew Him from others, his appearance being more personal and far more glorious; but Christ told me that I could not enter there yet; I must return to the world and warn the people thereof to do better and repent, and that I must get, and keep, in the narrow road myself, and that if I did so I should, by-and-by, have an entrance among the blessed, and that if the people did not repent and turn into the strait and narrow way it would soon be too late, and they would fall into the lake that burns with fire and brimstone. I thought I saw a person that I well knew, and as we conversed together he pressingly desired me to warn his family and relations to change their way of walking, and to walk in the strait and narrow road, for he apprehended there were some of them walking in the broad way which leads to destruction; he positively mentioned those of them that I must go to with the message. Christ then told me to be faithful to the charges now given me, and to the trust committed to my care, not to fail warning the people, as I had been directed; to warn all my companions and the dear youth to be sure to leave the broad way, and to walk in the strait and narrow road that leads to happiness; that life was short, and there was no other way to enter the Kingdom but by walking therein. The charge was then pressingly renewed to me to be sure to get in, and continue to walk in the narrow and strait path myself, there being no other way for me to arrive to happiness. After this they joyfully bid me farewell. My guide then conducted me back to the body."

The writer of this learned by inquiry that the young woman who gave the above relation has been a person much addicted to liberty and lightness, and not accustomed to bear the yoke nor take up the Cross, having manifested very little fruits of a religious, thoughtful life, neither had a change been obvious in her previous to the above circumstance. She, nevertheless, when this affecting account was taken, appeared remarkably composed, solid and weighty; delivered it with great clearness and pertinence; evidently a mind deeply sensible of her situation, and the obligations she was under, in being thus favored with this remarkable visitation. At the close of her delivering it, she expressed divers weighty, solemn truths in a feeling, seeking manner which affected most present.

A few months since Richard Wheatley furnished to the Christian Advocate, of New York, the account of the rescue, on the Banks of Newfoundland, of the crew of the fishing schooner, Lizzie Griffin, from Gloucester, Mass., on the first of Ninth Month, 1890. On the morning of that day the vessel had been struck and greatly damaged by a cyclone, being stripped of all her upper gear. She drifted helplessly at the mercy of the waves till late in the afternoon, when the crew were rescued by another fishing schooner, the Sigrid, Captain Petersen.

How the latter came to be on hand at this most opportune season is the most remarkable part of the narrative. She was engaged in the cod-fishery, while the Lizzie Griffin was in quest of halibut. The two were bound for different parts of the Grand Bank, and would not naturally have sighted each other. Both were overtaken by the tempest when between thirty and forty miles apart. Captain Petersen states that he was making directly for the southern part of the Grand Bank when he was suddenly and powerfully impressed by the conviction that he ought to change the course of his schooner

The feeling of obligation finally became so strong that, without looking at the chart, he called out to the man at the wheel, bidding him "Head her sou'-sou'-east!"

After following the new course for several hours Captain Petersen descended to the cabin, undressed, and prepared himself for much-needed sleep, but this was not obtained. An irresistible desire to go on deck immediately seized upon him. Dressing hastily he gained the deck, just in time to catch sight of the stars and stripes, upside down, waving from the mainmast stump of the Lizzie Griffin. Had he been two minutes later the doom of the perishing would have been sealed, for none of the Sigrid's men had sighted the foundering wreck. Fearful cross seas were raging, but notwithstanding their menaces the gallant captain and crew of the Sigrid rescued the imperiled fishermen on the Lizzie Griffin. Their own lives were in grievous jeopardy from a heroic enterprise that to them was one of the commonplace and necessary duties of a seafaring vocation, and that involved a loss of about $2,000 to Captain Petersen, his crew, and owners. They can see nothing in the action worthy of special praise. There was the peril of drowning men, and there was the duty of rescue, and the duty was done—and that is all there is about it. Such is their settled opinion. Landsmen may look differently upon the splendid exploit, and congratulate themselves upon the fact that America produces such descendants of Norse vikings.

Not only had Captain Petersen—who, we understand, is not a professedly Christian man, nor superstitious, nor a believer in dreams, except as psychological curiosities—these single impulses to unpremeditated performances, but he had also, on the night of Eighth Month 30th, before the storm, what may be loosely termed a prophetic dream. In this, he states that he imagined that he had fallen in with an American fisherman in distress, and that he rescued her crew under circumstances closely similar to those which actually presented themselves in a day or two after. His first exclamation when within hailing distance of Captain Griffin was: "My dream has come true!"

Believers in Divine revelation, and therefore believers in the efficacy of prayer, direct and intercessory, will see no improbability, scientific or otherwise, in the supposition that through Divine agency or permission the "coming events cast their [dreams] shadows before"; that the Holy Spirit, or some spirit commissioned by Him, suggested to Petersen the immediate change of his course to the south-south-east, and also impelled him at the proper time to hurry up on deck and look for those who might need his aid. Nor will such believers doubt that these freshawindings, suggestions and impulses may have been in loving response to the prayers of Christian friends for the deliverance of relatives doing business upon the great waters.

FOREBODINGS of evil are a more potent cause of trouble than evils that are present. If the element of dread of that which seems likely to come, or of sorrow for an anticipated lack, were eliminated from our personal troubles of mind, we should find it comparatively an easy matter to bear up under the burdens of the present. Yet the future can safely be left with God,—as he alone knows what it will bring to us, and has power to make it, not only endurable, but joyous.

Exercises of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting Respecting Intoxicating Liquors.

1789.—"The Concern and Labour of Friends to discourage the Distillation, Importation, selling or using Spirituous Liquors, having been blessed with some success, a Continuation of Care is desired and as the unnecessary frequenting Taverns and places of Diversion has a dangerous tendency to alienate and hurt the mind, it is most affectionately recommended to our beloved youth and others, carefully to shun and avoid those plausible Snares which are laid by the Enemy of all good for their essential Hurt and real injury, and that Friends be careful to use moderation on the account of marriages, births and burials, and on all other occasions."

1791.—A committee appointed by the Yearly Meeting brought in a report (not on the Minutes). It was directed to the Quarterly and Monthly Meetings, to "unitedly give Close attention to the Minutes made on this subject in the year 1788, and make Report of their proceedings next year."

1792.—Answer to the 4th Query, "Frequenting Taverns and places of ensnaring amusements it is feared is too little adhered by divers. * * * Though a good Degree of Moderation is observed by many, yet an Increase is allowed to be necessary in relation to Births and Marriages."

The Yearly Meeting adopted a Minute of advice on these subjects as follows: "The accounts sent up from the several Quarters respecting their Continued attention to the Cases of those who distil, vend or Import Spirituous Liquors and who are in the unnecessary Use thereof were read and divers instructive remarks were made to excite Friends to Diligence in fervent Labour with such who continue to engage in these employments and Monthly and Quarterly Meetings are desired to extend further care as heretofore directed in these respects and send an account to this meeting in their Report next year."

1792.—"The Concern of the Body respecting the Distillation, dealing in and use of Spirituous Liquors appears to have been attended to in the several Quarters, and Labour extended occasionally by Committees of Monthly and Quarterly Meetings, some of the Reports being expressive of a degree of encouraging Prospects, most of those visited acknowledging the righteousness of Friends' Testimony herein, though some in the different Meetings appear entangled by Apprehensions of a Necessity to continue a Traffic in this pernicious Article. One Report expressing that, upon the whole, it does not appear that the Concern has gained Ground since last year."

1793.—Report was made that committees in some of the Quarterly and Monthly Meetings have visited such professing with us, who are in the practice of dealing in or promoting the unnecessary use of distilled Spirituous Liquors, some of whom have declined the Business, and others acknowledge the Righteousness of our Testimony, yet greater readiness to relinquish the prospect of gain thro' that channel is still wanting in some, and three of the Quarters intimate that they do not apprehend Friends' Testimony has gained Ground the last year."

A committee appointed to consider the subject made the following Report, which being solidly attended to, the same was with much unanimity united with:

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"We, the Committee appointed to take into consideration the subject of distilled Spirituous Liquors, having met and weightily deliberated thereon, as also examined former Minutes of the Yearly Meeting on the subject, agree to report: That it is our united sense and judgment, it would be expedient for the Yearly Meeting to recommend to the Quarterly and Monthly Meetings, to continue their cares in a strict observance of the advices handed down by Minutes of 1777 and 1788, and if any should reject the advice of their Friends by continuing the practice of Importing or vending distilled spirituous Liquors either on their own account or as agents for others, or distil or retail such Liquors, or sell, or grind Grain for the use of distillation, that such should not be employed in any Services in the Church; nor their Contributions received for the use thereof; and a clear and explicit account of the State of their members, with the Care of Meetings to such herein be sent up next Year. And we further propose, if any should distil Spirits out of grain, or retail such Liquors, that Monthly Meetings should deal with them as with other offenders, and if they cannot be prevailed upon to desist from such a practice, be at Liberty to declare their disunity with them."

1795.—"The promoting a free use of distilled Spirits by distilling, importing, or vending them as a Commodity in Trade, on a revival of the subject, exciting a degree of fervent zeal, under the influence whereof, the ruin and desolation proceeding from an imtemperate use of this inflammatory article both in individuals and Nations, was affectingly set forth; and the Minute of this Meeting thereon last year being recurred to, its purport is afresh recommended to Quarterly and Monthly Meetings, which are exhorted to a continued exercise of faithful labour, in patient stability guarding against discouragement, which, given way to, will disqualify for this necessary service, of the effect whereof they are desired to give account to this meeting next year."

1796.—"The Meeting being at this time painfully exercised with the accounts of many remaining so under the influence of the Idolatrous Spirit of Covetousness as to prefer temporal Gain to unity with their Brethren in a firm, unshaken testimony against the unnecessary use of and profits sought from a traffic in Spirituous Liquors, under the weight and pressure of this deeply interesting concern, Quarterly and Monthly Meetings are afresh urged to renewed, patient and persevering labour with such, manifesting that the practice if continued in by any of our Members, cannot admit of any Countenance while there is a faithful adherence to the Divine Principle of Good will to Men."

1800.—"An Exercise is maintained for promoting the Concern of this meeting respecting distilled Spirituous liquors, this subject having obtained the weighty attention of the Quarters, in the extension of care towards such in membership who are engaged in trading in or distilling this article—and altho' not much progress has been made in exalting this righteous testimony, there is nevertheless reason to believe that the labour bestowed has not been unfruitful of some good effects. The Western Quarter proposes for consideration whether it may not be reasonable that some further advancement be made in this testimony."

"The importance of our testimony concerning distilled Spirituous liquors claimed renewed deliberation, with desires that an advancement therein may not be impeded or our hands weakened thro' an unfaithful Compliance with the supposed necessary use thereof, and that Quarterly and Monthly Meetings continue the exercise of further care towards such of their members as may be engaged either in trading in, distilling, retailing, or unnecessary use of those liquors—accounts of which labour to be forwarded to the Meeting next year. As the consideration of this subject embraces the request from the Western Quarter, and no way appearing with clearness to advance further in the testimony at this time, a renewed consideration thereof is referred to our meeting next year."

1801.—"The subject of spirituous liquors has obtained solid attention and regard in the several meetings, from the accounts whereof it appears that there are 15 members engaged in distillation, 50 that deal in or retail this article and several others who frequently use it in the time of harvest or otherwise; several of the Quarters mention that some of their members are concerned in the practice, but do not specify the number, and that there are also divers who have their fruit or Cider converted into Spirits. To nearly all those whose conduct has given occasion of concern and pain on this account, visits have been made and brotherly endeavors used to dissuade them from a practice so repugnant to the advice of the Body and their own religious benefit; and tho' a degree of comfort is derived from a prospect of amendment in some places, a few seeming desirous of becoming disentangled from the business, yet in general little real advancement in this testimony has been made since last year."

"The advancement of our testimony against the improper use and traffic in distilled Spirituous liquors obtaining renewed weighty attention, it is believed that the importance thereof, justifies the appointment of a Committee to take the subject under their solid consideration." Sixty-six Friends were named to constitute this committee who reported at a later session of the meeting. (Report not given). Various sentiments were expressed thereon and the subject postponed 'to the next annual assembly.'

(To be continued.)

For "THE FRIEND."

Revelation.

The knowledge of God and of his Son, is eternal life. It is through the revelations of the Spirit of God, that we know the Son, who plainly declareth of the Father. For the Father sent the Son, as the Son sent the Spirit, and as he that received the Son who testified of the Father received the Father also, so doth he that receives the spirit, who testifies of the Son, receive the Son, and with the Son the Father also.

God hath in all ages of the world afforded this knowledge to man, for he plainly declares, he "will have all men come to a knowledge of the truth."

No man ever knew the Son of God as such, not even at the time of his incarnation, but by the revelations of the Spirit, nor can any now know Him to be their Saviour but by the same revelation of the Spirit of God. But God visits all, and pleads with all by the visitations of his Spirit that all may come to believe in Jesus.

That God made himself and the knowledge of his will, known to the ante- and post-diluvian patriarchs is left on record to Adam, Cain, Enoch, Noah, Abraham and Jacob, not excepting those who perished in the flood, when once the long suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, for God said, "My spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh."

And yet has God condescended to corroborate this certain and infallible evidence by other means, which are nevertheless always dependent on the revelation by the spirit, which alone is truly all sufficient and essential, and without which the others are of no avail.

The works of created nature all silently declare "The hand that made us is Divine." No one of a sound mind beholding them can but acknowledge in them that we behold his power, but not himself. Yet in marvellous condescension to the blindness of unbelieving man, God wrought miracles.

To those who already believe God, and know his teachings, by his spirit, neither the works of outward creation, nor miracles, can any further declare Him. And miracles like those wrought through Moses before Pharaoh, and like those to Gideon, were not sent as to a believing people, but that they might believe the testimony of the spirit. Thus also in the days of Christ and his apostles, the Jews required these signs, and God having given to them the Law by the hand of Moses, with many and stupendous miracles, condescended to declare as divine the mission of Jesus Christ his Son, whose servant Moses was, by such miracles as even Moses did not perform, for Jesus wrought them by his own inherent Divine power, and Moses only as God directed him.

Jesus when glorified, sent the Spirit of Promise, to be as the vicar of Christ, with the church forever, and this spirit was to lead and to guide them out of all error into all truth.

God having given the Jews miracles at the establishment of the law, in condescension to them and their time honored belief and so also, at the abrogation of the same, when he was about to bring in a higher spiritual dispensation, even an everlasting one, that of the Gospel of his son.

But the Gentiles, never having been brought under the Jewish covenant, nor having witnessed the hand of God in so miraculous a manner as God's own people, needed not now the same, as we see exemplified in the reception of the gospel by Cornelius and his household. And though the mighty miracles wrought by God on the Egyptians and afterwards in the Promised land, struck terror into the hearts of the Egyptians and dwellers in Palestine, these failed to convert them, as in subsequent ages those of Christ and the Apostles also did the apostate Jews. God, who knoweth the heart of man declared of the Jews that not believing the writings of Moses and the prophets which testified of Christ, neither could they believe though one should rise from the dead, and how is this awful hardness and unbelief of the unregenerate heart of man illustrated by the conduct of the rulers of the Jews towards Lazarus, whom Christ had raised from the dead, yet did they through envy seek to put Him also to death, because that through Him, many believed on Jesus—and yet these teachers of the Jews thought that they themselves believed the Scriptures.

The Gospel then which is the power of God to salvation to every one that believeth is preached to the Gentiles, as it was to Abraham, and to his progenitors, through a long line of ancestry even to Adam, and the spirit by the coming and death of Christ, being now more abundantly poured out from on high, it is preached in the demonstration of his spirit and of power, and God doth set his seal thereto by the witness of his spirit to the truth, which he placeth in the hearts of all. Thus believing and hearing Him for ourselves we cannot but accept the records of that same spirit, and of the mighty acts of the Father and the Son as recorded in Holy Writ, and these thus make wise unto salvation, through faith in Jesus Christ, yet these of themselves alone (in conjunction with man's will and power,) can never implant that saving faith itself.

And as the surest evidence as to the nature of the light proceeding from the sun is the innate knowledge of the eye formed to perceive that light, so to him who hath the eye of the spirit the most irrefragable proof as to the Holy Scriptures being the word of God, is the witness of that spirit.

Revelation, then, is the first and the last, whilst miracles and prophecy with its fulfilment, and the Holy Scriptures containing a record of the same, are intermediate and corroborative evidence, truly comforting, confirming and establishing those who by the power of God are brought into the faith once delivered to the saints. Like Enoch to walk with God, like Abraham, to whom God said, "Walk thou before me and be perfect," so is it now said to us by Abraham's Lord and our Lord, "Follow me," and they who follow and "are led by the spirit of God are the sons of God." Like David these say to their soul, "Wait thou only upon God, for my expectation is from him" (Ps. lxxii: 3). Again, "Behold as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God, until that He have mercy upon us." (Ps. exxiii: 2).

Jesus then is "the author and finisher of the saints' faith," their Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end. He it is who leadeth them out from the bondage of sin, through the wilderness, trials and temptations wherein he proves and perfects their faith, and as faithful he leadeth them through all to living fountains of life, opened to all, through his love and mercy. And when all created things fade away, and all evidence, received through the natural senses, is forgotten, then shall that more sure word of prophecy shine brightly forth in the day of Christ and the living presence of Him, the Eternal word, that liveth and abideth forever, be felt secretly sustaining the soul by his own glorious power.

Eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man, the good things that God hath prepared for those that love him, but God hath revealed them unto us by his spirit, for the spirit searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God. The Lord hides these glories from the wise and prudent of this world, and reveals them unto babes in Christ, for except we become as little children we cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven. O Christian! oft walking as it were alone and in a tribulated path, watch and wait for the revelation of Jesus Christ to thy soul, for it is assuredly the only key that opens the door of heaven.

THE enemies of the Church in all ages of the world have been the world, the flesh, the devil and formalism and dry hireling literalism. When these enemies get a strong hold on the church, she soon loses her power for good and sits down in ease and listens to the charmer. Christ says; Listen to me, follow me.

SELECTED.

"To shun the world's allurements,
To bear my cross therein;
To turn from all temptation,
To conquer every sin;
To linger, calm and patient,
Where duty bids me stay;
To go where God may lead me—
This is my work to-day.

"I think not of to-morrow,
His trial or its task,
But still, with child-like spirit,
For the present mercies ask.
With each returning morning,
I cast old things away;
Life's journey lies before me—
My prayer is for to-day.

THE TWO GARDENS.

BY BENJAMIN W. BACON.

Between two gardens winds the narrow track
Trodden by all our weary human feet;
A while we pause, and longly look back,
And fancy see the Garden of Eden sweet,
Ah! vanished innocence and joy of childhood's day,
Conscience with sword of flame bars all the backward way.

But look we forward then: the thorny road
Leads to Gethsemane, garden of death and night,
Marked by the blood-drops of the Son of God,
He who through suffering entered into light.
Angel of death, 'tis thou that ministerest here,
Since Eden's gates were closed thy form has hovered near.

We counted it a prize to equal God
In knowing good and evil; sought to seize
By theft the right to choose the path we trod,
The self, and not the Guardian Flower, to please.
So came the race's childhood, so the man's, unknown
From out a time when consciousness of sin was none.

Suffering and toil and death, stern-visited three,
Were sent by Him whose every deed is love
From Eden on to bear us company.

As guardian angels, given his love to prove;
Toil that ennobles, pain that purifies, and death
That yields us to the everlasting arms beneath.

Led on by toil and pain, the Son of man
Comes to Gethsemane, clad in servant's guise,
Humbling himself to seek the Father's plan.
"Thy will, not mine; yea, even the cross," he cries,
Obedient unto death, trusting the unseen One.
Through death he overcomes; 'tis ministry is done.

Our garden of delights is far behind;
Before, that garden of agony and death,
Father in heaven, whose grace in Christ hath shined,
Support us, give us victory through faith,
With toil and pain from Eden hand in hand we've trod,
Bid death now lead us to the paradise of God,

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Travels Among the Great Andes of the Equator.

"Cotopaxi is an ideal volcano. It comports itself, volcanically speaking, in a regular and well-behaved manner. It is not one of the provoking sort—exploding in paroxysms and going to sleep directly afterwards. It is in a state of perpetual activity, and has been so ever since it has had a place in history. There are loftier mountains which have been volcanoes, and there are active volcanoes with larger craters, yielding greater quantities of lava, but the summit of Cotopaxi, so far as is known, has the greatest absolute elevation above the level of the sea of all volcanoes that are in working order.

"It is situated about forty-three geographical miles south-east of Quito.

"In the earlier part of 1877, a rather unusual degree of activity was manifested by Cotopaxi, and columns of smoke (composed of fine dust, which is commonly termed volcanic ash) rose sometimes a thousand feet above the cone, and at night the steam and smoke that issued was brilliantly illuminated by flames of incandescent matter within the crater. The dust was carried in this or that direction according to the prevailing winds, and much fell at Machachi and its neighborhood. No alarm seems to have been caused until June 25, when soon after mid-day an immense black column was projected about twice the height of the cone (say 18,000 feet) in the air, and was accompanied by tremendous subterranean bellowing. This eruption was clearly seen from Quito and Latacunga, as the winds blew the ash towards the Pacific, and left the view of the mountain from north and south obscured. The summit glowed at night, but next morning its appearance was normal until 6.30 A. M., when another enormous column rose from the crater. This time the ejected matter first drifted due north, spreading out to the northwest and northeast, and subsequently was diffused by other winds all over the country. In Quito it began to be dusk about 8 A. M., and the darkness increased in intensity until mid-day, when it was like night. One man informed me that he wished to return home, but could not perceive his own door when immediately opposite to it, and another said he could not see his hand when it was held close to his face.

"At daybreak on the 26th, the mountain could be clearly seen from places to the south of it, as the ash was blown northwards, and the eruption does not appear to have excited any particular alarm, or even attention. Some inhabitants of Mulalo, however, were looking at the summit at 10 A. M., and all at once saw molten lava pouring through the gaps and notches in the lip of the crater, babbling and smoking, so they described it, like the froth of a pot that suddenly boils over. The scene which then ensued upon the mountain was shut out from mortal eyes, for in a few minutes the whole of it was enveloped in smoke and steam, and became invisible; but out of the darkness a moaning noise arose, which grew into a roar, and a deluge of water, blocks of ice, mud and rocks rushed down, sweeping away everything that lay in its course, and leaving a desert in its rear. It is estimated that it travelled as far as Latacunga at the rate of fifty miles an hour—and this is not impossible.

"The scene upon the cone in the moments following the outpouring of the lava through the jagged rim of the crater must have surpassed anything that has been witnessed by man. Molten rocks filled the crater to overflowing. Its rise was sudden, and its fall, perhaps, was equally abrupt. One may well pause to wonder at the power which could raise the quantity sufficient to fill this vast arena, nineteen thousand feet above the level of the sea, even for a moment. The weight must be reckoned by hundreds of millions of tons, its heat at thousands of degrees Fahrenheit, and when it emerged through the depression of the rim and fell in streams or cascades upon the surrounding slopes of snow, ice, and glacier, much of it must instantly have been blown into the air by sudden evolution of steam, and falling again upon the cone bounded downward in furious leaps, ploughing up the mountain like cannon-shot. Portions of the glaciers, unaccustomed from their attachments by the enormous augmentation of heat, slipped away bodily, and partly rolling, partly borne by the growing floods, arrived at the bottom a mass of shattered blocks."

Natural History, Science, etc.

Pleasures of Plant Collectors.—Among the great pleasures of the botanical collector is a hope of finding some rare plant in a new locality. During the summer of 1880 the writer formed one of a small party collecting through the southern Alleghanies, and the prospect of finding Asplenium montanum somewhere on the trip, entered largely into the pleasures of the occasion. We had journeyed through North Carolina and Tennessee, along the Swannoo, Catawba, and the French Broad rivers, peering also into the banks that line numberless small streams that fed them,—but still the common question "shall we find Asplenium montanum?" remained unanswered. We had been many weeks journeying northward, and had reached the Greenbrier in West Virginia, near to its junction with the Kanawha; and, finding good "botanizing" at the little village of Hawk's Nest, were very happy. As we tramped on, sweltering under a hot summer afternoon's sun, one of my companions, Professor T. C. Porter, would stop every now and then under some huge rocky bluff, and query, "what would you say if we were to find Asplenium montanum this afternoon?" But though our portfolios opened frequently, it was not for the little fern. At length the sun went down behind the hills, and fearful that we might have miscalculated the distance of our lovely mountain path, we hurried away from the lengthening shades towards our quarters by the river. As we happened to go under the deep gloom of a huge projecting rock, extending half way across the path, the writer remarked, "If those ferns were not so large we might take them for Asplenium Rutanvaria." In an instant Professor Porter was upon a ledge, and "It is Asplenium montanum!" made us both forget, for the time being, the waning sun,—Meehan's Monthly.

Artificial Honey.—A substitute for honey has been introduced in Germany under the name of sugar-honey, and consists of inverted sugar, water, minute amounts of mineral substances and free acid. It has the characteristic taste and odor of bee honey. An examination shows that the artificial product is both chemically and physically a perfect substitute for bee honey. As the article can be produced at a lower price than honey the only product left to the bee-grower is the beeswax.

A New Alloy.—A German firm has brought a new alloy on the market, which is, it is claimed, harder than nickeline, the hardest alloy heretofore known. This new alloy is composed of copper, nickel, and manganese, and is called Kangin.

Don't Kill Harmless Snakes.—If insectivorous birds are destroyed, vegetation will be overrun with insects. If the snakes are destroyed the smaller mammals will increase indefinitely. A good deal of pains is taken to protect birds in some of the States, but none whatever to protect the harmless snakes. These animals are the natural destroyers of the rodents, moles, etc., which are so destructive, and they inflict absolutely no injury. Yet one can hardly open a newspaper without reading of some men or boys who have found a den of snakes and have as a matter of course destroyed every one of them. This is not only a crime but a blunder, and the grade of a man's intelligence is low who allows himself to commit it.

Delicate Scales.—There is a wonderful piece of mechanism in the United States Government Mint in the shape of the scales for weighing the gold coin. Two pieces of paper of equal weight have been placed upon the balances, and on one being removed and an autograph in lead pencil inscribed on it, and the sheet replaced on the scales, the second piece has been found to outweigh the other.

No Such Thing as Mummy Wheat.—Some seeds could live only a very short time after they were shed. It was said that the seeds of the willow would not live more than a few days, some said more than a few hours, they were so speedily dried up; the little embryo was killed and the whole of the life was gone. Of course, this cut at the root of all stories about mummy wheat. It was quite certain, as had been clearly established again and again, that no seed which was buried with the mummy at the time it was put in the coffin had ever germinated. It was not only the examination of the seed that would establish that; experiments had been made to show that this was not the case. A large number of seeds in the British Museum had been examined, taken from mummies, and they were all in the same condition that the mummy itself was in. It would be impossible to stretch out the arm of a mummy, because the whole of the muscle was entirely burned up by the slow action of the oxygen, and it was completely rigid. It was so with the whole of those grains of wheat and flax and various other seeds that were preserved—they were in the same condition. They had been subject to the slow burning action of the oxygen, and the whole of their vitality had disappeared. With regard to what was grown as mummy wheat, it was only a form of corn that was still extensively cultivated on the southern shores of the Mediterranean, and was easily obtained from Arabs and others, who were always ready to impose upon travellers, but brought it home as true mummy wheat.

Memoranda of William Kennard.

Seventh day of the week, and 12th of the month, we rode seven miles to Albion Meeting; which was but a low time, in which I labored some, but to no relief; and so left them; not feeling uneasy with what I dropped. Took leave of dear John Warren, a plain, honest hearted and deeply experienced minister of the Gospel, who travels much abroad from amongst Friends; endures great hardships, and is instrumental in turning many from "darkness to light," and to amend their ways unto righteousness.

Two miles to John Winslow's and lodged.

Thirteenth. From thence to China Meeting, in which I felt the spirit of prayer and supplication, and was drawn forth in the constraining power of an endless life; the spirit itself making intercession to the different states; to the humbling of my soul, and the melting down of many hearts, with the returning of praises through grateful hearts, unto Him who deigns to hear and to answer the prayers of his unworthy children.

Dined at Elijah Winslow's; also had another meeting, same evening two miles from here, at five o'clock, South China, in which we were favored with the Presence of the Great Head of the Church, mercifully condescending to abilitate to declare the Truth of the Gospel, as revealed by the holy Prophets and Apostles; Jesus Christ himself being the Chief Corner Stone; Elect; Precious.

Lodged at Abner Jepson's, whose wife, Comfort, some time past feeling deeply concerned on account of the deviation and apostasy of Elisha Bates of Ohio, although never having seen him; her sleep left her under a painful consideration of his present condition and downfall, at length was made willing to relieve her mind by addressing him by way of letter; after which she felt easy in her mind; and having it by her some time, she read it to John Warren; he thought it suitable to the occasion. I also have heard it read, believe it has come from the right authority; which she placed in my hand to deliver to him. She is an esteemed minister among Friends.

Fourteenth of Eighth Month. Resting and writing at Elijah Winslow's; and very crippling; sore with the rheumatism through my breast and shoulders.

Fifteenth. Attended China Monthly Meeting, which was large, and favored with Holy Help; after which I felt easy in my mind; leaving Friends in much good will, and sweet peace and joy in the Holy Ghost.

Dined at Oliver Jepson's; rode about eight miles, and at Nathan Moore's in East Vassalborough lodged.

Now Sixteenth of Eighth Month and Fourth-day of the week, four and a half miles to Vassalborough river meeting; attended their Monthly Meeting to satisfaction. Silent in the forepart. In the latter part, I had some labor, in both men's and women's meeting to good satisfaction; taking my leave of them as a final parting opportunity in Gospel Love.

Dined at Caleb Nichols's; rode seven miles; and lodged at Edward Cook's near Sydney, where their Monthly Meeting is held.

To-day, Seventeenth of Eighth Month, attended the Monthly Meeting of Sydney, in which I felt the Power of Truth to compass me about as a girdle; under and by which, I was enabled to labor in testimony and supplication for the gathering of the people unto the Shiloh of God. Felt relief and sweet peace of mind; it being a renewed visitation, and a humbling season to many people.

Dined at Peter Paddock's; from thence to Alton Pope's, about eleven miles and lodged; a man who has one of the greatest factories for varnishing cloths in this Eastern County.

From here four miles to Ezra Briggs' at Leeds; where we attended their Monthly Meeting to good satisfaction. From thence to Leeds fifteen miles, accompanied by our dear Friend Reuben Jones and wife, at whose house we lodged. Had a meeting at Leeds on the 19th of the month to satisfaction. Now the 20th of the Eighth Month accompanied by our kind friends Reuben Jones and wife twelve miles to Lewistown, called at David Davis's two miles from here, to meeting, where we had a meeting, made up of a mixed multitude, in which I sat long before I felt the Power of Truth to arise, in which I was enabled to declare the Truth to the humbling of many minds.

Dined at David Davis's; was accompanied by Levi Meader to Windham twenty-six miles. Lodged at Nathaniel Stephens's.

From here to meeting five miles. Called on the way to see an aged man near eighty-two, by the name of Elijah Kennard; a goodly, tender-hearted Friend.

At Windham there is a Quarterly Meeting held, at which place we had a large meeting to good satisfaction; also at Gorbam, five miles from the former, at four, in the evening, same day, to good satisfaction.

Lodged at William Cable's, and was informed by him, that when David Sands was along here at Portland, that in visiting families, he left a draught to visit a family not members of our Religious Society; but the son attended Friends' Meeting; and in the visit, he expressed three times, "I see the graves opening, and the graves thrown out."

And there were but three of the family, father, mother and son; which in about two weeks were all three buried; the last funeral David attended on his return.

It is now the Third-day of the week, and 22nd of Eighth Month.

From William Cable's we went to North Berwick, forty miles; lodged at John D. Lang's.

Twenty-third. Attended the select Quarter; silent and peaceful in mind. Dear Moses H. Beede had good service.

Lodged at the house of our friend abovementioned.

It is now 24th of Eighth Month, and last night there fell a considerable white frost, and perhaps it will cut down some of the tender vegetation.

This morning, received two very acceptable letters; one from Joseph Edgerton, and the other from Mary Edgerton and her daughter Christiana Gray, which were reviving to my mind.

Attended the Quarterly Meeting of Berwick which was a good one.

Dined at William Hill's. From thence seventeen miles to Hauson Meader's, and lodged.

From thence ten miles to New Durham, where we had a meeting to pretty good satisfaction.

Dined at Thomas Roberts's? From thence seventeen miles through a mountainous, rocky country, almost literally covered with stones, and thickly settled. Reached Wolfsborough; lodged at Lindley M. Hoag's.

First-day of the week and 27th of the month attended Wolfsborough Meeting, which was pretty largely attended by those not in membership with Friends; and whilst my mind was under a deep concern, lest the Cause should suffer, my mind was turned unto the Lord in prayer; and feeling the Word of Life to arise, which strengthened me to relieve my mind in testimony; after which, L. M. Hoag, a short and lively testimony; after which, I felt my mind drawn forth in supplication very sweetly.

Dined at Joseph Varney's; from thence twenty-two miles to South Sandwich among the high mountains of New Hampshire State, reached Cyrus Beede's, an ancient and honorable minister, 27th of the Eighth Month.

The 28th of the month; this day we had two meetings; one at eleven o'clock, which was a good one; the other at four o'clock, seven miles, held at North Sandwich, in which I had good service; felt sweet and Heavenly peace cover my mind, to the humbling of the creature as in the dust; all praises belongs unto Thee, O Lord! forever and ever! Amen.

Lodged again at Cyrus Beede's; and on leaving our dear friend's, I proposed getting into the quiet; the family assembled, and a solemn, parting opportunity it proved, in which we were brought near one unto another, in the Heavenly relationship, and our hearts in brokenness filled in love unto Him who was graciously pleased to be in the midst, unto whom belong all praises.

From thence about forty miles to Gilmanton. Lodged at Nicholas Jones's.

Had a meeting with them to good satisfaction, and accompanied by him and his wife to Pittsfield about sixteen miles. Lodged at a Friend's by name of Jonathan Miller, whose wife was a minister, and much esteemed, and died near a year ago, and has left a daughter, a young woman of good repute whose countenance speaks that she has been with Jesus in the Garden; and in a sweet and favored opportunity with the family, my mind was drawn to impart a word of counsel to keep pace with knowledge, and I believed that she would be favored to wear her mother's mantle; which took very great hold of her mind, until all present were broken down before the Lord.

Mayest Thou O God! be pleased to carry on Thy great work in the earth, in the hearts of man until Thy righteous knowledge shall reign, and cover over all, "as the waters cover the seas."

Attended Pittsfield Meeting, which was a blessed and Heavenly meeting. My way open; my tongue loosened, and as the pen of a ready writer; this blessed meeting ended with thanksgiving and praises unto the Great Head of the Church.

Dined at Moses Peesley's; and here we parted with our near and dear friends Nicholas and Abigail Jones, in great tenderness.

Rode about sixteen miles to Concord, and lodged at Thomas Thordike's. Now first of Ninth Month; here we had a meeting with the few Friends; in which I had some service; but Truth is at a low ebb, and I should think, not kept to the reputation of the Society.

At this place is the State Prison of New Hampshire; and having an opportunity of seeing the poor objects of distress and pity, who for their bad conduct and wicked deeds are here confined to hard labor for a long time; which is much better, than to take away life; but the reflection of man's bringing himself to such a state of degradation and wretchedness, brought serious feelings over my mind, and desires that sin and transgression might come to an end; and that everlasting righteousness might prevail over death and darkness universally, and the Kingdoms of this world become the Kingdoms of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

From here we travelled fifteen miles to South Weare, and lodged at Levi Gove's.

Seventh-day morning, Second of the Ninth Month. The latter part of yesterday and evening, my mind endured great leanness and poverty of spirit, which brought on a renewed exercise of mind to know my dear Lord's Will concerning me; desiring that "His Hand might not spare, nor His Eye pity, until he should bring forth judgment unto righteousness; and that strength might be given to endure the furnace, until all that is not of His own immediate begetting in me, may be consumed; that Christ may be all in all, to will and to do, that all praise may be given alone unto Him, that gives to all men liberally."

"The rain is over; the winter is past; the time of the singing of birds is come; and the voice of the turtle is heard in the land." Behold "He cometh leaping upon the mountains, and skipping upon the hills," bringing glad tidings of great joy!

On the second of the month, had two meetings; one at South Weare and the other at North Weare, six miles distant from each other; both renewed seasons of Divine favor. Lodged at John Page's.

Third of Ninth Month. Notice is given of our attendance of Henniker Meeting to-day, six miles from the other, which we attended; a dull, restless, and uneasy meeting, with many; and the testimony which I had amongst them was sharp; commencing with that saying of our Lord, that "Men do not gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles;" and thus proceeded; the Power of Truth in a good degree prevailed; blessed be the Lord forever!

Address of the Committee of the Peace Society to the Electors of Great Britain and Ireland.

Fellow Countrymen.—The approach of a General Election brings into prominence one of the greatest moral and political evils of our times, and induces us to call your attention to the remedies.

Year by year, what Mr. Disraeli termed the "mad rivalry of bloated armaments" is placing heavier burdens upon the nations, and rendering more uncertain the prospect of permanent Peace, while, as a consequence, the military spirit spreads itself more and more into the very life of society. Each addition to the fighting organizations of a country necessarily involves an increase of a class directly interested in the maintenance of the system, and makes it harder for nations to retrace their steps and to reduce their financial and other burdens.

The growth of the warlike spirit carries with it grave moral dangers, which are none the less real and inevitable because they are insidious and not easily estimated. If, as a community advances in morals, it increasingly regulates its conduct by the standard it applies to the individual, then militarism, of necessity, bars the way of the nation's advance towards the true Christian ideal; and in proportion as any people gives itself up to "learning war," it must enfeeble itself morally, and so fail in its religious tone, duty, and advancement. Thus the prevailing militarism becomes an increasing menace to the very life and prosperity of the nations of Christendom.

It is well known, moreover, that most of the European nations are face-to-face with serious financial difficulties resulting from their warlike rivalry. Each series of annual Budgets shows their respective expenditure increasing at an enormous rate; the resources of each are necessarily limited; no relative advantage accrues to any single State; and the withdrawal of a large amount of productive energy for military service not only lessens the industrial resources of each, but adds to the burden of unremunerative expenditure to be borne by those who are left engaged in industrial pursuits.

The alternative to this destructive national policy is, surely, International Arbitration and Mutual Disarmament, alternatives which would prove far less detrimental to the State in times of peace, and much more satisfactory in its results in times of dispute, than the arbitration of the battlefield.

We acknowledge that the present Government, although adding materially to the war expenditure, has generally pursued otherwise a policy of Peace. We would, however, earnestly urge that more is expected from the Government of a country like ours than a mere passive peace policy maintained by warlike measures. It should take the initiative in promoting a better understanding and a more pacific condition of things among the nations. The religion, progress, and enlightenment of the age, together with actual international exigencies, all demand some distinct and active effort in the direction of lessening the military burdens of the world. It becomes the imperative duty of the nation which is freest and best able to act, wisely to lead the way, and so to make mutual disarmament practicable for itself and its neighbors. Were half the anxiety manifested by the so-called Christian nations of Europe to meet each other for the purpose of arranging disarmament, as they display in a continued desire to outstrip each other in vast armies and navies, surely a very different state of mutual relationships would be speedily established.

The principle of International Arbitration which is advocated as a substitute for War, has been frequently applied and found practicable and effective. There have been seventy-five instances in the last seventy-five years. The practice of a just, righteous benevolence has always proved itself the truest defence. The "golden rule" of Christianity has been declared by both Mr. Gladstone and Lord Salisbury to be the wisest and all-sufficient principle of international policy. Arbitration, moreover, has been so often adopted by both parties in the State that it ceases to be a question of mere theory. It has "come within the range of practical politics," and what now remains is, that it should be embodied in international action.

Upon the great body of the Electorate will fall the duty of seeing that these principles of Peace and Arbitration are carried into effect, so far as this can be done by the selection of candidates. The large representation of "the Services" in the House of Commons generally consists of men who, by life-long association with the great spending departments, are naturally anxious to see "the Services" with which they are, or have been, connected, brought by large additional expenditure into what they deem to be a condition of thorough efficiency—a condition which, alas! long and undeviating experience has found to be unattainable, so long as human ingenuity can provide new inventions for the destruction of mankind, or the resources of the moneyed and industrial classes can be taxed, with the object of hiring more citizens for the purposes of war. A legislature largely composed of such persons cannot be expected to adopt a policy which promotes the opposite of that to which, by association and training, by profession and interest, they are naturally committed.

We confidently appeal to you as Electors, and urge you to send to Parliament those candidates who will avow themselves willing to support pacific measures, who favor a policy of reason instead of force, and who will promote International Arbitration, peace, progress and prosperity.—Herald of Peace.

Grave-stones.—The Annual Report of the Riverside Cemetery at Cleveland, Ohio, contains the following remarks: "And now indulge me in a few words upon the utter uselessness of disfiguring our lawns with slabs, shafts and grave-stones to mark the resting place of the departed. You ask, 'Would you then discourage these marks of affection and remembrance?' I answer freely, that the sole object of placing these obstructions to the natural beauty of the landscape is to mark permanently the spot where our loved ones are laid to rest. Have you ever stopped to consider how futile this puny effort is in the light of the history of the past ages?" All must have noticed the unsightly and often disgraceful appearance of old and neglected cemeteries, with their broken, tottering and crumbling gravestones. Do they accomplish the one practical object? Do they afford a permanent and lasting record to the spot where their forefathers sleep, for the descendants of future generations? All that tread the globe are but a handful to the tribes that slumber in its bosom. Where are the graves of the departed millions since time began? Where are headstones of past generations? Disintegration and final decay is the certain fate of every trapping and adornment of this nature."

Cremation.—It may not be generally known that the practice of cremation was forbidden to Catholics by a decree of the Sacred Congregation, conformed by Leo XIII in the Fifth Month, 1886. In this decree cremation was spoken of as "a pagan custom of burning the dead bodies of men," in contrast with "the constant Christian practice of burying in the earth the bodies of the faithful; a practice consecrated by the Church by solemn rites." It was forbidden for Catholics to become members of a cremation society or to give instruction that their own bodies or the bodies of others should be burned. In giving his approval to the decree Leo XIII spoke of it as "detestable abuse." The grounds of objection appear to be that it has been always a distinctively pagan practice whose advocates have been almost exclusively enemies of Christianity; that it is opposed to the unbroken traditions of the Church, and that it is incompatible with the ritual prescribed for Christian burial, and that Christian sentiment revolts against it as tending to diminish the respect due to the body created in the image of God and consecrated in baptism. Notwithstanding this condemnation a sentiment in favor of cremation is certainly growing among the most devout Protestants, if not among Catholics.—The Independent.

Women and Wine.—We are informed by despatches from Europe that Lady Henry Somerset has publicly stated that she found during her trip to the United States a universal sober womanhood. She has been present at several social affairs at which intoxicating drinks were among the refreshments offered to the guests, and she had seen only one woman partake of wine or liquor. We cannot be certain that this is a correct representation of what she said; but we regret to have to say that, if such were her experience, her opportunities of ascertaining practice in the City of New York must have been limited.

In fashionable circles many women drink wine. It can be seen served in broad daylight in many of the leading hotels and restaurants on Broadway and Fifth Avenue. At weddings and receptions it is not extravagant to say that often scores of women may be seen drinking wine, and many of them obviously flushed by it.

At a great wedding in this city, within three months, where the bride's father is a prominent member of an evangelistic society, the wines were numbered by hundreds, it was impossible to move twenty feet without finding a waiter offering wine to the guests, and as a lady was passing into the refreshment-room she was shocked by meeting persons carrying out a gentleman who had succumbed to the seductive influences. At that wedding young girls were seen sipping wine.

It is quite possible that some persons to be true to their consciences would not be able to get printed here if we did not know them to be true. American fashionable women drink less than those of some other nations, but the tendency for the past fifteen years has been steadily and alarmingly to the increased drinking of wines; prior to that time for some years it had diminished. Beer also is indulged in by hundreds of thousands of women of foreign extraction in this country, and by many others who have gradually contracted the habit.—The Christian Advocate.

Church and State.—One of the little incidents of a Sunday Church service the other day, when the English vicar had two Non-conformists appointed to collect the tithes due him. They refused to perform their duties, and an action was brought against them for failure to make collections; and they were actually convicted and fined.

Licensing Gambling.—A New Orleans telegram on the 1st ult. says that the Grand Jury has presented a recommendation to the Legislature and the Judges of the Criminal District Court in favor of licensing gambling. The Grand Jury declares that it has been found impossible to suppress gaming, and it proposes the adoption of the high-license system, recommending a fee of $2,400 a year and the Mayor to be the sole judge as to whether a gambling-house shall be permitted to do business. The money is to go to the Charity Hospital. Provision is also made that no miners shall be allowed to enter the gambling-house under penalty of a forfeiture of license; that no gambling be allowed on the ground floor of buildings, and that a private officer be stationed at each door to preserve order. New Orleans has twice before tried the experiment of licensed gambling, but with results so unsatisfactory as to be followed by early repeal. As in the case of high-license liquor-saloons, the last estate was found to be worse than the first. To legalize an evil which ought not to exist, is inevitably to intensify the injury it inflicts upon the community.

Women Preaching.—We are asked by The Central Presbyterian of Richmond, Va., what ground we have to suppose that our Lord, who would now choose women apostles or would authorize them to be ordained to preach and bear rule in the Church? Simply that He has done so. We believe He rules his Church to-day, and that his Spirit is now in his Church; and under this leading and inspiration a great many women have been chosen as apostles and have gone out to preach and bear rule. Our esteemed contemporary reminds us that Paul enjoined silence upon women as far as public preaching was concerned. Doubtless he did, and doubtless they obeyed. But it is equally beyond question that in these latter days he has poured out his Spirit upon our daughters as well as upon our sons, and has hidden them to speak. Each age has its own message from its Lord.—The Independent.

An Invitation to Join in Worship.

[We received, within a few days, a letter from Jane Jennings, of Colebrook, County Addington, Ontario, containing the invitation which follows. We have no knowledge of the writer beyond what is furnished by the letter itself.—Ed.]

If there are any, even two or three, who love to wait upon the Lord, and who know that their strength is to sit still, (Isaiah 30:7.) My house is open for such to come and worship, in Spirit and in Truth, for the Lord requireth such to worship Him. Of course there are numerous places with stated forms of singing, prayer, and studied up discourses, which they are pleased to call worship. Still it does not feed the hungry souls, nor fill the place of the inward Light and Leading of the Holy Spirit, (in my particular case at least.) I am not a birthright Friend and had little or no knowledge of their religious principles, until thus led by the Holy Ghost. I trust, therefore, I am not at all prejudiced. Should this come before any who may live at a convenient distance, who would like to come with me and worship, and learn of Christ by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, my home is open to such. If they will kindly write me so that we may make the necessary arrangements, and let us hope that the remnant that is escaped of the house of Judah, shall again take root downward and bear fruit upward.

JANE JENNINGS.

COLEBROOK, Ontario, County Addington.

DEFECT in our business morals is the failure to recognize fully the right relation of service to profit, of use to gain. It is recognized to a certain extent. The lottery has been put down. The gambling-table has become made illegal, and gambling hides itself behind closed shutters and drawn blinds. But a root evil of gambling is that it seeks to make a gain without rendering a service. It is therefore the purest illustration of covetousness; that is, the desire to enrich one's self at the expense of one's neighbor.

It is not true, however, that a very large part of business reaches no higher moral level than this? Is there even a desire to serve any use while accomplishing a gain? It would be presumptuous to pronounce upon many transactions of a speculative nature, as to whether or not they come under this censure. There are often services in such transactions which do not appear on the surface. But there are also many transactions, considered perfectly legitimate, in which it is hard to trace even the suggestion of a service to the other party, and which, therefore, must come under the condemnation of the Tenth Commandment.

No gain without a use, no profit without a service, is really a part of the moral code of honest business.—S. S. Times.

LET not the gaiety of your house laugh at the plainness of your person.

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 23, 1892.

We learn that the Biblical Department of Earlham College—Richmond, Indiana—is to be enlarged and its title changed to The Biblical Institute of Earlham College. It is furnished with a number of Professors, to each of whom is assigned the instruction to be given in particular branches of the general subject. As one of them is Evangelistic and Pastoral Work, we suppose one object of the Institute is to train "pastors and preachers" as similar theological schools in other denominations are expected to do.

This project involves so radical a departure from the principles held by the Society of Friends in reference to ministry and religious labor, that we are inclined to believe, that if twenty years ago one had told some of those connected with the proposed institute, the position in which they would be placed, they would have rejected the assertion in a measure of the same spirit which induced Hazeel to say to Elisha, "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?"

The one essential qualification for gospel ministry, is the bestowal of the Divine gift by the Head of the Church, and the renewed call to service by Him, on every occasion. It is the power of his spirit accompanying the labor of the speaker, and impressing the hearts of the hearers, to which all the good effected must be attributed. The natural tendency of such a training as a Biblical Institute can furnish is to lead the student to trust in the knowledge of the Bible, the facility of expression, and the intellectual training which he has received, and thus to enable him to utter a discourse on every occasion when he inclines to, without reference to the fresh extension of Divine Power.

It is a distressing thought that so many persons who claim the honored name of "Friend," should have been led to forsake the principles ever held by its faithful members.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The House Representatives, on the 13th inst., Representative Catchings, from the Committee on Rules, offered a resolution setting aside the 13th inst. and the next legislative day for the consideration of the Senate Free Coinage bill. After a hard fight the victory was won by the anti-silver men. The resolution reported—yeas 136, nays 154. This vote is the death of silver legislation at this session.

In the United States Senate on the 15th inst., the Naval Appropriation bill was presented, and the House amendments were agreed to. The bill now goes to the President. The Conference report on the Legislative Appropriation bill was presented and agreed to, and the bill will now go to the President. The same action was taken on the conference report on the Army Appropriation bill, and it will also go to the President.

Senator Quay offered an amendment to the World's Fair provision, in lieu of the First-day Closing amendment, declaring that all the appropriations made for the Exposition are made on the condition that it shall not open on First-days. The amendment was agreed to. The bill and amendments were reported to the Senate, and all the amendments were agreed to in the Senate. The bill is now ready for the sale of intoxicating liquors within the grounds of the World's Fair, and the other as to the geological survey. Senator Cullom asked a separate vote on the amendment prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors within the World's Fair grounds. The vote was taken and the amendment prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors was rejected—yeas, 21; nays, 29.

Ten of the regular annual appropriation bills have gone to the President, and have become laws or will very shortly. They are the Military Academy, Legislative, Diplomatic and Consular, Post Office, Army, Navy, Indian Affairs, and the Departments of the Interior and Agricultural bills. There are now none of the appropriation bills in conference, and but three remain to pass through that stage—namely, the Sundry Civil (now before the House for action on the Senate amendments), the Fortification (ready for return to the House), and the Efficiency.

The Postmaster General received notice that the South African Republic, known as the Transvaal, has joined the Universal Postal Union. This act reduces the rate of postage on letters from ten cents per half ounce to five cents per half ounce, and on all other matter from two cents to one cent for two ounces.

Strikes at Pittsburg were quiet for several minutes. The town having been occupied by the military, preparations have been made for the re-opening of the mills by non-union men, or such of the striking union men as will go back and renounce their allegiance to the Association. On the 14th inst. the employees of the Carnegie iron mills in Pittsburgh went on strike out of sympathy with the locked out men at Homestead, or because the company refused to confer with them. About 3,000 men are affected by the strike.

The employees of the Beaver Falls mills also went on strike for similar reasons.

Secretary Lovejoy, of the Carnegie Steel Company, on the 18th inst. appeared before an Alderman and made information against Hugh O'Donnell, the leader of the locked-out Homestead men; John McLuckie, Burgess of Homestead; Sylvester Critchlow, Anthony Flaherty, Samuel Burkett, James Flannagan and Hugh McGee, who are charged with the murder of T. J. Connors and Silas Wayne on the morning of Seventh Month 6th, during the riots.

O'Donnell has disappeared, and it is thought that the arrests will have a discouraging effect on the strikers.

The Governor of Idaho having formally called upon the President for the assistance of Federal troops in suppressing the disturbances in the Cour d'Alene district, troops were ordered to be sent at once from Fort Sherman, Idaho, and from Fort Missoula, Montana.

The Union miners of the Cour d'Alene district in Idaho went to Wardner and, taking possession of the mill of the Dunker 1131 and Sullivan, they threatened to blow it up unless the non-union men surrendered. On the 11th the men surrendered. The miners captured by the Union mob at the Gem and Frisco mines were taken to Wallace and turned loose, after all their arms and ammunition had been secured by their captors.

The Federal troops, under Col. Carlin, and a force of Idaho militia reached Wardner, to find that the strikers had dispersed to their respective mining camps, taking their arms with them. They had sent all the captured non-union men out of the country. The men who participated in the outrages are being arrested.

At 3 o'clock.—The elections in Great Britain will result in a victory for Gladstone and the Liberal Party, by a majority of perhaps fifty.

At 3 o'clock on the afternoon of the 18th the returns reported showed the election of 311 supporters of the Government and 347 of the opposition.

It was also announced that as a result of the visit of Lord Salisbury to the Queen at Windsor Castle, the Conservative Government will meet Parliament on Eighth Month 4th.

In view of the small majority which the Liberals will have in the next Parliament, the Chronicle says: "It would be useless for Mr. Gladstone to go before the country on the subject of the Home Rule bill, had he done something not only to improve the voting machine by registration reform and a one-man-one-vote bill, but also to convince the working class and the middle class that it is worth their while to use it in the Liberal interest. Mr. Gladstone need not hurry to try a fall with the Home Rule bill, but to wait for the intervals between the early and later stages of the Home Rule bill and between its first rejection by the House of Lords and its renewed tender by the House of Commons with fiscal, London and rural reforms. For the Liberals to go to the country with empty hands is to decide either its doom or vital modification of its entire organization."

A terrible accident has occurred at St. Gervais-les-Bains, in Savoy. A heavy landslide occurred in the mountains that almost overhung the village, and, without a moment's warning, a number of houses were buried beneath immense masses of rock and earth. This was caused by the melting of a glacier on Mont Blanc. The number of people killed is placed at two hundred.

The Berlin correspondents of the Times telegraph to his paper as follows in regard to the Bismarck controversy: "The Bismarckian organs are beginning to recognize that their grand attack on the Government has failed. The Deutsche Wochenblatt, a Bismarck paper, has again pronounced for peace and good-will with an allusion to the right of clemency as the noblest attribute of the crown."

When Prince Bismarck, who has always asserted that he has done no wrong and has nothing to regret or withdraw, is classed by his own friends among those for whose withdrawal from the crown would be avowed, it may be assumed that the work of the fight is over."

The eruption of Mount Etna is rapidly increasing in violence. Immense streams of lava are pouring down the mountain side, and it appears certain that several villages and a number of dwellings in the paths the lava is taking are doomed to total destruction. All the craters are active, and it is expected a continuous stream of lava several yards deep and very wide. This stream presents the appearance of a river of fire and is very beautiful to look at, though it is bound to ruin much property.

Another of the craters is hurling large incandescent rocks to an immense height, while the edge of the third crater throws up a fine white smoke.

Since 1869 there have been 11 eruptions of Mt. Etna, in 1869, 1874, 1878, 1883 and 1886.

The report of the Spanish Medical Commission, that was sent to Paris to inquire into the nature of the epidemic so-called "choleric," has been received. The report declares that the disease is Asiatic cholera.

In consequence of this report the Government has ordered that precautions be immediately taken along the Pyrenean frontier to prevent the introduction of the disease into Spain.

Cholera has reached Kazan. Steamship service between Odessa and the Caucasus has been stopped. A floating cholera hospital is moored in the Volga below Nijni-Novgorod.

Since the last report twenty new cases of cholera and eleven deaths from the disease have been reported at Simbirsk, on the Volga River.

An official cholera report shows that on Seventh Month 8th and 9th there were 495 new cases of the disease and 139 deaths throughout all the Russian districts affected. The heaviest mortality at any single place was at Baku, where there were 62 deaths.

A dispatch from St. Petersburg says: A statement issued by the Agricultural Department, compiled from the reports of 4,000 agents, says that an average harvest of winter wheat and rye is expected, but the corn crop will be under the average. A good crop of summer corn is assured. Other summer crops are above the average. The crop of hay is above the average in the black earth regions. Elsewhere they are fair.

The steamer Cattherun, which has arrived at Sydney, N. S. W., reports that when she touched at the Island of Timor there was a rumor current that the Island of Sangir, in the Malay Archipelago, had been destroyed by the eruption of the volcano. The population, comprising 12,000 souls, had perished. The Cattherun steamed four miles through masses of volcanic debris.

WESTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—A stated meeting of the Committee on Admissions will be held at 4th and Arch Streets on Seventh-day, the 23rd inst., at 10 A. M. JOHN W. BIDDLE, Clerk.

DIED, 15th of Third Month 1892, at the residence of her son-in-law, near Raymond, Blackhawk County, Iowa, Mrs. H. H. Hart, nee Levi Heald, nearly eighty-three years of age. Although this dear Friend had for many years been deprived of society by being so remotely situated, yet, as the infirmities of age and affliction increased, her interest in the welfare of Society and her friends, seemed unabated. She desired to die in the merciful arms of Levi Heald, nearly adding, I feel to love the whole human family. She bore a painful illness of a year and a half, caused by cancer, with Christian fortitude; several times desiring to depart and be at rest, but said she had craved for patience to suffer all the Lord's appointed time; and when she felt that her earthly mission was over, and the shadows of the future are dispelled, and the gleams of that radiant shore which I am nearing, seem spread around where, I trust, I shall soon be to join the loved ones long gone before.
